childe in the Court, and for this cauſe eſpecially had Solyman ſent him thither to be aſſured G that it was he. At length after long diſcourſe and conference betweene the King and the Embaſſadors, it was agree vpon, that the King ſhould receiue from Solyman full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him ſuſtained ſince the comming of Baiazet into Perſia, with ſuch further reward as ſo great a good turne deſerued: which things performed, that then it ſhould be in Solymans power to haue Baiazet made away. With this news Haſſan poſteth to his maſter at Conſtantinople, who forthwith cauſed the promiſed reward, togither with ſuch charges as the Perſian King demanded, to be made readie, and with a ſafe conuoy to be ſent vnto the borders of Perſia, where they were of the Perſians receiued. Preſently after returneth Haſſan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat Baiazet: for ſo Solyman had ſtraitly charged him to ſtrangle him with his owne hands. H Which thing this new made hangman accordingly performed, and with a bow-ſtring ſtrangled the vnfortunate Prince; who is reported to haue requeſted of the executioner, that he might but ſee his children before he died, and take of them his laſt farewell: which poore requeſt could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the woſull end of the vnluckie attempts of Baiazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in ſeeking to ſhun the death he feared, haſted the ſame before his time. Such as was the fathers end, was alſo the end of his foure ſons, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhamet: of whom the three eldeſt were ſtrangled at Casbin with their father, whoſe dead bodies together with his, were ſolemnly brought to Sebaſtia and there buried. The yongeſt but new borne left at Amaſia, and ſent by his grandfather to Pruſa (as is before ſaid) to be there nurſed, I was now vpon the death of his father commanded by his ſaid grandfather to be ſtrangled alſo. The Eunuch ſent by Solyman to haue done the deed, and loth to do it himſelfe, tooke with him one of the Porters of the Court, a deſperate and otherwiſe a hard hearted Ruffian, a man thought fit to haue performed any villanie: he comming into the chamber where the childe lay, and fitting the bow-ſtring to the childes necke to haue ſtrangled him, the innocent babe ſmiled vpon him, and lifting it ſelf vp as well as it could, with open armes offered to haue embraced the villaine about the necke and kiſſed him. Which guiltleſſe ſimplicitie ſo wounded the ſtonie hearted man, that he was not able to performe the intended butchery of the poore ſimple child, but fell downe in a ſwoune and there lay for dead. The Eunuch ſtanding without the doore maruelling at his long ſtay, goes in, and finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, with cruell hand performed that K the other could not finde in his heart to do, and ſo ſtrangled the guiltleſſe childe as had bin giuen him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercie or compaſſion of Solyman that ſo long cauſed the guiltleſſe infant to be ſpared, but rather the opinion generally receiued amongſt the Turks, who meaſuring all things by the good or bad ſucceſſe, refer all things that fall out well, vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer ſo vngraciouſly begun: and therfore ſo long as it was yet vncertain what ſucceſſe the attempts of Baiazet would haue, Solyman ſpared the infant, leſt vpon his fathers good hap he might ſeem to haue ſtriuen againſt the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrell by the euill ſucceſſe thereof condemned as it were by the ſentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to ſuffer him to liue, L leſt of an euill Bird might come an euill Chicke. I had ſometime (ſaith the reporter of this Hiſtorie) great reaſoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Baiazet, he began bitterly to inueigh againſt him for taking vp armes againſt his brother. Wherunto (ſaith this Author) I replied, That in mine opinion he was worthie both to be pittied and pardoned, for as much as he was of neceſſitie inforced either to take vp arms, or elſe ſhortly after to yeeld himſelfe to the ſlaughter. But he ſtill exclaiming againſt him, I ſaid vnto him, You blame poore Baiazet of great wickedneſſe for bearing armes againſt his brother: but Selymus Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occaſion tooke vp armes both againſt his father and his brethren; yet he therein did nothing amiſſe, nor in your iudgement blame worthie. And rightly, (ſaith the Chiaus) for the euent of the matter ſheweth ſufficiently, M that that which he did was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from Heauen predeſtinated thereunto: whereas in Baiazet the euent ſheweth the cleane contrarie. So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer ſo wicked means compaſſed or brought to paſſe, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall out otherwiſe, they iudge it as a thing condemned by God himſelfe; depending wholly vpon the good or bad euent of things,

A things, and therefore iudging them to be well done, or otherwiſe.

Charles the emperour reſigneth the Empire to his brother Ferdinand, and ſhortly after dieth.

This yeare 1558, Charles the fift that noble Emperor (of whome we haue in the courſe of this Hiſtorie ſo often ſpoken) who wearie of the world, had two yeares before deliuered all his hereditarie kingdomes and principalities to his ſonne Philip, did now the 24 of Februarie, on which day he was borne, by his Embaſſadours ſolemnly ſent for that purpoſe, reſigne that Empire with all the honors and titles thereof vnto his brother king Ferdinand, requeſting the Princes Electors to confirme the ſame vnto him, which they did the thirteenth of March next following. So liuing as a priuat gentleman in that ſolitarie life whereunto he had to the wonder of the world certaine yeares before retyred himſelfe from all worldly affaires, the 21 day of September following died of a feauer, when he had liued 58 yeares, and thereof B raigned 39: a man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongſt the greateſt Chriſtian Emperors that liued before him. About which time alſo died his two ſiſters, Mary the Queene of Hungarie, and Elenor the French Queene, both Ladies of great honour.

The Chriſtian Princes ſet out a fleet for the recouery of Tripolis in Barbary

The Knights of Malta, who of long had beene ſuters to the great Biſhop and the King of Spaine, for the recouerie of Tripolis in Barbarie, about nine yeares before taken from them by the Turkes; at which time they alſo ſurpriſed the Iſland of Zerbi vpon the coaſt of Barbarie betwixt Tripolis and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Chriſtians trauelling by thoſe ſeas: had now at length ſo much preuailed, that the King commanded a great fleet to be now forthwith made readie in September in the yeare 1559, to meet together in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly againſt the enemie by Malta. Vnto which fleet, the great Bi- C ſhop, the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, joined their forces alſo; ſo that at length there was a hundred gallies and ſhips met together vnder the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the Generall. But whilſt this fleet from diuers places was long in comming thither, the Duke of Medina Cœli came before with part of the fleet to Malta, and in the hauen of Marza Moxet expected the comming of the reſt, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whileſt they were wintered expecting the Spring, many of the ſouldiers fell ſicke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their ſetting forward being come, the Captaines conſulted among themſelues, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet vpon Tripolis, or the Iſland of Zerbi, otherwiſe called Mening. D The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better firſt to beſiege Tripolis, and that with all ſpeed, before Dragut ſhould come thither to furniſh it with ſouldiers and prouiſion. Others thought it better firſt to inuade the Iſland of Zerbi, where the armie might be relieued with plentie of all things neceſſarie, and from whence they might at all times of danger in ſafetie retyre; and from thence afterwards as time ſhould ſerue, to go to Tripolis. Which vnfortunate counſell was by the greater part agreed vpon. Wherefore in Februarie the yere following they departed from Malta, and ſailed directly to Zerbi. In the meane time Dragut the moſt famous pyrat of that time amongſt the Turks, and gouernor of Tripolis, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, and had notably ſtrengthned the citie with men, victual, and new fortifications; and preſently ſent meſſengers to Solyman at Conſtantino- E ple, to certifie him of the arriual of the Chriſtian fleet in Affrick. But the Chriſtians comming to the Iſland of Zerbi, were at the firſt landing incountred by the Moores, whom they repulſed, and ſo at pleaſure landed. This Iſland is not far from the maine, here and there ful of bogs and mariſhes, other riuer hath it none, and in the middeſt is ſomewhat hilly. It was inhabited with about 30000 men, which dwelt in low cottages, ſimply apparelled: yet is the Iſland reaſonable fertile, yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and ſuch like. When the Chriſtians were there landed, they ſent for Carauanus a poore King amongſt the Moores (from whome Dragut had before taken that Iſland) to vſe his counſell for their better proceeding in that war. In the meane time they agreed with 8000 men to beſiege the ſtrongeſt caſtle in the Iſland: in going whereunto, the Spaniards went foremoſt, the Germans next, and laſt of all the Italians. By F the way as they went they light vpon 10000 Moores which lay in ambuſh in a wood, to haue vpon the ſudden ſet vpon them vnawares; but being diſcouered, and 700 of them ſlain in skirmiſh by the Spaniards, the reſt fled. So comming to the caſtle they planted their batterie, and laid hard ſiege vnto it. The Captaine of the caſtle finding himſelfe too weake long to hold out, fled ſecretly with his Turks, leauing the caſtle for the Moores to defend; who vpon condition that they might in ſafetie depart, yeelded the Caſtle to the Spaniards: for keeping Piall Baſſa Solymans Admiral ſent to remoue the Chriſtians out of Zerbi.

whereof, Varona and Cerda two Spaniſh Captaines were there left with their Companies. G Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Carauanus the Moore king came to the camp of the Chriſtians and there talked with the General; in whoſe hoarie countenance reſted a reuerend Maieſtie: his apparell was after the Moores faſhion of white linnen, with him came alſo the King of Tunes his ſon. In talking with the Generall his manner was to ſit flat vpon the ground, and wiſely diſcourſed how the Turks were to be remoued out of Affricke. But in the middeſt of theſe diſcourſes, when ſuch a thing was leaſt feared, ſuddenly a pinnace brought newes from ſea, That Piall Baſſa the Turks great Admiral was comming thither with a great fleet of eighty fiue gallies, and that moe were daily repairing vnto him on euery ſide. Which was indeed true: for Solyman vnderſtanding from Dragut the Arch-pyrat, that Iſland to be by the Chriſtians now poſſeſſed and fortified, thought it not (in his ſo great power and flouriſhing eſtate) to ſtand H with his honor to ſuffer, but rather to giue aid vnto the Moores of that Iſland, a people agreeing in religion with himſelfe: and therfore commanded Piall Baſſa his Admiral to take in hand that expedition. Who therupon rigged vp a great fleet wel appointed & ſtrongly manned with a number of the Turks beſt and moſt approued ſouldiers, as well Ianizaries as others: yet all both doubtfull and fearefull of the long journy, as alſo of the fame of the enemies with whom they were to incounter: for why, the Turks had conceiued a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great wars both of antient and later times to haue bin by that nation (to the immortall praiſe thereof) moſt happily performed: they remembred Charles the fift, and daily heard much of king Philip, the heire both of his fathers vertues and kingdomes; which I made them ſo careful, that many of them before their ſetting forth (as in times of greateſt danger) made their wils, and ſo departed from Conſtantinople, taking their leaue of their friends, as if they ſhould neuer haue thither returned again. So that all the city was in a confuſed feare:
neither was there any man, whether he went or ſtaid, that hung not in ſuſpence with the doubtfull expectation of the euent of that war. Howbeit Piall with this great fleet, with long ſailing and a proſperous wind was at length come welneere as far as Malta, and knowledge therof (as aforeſaid) giuen vnto the Chriſtian fleet at Zerbi. With which vnexpected news the Chriſtians there were not a little troubled: neuertheleſſe they fortified the caſtle with new fortifications and bulwarks, and fell to agreement with the principall man amongſt the Moores of the Iſland, who commanded the reſt, and had before pluckt downe the enſignes of Dragut, and ſet K vp the king of Spaines) that he would yearely pay vnto the king of Spaine (as he had before vnto Dragut) ſix thouſand crownes, one camel, foure Oſtriches, foure Sparrow-hawkes, and foure blew Faulcons: a tribute fit for ſuch an Iſland.

But ſhortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great maſter of Malta by another pinnace gaue the Chriſtians at Zerbi again to vnderſtand, That the Turks fleet was euen now at hand, and alreadie departed from the Iſland of Gozo, wel appointed and ſtrongly manned: and that therefore he aduiſed them with ſpeed to hoiſe ſaile, & to get them to ſome place of more ſafety, or els to come to him to Malta, for feare of being by ſo great a power of the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed.
Whereupon Iohn Andreas Auria the Admirall ſent vnto the Generall, requeſting him to come abord, that ſo they might before the comming of the Turks fleet, retire themſelues to L ſome place of more aſſurance. But he for all that ſtaied ſtill at the caſtle, where the Chriſtians had built foure ſtrong bulwarks: wherof they had named one Auria's, another Gonzaga's, the third the Viceroy's, and the fourth the Knights, not yet all perfectly finiſhed: as for for the caſtle it ſelfe they called it Philip-Alcazer, by the name of the king. But whileſt the Generall is thus buſie, and vainly hopeth to keepe both the caſtle and his ſhips, he the next day deſcrying from far the comming of the Turks great fleet, haſted with the Admirall to be gon: and putting twice to ſea, was both times by a contrary wind driuen againe into the hauen, ſo that hee and the Admirall had much ado in time to get them into the caſtle: for the wind was ſo fauorable for the Turks, and brought them ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians diſmaied with their ſudden comming, knew not now well what to do, or which way to turne themſelues. But by good hap, the greater part of the ſhips and 14 gallies were got out and gon the night before, and the M Great maſter had in Aprill called home his gallies, wherewith and ten others of his owne hee afterwards defended the frontiers of his Iſland. As for the reſt of the fleet that ſtaied for the Generall and the Admirall, ſome few gallies eſcaped by flight, other ſome ran themſelues aground, ten of which were preſently taken by the Turkes, as were the reſt alſo that were left, although

Part of the Chriſtian fleet oppreſſed at Zerbi by the ſuddē comming of the Turks.

A although they for a while did what they might to haue ſaued themſelues. The night following, the Viceroy and the Admirall ſecretly ſtole out of the caſtle, and ſo by good fortune in two ſmall frigots fled to Malta, Carauanus alſo the Moore King, with the Prince of Tunes, got them away into the maine. Gonzaga the Viceroy departing from Malta in Sicilia, prouided as he might for the ſafetie of that country. Auria in the mean time gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed fleet, hauing loſt in this vnfortunat expedition ſeuenteene gallies, with a great part of the ſhips.

Now in the caſtle was left as Generall, Don Aluarus de Sandes, a valiant gentleman of great ſpirit and long experience, with fiue thouſand footmen, ſome Germans, ſome Italians, but for the moſt part Spaniards: beſides a thouſand other that were no ſoldiers. So that the Turks B beginning to beſiege the ſame the ſeuenteenth of May, were by them many times notably encountered, and in their aſſaults repulſed. Vnto this ſiege at length came Dragut the pyrat, who with fifteene great pieces which he brought with him from Tripolis, encreaſed the fury of the Turks batterie. Neither were the Chriſtians in the meane time wanting vnto themſelues, hauing in the caſtle fortie great pieces of artillerie, wherewith they ſlew a number of the Turks and Moores: and ſometimes ſallying out, fought with them hand to hand, and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, retired againe into the caſtle. In this manner the ſiege continued three moneths with many an hot and deſperat skirmiſh: during which time, nothing more troubled the defendants than thirſt in that hot and drie climat and intemperat time of the yere: for why, in the caſtle there was but one great ciſterne, which although it yeelded ſome good ſtore of C water, yet was it not enugh to ſuffice ſo great a multitude, but was by meaſure ſtil ſparingly giuen out to the ſoldiers ſo far as it would ſerue, no man hauing more allowed him than would ſuffice to keep him aliue: the quantitie wherof ſome augmented by diſtilling of the ſea water, and mingling it with their allowance, and ſo well eaſed their thirſt, vntil ſuch time as hauing ſpent all their wood, they wanted that poore helpe alſo. There might a man haue ſeene many poore ſoules lying vpon the ground halfe dead, gaping and ſtill crying out nothing but Water, water; into whoſe drie mouths, if any man vpon compaſſion vouchſafed to poure a little water, they as men reuiued therewith would preſently ſit vp, vntill that for thirſt they fell downe againe, and ſo at length as men roſted gaue vp the ghoſt. Thus many died daily, beſide them whom the chance of warre and other deſeaſes without helpe conſumed in ſo great a diſtreſſe, D Don Aluarus the Gouernor conſidering the great extremitie they were now brought vnto, attempted with Don Sanchius de Leyua Admirall of the Neapolitan gallies, Belingerius de Requeſenes Admirall of the Sicilian gallies, & ſome others, by night to haue eſcaped away into a gallie which lay vnder the caſtle, but in doing thereof were perceiued by the Turks, and ſo all taken. Whereupon ſuch ſoldiers as ſickneſſe and the enemies ſword had yet left aliue, pinched with extreame neceſſity, forſaken of their beſt captaines, and out of all hope of reliefe alſo, couenanting their liues onely with the enemie, yeelded themſelues into moſt miſerable captiuitie. In this vnfortunat expedition periſhed about eighteene thouſand Chriſtians, ſome with ſickneſſe, ſome drowned, but moſt ſlaine, beſide the loſſe of a great part of the fleet alſo.

The caſtle of Zerbi beſieged by the Turks.

The caſtle of Zerbi yeelded vnto the Turks

Of this victory Piall ſent news by one of his gallies to Conſtantinople, which for the more E manifeſting thereof, dragged at the poupe thereof a great enſigne of the Chriſtians, with the picture of Chriſt crucified therein. Which was no ſooner come into the hauen, but that the rumor of the ouerthrow of the Chriſtians was forthwith blowne thorow the whole citie, the Turks exceedingly reioicing one with another for the news of ſo great a victory: yea many of them not ſo contented, came by heaps to the gate of the houſe where the Emperor Ferdinands embaſſador lay, & there meeting with his ſeruants, by way of diriſion asked them, if they had any brethren, kinſmen, or friends, in the Spaniſh fleet at Zerbi, for if you haue (ſaid they) you ſhall ſhortly ſee them here. Beſides that, they with many words moſt inſolently bragged of their own valor, & ſcorned the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, asking, who were able to withſtand them, now that the Spaniard was alſo ouercome. Al which with much more the embaſſadors F men with great griefe were inforced to heare, but there was no remedy, ſeeing God had ſo appointed it. Shortly after, in September, the victorious fleet returned to Conſtantinople, dragging with it the priſoners, ſpoiles, and gallies of the Chriſtians, a ſight no leſſe pleaſant vnto the Turks, than heauie vnto the Chriſtians: & that night it lay at anker neere vnto the rocks in the face of the city, with the greater pomp and glory to come the next day into the hauen. At which time Solyman himſelfe was come downe into a gallerie neere vnto the hauens mouth, G adioining vnto his garden, the better to ſee the comming in of the fleet, and the Chriſtian captaines ſet there to ſhew vpon the poupe of the Admirall gallie, namely, Don Aluarus de Sandes, Don Sanchius de Leyna, Don Billingerus de Requeſenes, all of late great commanders: as for the Chriſtian gallies all diſarmed and vnrigged, ſo to ſeem the more contemptible in compariſon of the Turks, they were towed at the taile of the Turks gallies. They which then ſaw Solymans countenance, perceiued not in him any ſigne at all of any inſolent ioy. I my ſelfe (ſaith * Busbequius, then the Emperour Ferdinands embaſſadour there) ſaw him two daies after going to the church with the ſame countenance he had alwaies, with the ſame ſeueritie and grauitie, as if this victorie had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced ſtrange or vnexpected: ſo capable was the great heart of that old ſire, of any fortune, were it neuer ſo great; and his mind ſo H ſetled, as to receiue ſo great applauſe & reioycing without mouing. Within a few daies after, the Chriſtian captiues (before almoſt ſtarued with hunger) were brought to the court: many of whom could ſcarce ſtand vpon their legs, ſome others for weaknes fell down and fainted, and otherſome died outright: they were all ſcornefully led in triumph, with their armes diſordered and ſcornfully put vpon them: the Turks in the meane time inſulting round about them, promiſing vnto themſelues the empire of the whole world: and vainly asking, What enemie they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was ouercome. Aluarus Sandes, as chiefe of al the priſoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Viſier Baſſaes, and demanded by Ruſtan Baſſa, What his maſter meant, being not able to defend his own, to inuade other mens: anſwered, I That it beſeemed not him to iudge theron; and himſelfe to haue done but his dutie, with ſuch faithfulnes as was meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therein. After that, he beſought the Baſſaes vpon his knee, to ſpeake for him vnto Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, with certain ſmall children, for whom he requeſted him to ſpare him. Whereunto Ruſtan Baſſa (contrary to his manner) courteouſly anſwered, his ſoueraigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he was in good hope his pardon might be of him obtained: ſo was he commanded away vnto Caradines his caſtle, towards the blacke ſea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called backe againe; for that the great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet ſeen him: for which cauſe he was ſent for backe again; wherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing leſt the Baſſaes hauing changed their minds, would haue put him to death. The reſt of the captiues of the better K ſort were committed to the caſtle of Pera, and amongſt them, Don Sanchius de Leyna, with his two baſe ſonnes, and alſo Don Billingerus Requeſenes: which two great men, with Don Aluarus de Sandes, were neuertheleſſe afterwards with much ado and almoſt beyond all hope, at the requeſt of the Emperour, and by the dexteritie of his embaſſador, by Solyman ſet at libertie; although he had before denied them vnto Saluiat the French kings embaſſador, wo had bin an earneſt interceſſor for them. Yet before they were deliuered out of priſon, the Muphti or Turks great prieſt was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Chriſtian captiues (for the embaſſadour beſide the rewards he had promiſed vnto the Baſſaes, to further the matter, had alſo vndertaken, that fortie common priſoners of L the Turks ſhould be ſet at libertie for them) whereunto the Muphti anſwered, That the Doctors of their law were of diuers opinions concerning that queſtion, ſome ſaying that it was lawfull, and ſome not; howbeit as then it was by him reſolued vpon vnto the more fauorable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were among the priſoners taken at Zerbi, beſides theſe noblemen of whom we haue before ſpoken, two other noble gentlemen right honorably borne, Don Iohn of Cardona Don Billinger his ſon in law, and Don Gaſto the duke of Medina his ſonne, to whom yet but a youth his father neuertheleſſe had giuen an honorable place in the armie. Of theſe two Don Iohn had wiſely taken order for a great ſumme of money to be left in the Iſland of Chio, by the way as the Turks fleet went to Conſtantinople, from whence he afterwards in ſafetie got into Spain. But Gaſto was by Piall Baſſa (vpon hope of a great ranſome) purpoſely hid out of the way, M which had like to haue wrought his deſtruction: for Solyman hauing gotten an inckling thereof by the inſtigation of Ruſtan, laboured for nothing more than to haue Gaſto found out, ſo to haue a more iuſt occaſion for the putting of Piall to death, being taken tardie in ſo manifeſt a fault. But all that labour was ſpent in vaine, Gaſto being by death taken away, but whether by

A the plague (as ſome reported) or by Piall his means (as it were more like) leſt the truth ſhould be found out, is vncertaine. But certaine it was, that being with great care ſought for by the Duke his fathers ſeruants, he could neuer be heard of more: So that it was thought Piall for the ſafegard of his owne life, not to haue ſpared Gaſto his priſoners life. Who neuertheleſſe for a long time liued in great feare, and not daring to come to Conſtantinople, tooke occaſion with a few gallies to wander about amongſt the Iſlands of Ægeum, as if he had there ſomething to do: but indeed ſo ſhunning the ſight of his angrie lord, for feare he ſhould haue been compelled in bonds to haue anſwered the matter. Vntill at length he appeaſed at the requeſt of Suleiman Baſſa (the Eunuch and Solymans great Chamberlaine) and of Selymus, Solymans ſon, granted him his pardon in theſe words well worth the marking, out of the mouth of an Infi- B dell Prince: Well haue hee from me pardon and forgiueneſſe for ſo great an offence: but let God the moſt iuſt reuenger of all villanies take of him due puniſhment after this life. So fully he ſeemed to be perſuaded that no euill deed ought to remaine without puniſhment, either in this life or in the life to come.

Pial in diſgrace with Solyman, ſhunneth to come to Conſtantinople.

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turks well acquainted with Busbequius the Emperours Embaſſadour, then lying at Conſtantinople: into whoſe hands (in that diſcomfiture of the Chriſtians) by chance was come the Imperiall enſigne of the gallies of Naples; wherein within the compaſſe of an Eagle, were contained the armes of all the Prouinces belonging to the kingdome of Spaine. Which faire enſigne the embaſſadour vnderſtanding him to purpoſe to giue for a Preſent vnto Solyman, thought good to preuent the matter, and to get C it from him: which he eaſily obtained, by ſending him two ſutes of ſilke (ſuch as the Turkes make reckoning of) for it: ſo prouiding that one of the Imperiall enſignes of Charles the fift, ſhould not to the eternall remembrance of that ouerthrow, remaine ſtill with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion. This ſo miſerable a calamitie receiued by the Chriſtians at Zerbi, made that Iſland, before little or nothing ſpoken of, to be euer ſince famous.

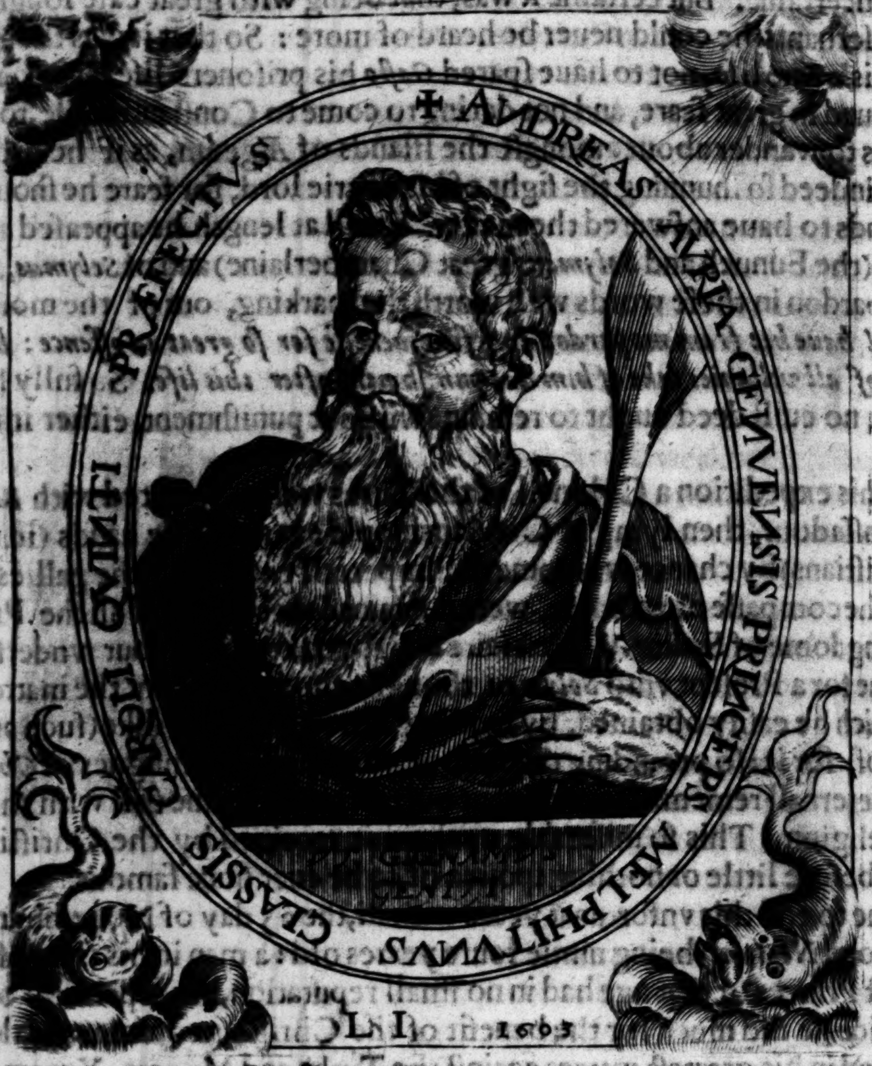
About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall, the 25 day of Nouember died Andreas Auria (that ſecond Neptune) being nintie foure yeares old: a man in his time of great fame, and of the greateſt Princes of that age had in no ſmall reputation, but eſpecially of Charles the fift, in whoſe ſeruice he did much for the benefit of the Chriſtian common weale, being for moſt part imployed in his greateſt warres againſt the Turks and Moores. Yet amongſt all the D notable things done to his immortall glorie, the kindneſſe by him ſhewed vnto his natiue countrey was greateſt; which oppreſſed by the French, he ſet at libertie: and when he might haue taken vpon him the ſole gouernment thereof (as had diuers others before him) moderating his deſires, and reſpecting the onely good thereof, appeaſed the great diſſention that had of long raigned therein; and eſtabliſhed ſuch a forme of gouernment, confirmed with ſo good and wholeſome lawes and orders (no mans libertie infringed) as that it hath euer ſince to his eternall praiſe, in great wealth, ſtate, and liberty, thereby flouriſhed. Vnto whoſe remembrance (for that we haue before of him much ſpoken in the courſe of this Hiſtorie) I thought it not amiſſe to ioyne the liuely counterfeit of his reuerend aged countenance, by nature framed anE ſwerable vnto his noble vertues.

The death of the noble Andreas Auria.



ANDREAS AVRIA GENVENSIS PRINCEPS MELPHITANVS CLASSIS CAROLI QVINTI PRÆFECTVS

Genua quem genuit, genui quam deinde viciſsim, Auria qui merui Carolo ſub Cæſare quinto, Turcarum terror, piratarumque Subactor, Barbara quem ſenſit tellus, & capta Thuniſſa, Arx & Aphrodiſium, Moriaque vrbs celſa Corone, Mors rapuit Luſtris decies prope quinque peractis.

As Genoa did me beget, ſo I preſeru'd the ſame:
  And ſeruing vnder Charles the fift, exalted haue my name.
A terrour to the Turks I was, I brought the pyrats low:
  And ſpoiling the Barbarian coaſt, made them my force to know.
Faire Tunes and ſtrong Aphrodiſe, both by my helpe were woon:
  And Corone in Morea, by me was ouerrun.
So hauing ſpent ninetie foure yeares in treading honours trace: Full fraught with honour and with yeares, I ended haue my race.

1561 A great ſhip-wrecke. The Turks the yere following, with their gallies robbed and ſpoiled diuers places vpon the coaſts of Italie, Sicilie and Malta: againſt whom Philip King of Spaine ſending forth his gallies, by force of tempeſt loſt twentie fiue of them, the eighteenth day of September, together with Mendoza Admirall of that fleet.

Ferdinand the Emperour, hauing with long ſute and much intreating obtained peace of Solyman, A lyman, and being now well ſtricken in yeares, and carefull both of the ſtate of the empire and of the aduancement of his poſteritie, began to deale with the Princes Electors for a choice to be made of a King of the Romans; who after his death might without the trouble of Germanie, ſucceed him in the empire: commending vnto them his ſon Maximilian, a Prince of great hope, then King of Bohemia. Whereupon an aſſembly of the Princes Electors was appointed to be holden at Franckford: who there meeting at the appointed time, with generall conſent the 24 day of Nouember in the yeare 1562, choſe Maximilian the Emperours ſon king of the Romans, and with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities crowned him: who alſo the yere after was at Presburg the eight of September with much ſolemnitie crowned king of Hungarie. Vnto this ſolemne aſſembly of the empire at Franckford, Solyman the Turkiſh Emperour B ſent Ibrahim Baſſa, otherwiſe called Abraham Strozza (a Polonian borne, of whom we haue before ſpoken) his embaſſador with Preſents and letters to Ferdinand the Emperor, to confirme the peace for eight yeares betwixt them before concluded; who the ſeuenteenth day of Nouember in preſence of the Emperour, the king of the Romans, and all the Princes Electors, had audience: where after much glorious ſpeech in ſetting forth his maſters greatneſſe, with his loue towards the Emperor and his ſonne the new choſen king, as wiſhing vnto them all happineſſe, he deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperour: the coppie whereof I haue not thought amiſſe here to ſet downe, for that therein is notably to be ſeen the moſt inſolent pride of that barbarous Prince, and miſerable eſtate of the rent kingdome of Hungary, diuided as it C were at his pleaſure betwixt him and the Emperour.

Maximilian choſen king of the Romans, & after crowned King of Hungarie.

Solyman by his embaſſador confirmeth a peace with Ferdinand the emperor for eight yeares.

Solymans proud letters to the Emperour Ferdinand.

I the Lord of Lords, ruler of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, who am of power to doe and not to doe whatſoeuer pleaſeth mee, Lord of all Grecia, Perſia and Arabia, Commander of all things which can be ſubiect to King and command; the great Worthie of theſe times, and ſtrong Champion of the moſt wide World, Lord of all the white and blacke ſea, and of the holy Citie of Mecha ſhining with the brightneſſe of God, and of the Citie of Medina, and of the holy and chaſte Citie of Hieruſalem, King of the moſt noble Kingdome of Ægypt, Lord of Ionia, and of the Citie of Athens, Senau, of the ſacred Temple of God, Zabilon and Baſſio, Rethſan and Magodim, the ſeat and throne of the great King Naſhin Rettam, and Lord of the Iſland of Algiers, Prince of the Kingdomes D of Tartarie, Meſopotamia, Media, of the Georgians, Morea, Anatolia, Aſia, Armenia, Walachia, Moldauia, and of all Hungarie, and of many other Kingdomes and territories, whereof I am Emperour; the moſt mightie Monarch Sultan Solyman, ſonne of the great Emperour Sultan Selym, who haue power from God to rule all people with a bridle; and ſtrength to breake open the gates and barres of all Cities and ſtrong places: Into whoſe mightie hand are deliuered all the ends of the World, none excepted. I the ruler of the Eaſt, from the Iſland of Tſein vnto the fartheſt bounds of Affrica, whome God hath appointed a mightie warriour in the edge of the ſword: amongſt whoſe moſt mightie Kingdomes the impregnable Caſtle of Ceſaraa is reputed for the leaſt, and in whoſe hereditarie dominions the Kingdome or Empire of Alexander the Great is accounted of as a trifle: with mee is the ſtrength of the whole World and vertue of the firmament. Foraſmuch as thou E King Ferdinand, which art the mightie Lord of Chriſtendome, and the choſen veſſell of the mightie Chriſtian Faith, created and elected Emperour of the Romane people, of Bohemia, Vandalia, Crabatia, and many other Countreys King and Lord, &c. Not long ſince ſent vnto our Court (which is the refuge of all Kings, the protection and ſanctuarie of all that flie thereunto, and the throne of Grace for all Princes of theſe times which repaire vnto it) one Augerius Busbecke, thy faithfull Counſellour and Embaſſadour, with Letters of conſideration, to renew with vs a peace, and to enter into a further league and bond of amitie: Which letters beare date the yeare from the Prophet Ieſu (vpon whom and our Prophet Mahomet reſt the brightneſſe and peace of God) 1562, the firſt day of Iune, requeſting of vs, That granting you peace for eight yeares, we would not with any hoſtilitie heereafter moleſt your Cities, Caſtles, or Countries, ſubiects, but to ſuffer them to liue in ſecure peace and tranquilitie, F &c. Vnto which your petition wee anſwere you, That from henceforth for the whole ſpace of eight yeares ſhall bee betwixt vs on both parts to be continued a new, true, and firme league: of which agreement, peace, and confederation, theſe ſhall bee the conditions. Firſt, That you our beloued ſhall be bound to ſend yearely to our court as a pledge of this league thirtie thouſand Hungarian Duckets, with that remainder which you owe vnto vs for the two yeares laſt paſt: For which wee promiſe vnto you, that wee from henceforth during this eight yeares league, will take no part either by way of hoſtilitie or friendſhip with King Iohns ſonne, foraſmuch as belongeth to his hereditarie countries, whether they bee in the hither part of Hungarie, or on the further ſide of Teiſſe: All which for all that, by law of armes belong vnto vs. And the ſame King Iohns ſonne in time of this eight yeares league ſhall bee alſo bound in ſuch ſort to performe vnto vs his obedience, as that from henceforth it ſhall not be lawfull for him to vſe any warre or hoſtilitie againſt you, neither to trouble your ſubiects with fire or ſword, nor to ſurpriſe your Cities, Caſtles, or Townes; or by violence to take away or exact of your people or ſubiects, their ſheepe, their cattell, their goods, money or reuenewes. Wee alſo our ſelues ſhall haue no right, nor take occaſion to driue away your people, to burne your countries, or carrie away any captiues: but rather in this eight yeares ſpace religiouſly keepe peace and concord with you. And vnder theſe conditions of peace ſhall alſo be comprehended Michaell Balaſchus, Nicholas Bathor, with all their goods and territories, and diuers other ſuch like, which ſhall bee ſubiect vnto you and King Iohns ſonne. To be briefe, if happily any of yours or King Iohns ſonnes ſubiects ſhall haue now before in time of warre thruſt one another out of his goods, lands, or poſſeſſions, whereof new quarrels or diſcord may ariſe; wee will and decree, that all ſuch controuerſies, quarrels, and claims ſhall bee deferred vntill this definite time of the league expired. Beſide, if by chance any diſſention ſhall hereafter ariſe betwixt vs about our iuriſdiction, which can by no meanes be compoſed and ordered; we will that yours ſhall in the mean time remaine as yours, and ours as ours; all contention and enmitie ſet apart: alſo many townes ſcituate heere and there by Danubius and Tatta, ſhall be ſuffered to vſe the ſame law which they did in former time; ſo that the ſouldiers which are yet in garriſon in the caſtle of Tatta, ſhall haue no right to infeſt or vexe thoſe townes ſcituate neere vnto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your noblemen or gentlemen ſhall fortune to haue any of our noblemen by reuolt or other occaſion whatſoeuer, captiues, they ſhall diſmiſſe them and ſet them at libertie, to returne vnto their friends freely without hurt or ranſome; that ſo the concord and peace begun betwixt vs, may bee the more firmely kept, and our ſubiects liue in more ſecuritie. All and euery one of theſe things we grant and promiſe to bee of vs from henceforth vntill the end of the aforeſaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiouſly obſerued and kept: and for that purpoſe haue cauſed theſe our letters of this peace and confederation to be publiſhed from our royall pallace: and moreouer, haue not onely prouided, that the coppie of the ſame ſhould together with our edict be proclaimed to all and euery the Generalls, Captaines, Lieutenants, of our armies both by ſea and land, in all the parts of our empire, and to all our mercinarie ſouldiers, but haue alſo ſtraightly commanded, that it ſhall bee firmely and ſincerely kept. We will alſo, that this agreement of peace and amitie ſhall comprehend and concerne our two chiefe Gouernours or Vaynods of Vallachia and Moldauia, ſo that none of your people of Hungarie, Crabatia, Sclauonia, or other your countries or Iſlands whatſoeuer, ſhall in any ſort bee moleſted or grieued by our ſubiects. And if it ſhall fortune that ſome ſhall on your part out of their Caſtles ſet vpon our ſubiects, or by force take away their goods, the ſame men ſhal in any caſe be bound to make thereof reſtitution. Alſo if any ſhall flie from vs, and carry away with them the money or goods of their maiſters whome they ſerued, or if the like ſhall be done by any of yours flying to vs, then the ſame goods on both parts are to be of right demanded and recouered againe, and the fugitiues to the example of others to be corrected and puniſhed: foraſmuch as fugitiues goods of right appertaine vnto their Lords and maſters. Furthermore it ſhall bee lawfull for your Captaines and Commanders to fortifie or build Caſtles, Cities, or Townes, in the borders of Hungarie, and to put into the ſame victuall, armour, and ſuch like, but ſo, that they doe none of theſe things out of their owne limits. And during the time of this league, it ſhall not be lawfull to take or carrie away any of your ſubiects priſoners either in Hungarie or in other place of your iuriſdiction: which for all that, if it ſhall by any chance happen, that then ſuch captiues without delay be ſuffered) ſafely to returne home againe. Furthermore, whatſoeuer Chriſtian ſhall haue any buſineſſe to doe in our magnificent court or any part of our dominions, as are Embaſſadours, officers, ſeruants and ſuch others: vnto all theſe we not onely grant and permit, that they may come and goe about their buſineſſe, and ſo againe depart from our court or prouinces; but alſo haue willed and commanded, them to bee well and courteouſly entreated by our ſubiects, and furthered with the interpretation of our language. And if it ſhall fortune any contention or diſcord to ariſe betwixt our ſubiects on either ſide, about the bounds and limits of Lands, or other ſuch like cauſes: ſuch controuerſies we wil to be decided and determined by diſcreet and indifferent men on both parts, and the authours of ſuch diſcord and variance, to be puniſhed as ſuſpected perſons and breakers of the league. We alſo prohibite thoſe skirmiſhes or combats, which were woont to be ſometimes on both ſides made vpon the borders. And deſire, that the forme of this league and peace, and euery article thereof, may bee

A publiquely read and ſet vp in ſundrie places of your Dominions; and commandement giuen, that they may with due obedience and reuerence be obſerued and kept. Which we likewiſe haue now before promiſed faithfully and aſſuredly to performe: and your Embaſſador whom a few moneths agone you ſent vnto vs, in your name requeſted the ſame of vs, and hath with earneſt prayers mooued vs, by Imperiall oath and theſe Letters of credence to witneſſe, that we did ratifie and confirme the ſame; as if wee our ſelues ſhould ſpeake to you in preſence. Wherefore we haue giuen to him theſe our letters of Pacification to you directed, that your Generals, ſouldiers, and ſubiects, may be bound alſo to obſerue and keepe all theſe things: wherefore, ſo long as nothing contrarie to this league ſhall be done on your part; ſo long in like manner all theſe articles of peace ſhall be of me accepted and aſſured. For witneſſe and confirmation whereof I ſweare this oath; By the true and liuing Creator of heauen and earth, by the true ſignes of our B great and reuerend Prophet, by my Imperiall power, and by my true faith; that nothing contrary or repugning vnto the aforeſaid articles, conditions, and promiſes of the eight yeares league agreed vpon betwixt vs, ſhall be attempted or done by any our Gouernours, Generals, or Vayuods, &c. Commanding moreouer, all our ſworne Gouernors of our moſt mightie Empire in Walachia and Moldauia, and king Stephen himſelfe, and others which haue the gouernment of our Empire confining vpon you, That they all and euery of them as well as our ſelues, ſhall iuſtly, faithfully, and religiouſly accept, reuerence, and keepe theſe conditions of peace, towards your ſubiects, cities, caſtles, townes, and other things appertaining to you; and in the leaſt thing not to hurt, iniurie, or wrong any your ſubiects. In briefe, we ſhall as far as our part concerneth vs, giue vnto this moſt mightie and great new made loue and friendſhip, ſo great honour, reuerence, and authoritie, that that which may euen in the leaſt things be had, ſhall not on C our part be wanting. In token whereof, we haue ſuffered certaine Chriſtian captiues, whom by your Embaſſador you requeſted to haue ſet at libertie, franckly to returne vnto you without ranſom; out of which captiuitie they could neuer haue been redeemed, if in regard of this our amitie and friendſhip we had not granted them libertie: truſting that you will in like ſort ſet at libertie ſuch of ours as you haue captiues. Giuen at our Imperiall Palace and ſeat in the moſt mightie citie of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of September, in the yeare of our great and reuerend Prophet 969.

The Turks purpoſing warre, craftily ſue for peace.

Preſents from Solyman to the Emperor Ferdinand.

The ſame Embaſſador after he had deliuered theſe letters, preſented vnto the Emperor the gifts he had brought from his great Maſter: which was two great cups of naturall Cryſtall curiouſly wrought and ſet with ſtones of great price; a couragious Turkie horſe with a ſaddle D and trappings wrought with gold, and ſet with pretious ſtones, and garniſhed with chaines of pure gold; and foure of the faireſt camels that were to be got in all Conſtantinople. In deliuering of which Preſents the Baſſa made his excuſe, that the horſe and camels had loſt their beautie, being with foure moneths trauel from Conſtantinople, growne ſomewhat leane and wearie.

The death of the Emperor Ferdinand.

New troubles in Hungarie.

This peace thus concluded betwixt the Emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeres after in the yere 1564 vpon S. Iames his day died, being ſixtie yeres old: whereof he raigned as Emperor not full ſeuen yeares. In whoſe place ſucceeded Maximilian his ſon, before choſen King of the Romans. But immediatly after the death of Ferdinand, the Captaines on the frontiers of that part of Hungarie which was holden E for the Emperour on the one ſide, and the Turkes Captaines with the Vayuod of Tranſyluania on the other ſide, wearie of their eaſe, began contrarie to the forme of the League, to ſurpriſe ſtrong holds and townes one in anothers confines, whereof enſued much trouble. The author whereof was Melchior Balas the Emperours lieutenant in that part of Hungarie, which bordereth vpon Tranſyluania, who firſt ſurpriſed certaine townes vpon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge whereof, the Vayuod ſuddenly ſet vpon Sackmar a towne in the Emperors Territorie, which he tooke, and therein Balas his wife and children. In deſpight whereof Balas ranſacked and burnt Debrezin a great Towne of the Vayuods. But not long after, the Vayuod Solymans Vaſſall, and aided by him with foure thouſand Turkes and three thouſand Moldauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of Hungarie which belonged vnto F the Emperour; and firſt tooke Hadad, and afterwards beſieged Vngar. In requitall whereof, Maximilian the Emperour ſent Lazarus Suendi a valiant Captaine, who with an Army of eight thouſand beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Tokay, which he tooke the fift of Februarie, in the yeare 1565, and after that tooke the rich Towne of Erden. In the meane time Solyman, who had in himſelf fully purpoſed to be reuenged of all theſe iniuries (as well appeared by that he did the yeare following) to ſtay the Emperour from proceeding farther, vntil ſuch G time as he were at better leiſure to be reuenged, (for as then he was making great preparation for Malta) ſent Marcus Lilineſius a renegat Tranſiluanian of Cibinum, his Embaſſador to Maximilian, to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to wiſh him to haue regard how he further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperour, becauſe he would not ſeeme vnwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his lieutenants and captaines no more to inuade Tranſyluania or that part of Hungarie which the Turkes held. Howbeit that whileſt this Embaſſadour was thus entreating of peace at Vienna, the Baſſa of Temeſware in the borders of Tranſyluania, made diuers incurſions into the borders of Hungarie, and with ſix thouſand ſouldiers beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of Iula, and the Turks in great number came daily into Tranſyluania. At which time alſo Suendi Generall of Maximilian his H Forces vpon the frontiers, by meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, wiſhed him not to giue any credit vnto the Turks Embaſſadour, who meaning nothing but warre, vnder the colour of peace ſought nothing els but to take him vpon the ſudden vnprouided. Neither ceaſed theſe troubles thus, but dayly grew from euill to worſe: for in Iune the Tranſyluanians beſieged Erden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two moneths ſiege had it yeelded vnto them.

In the meane time Chernouich the Emperours Embaſſador to Solyman, returned from Conſtantinople; aſſuring him, that the great Turke for all his faire ſhewes of peace, meant indeed nothing but warres, for which he was (as he ſaid) making great preparation both by ſea and land.
Whereupon the Emperour began to raiſe new forces: which thing diuers Noblemen both of Germanie and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers: and amongſt I other Romerus one of the Knights of Malta, and diuers others of his brethren, with fiue companies of ſouldiers well appointed, ſent thither by George Hochenheime grand Prior of that Order in Germanie, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the ſame time alſo, the Turkes being buſie vpon the borders of Styria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke: who taking them at an aduantage, ſlew at one time three thouſand of them. Yet for all this, the Turkes Embaſſadour was ſtill at Vienna treating for peace, and ſo cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma a valiant Captaine, had corrupted the chiefe Iudge with certaine others of Alba-Regalis, to haue betraied the Citie vnto him; for performance whereof they had deliuered their wiues and children as hoſtages, and he was now vpon his way from Rab, which is but eight miles off, in an aſſured K hope to haue ſurpriſed the Citie; he was ſuddenly by letters in poſt from the Emperour, called backe againe, for corrupting the hope conceiued of peace: and ſo was that notable deſignement vnfortunately diſappoined: of which practiſe the Turkes hauing knowledge, afterwards moſt cruelly executed fortie of the conſpiratours, impaling ſome of them vpon ſharpe ſtakes, and hanging others vpon yron hookes by the jawes vntill they were dead.
Shortly after the Turkes tooke Neoſtat, which was not long after againe recouered by the Emperour.

At the ſame time one of the Turks ſpies was taken at Zigeth, who but thirteen daies before was ſent from Conſtantinople, of purpoſe to view the ſtrength and ſcituation of that place: he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, ſaid, That Solyman would aſſuredly L the next Spring come in perſon himſelfe into Hungarie, to beſiege the ſtrong caſtles of Zigeth and Iula. At which time alſo Countie Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turks Spies, by whome he was certainly aduertiſed of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongſt others, Scaphir Vayda the Baſſa of Buda his chiefe Counſellor. Beſide this, the countrey men contributors both to the Imperials and the Turkes, were now ſtraightly commanded by the Turks, to pay no more contribution money vnto the Imperials: whereupon it was eaſily gathered, that all that talke of peace was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing els but to delay the time, and to put them in ſecuritie. Beſide that, the Turks made incurſions daily into one place or other of the Emperors territories, ſhewing their antient hate, and ſowing by thoſe light skirmiſhes, as it were the ſeed of a greater war againſt the next Spring: which the Emperour M now out of doubt of (being alſo warned thereof by many letters from his friends) put ſtrong garriſons into his frontier towns, eſpecially into Rab and Zigeth. But knowing that to be but a poore helpe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, he reſolued as his father and vncle had done before, to reſt vpon the ſtrength of the Empire, and againſt the next yeare to call a generall aſſembly

A aſſemblie of the Princes of the Empire at Auguſta, for the better withſtanding of the common enemie. The wars thus beginning againe in Hungarie, Solyman at the ſame time in reuenge of the manifold harmes done vnto his ſubiects by the Knights of Malta, (whoſe hand he found euer againſt him in all his dealings with the other Chriſtian Princes) made great preparation both by ſea and land; purpoſing, as ſeemed by the manner thereof, to haue raſed the memoriall of thoſe worthie men from off the earth. Whereunto, beſide the naturall hatred which he bare againſt all Chriſtians in generall, and them aboue the reſt in particular, he was much incited by Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his ſonne King of Algiers, and Dragut gouernor of Tripolis: by whoſe perſuaſions he cauſed a ſtrong fleet to be rigged vp, commanding the Lieutenants and Gouernors of his ports and hauens all alongſt the ſea coaſt, to put to their helping hands, and B to be readie againſt the next Spring. And not long after, vnderſtanding partly of his own certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardneſſe things were; he calling together a great aſſemblie of his chiefe Princes and men of warre, deliuered vnto them his minde as followeth:

What thing I haue this fortie yeares alwaies wiſhed, which was to haue ſo much leiſure from other warres, as to plucke out of their neſts, and vtterly to root out theſe croſſed Pyrats, which vaunt themſelues to be the Bulwarke of Chriſtendome: that ſame me-thinks I haue by the fauour of God and Muhamed his Prophet, at this time obtained. For wee haue ſo repreſſed the attempts of the Perſians, that they cannot let vs: and in Hungarie, from whence certaine dreadfull motions were reported, C we our ſelues will ſhortly do thoſe things which ſhall inforce our enemies to hide their heads in the heart of Germanie, and to ſue to vs for peace. You your ſelues daily heare the pittifull complaints of our ſubiects and merchants, whome theſe Maltaſes, I ſay not ſouldiers, but pyrats, if they but looke into thoſe ſeas, ſpoyle and make prize of: whoſe iniuries to reuenge, all lawes both of God and man require. Neither can any thing happen vnto me more pleaſing or more honorable, than if I may before I die accompliſh thoſe things, that is, to win Malta, and to leaue all things in order in Hungarie and Polonia: except perhaps ſome man thinke it a harder matter for vs to thruſt theſe Croſſed companions from the rockes of Malta, than for our Anceſtors to haue driuen them from Ieruſalem, and ſo quite out of Syria: and for our ſelues to haue forced them out of the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes. But this ſome will ſay is neerer vnto Italy, from whence aid may eaſily be ſent, and the place defended D by a Fleet. Beleeue me, they will neuer aduenture to fight with vs at ſea, who remember themſelues to haue been there by vs ſo often ouerthrowne: beſide that, ſo little a place cannot containe any great garriſon; neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherefore vnto this expedition we haue determined with the firſt of the Spring to ſend a moſt ſtrong Fleet: and euen now we haue alreadie commanded all our ſea Captaines and Aduenturers which acknowledge our commaund, to be there preſent with their Ships. The King of Algiers will be there, the garriſons of Alexandria are in readineſſe, ſo alſo is Dragut with his appointed Fleet: as for our owne it is by mine owne appointment rigged vp: vnto which Fleet I doubt not but that all the ſtrength of the Weſt will giue place. Which thing (worthie Captaines) we ſpeake, truſting vpon the helpe of Almightie God and Muhamed his great Prophet, with your knowne and approued valour: Now remaineth onely, that euerie
E one of you thinke with vs, how this warre may beſt be managed, and ſo to referre your deuices vnto vs: which that you may the better doe, Lo, I here deliuer vnto you the ſcituation of the whole Iſland, and proiect of all their Fortifications, which we haue receiued of moſt expert and skilfull men.

Solymans oration to his Captains for the inuaſion of Malta.

Solymans purpoſe thus made knowne, and the matter well conſidered, after that they which beſt knew the ſtrong places and maners of the Maltæſes, had declared their opinions what they thought to be moſt expedient, it was decreed, That they ſhould with all ſpeed ſet forward: wherefore victuall and other things neceſſarie for ſuch an expedition being with wonderfull celeritie prepared, they expected but winde. Of theſe things Io. Valetta a Frenchman, Grand maſter of Malta and of the Knights of the Order, being both by letters and meſſengers aduertiſed (for he had alwaies fit men his intelligencers at Conſtantinople, who warily noted the purpoſes and actions of Solyman) was not affraid, but knowing that of God depended the victorie, and that men were to watch, labour, and foreſee; he aſſembled a Councell of his Knights, and in few words ſpake vnto them in this ſort:

What Solyman prepareth (moſt Noble and valiant Knights) and what a great warre he prouideth againſt vs, you with me of late right well vnderſtand, wherefore it is needleſſe for me to vſe any long ſpeech with you concerning that matter. The enemie is knowne, his inſatiable ambition is knowne, his ſtrength is knowne, and his mortall hate againſt vs and the Chriſtian name is ſufficiently knowne. Wherfore let vs all as one firſt reconcile our ſelues to God, and then prouide all ſuch things as ſhall be needfull for the warre. In briefe, noble Knights, to reconcile our ſelues vnto God, and to appeaſe his diſpleaſure, two things are of vs to be performed: whereof the one conſiſteth in amendment of life, with a holy conuerſation: the other in the religious worſhipping of him, with a firme and conſtant truſt in his helpe, with prayer, which is called godlineſſe. By theſe meanes our Aunceſtors obtained many victories againſt the Infidels in the Eaſt. Neither is it to be doubted, but if we ſhall in theſe things ioyne together, we ſhall alſo fruſtrat all the force and fury of this proud Tyrant. But foraſmuch God vſually helpes them which labour and take paines, and not the negligent and ſloathfull, we muſt of neceſsitie ioyne vnto them thoſe helpes, which both our profeſsion and the courſe of warre requireth: which partly conſiſteth in our ſelues, and partly in the other Chriſtian Princes. For victuall, armour, money, and other ſuch things as in warres are requiſite, we will ſo prouide, that no man ſhall iuſtly complaine, that wee ſpared either coſt or paines. I will poure out all my ſtore, neither will I for deſire of life refuſe any danger. As for the Chriſtian Princes, I cannot perſuade my ſelfe that they will lie ſtill in ſo fit an opportunitie, and in ſo great a danger, not of our eſtate onely, but much more of their owne. Verely I will not ſpare to exhort euery one of them both by Letters and by Meſſengers, which in part we haue alreadie done: and I doubt not but we ſhall haue aid enough from the Pope, the Emperour, and the King of Spaine (ſuch is their Chriſtian zeale) and they I hope ſhall moone the reſt. As for you, the Princes and verie light of this ſacred Order, and the reſt of our brethren, moſt valiant Knights, I am well aſſured you will ſo fight for the moſt holy Chriſtian Religion, for your liues and goods, and for the glorie of the Latine Name, againſt a moſt cruell Tyrant, the rooter out of all true Religion, of all ciuilitie and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man; as that he ſhall feele the ſting of the Croſſe which he ſo much contemneth, euen in the citie of Conſtantinople, yea in his houſes of pleaſure. For we ſhall not haue now to do with him in the Iſland of the Rhodes, far from the helpe of our friends, (from Aſia, from Europe, from Ægypt incloſed with our enemees both by ſea and land) but in the eyes of Italy and Spaine, in places ſtrongly fortified, from whence the enemie may eaſily be circumuented: which that it may ſo fal out, let vs not ceaſe to pray vnto Almightie God, and to craue his readie helpe.

The Knights make preparation for the Turks cōming

When the Grand maſter had thus ſaid, all that were preſent promiſed with one aſſent rather to loſe their liues, than in any part to faile the Common cauſe, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that, publique prayer and ſupplication was made in euerie Church thorough the Iſle, and three Colonells choſen out of all the Knights: one an Italian ſyrnamed Imperator, another Borneas a French man, and Quatrius a Spaniard the third, all aduiſed men, and moſt expert Souldiours, who ſhould with all diligence prouide all things neceſſarie for the Warre. By whoſe appointment the ſuburbs and trees which might any way be hurtfull to the fortified places, were ouerthrowne, the fortifications were thoroughly viewed, the Garriſons ſtrengthened, and all manner of prouiſion moſt plentifully diſtributed: and Letters from the Great Maſter ſent vnto the Great Biſhop and other Chriſtian Princes, requeſting their aid againſt the Common Enemie. Meſſengers were alſo diſmiſſed into diuers places, to certifie both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turkes great preparation.

Solymans fleet departeth from Conſtantinople.

Solymans fleet departing from Conſtantinople the two and twentieth day of March, in the yeare 1565, kept a direct courſe towards Peloponeſus, and ſo came to Methone: where Muſtapha Baſſa one of the Turks greateſt captaines, a man of 75 yeares, and Generall of the land forces, muſtered the armie, wherein were numbred ſeuen thouſand horſemen of them which are of the Turks called Spahi: out of the leſſer Aſia, conducted by the gouernor of that countrey, and two Lieutenants of Cilicia, fiue hundred: and of the Iſland of Lesbos, now called Metylene, foure hundred: hee had of the Ianizaries foure thouſand fiue hundred led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman, for that the chiefe Captaine of the Ianizaries, which they call the Aga, neuer departeth from the citie but when the Sultan goeth himſelfe. Beſides theſe was a certaine kind of men amongſt the Turks, who liue of the reuenues of the Church; of them there was in the Armie thirteene thouſand, who had at Conſtantinople vowed

A their liues for their ſuperſtition. Out of Thracia and Peloponeſus were come two Colonels and one Lieutenant, with twelue hundred horſemen and three thouſand fiue hundred voluntaries out of diuers countries. There alſo Piall Baſſa Solymans Admirall tooke view of the fleet, werein were found a hundred and thirtie gallies, two and twentie ſhips for burthen, ſome greater, ſome leſſer; beſides one that was caſt away neere vnto Methone, where was loſt ſix thouſand barrels of pouder, thirteene thouſand great ſhot, and foure hundred Spahi: beſides theſe, there were ten gallies from the Rhodes commanded by Halyport a man of 70 yeres; two gallies from Mitylene, and about ſeuenteene galliots and other ſmall pyrats ſhips. With this ſtrong fleet the Turks departing from Methone the thirteenth of May, arriued at Malta the eighteenth of the ſame moneth, and put into a hauen in the Northeaſt part of the Iſle, B which the inhabitants call Marzaſiroc: but perceiuing themſelues not to be there in ſafetie, they remoued to another port called Maior.

The deſcription of Malta.

The Iſland of Malta lying betwixt Affrica and Sicilia, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in Affricke or Europe, but that the antient Coſmographers, and the Moores language, which the Maltæſes haue alwaies vſed, claime it for Affricke: it is in length from the Northeaſt to the Southweſt twentie miles, and in the broadeſt place twelue. It regardeth Affricke Southward, ouer againſt Leptis Parua; and Sicilia towards the North, but more towards Pachinum than Lilybeum; and is in circuit about threeſcore miles. It ſeemeth to haue taken the name of Melita, of Mel or Honey, whereof it yeeldeth plentie. The trees there beare fruit twice a yeare, and they haue oftentimes twice harueſt, eſpecially of barley and cotten wooll; C yet is the Iſle in ſome places ſtonie, grauellie, and bare of wood: neuertheleſſe it beareth figs, apples, almonds, grapes, and other fruit trees planted by the induſtrie of man, datetrees alſo, but not fruitfull: it beareth thiſtles of ſuch bigneſſe that the inhabitants vſe them for wood: freſh water is there wonderfull ſcarce, and ſuch Wels as they haue are filled with raine in Winter, for in Summer they are either cleane drie, or els the water becommeth brachie. The inhabitants are ſo burnt with the Sunne, that they differ little in colour from the Æthyopians: they are of a wholeſome conſtitution of body, ſpare of diet, induſtrious, rather painfull than warlike, dying more for age, than of ſickneſſe: their buildings, except it be in the citie, which is in the midſt of the Iſland, and in the ſuburbs, are long and low (like vnto the Moores) couered with turfe or reed. It is commonly ſuppoſed, that S. Paul was by ſhipwreck D caſt vpon this Iſland: but it is with greater reaſon to be thought that it was the other Melita in the Adriaticke betwixt Corcyra and Illyria, and better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apoſtles trouble and ſhipwrecke in the Adriatique, out of which ſea, it is not to be gathered by the text, that Paul and the reſt were driuen. But againe to our purpoſe: That ſide of Multa which reſpecteth Sicilia, hath in it many good harbours and commodious hauens fit for ſhipping; where beſides the port Marzaſiroc towards the Eaſt, where the Turkes fleet firſt landed, and the port of S. Thomas, with another called Scala not farre off, it hath two other notable hauens, the one called Maior, and the other Marzamoxet, diuided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground: which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North almoſt in manner of an Iſland, hauing the hauen Maior on the Eaſt Marza Moxet E the Weſt. Vpon the head of this high ridge ſtandeth the caſtle of S. Elmo, of great ſtrength both by nature and art. As a man entreth into the hauen Maior, vpon the left hand are foure promontories pointing farre into the hauen on that ſide, almoſt in manner of Iſlands, making ſo many bayes: Vpon the firſt ſtandeth the gallowes, whereof alſo it taketh name: vpon the verie point of the ſecond, on a rough and high rocke ſtandeth a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, called the Caſtle of Saint Angelo, whereunto adioineth the Towne, ſeperated from the Caſtle onely with a wall and a ditch, and is placed in a hollowneſſe cut out of the maine rocke, ſtrengthened alſo with the ſea and the induſtrie of man, and is of ſome called the Burg, of others the new Citie; in this Caſtle reſideth the Grand maſter, and the ſouldiers in the Burg: vpon the third promontorie ſtandeth another ſtrong Caſtle, which they call alſo the Burg of S. Michael: the fourth promontorie is not inhabited, from whence the ſea runneth alongſt the winding banks almoſt into the midſt of the Iſland, vnto a place called Aqua Marſia. Againe, after the port Marza Moxet, Weſtward is the harbor of S. George; and after that another called Bennorrat: then followeth the port of S. Paul, no leſſe than the port Marzaſiroc: after which commeth the port called Salinarum Sinus: but on that ſide of the Iſland towards Affricke, is onely one port called Milliaria: neere vnto the Iſland of Malta lie certaine other little Iſlands, G as Gauloſo, now Goza, two other called Cuminia, and another called Piper, all ſubiect to the Maltæſes.

Thus much I haue thought good to ſet downe concerning the Turks fleet, and for the deſcription of thoſe places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the world. Now ſhall it not be amiſſe, in like manner to declare vpon what ſtrength, next vnto God, Valetta the Grand maſter ſtood againſt ſo mightie and puiſſant an enemie. Firſt, there was in the Iſland 1300 mercinaries, ſome Spaniards, ſome French, ſome Florentines, and the reſt of Naples: there was alſo 1000 ſea men of the Knights fleet, and 500 in the town of S. Angelo: and of the country people which were fled into the ſtrong places fiue thouſand, men not altogether vnskilfull of the wars: there was alſo fiue hundred Knights of the Order, H beſides Prieſts and Squires; for of theſe three ſorts of men are they which are called Brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the caſtles and towns of S. Elmo, S. Angelo, and S. Michael, whereunto they were proportionably diuided: and in the City it ſelfe, which is called Melita, being in the middle of the Iſland, was 200 ſouldiers and as many citiſens, with three hundred of the countrey people all horſemen, commanded by Io. Vagno a valiant captaine. Beſides this, euery place was furniſhed with plentie of victuall, armor, weapons, artillerie, and whatſoeuer els was needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege, and a war that ſhould want many things: and that which paſſed all the reſt, minds armed with inuincible courage againſt whatſoeuer ſhould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquiſhed, victors.
All theſe things being in readineſſe and orderly diſpoſed, as ſoone as they vnderſtood that ſe- I uen and twentie of the Turks gallies had put into the hauen Marzaſiroc, and were there landing their men; Gyon Admirall for the Order, a valiant and couragious Knight, marched thither with 500 harquebuſiers, to haue skirmiſhed with them: but as ſoone as the Turks ſaw them comming, they retired againe to their gallies. On the other part where the other fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks going on ſhore, met by chance with Riuerius a Frenchman, and eight Knights moe, who hauing his horſe killed vnder him, and one of his companions ſlaine, fell with the reſt into the hands of the enemie. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, a certaine Chriſtian mariner fled out from the Turks to the Citie Melita; who diſcouered the enemies purpoſe, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Muſtapha had determined to haue landed the greateſt part of their forces, preſently to haue beſieged ſome ſtrong place; had not K Piall Baſſa the Admirall exclaimed againſt it, doubting to be left too weake at ſea: ſaying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euery houre expected. For Solyman had expreſly commanded, that they ſhould doe nothing without his counſell; ſo great an opinion had he of his policie and valor. But whether this his report was true or otherwiſe, the Turks for all that returning with their fleet to the port of Marzaſirock, landed 20000 ſoldiers & fiue field pieces, and ſo intrenched themſelues. This done, Piall Baſſa with 7000 went to view the caſtle of S. Michael, but for feare of the great ſhot durſt not to come nigh it: neuertheleſſe they of the towne ſallying out, couragiouſly skirmiſhed with the Turks; in which conflict, Curfelinus, ſirnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, ſo furiouſly aſſailed the enemy, that he tooke from him one enſigne, and ſlew one of the Sanzacks L a great commander, with diuers others. When Piall was come againe into the campe, the Generall began to conſult with the other captaines, whether it were better to lay ſiege to the Ca-ſtle of S. Elmo, or to the towne of S. Michael: in concluſion it was agreed vpon, that they ſhould with all their forces beſiege the caſtle of S. Elmo. And going vp the hill to view the caſtle, they were incountred by the gariſon ſoldiers, in which fight ſome few were loſt on both ſides. Thus by degrees things growing hoater and hoater, the Grand maſter thought it good to certifie Garzias of Toledo Viceroy and Sicilie, how things ſtood, that he might the ſooner rig vp his fleet to come to their reſcue. Wherefore he commanded one galley to put out of the hauen by night, and to paſſe ouer into Sicilie, with Saluagus one of the Knights ſent thither M on meſſage. In the meane time the Turks caſt vp a mount to haue battered the caſtle of S. El- mo, and beaten the gallies in the hauen Maior, and ſo to haue opened a way for their fleet to haue entred: but they were not able long to keepe that mount, for they had ſcarcely well ended the worke, but it was forthwith by the continuall thundring ſhot out of the caſtle beaten downe againe: which thing greatly abated the Turks courage. About that time, Ochial came Riuerius with other Knights taken of the Turks.

The Turks beſiege the Caſtle of S. Elmo.

A to the fleet with ſix ſhips, drawne out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria, and in them 900 ſoldiers. The Turks beaten from their firſt mount, caſt vp another on a higher ground, whereon they placed three great pieces of ordnance, wherewith they annoied not only the hauen wherein the fleet of Malta rid, but the caſtle of S. Angelo alſo, the Great maſters ſeat, and with a rolling trench drew neerer and neerer vnto the Caſtle of S. Elmo: which although they had at firſt in vaine attempted, hindred by them which were in the caſtle; yet at laſt with much labor and trauell they brought it to perfection: for the Turks in that kinde of worke, ſtill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excell others. Wherefore in ſhort time they planted their great ordnance in ſuch ſort, as that they might batter both the Caſtles of S. Elmo and S. Michael. There was in the Turks campe a gentleman of Spaine, but then a B ſlaue vnto a Turke, who vnderſtanding the enemies purpoſe for the beſieging of the caſtle of S. Elmo, by a Chriſtian fugitiue aduertiſed the Great maſter thereof: whereupon hee forthwith ſent Cerda and Miranda with two companies of Spaniards into the caſtle, who were afterwards a great ſtrength vnto the caſtle, and hinderance vnto the enemie. At length came Dragut gouernor of Leptis, long looked for of the Turks, with 13 gallies, and in them 1600 ſouldiers: after whom followed ten galliots from Bona, and in them two companies. In the mean time Saluagus the worthie Knight (ſent before into Sicilia) came to Meſſana, and hauing certified the Viceroy of the ſtate of Malta, was by him commanded to returne to Malta in a Galliot, conducted by two gallies of the great Maſters; which hauing brought him neere vnto the Iſland, returned againe into Sicilia: but hee with his galliot (not without moſt manifeſt C danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne thorough the middeſt of the enemies fleet, with the loſſe of but one of his followers. Where hauing deliuered vnto the Great maſter what he had in charge from the Viceroy, he was the ſame night ſent backe again by the Great maſter into Sicilia, to certifie the Viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him ſome ſupplie, whereby he might the better hold out againſt the force of ſo great an enemie. Saluagus diſcouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, preſently committed himſelf againe to ſea, and in ſhort time arriued in the port of Siracuſa, where finding the two gallies we before ſpake of, he ſent them to Malta; as he had in charge, with 400 ſoldiers, among whom were diuers Knights of the Order, & certain ſkilful canoniers: willing them to ſhun the Weſt part of the Iſland, whereas they muſt needs come into the enemies D ſight, and to paſſe by the Eaſt end therof, which was further about, but ſafer; & turning Southward, to land in the port Miliare, and from thence by the low places of the Iſland to conuey the ſoldiers by night to the citie Melita, which was but foure miles off; from whence they might eaſily paſſe to the caſtle S. Michael. This order taken, he went to Meſſana, and there declared to the Viceroy the danger of the war, with the ſmall number of the defendants, requeſting of him a thouſand footmen, which with thoſe alreadie ſent, he thought would ſuffice to hold out the ſiege vntill he with his whole fleet might come to relieue them. But whileſt theſe things were ſlowly prouided (which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to paſſe, the Chriſtian Princes as it were ſleeping in ſo great a danger) the Turks vpon the ſudden the third of Iune aſſaulted the caſtle of S. Elmo, in hope with ſhort ſcaling E ladders to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neereſt vnto the bulwarke of the Caſtle. But the defendants, in the ditch which before had no flanker to ſcoure the ſame, had of earth and faggots made a large ſtrong flanker, from whence the caſtle alſo helping them, they valiantly reſiſted the enemie, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, truſting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true valor, they obtain ſo manie victories) thruſt ſtill on vntill they had by obſtinate force (although long firſt) gained the flanker: whereby they commanded all that part of the ditch towards the port Marza Moxet. In which place they with wonderfull celeritie ſo fortified themſelues, that they could not be hurt by the defendants: wherin they were much holpen by their own great ordnance planted on the other ſide the hauen Marza; for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat down the corner of the rampier, and battered the front of the bulwarke, whoſe hight & greatneſſe troubled the enemie, but was not ſo commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without any flankers. But night comming on, 5000 of the 9000 Turks which gaue the aſſault, tarried there: wherefore the Chriſtians conſtrained to forſake the place, retired themſelues into the caſtle. The Turks in the meane time couered with the darkenes of the night, with ſackes filled with tow and earth, filled vp the ditch which was vnder the bulwarke, but neither of any great wideneſſe or depth: which done, they gaue a freſh aſſault, wherein aboue 800 of them were ſlaine, part Ianizaries, and part Spachi, and beſides them many wounded, of whom the moſt part remained halfe dead in the ditch, where they periſhed, and could not be relieued. Of the Chriſtians was loſt fiue and fortie, amongſt whom was fiue knights of the Order, Guardampes an Auergnois, Maſius a Colonell of Narbona, Contilia a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neinec a German.

New ſupply ſent into the Caſtle S. Elmo.

The ſame night the Great maſter thinking, as reaſon was, that they in the Caſtle of S. Elmo might want helpe, ſent two hundred of his Knights and as many other ſouldiers into the Caſtle; who if they had been moe, together with the foure hundred which were before in the Caſtle, might happily haue driuen the Turks both from the Rampers and the flanker, and alſo kept the place longer. But for as much as the Great maſter wanted ſouldiers, and had therefore ſent Saluagus into Sicilie for new ſupplies, (as we haue before ſaid) he in the meane time couragiouſly expected their comming, refuſing no labor or paine: yet bewailing ſometime with himſelfe the vnfortunateneſſe of the Chriſtian Princes, by whoſe negligence ſo fit an occaſion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemie was let ſlip:

But aboue all things, he maruelled exceedingly that no helpe yet came, eſpecially thoſe two gallies, which (as we haue ſaid) were in all haſte ſent by Saluagus: but they by the maſters default kept not the appointed courſe; for firſt whereas they ſhould haue ſhunned the Weſt part of the Iſle, and haue turned towards the Eaſt, they ſhaped their courſe Weſtward to the Iſland of Gaulos, the maſter vainly affirming, that he ſaw certaine of the Turkes Galliots lying before port Mileria: which was afterwards wel knowne not to haue beene ſo; for the truth was, that he for feare (whereby notable deſignes are many times fruſtrated) durſt not go forward. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Great maſter was diſappointed of ſo neceſſarie a ſupplie: which thing much grieued both the Viceroy and others, but eſpecially Saluagus. For he ſaw it would come to paſſe, that if the Turks ſhould take the Caſtle of S. Elmo (the moſt aſſured bulwarke and defence of the Iſland of Malta) the other places muſt of neceſſitie be brought into extreame danger, all the way to relieue them being thereby ſhut vp. And that it might be taken, ſeemed not to him impoſſible, the enemie hauing alreadie taken one fort, and laying hard ſiege almoſt on euery ſide of that little pile. The due conſideration of theſe and ſuch like things grieued the minds of skilfull men, eſpecially ſeeing ſuch ſlacke preparation in a caſe requiring ſuch preſent reliefe. Yet in the meane time ſouldiers were taken vp at Rome by the commandement of Pius Quartus then Biſhop, to be ſent to Malta: and by his example to ſtirre vp other Princes to ſend aid vnto this ſacred warre, hee gaue a hundred pound of gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commanded gunpouder and other neceſſaries for that warre to be taken out of his Caſtle S. Angelo, that ſo he might ſeeme to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer theſe ſouldiers, in number ſix hundred, he appointed Pompeius Columna Generall, and commanded Camillus Medices his Legat to accompanie him. With theſe went many voluntarie men, of purpoſe to lay downe their liues for the eterniſing of their names in ſo religious a warre, and that with ſuch an ardent deſire, as that euerie little delay ſeemed vnto them a yeare. Wherefore comming to Naples, they there found Iohn Andreas Auria with eleuen ſhips, the Prince of Populonia with nine, Lanicius with three, and three others ſet forth by other priuate Gentlemen. In theſe ſhips were embarqued all thoſe footmen which came from Rome, and ſo tranſported to Meſſana, where the kings fleet was prouiding. But whileſt the Chriſtians make ſlow preparation, conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger, the Turkes not ignorant thereof, reſolued to proue the vttermoſt before the ſtrength of the Chriſtians were readie or drawne together. For the Caſtle of S. Elmo once taken, they aſſured themſelues with more eaſe to carrie the reſt: for that thereby they ſhould firſt haue the hauen Marza Moxet in their power, where their fleet might in ſafetie ride ſo long as they pleaſed; and the riſing ridge betwixt the two hauens was commodious for them both to batter the towne of Saint Michael, and to keepe the hauen Maior, ſo that none could without their leaue paſſe in or out thereat.

Wherefore vpon theſe and other ſuch like conſiderations they began againe to batter the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, as it had beene with thunder: which furious batterie they continued by the ſpace of foure dayes together without intermiſſion. The night following they ſuddenly with great force gaue an aſſault, and with their ſcaling ladders had almoſt gained the top of the wall; when the Chriſtians deſirous of

A nothing more than to come to handie blowes, draue them downe againe with ſuch violence, that neuer after they durſt ſet ladder to the wall, vntill the very laſt conflict. Whileſt things were thus hot at the caſtle of S. Elmo, Dragut his ſouldiers vpon a brauerie, as if they had been the onely men, went to a place called Martia Scala, which is betweene the gallows and S. Thomas rode, as if they would haue done more than the reſt: which the Chriſtians beholding out of the town of S. Angelo, to repreſſe their inſolencie, ſallied forth vpon them, and ſo welcommed them, that they were glad after they had receiued a great loſſe, forthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Chriſtians were ſlaine Bonnemius a Frenchman, one of the Knights, and ſeuen others.

The Turkes repulſed.

The ſame time Monſerratus was by the Great maſter ſent into the caſtle of S. Elmo, to command B there as Gouernor in ſtead of Brolia; for that he with watching and pains taken in defence thereof, was fallen ſicke. The ſame Brolia had many times before written to the Great maſter, That the caſtle was ſo well fortified and furniſhed of all things needfull, as that he thought it impoſſible to be won by the enemy: and had with cheerfull ſpeech and braue behauior, ſo encouraged the knights, and other the defendants, that they fought againſt their enemies with more than mens ſtrength, and greater courage than is to be beleeued. Neither were the Turks for that diſcouraged, although they were with great loſſe ſtill repulſed: but for certaine daies battered the caſtle with greater fury than before, and immediatly gaue an aſſault; for they had made a bridge ouer the ditch, of maſts and ſaile yards, of ſuch a breadth, that ten men might go thereon in rank; and had placed about the ditch 4000 harquebuſiers, and brought all C their fleet vnto S. Georges ſhore, not far from the caſtle. And when they had by the ſpace of 18 daies ſore ſhaken it, and torne the wals with 13000 great ſhot, and were now in hope euen preſently to win the caſtle: ſee, Beragamus a Biſcane, one of the knights, and Medranus a Spaniſh captaine, with certaine other valiant men, ran to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders, oppoſed themſelues againſt the multitude of the miſcreants. The fight hand to hand was on both ſides both fierce and terrible: and now one of the Turkes had aduanced a Turkiſh enſigne vpon the bulwarke, which whileſt Medranus layeth hand vpon, and the Turke on the other ſide ſtrugleth to cleare himſelfe from him, in ſtriuing together, they fell downe both dead, ſhot thorow with one bullet by one of the Turkes. At which time the 400 which we ſaid were but a little before ſent thither by the Grand maſter, ſtood in good ſtead: D for ſeeing all brought to ſo great a danger, ſome of them (whileſt otherſome fought with the enemy) thruſt barrels of gunpouder vnder the bridge, ſome caſt downe wildfire, ſtones, and whatſoeuer elſe came to hand, vpon the enemie, and others farther off with their harquebuſiers ſore gauled the Turks; ſo in ſhort time the bridge was burnt and blowne vp, which in the fall thereof, ouerwhelmed eight hundred Turks: the reſt (as they might) retired, few whole, but moſt part wounded. In this conflict the Chriſtians pluckt downe two enſignes; the one Muſtaphaes, the other Draguts, which the Turkes had ſet vp vpon the very battlements of the wals. On the other part toward the Southweſt, a band of the Turkes had got to the top of the higheſt rampier, which as ſoone as they in the caſtle of S. Angelo perceiued, thinking to haue beaten them off with a great ſhot, ſlew by miſchance ſeuen of the defendants vpon the ſame E rampier, as they were going too and fro: but to recompence that errour, at the next ſhot they rent in ſunder foure of the Turks captains, with twelue other of their moſt forward ſoldiers.
Whileſt they were here fighting, other Turks in the meane time had caſt vp a trench on that ſide of the caſtle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driuen with fire, ſtones, & other ſuch like things throwne downe vpon them by the defendants. The Turks valiantly on euery ſide repulſed, retired into the camp, when they had in this aſſault loſt two thouſand of their beſt ſouldiers, and of the Chriſtians ſlaine almoſt a hundred, and wounded as many moe.
The ſame day, Valetta the Grand maſter, perceiuing the port Marza Moxet not to bee very ſtraitly kept by the Turks, commanded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the hauen, ouerland to the place called Martia Scala, that from thence he might ſend into Sicilia: for hee (as F reaſon was) conſidering in what danger the caſtle S. Elmo ſtood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the Biſhop of Rome thereof, and of ſuch things as were there done; requeſting them of ſpeedie reliefe. The copie of the letters ſent to the Viceroy, I haue here ſet downe: as for thoſe which were ſent to the great Biſhop, becauſe they were almoſt of the ſame purport, I haue purpoſely omitted.

The Turks [illegible]

To

To Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the fleet, greeting.

The Great maſters letters to Garzias Viceroy of Sicilia.

Since the time that I ſent Saluagus, I haue ſent vnto you two letters, which I cauſed to bee ſent by Melita into Gaulos; which I pray God be come to your hands. After that, when as neither meſſengers nor letters came vnto vs from you, I commanded a man with inſtructions to haſte to Meſſana, who when hee had certaine nights attempted to goe out, and was at laſt got out; hee was ſcarcely gone two miles, but hee ſaw the Turkes with might aad maine making after him; whom to eſcape, hee was glad to runne his pinace on ground: And caſting his letters into the ſea, to forſake his boat, and by flight to ſaue himſelfe. Now the Turkes hauing remooued their fleet out of the port Vulturnus, I conſidering how much it concerneth to certifie you of thoſe things which are heere done, commanded a Brigandine to be carried to Martia Scala; for ſeeing that the Turkes fleet is gone to another part of the Iſland, I hope my letters will without let in ſhort time come vnto you. And the things I would haue you to know, are theſe: The fifteenth of this moneth, all the enemies fleet (a little before night) paſſed by this port; the comming on of the night letted, that wee could not well perceiue the weakneſſe thereof; whileſt the gallies almoſt vnarmed were with much difficultie towed forth: want of water, cauſed them chiefly to depart out of the port Vulturnus, and peraduenture feare of your fleet. For, as I haue heard, they haue intelligence, that an hundred and fiftie ſaile lie at road in the port of Meſſana, for which cauſe alſo, they haue not put themſelues into the port of Saint Paul, but haue placed their fleete aboue the port Marza Moxet; yet a good part of their gallies lie at the port Saint George, ſo to bee neerer vnto their land forces: yet is not the neereneſſe ſuch, but that if your fleete come vpon the ſudden, they will with the ſame feare retire to their fleete, that they would if they were farther off. No man is now to bee ſeene at Vulturnus, for they haue left their firſt campe at Saint Katharines and Saint Iohns, hauing burnt all the countrey villages, and now lie with their fleete as I haue ſaide: and with their armie at the caſtle Saint Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will: which thing is euen for this to bee hoped for, which was but yeſterday done; when as our moſt valiant ſouldiers (by the helpe of God) for the ſpace of foure houres couragiouſly endured a moſt terrible aſſault. The Turkes hauing alſo made a bridge Weſtward toward the port Marza Moxet, wee haue foure times repulſed them to their great loſſe; yet not without ſome loſſe alſo on our part, amongſt whome Medranus, a worthie Captaine was to my great griefe ſlaine. With this victorie our men are ſo encouraged, that I am in hope the Caſtle may bee defended vntill your comming, eſpecially the enemies batterie not ſo furiouſly now as before maintained. If I were relieued with certaine companies of freſh ſouldiers, or at leaſt with thoſe our two gallies, I would neuer thinke that this caſtle could bee taken from vs: In defence whereof, whileſt wee euery houre looke for helpe, wee haue ſpent both our men, and whatſoeuer warlike prouiſion wee had elſe. Wee are reſolued although it coſt vs all our liues, to goe thither, relying vpon you: who, as wee hope for your deuotion and noble courage, will not be vnmindefull of our health and welfare; but knowing the danger whereinto wee muſt needs fall, if you ſhall deferre to ayde vs, will ſend vs out of hand certaine bands of men, eſpecially when they may ſo eaſily bee ſent: for now that the Turkes are departed from the Eaſt part of the Iſland, our ſouldiers may bee landed at the Blacke Rocks. our liues lie in your hands, on whom (next vnto God) reſteth all our hope: Wherefore wee moſt inſtantly requeſt you not to forſake vs: committing our ſelues, and all that ours is, to your compaſſion and protection. Fare you well from Malta the 17 of Iune.

Foure gallies ſent to the great maſter for the reliefe of Malta

Theſe letters receiued, and the diſtreſſe of the beſieged caſtle perceiued, the Viceroy was (as of right he ought) greatly moued, and made ſemblance as if he had been deſirous to haue brought forth his whole fleet againſt the Turkes. But foraſmuch as the ſupplie of ſhips from Genoa and Spaine was not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to aduenture the fortune of a battell; he forthwith ſent Ioh. Cardona with foure gallies, whereof two were of Malta: and with Cardona ioyned one Robles Campe-maſter, with a ſelect companie of Spaniards; with whom went alſo about eighty knights of Malta, who ſtayed at Meſſana, awaiting ſome fit occaſion to paſſe ouer: Amongſt whome were theſe chiefe men of the Order, Pariſot the Great maſters nephew, Vincentius Caraffa, Boninſcana and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of Aquitania, and ſome others: Who although letted by tempeſt and other occaſions,

A caſions,they came too late to Malta, as ſhall bee heereafter declared,yet ſerued they in great ſtead , and had they come in time, before the caſtle S.Elmo was loſt,happily it might haue been ſtill kept.

The Turks making no more account of ſo great a ſlaughter of their men, than of ſo many ſheepe, deſperatly renewed the fight,as men reſolued to indure all extremities. And firſt they moſt horribly thundered day and night with their great ordnance vpon the caſtle : afterwards they aſſaulted the breaches with ſuch a multitude and force, that if true valor and hope of immortalitie had not excluded all feare out of the hearts of the defendants,the terrour of the aſſault had inforced them either to haue fled or yeelded. Dreadfull was the fight, and had they not been obſtinatly ſet downe on both ſides, the one to win the caſtle, the other to defend it, B that day had ended the quarrell. Fiue houres endured that moſt terrible aſſault, at length the Turks repulſed by the valour of the Chriſtians,retired : yet did they not for all that paſſe the night following in quiet, but with their great ordnance did ſo beat the defendants, that they had much ado to keep the Turks from ſcaling the wals : which,that they ſhould not then dare to attempt, was,with exceeding indeuour prouided for by the Chriſtians; of whom in this aſſault was loſt two hundred,and of the Turks an infinit number. And Dragut himſelfe, whileſt he there performed the dutie both of a Generall, and moſt valiant ſouldier, got a blow on the head with a ſtone, whereof he in two daies after died : his dead body was afterwards carried to Tripolis,and there honourably buried.

A moſt terrible aſſault.

Dragut ſlaine.

The commanders of the Turks army,ſtil more & more enraged with this valor of the Chriſtians, C and the ſlaughter of their men, gathering all their fleet together, commanded them to compaſſe about the caſtle, of purpoſe to giue thereunto their laſt aſſault, with all their forces both by ſea and land,and to ſend new ſupplies of freſh ſouldiers one after another,vntill they had taken the caſtle. And therfore they with great induſtry prepared bridges,ladders,engins, armor,weapons,ſhot,and whatſoeuer things elſe was needfull for the aſſault. Which Valetta perceiuing out of his caſtle S.Angelo,and fearing(as meet was)leſt they in the caſtle ſhould not be able longer to indure ſo great a fury, called together in counſell his knights,two daies before the Turkes gaue their laſt aſſault : and told them, That they all as well as he,ſaw in what danger they which defended the caſtle S.Elmo were ; and that he doubted not,but that euerie one of them(vpon a godly zeale and compaſſion) was no leſſe moued with the ſlaughter and D danger of their fellowes and other their Chriſtian ſouldiers,than with their owne: wherefore he requeſted them,to declare what they thought beſt to be done for their ſafety;yet ſo,as that they ſhould not haſtily determine any thing, that agreed not with the antient valor and honor of their ſacred militarie profeſſion. Which motion once made, & their opinions in briefe deliuered, a decree was made, That foraſmuch as the caſtle could not longer be holden, regard ſhould be had for the ſafegard of them that were therein:for which purpoſe it was agreed,that 12 pinnaces ſhould be ſent to fetch them away. But before, three knights were choſen, who ſhould in haſt the night following goe thither,& tell them what was in the counſel agreed vpon, and carefully to conſider in what ſtate the caſtle was,which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned,they ſhould poiſon the water,& cloy the great ordnance,that it might not afterwards E ſtand the Turks in ſtead. The three knights ſent thither,was Medina a Spaniard,Rocca a Frenchman, & Conſtantinus Caſtriot an Italian ; who not without danger of their liues (being oftentimes ſhot at by the Turks)got into the caſtle,and declared vnto them that were there in garriſon,how carefull the Great maſter and the reſt were of them. And they on their ſide,firſt of all gaue thanks to the Grand maſter and the reſt,for the regard they had of them : and afterward concerning the caſtle,ſaid,That if they conſidered the ſtraightnes of the place,the ſmall number of the defendants,& multitude of the enemy,they ſhould well perceiue in what danger they were,if the Turks ſhould often with ſuch obſtinacy renew the aſſault:yet foraſmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the helpe of God ſo preſent,who had ſtill mercifully defended them againſt the rage of the enemy,& wanted nothing needful for the defence of the place;the F keeping wherof they had requeſted of the grand maſter as an honor,although they knew right wel it could not without moſt manifeſt danger of their liues be holden:yet they would for al that keep it to the laſt man:for that perhaps the like honorable occaſion for them to ſhew themſelues in,ſhould neuer again be offred : wherfore they had(as they ſaid)reſolued in that place to ſpend their liues for the glory of God & the Chriſtian religion. The courſe of this life(they ſaid)

Three knights ſent to view the ſtate of the caſtle S.Elmo.

The reſolute anſwere of them in the caſtle to the knights ſaid)was but ſhort,but that honor and fame was for euer : and whereas death is to all men pre- G fined,it were to be wiſhed, that the life which is to nature due,ſhould rather ſeem to be by vs franckly giuen to God and our countrey, than reſerued as natures debt : which if it ſhould ſo happen,they would ſo vſe the matter,as that the barbarous enemie ſhould haue neither plea-ſure nor ioy,which ſhould not coſt him much bloud euen of his beſt ſouldiers.This they willed the knights to tell the Great Maſter,and to requeſt him not to be too careful of them,but to promiſe to himſelf thoſe things of them which beſt beſeemed reſolute men,eſpecially of them who had vowed themſelues to that ſacred war. This anſwer of greater reſolution than fortune, receiued,the three knights, when they had diligently viewed the caſtle, returned to the Grand maſter: who calling to counſell his knights,and hauing heard the anſwer of the be-ſieged,would needs heare alſo what opinion the three knights themſelues were of concerning H the keeping of the caſtle:of whom Caſtriot was of opinion, That the place was ſtil to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would vndertake to performe it; and there rather to loſe his life than to forſake it,after he had once taken vpon him the charge therof. But Rocca the French knight was far of another mind,and ſaid plainly,that the place could not poſſibly be holden againſt ſo ſtrong an enemie;and that if Iulius Cæſar himſelfe were aliue, & ſaw to what ſtraight the place was brought (eſpecially all the rampiers being either beaten downe or ſore ſhaken,& ſuch a power of obſtinate enemies lying round about it) he would neuer ſuffer ſo many valiant ſoldiers to be loſt,but quit the place,& reſerue his men to further ſeruice:

for why,it was the part of valiant men to performe ſo much as was of men to be performed, but to ſtriue to do more,was no manhood at all:wherefore he thought it beſt to do that which I men vſe with members mortified,whoſe recouerie is deſperat;in which caſe we doubt not to make a ſeparation,ſo to ſaue the reſt of the bodie with life. The Spaniſh knight in moſt part agreeing with Caſtriot,ſaid,That he thought it not good,that the place ſhould ſo eaſily be for-ſaken;firſt,for that the ditches and bulwarks were yet defencible; and then becauſe he ſaw ſo great a conſent among the defendants,and ſuch a cheerfulneſſe to withſtand the enemy,which thing (as he ſaid) preſaged victorie.

The three knights of diuers opinions concerning the keeping of the caſtle S. Elmo.

These opinions of the knights thorowly in counſell debated, and euery particular well weighed,it ſeemed good to the greater part,that they which were in the caſtle ſhould for certain daies yet hold it out;eſpecially becauſe it was not the manner of the knights of the Order eaſily to abandon their ſtrong holds,but rather to keepe them to the laſt, that euen therein the K barbarous enemie might perceiue with whom he had to do,and ſo ſee his pride abated.For if they ſhould haue forſaken the place,they might haue been thought to haue done it for feare: whereby the enemies inſolencie might haue bin increaſed,and the honorable Order of thoſe ſacred knights diſgraced.

But the Turks intentiue to that they had before determined,the 23 day of Iune aſſembling all their forces both by ſea and land round about the caſtle, in the dead time of the night on euery ſide ſet vp ſcaling ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with 32 great pieces of artillerie battered the reſt of the walls yet ſtanding, and preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault.
The defendants on the other ſide beat down ſome,repulſed other,ſlew many,euer more care- L full how to wound the enemy,than to ſaue themſelues : and where he preſſed faſteſt on,there to ſhew their greateſt valour.Great were the outcries made on both ſides,mixt with exhortation,mirth and mourning ; the face of the whole fight was diuers,vncertain,cruell,and dreadfull : and now it was the third houre of the day, when ſtill the victorie ſtood doubtfull ; and had not the fury of the great ordnance been ſo terrible, that it now had beaten downe all the wals vnto the very rocke wheron the caſtle ſtood,the defendants might for ſome longer time haue endured the enemies force.But the very rock bared both of wals & defendants,& more than foure hundred ſlain,a man could now ſcarcely ſhew himſelfe,but he was preſently ſtruck in pieces. Monſerratus Gouernour of the caſtle, and Garas of Eubœoa,men of equall valor,integritie, and honour, were both ſlaine with one ſhot; for a ſhort and tranſitorie life made per-takers of immortality together.Yet the reſt which ſtood in defence of the caſtle,nothing ter- M rified with ſo great a loſſe and ſlaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force than before,ouerthrew the Turkes enſignes now ſet vp in the caſtle,ſlew the enſigne-bearers,captaines,and colonels;now reſpecting nothing more,but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtaining

The Turkes furiouſly aſſault the citie.

A ning of immortall fame. By this time the ſunne was mounted to the middle of heauen, great was the heat, and men exceeding wearie; the murthering ſhot neuer ceaſed, and ſuch was the multitude of the enemy, that he ſent in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other ſide, the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and thoſe weakened with labor, watching, thirſt and wounds, did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force, and ſo the caſtle by the Turks woon, but with ſuch ſlaughter of their men, that it was a wonder that ſo many ſhould be ſlaine of ſo few. The defendants were all ſlain, euery man, in valiant fight.

Here may I not in ſilence paſſe ouer the inhumane and more than barbarous crueltie of the Turks againſt the dead bodies of the ſlaine knights, that thereby may appeare, that crueltie B neuer wanteth wheron to ſhew it ſelfe mercileſſe, yea euen after death. The Turks after they had taken the caſtle, finding certain of the knights yet breathing; and but halfe dead, firſt cut their hearts out of their breaſts, and then their heads from their bodies; after that, they hanged them vp by the heeles in their red clokes with white croſſes, (which manner of attire they after an antient cuſtome vſe in time of war, as they do black in time of peace) in the ſight of the caſtles, S. Angelo and S. Michael. And yet Muſtapha the Turks Generall not ſo contented, commanded them afterwards to be faſt bound together, & ſo caſt into the ſea, whoſe dead bodies were in few daies after by the ſurge of the ſea caſt vp in the hauen Maior, and known by their friends, were by the commandment of the ſorrowful Great maſter honorably buried. With which the C enemies moſt barbarous cruelty he was ſo moued, that hee commanded that no Turke ſhould from that time be taken priſoner, but to be preſently ſlaine. And therupon all that were before taken, were forthwith put to the ſword, and their heads caſt ouer the wals on that ſide towards the enemie. From the beginning of the ſiege to the taking of the caſtle, of the Chriſtians were ſlain a thouſand three hundred, amongſt whom were a hundred & thirtie of the ſacred knights of the Order, all worthie to be regiſtred in the Booke of euerlaſting Fame.

The caſtle of S. Elmo thus loſt, Valetta although his mind (as he had good cauſe) was inwardly attainted with exceeding griefe, yet made ſemblant otherwiſe, becauſe he would not daunt the minds of his ſouldiers: telling them, that nothing was hapned vnprouided for or vnforeſeen. This was (as he ſaid) *the will of God, and the chãce of war, that ſometimes one, ſometimes an*D*other ſhould be ouercome: and that cowardiſe, not ſuch valor as was in them that were gone, gaue occaſion to liuing friends to lament: yet that the enemie was not for that to be feared, who had alſo receiued ſuch a loſſe, as he might therby rather ſeem conquered, than a victorious conqueror: wher as the loſſe of his knights was recompenced with honor and immortality, things of themſelues ſufficient to inflame al noble minds to behaue themſelues valiantly. As for himſelfe* (he ſaid) that truſting not in his owne ſtrength, but in the help of Almighty God, he had not yet caſt off the hope of victorie ouer the relicks of the diſcomfited enemy; and that he well hoped, they were all of the ſame mind, wherein hee moſt earneſtly requeſted them to perſiſt vnto the end. When he had thus ſaid, he being a man armed againſt all fortunes, withdrew himſelfe a little aſide: where caſting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to ſend letters to Petrus Meſquita, Gouernour of the citie of Melita, to certifie him and the E knights of the Order that were at Meſſana, and the Viceroy, of the loſſe of S. Elmo: the copie wherof, becauſe that in them euidently appeareth the Chriſtian mind of him the Great maſter, I haue thought good here to ſet downe as followeth:

Whileſt theſe Knights are ſetting forward, in the meane time chanced the miſerable misfortune of the Caſtle Saint Elmo: which although it brought vnto vs that griefe you may eaſily imagine, we for all that, as if it had happened by ſome ſecret appointment of God, haue taken it in that part, that hee as a moſt mercifull father porpoſeth thereby to warne vs, but not vtterly to deſtroy vs. Neither doe I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercie and power. Yet for all that, I may neuertheleſſe complaine, that wee are of them forſaken of whome it leaſt beſeemed. So that in the ſpace of ſeuen and thirtie dayes, F wherein our moſt valiant ſouldiers endured all the force of the enemie (which truely was done rather by the power of God than of man) we were holpen of our owne (which owe ſo much vnto vs) not ſo much as with the leaſt helpe, which they might oftentimes haue ſent vs. But I liſt to aſcribe it, whatſoeuer it is, to God, of whom alone as we haue hitherto receiued ſo many good things, ſo reſt we in hope hereafter to receiue alſo. For, for any thing that I can ſee, wee muſt not now truſt to mans helpe: foraſmuch as wee could by no Letters, no diligence, no prayers, no admonitions, and to bee briefe, by no commands

moue them, who of all others ought moſt to haue obeyed it. The ſhortneſſe of the time ſuffereth vs not to G write to the Viceroy of theſe things, it ſhall be your part to certifie both him and other our friends thereof: who if they had obeyed our command, or aided vs with neuer ſo ſmall a ſupplie of ſouldiers, happily we had not loſt the caſtle Saint Elmo: in defence whereof we haue ſpent the beſt part of our ſouldiers. Wherefore except the Viceroy make haſt to deliuer vs from this ſiege, I feare that he cannot in time come; but eſpecially if we be here beſieged before the comming of thoſe our ſmall helpes which we as in a dreame haue promiſed vnto our ſelues, and which we now ſcarce hope will be in time preſent. For all that, we doe not diſtruſt of God his loue and prouidence: by whoſe diuine inſpiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being in ſhort time ſtirred vp, will haſten hither to relieue vs. For all our welfare conſiſteth in celeritie. Our enemies hauing drawne all their fleet into the hauen Marza Moxet, are buſied in cleanſing the caſtle, and repairing the breaches, that they may afterward the better vſe them againſt vs. Wherfore vpon the ſight of theſe our letters, ſend vnto vs the captains Catherin, Belcacar, Belmeſt, & H Zoricius, with their companies, that we may vſe their faithfull and valiant ſeruice. God of his mercie ſend vs aide from ſome place, and keepe you. Fare you well, from our Caſtle Saint Angelo, the 24 of June, 1565.

Meſquita hauing receiued theſe letters, commanded a galliot forthwith to be launched, and therein imbarked Maſius Codonellus, one of the knights; to whom he deliuered both the letters of the Grand maſter to him, and others of his owne, almoſt of the ſame purport, directed to the Knights of the Order which lay at Meſſana, requeſting him with all ſpeed poſſible to paſſe ouer with them into Sicilia.

Muſtapha Baſſa ſendeth meſſengers to the great maſter.

In the mean time Muſtapha the Turks Generall ſent a meſſenger to Valetta, and with him an I old Spaniſh captiue, with promiſe of liberty if he would goe with his meſſenger to the towne, to talke with Valetta concerning the yeelding vp thereof, and to try if he would by any means come to agreement: who comming to the towne, the Turke ſtill waiting at the gate, the Chriſtian was let in, and brought to the Great maſter, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Baſſa. But as ſoon as Valetta heard of the name of compoſition and yeelding, he was ſo filled with indignation, that had he not bin a Chriſtian, he would preſently haue commanded him to haue bin hanged. Wherefore he gaue him choice either to tarry ſtil in the towne, if he thought ſo good, or els forthwith to returne and tell his companion, that if he got him not packing quickely, he would ſend him farther off with a great ſhot. With this ſhort anſwer the K Turke ſuddenly returned into the campe. Whereupon Muſtapha fell into ſuch a rage, that he openly proteſted, neuer from that to forbeare any kind of cruelty againſt the Chriſtians.

The anſwer of the great maſter to the Turkes meſſengers.

Philip Laſcaris flieth from the Turks to the caſtle S. Michael.

There was then with Muſtapha one Philip, of the moſt noble Græcian Familie of Laſcaris, who of a boy taken priſoner by the Chriſtians in Patras, a city of Achaia, and by them honeſtly & courteouſly vſed, was therefore euer after well affected toward the Chriſtians: he priuie to many of Muſtaphaes deſignes, by a certaine diuine motion thought hee ſhould not a little profit the Chriſtians by reuolting vnto them: wherefore he reſolued to flie vnto the caſtle of S. Michael. Which thing when he had oftentimes attempted, at length the firſt of Iuly he caſt himſelfe into the ſea (for by land he could no way eſcape) and ſwum to the caſtle, not without danger of his life; for diſcouered by the Turks, he was many times ſhot at both with their arrowes and L ſmall ſhot. He, brought to the Great maſter, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies ſecrets, and alſo aduiſed him what was to be done at the point of S. Michaels, to fruſtrat the enemies purpoſe for the aſſailing of that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no ſmall helpe: and afterwards as often as need was, during the ſiege, fought valiantly againſt the Turks.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Codonellus ſent as we haue before ſaid into Sicilia, came in ſafetie to Meſſana, where he found the Chriſtian fleet not yet readie to relieue the diſtreſſed Maltæſes; for the Spaniſh ſhips were not yet come, and Iohn Andreas Auria with eight and twentie ſhips was ready to returne to take in foure thouſand footmen, taken vp in Etruria by Capinus Vitellius. Which backwardneſſe the knights of the Order conſidering, and what dan- M ger was in delay, after they had well debated the matter amongſt themſelues, they reſolued by the power of God by all meanes poſſible to helpe their brethren. And for this expedition choſe two moſt fit Generalls of their owne fellowes (the Commanders of Meſſana and Baroli) who forthwith went to Garzias the Viceroy, declaring to him what things the ſacred

A Knights of their Order had done,not for the king of Spaine only, but for the Chriſtian commonweale, and alſo what great charge they had been at the yeare before in the Pinionian expedition, wherein they had neither ſpared ſhips,victual,nor munition, neither their own liues, to profit the King and the Chriſtian commonweale. Beſides this, they beſought him well to conſider,that the loſſe of Malta concerned not the ſacred knights only,but all Italie, and eſpecially Sicilia,for the neerenſſe of ſo troubleſome and puiſſant an Enemie. For theſe and other like reaſons, which the ſhortnes of the time ſuffered them not to rehearſe, they requeſted of him 4000 footmen, with whome all the Knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntarie men would make all poſſible ſpeed to relieue the beſieged, which they had before in vaine attempted; with which ſtrength they were in good hope, if not to B repulſe the enemie,or to recouer that was alreadie loſt, yet at leaſt to ſtop and ſtay his farther proceeding, vntill ſuch time as he hauing rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet, might ſet vpon the Turks,and (as was to be hoped) vanquiſh and diſperſe them. But whilſt the Viceroy hauing heard their requeſt,conſidereth what anſwer to make,a meſſenger came vnto him from Spaine (but with what command from the king (although men gueſſed diuerſly) could not be knowne. But vpon his comming,the Viceroy gaue the knights this cold anſwer, That he could not grant what they requeſted,for that in ſo doing he ſhould disfurniſh his fleet, & not be able afterwards to relieue them as he deſired: but if it pleaſed them to tranſport the Knights with part of the Biſhops ſouldiers into the Iſland, they might ſo doe with their owne two gallies they had alreadie,whereunto he would alſo ioyne another of his owne. The Knights when C they could obtaine no more, accepted of that which was offered.

The Knights of Malta craue aid of the Viceroy.

The cold anſwer of the Viceroy to the Knights.

Whilſt theſe gallies were ſetting forward,thoſe foure gallies whereof we haue before ſpoken, wherein were imbarked 80 knights and 600 other ſoldiers, hauing at ſea ſuffered many troubles by the ſpace of twentie dayes, could not as yet arriue at Malta: and becauſe the Viceroy had commanded that they ſhould not land, except they firſt knew whether the Caſtle S. Elmo were ſtill holden by the Chriſtians, they ſent out a frigot to land, promiſing that day and the next to tarrie in the ſea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, it ſo fell out,that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne: wherfore the gallies which expected her comming, fearing leſt ſhe had been either by tempeſt loſt, or by the enemie intercepted,retired vnto Pozalo a port vpon the coaſt of Sicilia,neereſt to Malta,there D to expect ſome good newes: where as ſoone as they had put in,they vnderſtood that S. Elmo was yet defended: whereupon they put to ſea againe, with purpoſe to haue arriued at Malta.
But when they were within two leagues of the place where they thought to haue landed, they ſaw a fire there,which cauſed them to miſtruſt that the place was poſſeſſed of the enemie, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them: wherefore they returned againe to Pozalo; where now vnderſtanding of the French knight come from Malta,that that fire was made by his commandment, as a ſigne that they might without feare come forward, they with all ſpeed made againe for the ſame place, and at the length the 29 day of Iune about midnight landed at the Blacke rockes on the South ſide of the Iſland toward Affricke,and vnſeene of any,got in haſte E to the citie Malta, where they were ioyfully receiued,and there ſtaid to expect what the Great Maſter ſhould command. In the meane time it fortuned, a great foggie miſt (which ſeldome times there chanceth) to ariſe ſo thicke, that a man could hardly ſee for it: at which time a boy of about twelue yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the caſtle of Melita, ſuddenly as one afraid cried out,that he ſaw a Turke going from the citie to the caſtle of Saint Michael. Which thing ſome of the knights hearing, ran preſently out that way, and found a Greeke of the citie Melita, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouernors paſſe it was not lawfull for any man to goe out of the citie) confeſſed, That his purpoſe was to haue aduertiſed the Turks of the comming of thoſe ſouldiers,that ſo they might haue intercepted them as they ſhould haue come from Melita to the Grand maſter: for which treaſon he was as he had well deſerued cut in foure pieces. Three dayes after, this new ſupplie come from Sicilia,in the firſt watch of the night came all in ſafetie from Melita to the Grand maſter,except two or three boyes,who ouercharged with armor and other baggage,were not able to keepe way with the reſt. It is not to be told, how much the beſieged reioiced at the comming of theſe their friends, and eſpecially Valetta, who ſeeing the floure of his Knights and other ſouldiers, as it were by diuine prouidence come vnto him, with teares trickling downe his cheekes, and his eyes caſt vp to heauen, ſaid:

The prayer of Valetta.

I thanke thee, ô heauenly Father, which heareſt my prayers, and forſaketh not this thy little Flocke, beſet round with moſt rauening Wolues: theſe are the workes of thine euerlaſting goodneſſe, mercie, and prouidence.

Theſe new come ſouldiers requeſted of the great maſter, as a reward of their paines, That they might be put in garriſon into the Towne S. Michael, a place now moſt laid vnto by the Turks: which thing he (commending their forwardnes) eaſily granted; yet for all that remoued not the old garriſon. Theſe freſh and couragious ſoldiers deſirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemy, the next day ſallied out, and hauing ſlaine 200 of the Turks, & wounded as many more, without loſſe of a man returned, euery mans ſword imbrued in the bloud of his enemie. Which thing Muſtapha the Turks Generall hearing, knew it was they which lately came into the towne; and thereupon fell in rage with his captains, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the ſuſpicion grew moſt vpon them which were appointed for the keeping of the vttermoſt part of the Iſland: which was the more increaſed, for that three galliots of Algiers had withdrawne themſelues away; ſo that he neither truſted them nor the renegat Chriſtians, who as occaſion ſerued fled daily from him. For which cauſe he gaue out proclamation, That none of them ſhould lie by night out of the gallies, and that ſuch as did otherwiſe, ſhould therefore be burnt, or impaled vpon ſharpe ſtakes: and changing his warders, appointed Salec with his galliots, whom he thought to be more faithful, for the keeping of the Iſland. And that neither they nor the Chriſtians ſhould be able to attempt any thing, he chained together diuers gallies in the entrance of the hauen Marza Moxet, and cauſed the reſt of the fleet to ride neerer together thã before. But becauſe exceeding many were at that time ſick in the Turks campe, of the flix and other diſeaſes; three places were aſſigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto Aqua Martia, garded with 2000 Turks; another in the poups of their ſhips & gallies for the Turks voluntaries; and the third amongſt the bulwarks, where the inforced Chriſtians were cured.

Ochiall Baſſa made gouernor of Tripolis.

At the ſame time, Muſtapha appointed Ochiall Baſſa Gouernor of Tripolis, in ſtead of Dragut before ſlaine: who going thither with fiue gallies, and hauing ſet all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. With him the Baſſa had ſent two ſhips loaded with corne to Tripolis, there to make bread, wherof they began to feele ſome want in the campe. He alſo ſent Zaloch one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the winning of the caſtle S. Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the deſcription of the Iſland of Malta as they found it at their arriuall: and further to declare vnto him, That he found the Maltæſes ſtronger and better prouided, than was at his ſetting forth ſuppoſed: wherfore if it were his pleaſure longer to continue the ſiege, he ſhould ſend a new ſupplie of men, victuall, and other warlike prouiſion: which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other ſtrong places of the Iſland alſo, though not ſo ſoone as was at the firſt ſuppoſed: and that in the mean time whileſt he expected anſwere, he would not faile to do what he poſſibly might.

And becauſe he would not ſeeme to haue written an vntruth, he began his batterie in fourteene places with 70 great pieces of artillerie, amongſt which was three moſt huge baſilisks: for from the Gallows promontorie to Aqua Martia, and from thence to the caſtle S. Elmo, wherein he had placed 300 Ianizaries, the Turks had incloſed all that compaſſe with ſundrie bulwarks, trenches, and mounts, from whence they with their thundering ſhot day and night inceſſantly battered the townes and caſtles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the walls, beat downe the bulwarks, and brake down the houſes in ſuch terrible manner, that ſcarce any could be ſafe therein: which of all others moſt troubled the feareful women and children. But the Turks in their trenches reſted in far more ſafetie: yet ſo, as they durſt not ſtray far out of the campe, but truſting vpon their multitude, and not that many times without their loſſe, being cut off by the horſemen of the garriſon of Malta, who were euer readie at their heeles.

When the loſſe of the caſtle S. Elmo was knowne at Rome, the citie was filled with mourning and heauines: ſome were ſorie for the diſhonour, other ſome feared leſt the calamities of the Maltæſes ſhould redound vnto themſelues. There was alſo amongſt others, a certain enuious and foule mouth'd kinde of men, altogether ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall affaires, who ſhamed not to lay the blame of the loſſe of S. Elmo vpon the Grand maſter: whom both his owne valour, with the worthy teſtimonie of ſo many famous and valiant men as were there preſent with him, as alſo this hiſtorie gathered out of the true light of things then done, ſhall

A ſhall both for the time preſent and for all poſteritie ſufficiently acquite of ſo falſe, a ſlander.
But he will eaſily blemiſh another mans name, that ſpareth not his owne: neither can Ignorance rightly iudge of the counſels of the Skilfull; or cowardiſe, of valiant deeds.

But to returne againe to our purpoſe: we ſaid before, that three gallies were made ready at Meſſana; in ſetting forth whereof, they which had the charge vſed ſuch diligence, that the ſeuenth of Iuly they departed out of harbour. In them (beſides the Knights of the Order) was imbarqued 600 Spaniards, and 300 of the Great Biſhops ſouldiers, conducted by Pompeius Colamba: the mariners were part hired, part ſlaues, to whom libertie was promiſed, if they would luſtily do their endeuour to get into the hauen, and to be accounted of as the reſt of the ſouldiers were. And becauſe they would relieue the beſieged not with men onely, but with B victuall alſo, they put into the ſame gallies fiue hundred buſhels of wheat, beſide gunpouder, ſalt-peeter, and lead for ſhot. And although it was thought a moſt hard matter, by the hauen it ſelfe to enter into the Iſland, the Turks poſſeſſing it and all the places therabouts; neuerthe-leſſe there was in the Knights ſuch an earneſt deſire to relieue their Brethren, that they pro-miſed both to themſelues and others, all things eaſie & ſafe. But when they began to approch the Iſland, they ſent a ſcout before, to vnderſtand by ſignes from the caſtle of S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not: who comming ſo far that they might diſcouer the ſigne, perceiued thereby that they ſhould retyre. Which thing the Turks perceiuing alſo, preſently with the ſmoake of their great ordnance and other things, they ſo obſcured the aire as with a C thicke cloud, in ſuch ſort as that thoſe ſignes were no more to be diſcerned: but all in vaine: for why, our men had alreadie diſcried them: ſo thoſe three gallies returned againe into Sici-lia. For, Valetta that good Prince thought it not meet to bring ſo many of the ſacred knights, ſo many noble gentlemen and valiant ſoldiers, into a moſt manifeſt danger: for he ſaw certaine of the Turkes gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the hauen Marza Moxet, at a place called the Little ſands, to impeach the going in or out of the hauen Maior. About the ſame time, they which lay in garriſon in the citie Melita, hearing of the notable ſallie made by the ſouldiers lately come, and taking heart thereupon, at ſuch time as the Turks were fetching in a certaine bootie of cattell, the horſemen purſued them, and hauing ſlaine diuers of them, recouered the prey; and yet not ſo contented, chaſed them euen to their campe. But the other Turks ſeeing D their fellowes flying in ſuch haſte towards them, raiſed an alarum, ran to their Generals tent, and for that time ceaſed their batterie.

Three gallies depart from Meſſana with aid towards Malta.

The gallies vpon a ſigne giuen returne backe.

The Great maſter probably coniecturing, that the Turkes would in ſhort time aſſault both the towne and caſtle of S. Michael, thought good by his preſence to encourage and ſtrengthen the garriſon; and therefore was about to haue gon thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, betweene S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickely vnderſtanding the certaintie thereof, returned againe into his caſtle. Some there be that thinke, For him to haue ſo done, had been a venturous part, and full of danger, and therefore to haue beene diſ-commended: for that great things are performed, not ſo much by ſtrength of bodie as of mind, by politique counſell and direction, wherwith a Generall (although abſent) may yet with his E forces be alwaies preſent; but the Generall once loſt (which may eaſily happen if he will preſent his perſon to the danger) we ſee moſt commonly all fall together with him, no otherwiſe than doth all parts of the bodie when the ſoule departeth. But other ſome are of contrarie opinion, That the Generals preſence, eſpecially in great dangers, is both praiſe-worthy and moſt neceſſarie; for that he, as the ſoule, cannot prouide for or rule the bodie, except it be preſent, yea placed therein: and that Valetta in ſo doing, followed the examples of the greateſt kings and moſt famous Generals; as of Alexander the Great, Iulius Cæſar, Themiſtocles, Ma- rius, and others: whoſe words vnto their ſouldiers were theſe, I my ſelfe will be your conducter in the field, in the battel partaker of the danger with you, you ſhalbe in all things as my ſelfe. Beſides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, ſo moſt of all in martial affaires, all things are better, more orderly, and more eaſily done when the maſter is preſent; neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing els, when in the wars betwixt the Latines & the Rutilians, he ſaith, Vr- get præſentia Turni? wherupon they concluded, that the Great Maſter in going had done both valiantly, wiſely, and according to his dutie. But this we leaue for martial men to determine.

At the ſame time the king of Algiers came to aid the Turks with 7 gallies and ten galliots, and in them 2200 ſouldiers: who ſorie that he was not there at the begining, and deſithe great Baſſa to beſtow vpon him the firſt place in the beſieging the caſtle S.Michael:which he not only granted,but joined to his forces 2000 of his own beſt ſoldiers. Theſe things obtained, he commanded ninetie ſmall veſſels by deuiſes to be carried ouer land out of the port Marza Moxet to Aqua Martia, for that he purpoſed on that ſide to beſiege the caſtle by water.

But Valetta perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, both by ſeeing that was done, and alſo aduertiſed thereof before by a Chriſtian fugitiue; preſently called vnto him two faithfull and skilfull ſhipmaſters of Malta,and imparting the matter vnto them, demanded what they thought beſt to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it ſeemed they purpoſed at the walls foot.They quickly perceiuing the matter,anſwered,That in their opinion,if a chaine were made of maſts and ſaile-yards as ſpars ioined together with iron rings,and ſo drawne all alongſt from the corner H of the caſtle of S.Angelo, to that place where the enemy thought to land, their purpoſe might be ſo defeated. This deuice ſo pleaſed the Great maſter, that the night following ſuch a chain was made,and faſt mored in the appointed place.The Turks ſo ſoone as it was day perceiuing this bar,ſtood as men doubtfull,not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purpoſed. Whileſt they ſtood ſo abaſhed,a Chriſtian fugitiue a moſt deſperat villaine (in which kind of men fooliſh hardineſſe is accounted a vertue, and deſperation, conſtancie) came to the king,and promiſed him to breake the chaine, and ſo with a hatchet in his hand caſt him ſelfe into the ſea; after whom followed two or three mo to helpe him: who ſwimming to the chaine,got vp vpon it, and began to hew apace with their hatchets. Which the Chriſtians beholding,ſuddenly fiue or ſix of the Maltæſes ſwam thither with their drawne I ſwords in their hands,and hauing ſlaine two of them,cauſed the other to flie:after which time none of the Turks was ſo hardie as to attempt the ſame. The barbarous king for all that gaue not ouer his purpoſe ſo, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the ſiege, which the fifteenth day of Iuly began both by ſea and land. But the defendants turning their great ordinance vpon that place from whence the galliots came, with the furie thereof (in the ſpace of three houres,which the aſſault endured) ſlew two thouſand Turkes, and ſunke twelue of the Galliots:the reſt comming as far as the chaine,when they could get no farther, nor land their men,turned their prows vpon the corner of the caſtle,but were glad at laſt to retire and leaue that they came for vndone. The aſſault by land alſo endured fiue houres,wherein many of the Turks were ſlaine: and of the defendants 200,amongſt whom was Fredericus the Viceroy of K Sicilia his ſon,ſtrucke in ſunder with a great ſhot, Gordius a Frenchman, Franciſcus Sanogher and his nephew Iohn,Spaniards,all Knights of the Order: Medina was alſo wounded,whereof he afterward died. But Valetta conſidering into what danger the ſtate of Malta was like to fall, if he ſhould be conſtrained to fight many ſuch fights,where his ſoldiers wearied day & night without reſt, were ſtill to incounter with freſh men,and heard nothing of any aid or new ſupplie, the 17 day of Iuly he ſent a meſſenger into Sicilia,who ſwam from the caſtle to the fartheſt part of the bay to Aqua Martia,and from thence eſcaped vnknowne thorow the midſt of the enemies, vnto the citie of Melita, and ſo in a little frigot came to Meſſana. By him the Great maſter ſent letters to the Viceroy, requeſting him to ſend him his owne two gallies with thoſe Knights which were at Meſſana, and ſuch other ſouldiers as might in them be L tranſported: willing them,that as ſoone as they came to the Iſland,they ſhould houer off aloof before the hauen,readie vpon a ſigne giuen to thruſt in. The ſame time that this meſſenger arriued at Meſſana, came thither alſo the fleet from Spaine, wherein were many of the Knights of the Order from diuers nations. The Viceroy deſirous to ſend theſe two gallies to Valetta, ſent letters before vnto him in ſecret characters by two frigots, wherein he certified him that he would ſend the gallies,requiring to haue from him ſome ſigne wherby they might at their comming know whether they ſhould enter or retire: which frigots taking diuers courſes, one of them laded with medicines,as was afterwards knowne,was intercepted by the enemy: the other although ſhe came in ſafetie to Melita,yet for as much as all the paſſages betwixt the caſtle of S. Michael and the citie Melita,were certaine dayes before by the diligence of the enemie M ſhut vp, and three which had vſed to paſſe too and fro, intercepted and moſt cruelly executed; and beſides that, the hauen ſtraightly kept; the Knights of Meſſana could haue no further direction from the Great maſter,for the ſafe ſending of the two Gallies: yet neuertheleſſe becauſe he had requeſted them, and they themſelues were of the ſame opinion (as he

A hard ſhift to carrie newes.

A he had before written) that where all is in queſtion, the aduenture of a little part is leſſe to be feared; they thought it good to aduenture them, yet with this regard, not to expoſe all thoſe knights to ſo great a danger, but of them all to ſend onely fortie, with a conuenient number of other ſonldiers, and with them Salazar a Spaniſh captaine was ſent by the Viceroy to be landed in the Iſland Gaulos, who ſhould afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpoſe towed along by the gallies) paſſe ouer into the Iſland of Malta as a Spie, to take view both of the citie and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the loſſe receiued in the aſſault of the caſtle S. Michael, and deſirous of reuenge, did ſo violently batter the caſtle with their great ordnance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they ſtiill beat downe againe by day: and in time B of batterie made a bridge, which the 20 day of Iuly before the Sun riſing they laied ouer the ditch, that they might as if it had bin vpon euen ground, come to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians. Which ſeen, and quickly perceiued what danger it might bring, by and by Pariſot the Great maſters nephew, and Agleria, both knights, with certaine mercinarie ſoldiers ſallied out to haue burnt the bridge, but were ſo receiued of the Turks, that they were almoſt all ſlain together with Pariſot and Agleria, and yet the exploit vnperformed. The Turks without ceaſing continued their furious batterie vntill the eight and twentieth of Iuly, which day in the afternoone they in diuers places aſſaulted the caſtle, thrice they with freſh and new ſupplies relieued their repulſed and wearied ſoldiers, and ſo fiercely maintained the aſſault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Caſtle. But the defendants with no leſſe reſolution C withſtood them, repulſing them with their weapons, with ſhot, fire, and force, and at length inforced them with no ſmall loſſe of their men to retire from the wals. This victorie ſo incouraged the beſieged, that now they made ſmall reckoning of the enemie: but foraſmuch as our men alwaies ſpared their great ordnance but in time to fight, and ſallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the garriſon was but weake, and that ſhot & pouder grew ſcarce in the Caſtle. Yet deceiued in both, for that it was rather of purpoſe, than for want, ſo commanded by the Great Maſter; who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and ſeeing the enemy to giue daily more fierce aſſaults, would not vainly ſpend his moſt neceſſary helps. The Turks perceiuing what little good they had done with their often aſſaults, determined now to proue what might be done by vndermining the caſtle; and had almoſt brought one of their D mines to perfection before it was by the Chriſtians diſcouered: and to the intent they ſhould the leſſe marke it, they cauſed two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, & to batter that place; in hope that whileſt our men gazed vpon that was done openly, they ſhould the leſſe regard what they were working in ſecret, that ſo they might in the meane time more eaſily get into the caſtle. But the beſieged carefull of all that was to be cared for, perceiuing their purpoſe, with a countermine defeated their mine, & by the couragiouſneſſe of certain of their ſoldiers, but eſpecially of one Ancient, draue out the enemy, who hauing caſt certaine pots of wild-fire before him into the mine, and following preſently after with a piece of fire-worke in his hand, forced him out. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great maſter rewarded with a chaine of gold of fiue pound weight. And becauſe of vertue ſpringeth vertue, which ſtil reſteth vpon difficulties, the next day, which was the firſt of Auguſt, the bridge which wee ſaid the enemie had made ouer the ditch, was by a ſally made by the defendants burnt downe with fire and gunpouder caſt vpon it: which was in good time done, for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again aſſailing that part of the caſtle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulſed. This aſſault endured 3 houres, in which time 300 of the Turks were there ſlain: and of the knights, Rufus himſelfe and Bareſus, with certaine mercinarie ſoldiers. At this time the Chriſtians were by the enemie ſo ſhut in with the multitude of great ordnance, that they could not ſo much as looke into the ditch or ſhew themſelues, much leſſe ſally out, but they were preſently ſet off. Yet did they not for all that make ſpare of their liues when occaſion was giuen them to performe any notable exploit: as appeared by Calderonius a Spaniard, who ſeeing ſome viewing that part of the wall which the enemy had moſt battered and ſhaken at the caſtle bulwarke, doubted not to ſally out, but was preſently taken with a bullet and ſlaine; which miſchance when it might ſeeme of right to haue terrified the reſt from attempting the like, did indeed the more incenſe them; ſo that when they ſaw the enemy exceeding buſie in filling the ditch, they, reſolutely ſet downe to offer themſelues to moſt aſſured ſured death, rather than to fall into the hands of the mercileſſe enemie, agreed to ſallie out by G night, and to meet with his deſignes. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other ſouldiers, ſallying forth, cauſed the enemie to forſake the ditch and betake himſelfe to flight, of whom they ſlew about foureſcore, and loſt of their owne, ten men: amongſt whom were Ioannes and Manicrinus two Knights, whoſe heads the Turks the next day ſet vp vpon two ſpears vpon their trenches, that they might be ſeene by the Chriſtians.

The ſame day, they of the citie of Melita at night made at one inſtant a number of fires, and as if it were in triumph diſcharged great vollies of ſmall ſhot, with many other tokens of ioy: which as wel the beſieged as the Turks thought verily to haue bin done vpon diſcouerie of the Chriſtian fleet, or els the landing of ſuch forces as were come to remoue the ſiege: wheras H indeed it was neither, but done only to ſhew their cheerefulnes, and to keepe the Turks in ſuſpence with the noueltie of the matter: who for all that were not ſlacke in their buſineſſe, but with earth filled vp the ditch at the caſtle bulwarke, wherby it came to paſſe that they could not be hurt by the flankers made in that place to ſcoure the ditch, but might thereby, as vpon plaine ground, without ſtay paſſe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrowne with their continuall batterie, and with two great pieces (which they had planted vpon a high mount which they had newly caſt vp on the right hand the bulwarke Sauoire) they began to play vpon the caſtle, and at the firſt ſhot, ſhot into the loupe where Franciſcus Caſtilia commanded. Ioannes Bernardus Godinetius a Spaniſh knight was there ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. The ſame day Franciſcus Aquilates a Spaniard one of the garriſon ſoldiers, perſuaded by feare and hope (in dangers I two euill counſellors) fled out of the town S. Michael to the enemie; perſuading the Turks Colonels to giue a freſh aſſault, aſſuring them that they ſhould without doubt win the towne, becauſe there was but 400 ſoldiers left aliue in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new city and of the caſtle of S. Michael, wide enough for carts to go thorow, they determined with all their forces to aſſault both places at once, and to proue if there were yet ſo much ſtrength left in thoſe holds, as again to repulſe them: ſo the 7 day of Auguſt at one inſtant they aſſaulted the new city at the caſtle bulwark, and the caſtle S. Michael at the breach, with ſuch a multitude, that all the earth ſeemed to be couered with men round about. The thundring of the great ordnance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, with the clattering of armour, and K noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, with the cry of men on both ſides was ſo confuſed and great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the city Melita heard, and ſaw the heauens obſcured with ſmoake, fearing that the Turks (as at the caſtle S. Elmo) would neuer giue ouer the aſſault vntill they had won both the towne and the caſtle; preſently all the garriſon horſemen iſſued out of the citie, and to auert the Turks from the aſſault, ſet vpon thoſe Turks which lay at Aqua Martia: who all ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, fled, the Chriſtian horſemen hardly purſuing them with bloudy execution, and they in their flight pittiouſly crying out vpon their fellows for helpe. Whereby it came to paſſe, that they which were aſſailing the citie and caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfited fellowes, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault: ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both ſides by L the Chriſtians, they returned to their trenches, when they had loſt about fifteene hundred at the aſſault, beſide them which were ſlaine in the chaſe by the horſemen of Melita. Of the defendants of both places were ſlaine aboue an hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured about fiue houres. Valetta deliuered of ſo great a danger, that day and certaine others cauſed publique prayers to be made, and went himſelfe with the multitude of the citiſens to the Church, to giue thanks to Almightie God for that victorie.

The garriſon ſoldiers of Melita ſallying out cauſe the Turks to giue ouer the aſſault at Saint Michaels.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was aduertiſed from Calabria, that certaine ſhips laded with men, victuall, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for the wars, were comming from Conſtantinople to Malta: wherefore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada two noblemen, with fiue gallies to meet them: who being come within thirtie miles of Malta, met with no ſuch ſhips, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they tooke, but the galliot M eſcaped to the enemies fleet at Malta.

Muſtapha the Turks General now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, reſolued not to giue vnto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commanded his ſouldiers againe to aſſault the breach at the Caſtle of Saint

Michel,

A Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no ſmall ſlaughter quickly repulſed: neither did the Baſſa giue ſo many aſſaults, for the hope he had to win thoſe places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant Generall, and to ſatisfie Solymans pleaſure, who had expreſſely commanded, either to win that Iſland, or there all to loſe their liues. He alſo ſent a galliot in haſt with letters to Solyman; wherein he ſhewed him the ſtate of the fleet, with what difficulties the army was diſtreſſed, what ſmal hope there was of winning the places beſieged, how well the Chriſtians were prouided, with many other ſuch things.

Muſtapha ſendeth a meſſenger to Solyman.

In the meane time thoſe two gallies of Malta (which we haue before ſpoken of) departing from Meſſana, came to Syracuſa, where they ſtaied a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of Malta in a ſmall boat comming from Pozalo ſore wounded: B he being demanded how hee was ſo hurt, told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night: which they doing, about midnight fiue Turks brake into the houſe vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turkes, that two gallies were come into that port, with ſouldiers and other warlike prouiſion bound for Malta. Wherby the knights perceiued, that their comming would be diſcouered vnto the enemie, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the hauen of Malta, as they had before purpoſed: neuertheleſſe, to conduct Salazar with his little boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two gallies and one galliot going before them, who ſeeing C the gallies comming after them, made with all ſpeed to Malta: and were no doubt thoſe gallies, from whence thoſe fiue Turkes came, which had done thoſe things which the wounded Maltæſe reported. For all that, theſe gallies kept on their courſe as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters, all that had happened: and not daring to put to ſea, the South wind blowing with a ſtiffe gale againſt them, they returned backe againe to Syracuſa, expecting there farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the knights to him to Meſſana; by whom they receiued anſwere, That they ſhould goe no farther, but to ſtay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſſe ouer to Malta. But Salazar brought by the gallies to Pozalo, reſolued with his little boat to go on: & although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder & rain, D yet the dayes following proouing more calme, he in ſhort time arriued in the Iſland of Malta, and came in ſafetie to the citie Melita, and there diſguiſed himſelfe in Turkiſh apparell, and taking with him one companion, who could alſo ſpeake the Turkiſh language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in al the Turks army of land ſoldiers ſcarce 14000, and of them many wounded and ſicke; and that the reſt was but an vnſeruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of warres had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt ſouldiers. When they had thus viewed the camp, they returned againe to the citie; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the watch tower of Maleca: which when they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſeruing the ſignes from the Iſland of E Gaulos and the citie of Melita, hee might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approch, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelfe, he in his little boat (which at his comming into the Iſle hee had there left) happily returned to Meſſana, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that hee had ſeene: conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turkes fleete was but weake, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of men and munition, farre vnable to encounter with 10000 Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two frigots which were before ſent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, & a fugitiue from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from Meſſana, were alſo come in with fourteene Turks taken about the Iſland of Malta, who all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported: F Which was, That the Turkes armie was with often aſſaults wonderfully weakened, both in number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his owne hands ſlaine diuers of them: and that which more encreaſed their feare, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with inuincible courage to defend their ſtrõg places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vaine: Wherefore they were ſorie, and repented that they euer tooke in hand ſured death, rather than to fall into the hands of the mercileſſe enemie, agreed to ſallie out by night, and to meet with his deſignes. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other ſouldiers, ſallying forth, cauſed the enemie to forſake the ditch and betake himſelfe to flight, of whom they ſlew about foureſcore, and loſt of their owne, ten men: amongſt whom were Ioannes and Manicrinus two Knights, whoſe heads the Turks the next day ſet vp vpon two ſpears vpon their trenches, that they might be ſeene by the Chriſtians.

The ſame day, they of the citie of Melita at night made at one inſtant a number of fires, and as if it were in triumph diſcharged great vollies of ſmall ſhot, with many other tokens of ioy: which as wel the beſieged as the Turks thought verily to haue bin done vpon diſcouerie of the Chriſtian fleet, or els the landing of ſuch forces as were come to remoue the ſiege: wheras indeed it was neither, but done only to ſhew their cheerefulnes, and to keepe the Turks in ſuſpence with the noueltie of the matter: who for all that were not ſlacke in their buſineſſe, but with earth filled vp the ditch at the caſtle bulwarke, wherby it came to paſſe that they could not be hurt by the flankers made in that place to ſcoure the ditch, but might thereby, as vpon plaine ground, without ſtay paſſe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrowne with their continuall batterie, and with two great pieces (which they had planted vpon a high mount which they had newly caſt vp on the right hand the bulwarke Sauoire) they began to play vpon the caſtle, and at the firſt ſhot, ſhot into the loupe where Franciſcus Caſtilia commanded. Ioannes Bernardus Godinetius a Spaniſh knight was there ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. The ſame day Franciſcus Aquilates a Spaniard one of the garriſon ſoldiers, perſuaded by feare and hope (in dangers two euill counſellors) fled out of the town S. Michael to the enemie; perſuading the Turks Colonels to giue a freſh aſſault, aſſuring them that they ſhould without doubt win the towne, becauſe there was but 400 ſoldiers left aliue in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new city and of the caſtle of S. Michael, wide enough for carts to go thorow, they determined with all their forces to aſſault both places at once, and to proue if there were yet ſo much ſtrength left in thoſe holds, as again to repulſe them: ſo the 7 day of Auguſt at one inſtant they aſſaulted the new city at the caſtle bulwark, and the caſtle S. Michael at the breach, with ſuch a multitude, that all the earth ſeemed to be couered with men round about. The thundring of the great ordnance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, with the clattering of armour, and noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, with the cry of men on both ſides was ſo confuſed and great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the city Melita heard, and ſaw the heauens obſcured with ſmoake, fearing that the Turks (as at the caſtle S. Elmo) would neuer giue ouer the aſſault vntill they had won both the towne and the caſtle; preſently all the garriſon horſemen iſſued out of the citie, and to auert the Turks from the aſſault, ſet vpon thoſe Turks which lay at Aqua Martia: who all ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, fled, the Chriſtian horſemen hardly purſuing them with bloudy execution, and they in their flight pittiouſly crying out vpon their fellows for helpe. Whereby it came to paſſe, that they which were aſſailing the citie and caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfited fellowes, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault: ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both ſides by the Chriſtians, they returned to their trenches, when they had loſt about fifteene hundred at the aſſault, beſide them which were ſlaine in the chaſe by the horſemen of Melita. Of the defendants of both places were ſlaine aboue an hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured about fiue houres. Valetta deliuered of ſo great a danger, that day and certaine others cauſed publique prayers to be made, and went himſelfe with the multitude of the citizens to the Church, to giue thanks to Almightie God for that victorie.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was aduertiſed from Calabria, that certaine ſhips laded with men, victuall, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for the wars, were comming from Conſtantinople to Malta: wherefore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada two noblemen, with fiue gallies to meet them: who being come within thirtie miles of Malta, met with no ſuch ſhips, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they tooke, but the galliot eſcaped to the enemies fleet at Malta.

Muſtapha the Turks General now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, reſolued not to giue vnto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commanded his ſouldiers againe to aſſault the breach at the Caſtle of Saint Michel,

Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no ſmall ſlaughter quickly repulled: A neither did the Baſſa giue ſo many aſſaults, for the hope he had to win thoſe places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant Generall, and to ſatisfie Solymans pleaſure, who had expreſſely commanded, either to win that Iſland, or there all to loſe their liues. He alſo ſent a galliot in haſt with letters to Solyman; wherein he ſhewed him the ſtate of the fleet, with what difficulties the army was diſtreſſed, what ſmal hope there was of winning the places beſieged, how well the Chriſtians were prouided, with many other ſuch things.

In the meane time thoſe two gallies of Malta (which we haue before ſpoken of) departing from Meſſana, came to Syracuſa, where they ſtaied a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of Malta in a ſmall boat comming from Pozalo ſore wounded: B he being demanded how hee was ſo hurt; told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night:
which they doing, about midnight fiue Turks brake into the houſe vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turkes, that two gallies were come into that port, with ſouldiers and other warlike prouiſion bound for Malta. Wherby the knights perceiued, that their comming would be diſcouered vnto the enemie, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the hauen of Malta, as they had before purpoſed: neuertheleſſe, to conduct Salazar with his little boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two gallies and one galliot going before them, who ſeeing C the gallies comming after them, made with all ſpeed to Malta: and were no doubt thoſe gallies, from whence thoſe fiue Turkes came, which had done thoſe things which the wounded Maltæſe reported. For all that, theſe gallies kept on their courſe as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters, all that had happened: and not daring to put to ſea, the South wind blowing with a ſtiffe gale againſt them, they returned backe againe to Syracuſa, expecting there farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the knights to him to Meſſana; by whom they receiued anſwere, That they ſhould goe no farther, but to ſtay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſſe ouer to Malta. But Salazar brought by the gallies to Pozalo, reſolued with his little boat to go on: & although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder & rain, D yet the dayes following proouing more calme, he in ſhort time arriued in the Iſland of Malta, and came in ſafetie to the citie Melita, and there diſguiſed himſelfe in Turkiſh apparell, and taking with him one companion, who could alſo ſpeake the Turkiſh language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in al the Turks army of land ſoldiers ſcarce 14000, and of them many wounded and ſicke; and that the reſt was but an vnſeruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of warres had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt ſouldiers. When they had thus viewed the camp, they returned againe to the citie; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the watch tower of Maleca: which when E they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſeruing the ſignes from the Iſland of Gaulos and the citie of Melita, hee might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approch, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelfe, he in his little boat (which at his comming into the Iſle hee had there left) happily returned to Meſſana, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that hee had ſeene: conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turkes fleete was but weake, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of men and munition, farre vnable to encounter with 10000 Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two frigots which were before ſent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, & a fugitiue from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from Meſſana, were alſo come in with fourteene Turks taken about the Iſland of Malta, who all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported: F Which was, That the Turkes armie was with often aſſaults wonderfully weakened, both in number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his owne hands ſlaine diuers of them: and that which more encreaſed their feare, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with inuincible courage to defend their ſtrong places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vaine: Wherefore they were ſorie, and repented that they euer tooke in hand that expedition;they deteſted ſuch a war,ſhrinking as much as they could from the aſſault,and as they might ſtealing quite away,which many of them did,ſpecially ſuch as had before abiured G the Chriſtian Faith. For which cauſe diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandement giuen by the great Baſſa, that they ſhould reſolue with themſelues either to winne the towne,or there all to lay vp their bones, for that the great Sultan Solyman had ſo commanded, whom to gaineſay,was in it ſelfe death. Theſe and ſuch like perſuaſions, cauſed the Viceroy ſomwhat the ſooner to thinke of the bringing forth of his fleet:the beſieged in the mean time did what men might for defence of the place & them ſelues. There was in the caſtle one Franciſcus Giuara captain of the vauntgard,a noble & valiant gentleman,of a great conceit,he about ten foot from the towne wall, which the enemie had with their great ordnance beaten down, cauſed a curtain to be drawne 50 foot long,& 5 foot thicke,with flankers at both ends,which in two nights was brought to perfection, & was afterwards a great help to the beſieged.The H enemie in the mean time began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch,where Boningſegna a Spaniard and a moſt valiant knight had the charge: which the beſieged perceiuing, by a countermine defeated the ſame.It hapned in the mean time, that as a fugitiue was ſwimming to the towne,he was taken by the enemy, which much grieued the beſieged, deſirous to haue vnderſtood ſomething of the ſtate of the enemies camp,and of their purpoſes.Now when the former mine had taken ſo euill ſucceſſe,part of the Turkes aſſailed the caſtle S.Michael, & part with gunpouder thought to haue blowne vp the caſtle bulwarke: but by the carefulneſſe and courage of the defendants,al their attempts were diſappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places ſlaine, and certaine bags of pouder taken from them in the mine. With theſe and other ſuch difficulties,Muſtapha and Piall the Turks Generals diſappointed of their hope,conſulted I with the other great captaines of the army, Whether they ſhould there ſtill continue that deſperat ſiege,or depart? Where moſt were cleere of opinion,That it was beſt betime to depart. Yet for all that,the old Baſſa ſaid,He would there ſtay,vntill the galliot which he had before ſent to Conſtantinople,were returned with anſwer from Solyman,and in the mean time both by force and policie to ſeeke after victorie: which thing he oftner did, than ſtood with the broken eſtate of his armie,or of the beſieged; neither reſting himſelfe nor ſuffering others to take reſt: for one while he battered the wals,another while he wrought mines or els made bridges,ſometime he caſt vp mounts,and then again filled the ditches,and euer and anon gaue one aſſault or another. In all which doing he vſed ſuch induſtrie,that whatſoeuer he tooke in K hand,was in ſhort time brought to ſuch perfection as might haue carried a ſtronger place,had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his ſtrong and politique deuiſes.

The Turks mines defeated by the Chriſtians Robles gouernor of the caſtle of S.Michael, ſlaine.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp-maſter,and Gouernour of the caſtle S.Michael,was by night viewing the ruins of the wall,he was ſtrucke in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlain,leauing behind him to his fellowes,the great deſire of himſelfe: for why,he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times ſtood the defendants in great ſtead) worthily beloued.In whoſe ſtead the Great maſter ſent one of the Colonels that was with himſelfe, a moſt expert and reſolute captaine,to take charge of S.Michaels caſtle; who by his valiant care and prouidence ſo well diſcharged the charge committed vnto him,that as often as the Turks attempted the place,ſo often they were with loſſe repulſed. L

The two gallies with the galliot, deſcried by the gallies of Malta (as we haue before ſaid) told Piall Baſſa the Admirall,that the Chriſtian fleet was ready to come forth: wherefore hee fearing the ſudden comming thereof,cauſed ſeuentie gallies to be in readineſſe: beſides which forty others lay in the hauen Marza Moxet vnſeruiceable,as wanting both men & other equipage; for that was ſpent in making bridges,mines,& other ſuch things neceſſarie for the ſiege: as for the men,they were part with ſickneſſe,and part with often aſſaults conſumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himſelfe by day in the port Maior neere the ſhore, and by night put forth to ſea,expecting the comming of the fleet.But after long looking,when he ſaw no man appeare,hee againe landed his ſouldiers: and becauſe at land the Baſſa began to want pouder, of euery thirtie barrels of pouder in euery gally,hee tooke out twentie,and of ſome M twentie fiue,or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the walls of both townes, eſpecially with thoſe great pieces which they call Baſiliskes, whoſe ſhot of two hundred pound weight was ſeuen hands about; whereby the walls of the caſtle of S.Michael were beaten flat. And at the ſame time,

A time,the Baſſa at the caſtle S. Angelo,had with continual batterie ſo ſhaken the caſtle bulwark, that it was almoſt fallen quite downe. Theſe breaches thus made, when the Turks ſaw both townes bared of wals and other defendants,and laid ſo open, that nothing ſeemed now to let them to looke vpon their enemies,they made no longer ſtay,but the 18 day of Auguſt(the Sun being now at the higheſt)with all their power fiercely aſſaulted both the towns. Thrice they were repulſed, and ſtill came on afreſh; yet at length beaten downe on euery ſide with greater ſlaughter, they were glad ſhamefully to giue ouer the aſſault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this moſt cruell fight (which endured fiue houres)the inuincible courage of the Great maſter notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold, was ſtill valiantly fighting in the face of the breach; whoſe preſence incouraged not the ſoul-B diers only,but euen boyes and women to fight: for ſo it is,that men are more moued with example, than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turkes,part ſtood ſtill in the towne ditch,and to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of the caſtle bulwarke,had with wonderful celeri-tie caſt vp a defence of earth, fagots,and other like matter, which they did of purpoſe to ap-proch and to vndermine the wals,and had therefore incloſed the ſpace of fifteen elnes: which when the beſieged perceiued,they bent certaine pieces of artillerie vpon it,and ſlew many of them,and with fire conſumed what was left. The next day the aſſault was at the ſame places by the enemie renewed,who by reaſon of his number of ſoldiers might eaſily ſend freſh men in ſtead of them which were wounded or wearie: and firſt,after their wonted manner they battered both the townes all that day vntill night; afterwards the Moone ariſing, about midnight C with a horrible crie they began a moſt terrible aſſault, which at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians,who yet ſtill mindfull of their wonted valor,did ſo much with their weapons and fire-workes, that the enemie euill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The ſame day a mine was by the defendants perceiued,at the caſtle bulwarke, wherein a hundred Turks there found,were almoſt all ſlaine,and the mine deſtroied. Yet for all this did not the enemie reſt at all, but the next day ſeuen times aſſaulted the ſame breaches, vſing now not weapons only,but fire-workes alſo; wherewith Boſninſega had his face ſo burnt, that he loſt one of his eies. At the ſame time alſo,the Turkes at a place called the Spurre, laboured mightily to haue gotten into the caſtle: where Centius a knight of an inuincible courage,got vp vpon the rampier,and with a pike couragiouſly thruſt them downe that were climing vp, and D thruſting thorow one,diſcouraged the reſt; but was himſelfe wounded in the arme with a ſmal ſhot: yet when he had a little withdrawn himſelfe to haue his wound bound vp,he came againe to the rampier,and neuer departed from the fight,vntill he had(as a valiant conqueror)preſerued the place. So the Turks with great ſlaughter on euery ſide repulſed,left the victory to the Chriſtians,of whom were ſlaine almoſt an hundred, and moſt of them (as at other times) with ſhot: amongſt whom were theſe moſt valiant knights; at the caſtle Angelo, Fragus; at the caſtle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatus, Ioh. Baptiſta Soderinus, Paulus Bemportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus, and certaine others, men worthie of longer life. The Turkes had alſo at the ſame time wrought a mine at the caſtle S. Michael,which was at once both diſcouered and deſtroied.

The Turkes at once aſſaile the towns S. Angelo and S. Michael, and are at both places repulſed.

Another aſſault

With theſe ſo many and ſo great aſſaults,certain of the knights(and thoſe not of the meaneſt E ſort)fearing leſt that which was ſo often attempted by the enemy,ſhould at length be effected; told the Great maſter, That they thought it conuenient and neceſſarie, to remooue all the records,all the pictures and reliques of the Saints,and other their religious things into the caſtle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more ſtrength and aſſurance. The Great maſter, although he well knew that they which thus ſaid, ſpake it of a good mind, was for all that with that ſpeech exceedingly moued: wherfore he ſhortly anſwered them, That ſo to do,were nothing els but to applauſe & diſcourage the minds,not of the Maltæſes only,who had hitherto valiantly behaued themſelues, & don more than any man could haue hoped for; but alſo of the mercinarie ſouldiers,if they ſhould perceiue it: wherefore he was reſolued,either together to keep all,or loſe all: and becauſe none ſhould from thenceforth repoſe any hope in the ſtrength F of the caſtle S. Angelo, he ſaid he would bring all the garriſon out of the caſtle into the towne, that there they might together with others withſtand the enemy, & that he would leaue in the caſtle none but gunners, who ſhould as need required ſhoot at the enemy: an anſwer truly well beſeeming a man of his place, & to be to al poſterity commended: for how can the ſouldier hope, which ſeeth his captain deſpaire? or aduenture, where the chieftain ſeemes to be ſtrucke with feare? Whileſt the Grand maſter with this anſwer doth both aſhame them and alſo encourage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before ſhould not paſſe without aſſault) with the dawning of the day aſſailed the very ſame places with the greateſt fury poſſible, eſpecially at the ruins of the caſtle: where San Romanus an Auergnois, which had the charge of that place, loſt this ſhort and tranſitorie life, winning thereby immortall fame: and at S. Michaels, Adurnius one of the knights, and Fagio with certain others, were grieuouſly wounded: for the enemy ſuddenly retiring from the aſſault, preſently ſo thundred into the breaches with their great and ſmall ſhot, that all the Iſland ſeemed to tremble, the heauens to burne, and the aire to be darkned with ſmoke. In the mean time Valetta thorowly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himſelfe a little to breath himſelfe: when ſuddenly a Spaniſh prieſt, with his hands caſt vp to heauen, came running to him, roaring and crying out, That all was loſt and forlorne, and that three or foure enſignes of the enemies were by the caſtle breach broken into the towne. Which the great maſter hearing, ſuddenly clapt his helmet vpon his head, and with a pike in his hand, ſaid vnto them that were about him, Loe fellow ſouldiers, the houre is come wherein you may ſhew your ſelues the moſt valiant Champions of the Chriſtian religion, if it be ſo, that you now alſo retaine the ſame valour which you haue in other battels ſhewed. There is no cauſe wherefore you ſhould doubt of this laſt, for the enemie is the ſame, and the ſame God which hath hitherto preſerued vs, will not now forſake vs: wherefore follow mee, valiant hearts. This ſaid, he haſted to the place where moſt danger was, and with him all the ſouldiers, all the citiſens men and women, old and yong, yea the very children, all againſt the common enemy. There was fought a moſt dreadfull & dangerous battell: ſome kept the enemie from entring, ſome ſet vpon them that were already entred, whom they wounded, chaſed, and ſlew, although they notably reſiſted. Within, without, all was couered with weapons, darts, dead bodies, and bloud. The Great maſter was careful of al, and in euery place preſent, commending, exhorting, directing, as occaſion required, performing at once all the duties of a moſt valiant ſouldier & worthie Generall. At length the Turkes with the ſetting of the Sun retired, and ſo the aſſault ceaſed. Thus was the Great maſter the vndoubted victor, but not without much bloud of his people, conſidering his ſmall number: for in this fight he loſt aboue 200 men, whereas of the enemies, beſide them which were entred, whereof not one eſcaped, were ſlaine aboue 2000. Theſe are thoſe foure terrible aſſaults, preſently giuen one after another vnto the beſieged.

Garzias the Viceroy in the meane tarried for nothing elſe to tranſport his armie to Malta, but for the comming of Io. Cardona, who with twelue gallies was gone to Panormo, to conduct thence foure ſhips laded with prouiſion: but when he ſaw him ſtay long, he ſent to him in poſt, That if he could not with ſuch ſpeed as was required tow forth thoſe ſhips, hee ſhould ſpend no longer time, but take out the prouiſion into his gallies, and with ſpeed to come away. So the Viceroy with a fleet of 72 gallies the twentieth day of Auguſt ſet forward from Meſſana to Syracuſa, wherein he carried ten thouſand ſelect ſouldiers, amongſt whom were aboue two hundred knights of the Order of S. Iohn, and aboue fortie of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of knights inſtituted by Coſmos Medices, Duke of Florence, to the imitation of the knights of Malta in the yeare 1561, and haue their reſidence at Coſmopolis, a new built city in the Iſland of Elba in the Tuſcane ſea, ouer againſt Piombino. Beſides theſe Knights, in this fleet were diuers noble and valiant gentlemen of Italie, Sicilie, and other countries. The fleet being arriued at Syracuſa, the Viceroy ſent Auria with one gallie and a boat to Malta, to land a man, to know of Paccius (left, as we haue before ſaid, for a watch in the Iſland at Maleca) what newes, or what he had ſeen. By whom it was vnderſtood, That no ſhip was ſeene at ſea, but one galliot, which the one and twentieth day of Auguſt in the morning made towards Gaulos, & the ſame day towards night as hee was informed by the watchmen of Maleca, ſixteene gallies came to water at Saline, but what became of them afterwards, by reaſon of the comming on of the night could not be deſcried

In this while the beſieged had notably repaired the breach at the caſtle bulwarke, & had in ſundry places aptly placed certain great pieces to flanker the ditches, & to beat the mount caſt vp by the enemie at the bulwarke of Boninſegna, that they might from thence annoy all the plain of the caſtle with their ſmal ſhot. But the Turks hauing determined with all their forces at once to aſſault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of ſpars and boords, able to couer thirty men, vnder the breach at S. Michaels: wherby it came to paſſe, that none of the defen-

A defendants could without danger ſhew themſelues in the breach: which when they could by no means endure,they ſuddenly ſallied out,& putting them to flight which were there couered, ſet fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner,they which beſieged the new city,were repulſed at the caſtle breach,& another like engine burnt. The next night,certain of the watch of the caſtle iſſued out,and hauing deſtroied the Turks engines prepared for the aſſailing of that place,and ſlaine them that were ſet for the keeping thereof,returned in ſafety into the caſtle.
But when the enemies both that day and others following reſted not, but repairing their mines,mounts,and engines,laboured in both places ro haue beaten the Chriſtians from the wals;all their endeuour and labour was by the induſtry and valor of the defendants made fruſtrate.
The beſieged had at the caſtle breach made a mine,and laid in it eight barrels of pouder, B that if the enemie ſhould againe aſſault that place,he might there be blown vp : but whilſt the Turks were for like purpoſe working a mine in the ſame place, they chanced vpon the mine before made,which they ſpoiled, and carried away all the pouder. Thus whileſt they labour both on the one ſide and the other,Muſtapha the Generall, a moſt expert and famous commander, conſidering that Summer now ſo far ſpent,he was not to vſe longer delay;and withal,that reſolute perſeuerance oftentimes in war findeth out a way to victory; determined with all his power once againe to aſſault the caſtle S.Michael. Wherefore diſplaying the ſtately ſtanderd of the Turkiſh Emperor,vpon the point whereof was faſtened a globe of Gold, he commanded his ſouldiers to enter the breach ; who now like deſperat men attempted to haue performed his command,and were by the Chriſtians valiantly encountred:ſo that in the breach was C made a moſt terrible& doubtful fight.But when the Turks had now bin twice reiected & beaten downe; Muſtapha perceiuing his ſouldiers as men halfe diſcouraged,but faintly to maintain the aſſault,came himſelfe to the places,praying and exhorting them not to be diſcouraged,but that day to confirme their former labors and victories;and not to ſuffer their vanquiſhed enemies to triumph ouer them : hee told them that the enemie had now no defence left wherewith to couer himſelfe,that all was beaten downe flat,and that there remained only a few wearie & maimed bodies,which were not able long to indure the edge of their ſwords;that with ſuch reſolution they had before won the caſtle S.Elmo : laſt of all, hee by promiſing to ſome mony,to ſome honor and preferment,threatning ſome,& requeſting others,incouraged ſome one way,ſome another,euery one according to his quality and diſpoſition:who moued either D with their Generals preſence,promiſes,or threats,gaue a freſh and fierce aſſault. The fight was on both ſides terrible,yet at length the Turks were again inforced to retire:for the defendants had caſt vp a rampier,wheron they had fitly placed two field pieces,wherwith they ſore troubled the enemie,and at the firſt ſhot ſtrucke in ſunder one of thoſe wooden engines,which the enemie had made ſtronger than the reſt,couered with raw hides to keep it from burning, and rent in pieces fortie ſouldiers which were vnder it: and the ſame night they which were in the other towne and the caſtle bulwarke, ſallying couragiouſly out, deſtroied all the enemies defences,and draue them from a mount which they had made vpon the fortifications of the Chriſtians: whereby they perceiued plainly, what ſmall courage the Turks had to fight, for E vpon that mount they were almoſt 300,wheras of our men was but 25,with which ſmal number for all that,they had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpoſe as before,made another mine at the caſtle bulwarke, but perceiuing that it was in danger to be found by the enemie in repairing his fortifications without,they ſuddenly put fire vnto it,by force whereof threeſcore Turks which were within the danger of the place,were blowne vp and ſlaine.

The Turks enforced to retire Garzias the Viceroy,in the mean while that theſe things were in doing, departing with his fleet from Syracuſa,with a proſperous wind kept on his courſe toward Pachynum,where they deſcried a tall ſhip at ſea, driuen thither (as was afterward knowne) by tempeſt : ſhee out of the Iſland Mening was carrying a great ſupply of ſhot and pouder vnto the Turkes campe at Malta ; but now,ouertaken by the Chriſtian fleet,eaſily yeelded,and was by the Viceroy ſent by other mariners to Syracuſa. And now the Chriſtian fleet carried with a faire gale towards F Malta,ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a tempeſt from the Eaſt, that they were driuen to the Iſland Æguſa, two hundred and twentie miles Weſt of Malta, from whence the firſt of September letters were brought from the Viceroy to the Great maſter, certifying him, That hee would in ſhort time come with his fleet and relieue him. The ſame day alſo a Chriſtian fled out of the Turks gallies,wherein he was captiue,to the city S,Angelo ; who reported, That in the Turks camp were few men able to fight, moſt of the armie being with wounds, famine, ſickneſſe, and other G miſeries brought to extreame weakneſſe: and beſides that, that infinit numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he ſaid moreouer, that they were determined to beſiege the citie of Melita, and had already for that purpoſe mounted fiue great pieces of artillerie for batterie; and that they had but a few daies before taken twelue, & the laſt day of all fourteene horſemen of the garriſon ſouldiers of that citie. In the meane while the fleet which was driuen (as we ſaid) to Æguſa, the rage of the ſea being now well appeaſed, came to Drepanum, and from thence toward Gaulos, as was before intended: where by the way the two gallies of Malta light vpon two of the Turks galliots, and tooke them.

The Chriſtian fleet commeth to Gaulos.

The fift day of September the Chriſtian fleet came to Gaulos, where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed ſignes from Malta, whereby he might ſafely land, returned forthwith H backe againe to Pozalo, whither Auria immediatly following him, told him, That he had ſeen the ſignes, and aſſured him of ſafe landing in the Iſland of Malta: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged, the next day towards night returned againe to Gaulos.

A fugitiue diſcouereth the enemies purpoſe to the Great maſter.

The ſame day a Chriſtian captiue fled from the Turks to S. Angelo, and told the Great maſter, That hee was come to bring him good newes, how that the Turkes had determined to proue their laſt fortune in aſſaulting the Caſtle S. Michael, which they would do the next day: where if the ſucceſſe were anſwerable to their deſire, they would then tarrie, but if not, then forthwith to be gone: and that Muſtapha the more to encourage his ſouldiers, had promiſed fiue talents of gold to the enſigne bearers, that ſhould firſt aduance their enſignes vpon the wals I and farther to promote them to greater places of honor; as for the reſt, he would reward euery one of them according to their deſert, either with mony or preferment. Valetta thinking all theſe things to be by Gods appointment diſcouered vnto him by ſuch men, as they had from time to time been: firſt gaue thanks vnto Almighty God, and after that, with all diligence prepared ſuch things as he thought moſt neceſſary for the repulſing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordnance battered the new citie, and the ſhipping in the hauen, in ſuch ſort that one of the great ſhips was there ſunke.

In the morning Garzias the Viceroy with his fleet arriued at the Iſland of Malta, and there quickly and quietly landed his forces, and whileſt his gallies watered at Gaulos, went forward with the armie about halfe a mile, inſtructing the Generalls and Colonells, what he thought K needful to be done, commanding all proclamations and commands to be made in the name of the king of Spaine, vntill they came to the Great maſter, and then in all things to obey him as their Soueraigne: and charged Aſcanius Cornia the Generall, in all his actions to follow the counſell of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, hee left them marching towards Melita. About noone he retired to his gallies, and ſailing Eaſtward, came with all his fleet within the ſight of the citie of Melita, about 3 miles diſtant from the South ſhore. They of the citie vpon ſight of the fleet, in token of ioy diſcharged all the great artillerie, which was anſwered from the fleet, by diſcharging all their great ordnance twice. After that, he returned as he had before determined into Sicilia, to take into his gallies the Duke of Vrbins companies, which were come to Meſſana, and certaine bands of Spaniards at Syracuſa, L and ſo forthwith to return to Malta, to attend the departing of the Turks fleet, being now euill appointed, and already as good as halfe ouerthrowne.

The Turks, who (as is before ſaid) had purpoſed to proue their laſt fortune vpon the towne of S. Michael, had now certaine daies before the comming of the fleet, begun to truſſe vp their baggage: but as ſoon as they heard that the fleet was come, and the army landed, there ſuddenly aroſe a wonderfull tumultuous confuſion amongſt them, ſome cried, Arme, arme, and otherſome as faſt to be gone: and being generally all afraid, euery one according to his diſpoſition, betooke himſelfe to his weapons or to his heels, the greateſt number thruſt together into their trenches as neere as they could vnto the great ordnance: and ſo burning the engines and fortifications, with all the ſpeed they could imbarked their great ordnance and baggage. Which they in the town of S. Angelo perceiuing, not expecting the commandement of the Great maſter in ſo ſudden an opportunity, couragiouſly ſallied out to Burmola, where certain Turks kept a huge great piece of ordnance, who now hauing no minde to fight, betooke themſelues to flight, & forſooke the piece, which they of the town preſently drew within their wals: and if the new come forces had that day charged the enemy as they diſorderly ran to their gallies, A pily they had either found an occaſion of victory, or at leaſtwiſe taken from them the greateſt part of their artillerie. But it may be, that they followed the old militarie ſaying, That vnto the flying enemie a man ſhould make a bridge of ſiluer. Beſides that, they thinking it not conuenient to depart from the prouiſion and things which they had brought for the reliefe of the beſieged, which for the roughneſſe of the way and want of horſes were hardly carried, would not prouoke the enemy with any ſkirmiſh: wherby it came to paſſe, that the Turks without let imbarked their great ordnance, their baggage, and moſt part of their army. The 11 of September, whileſt the Turks fleet was brought out of the hauen Marza Moxet, a fugitiue of Genoa came in haſt to the Great maſter, & told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Melita, to meet with the Chriſtians vpon the way. Which thing the Great maſter hearing, preſently B ſent a ſufficient number of good ſoldiers to the caſtle S. Elmo, there to ſet vp one of the enſigns of the ſacred Order: who comming thither, found there foure and twentie great pieces, ſome for batterie, ſome for the field, which they could not in ſo great haſt remoue thence.

The Turks fleet departing out of the hauen Marza Moxet to the port of S. Paul, there landed ſeuen thouſand men, with Muſtapha their Generall, who was falſly informed, That the Chriſtians were not aboue three thouſand ſtrong: and from thence incouraged with the ſmall number of the enemie (as they ſuppoſed) they marched directly toward Melita. The Chriſtians alſo marching orderly & ready to giue battell, held on their way to meet them: and at the riſing of an hill both armies meeting together, they gaue a great ſhout, and withall the formoſt began the battell, where ſome few were at the firſt ſlain on both ſides. But the Chriſtians ſtill C growing vpon them both in number and ſtrength, the Turks finding themſelues ouercharged, fled, the Chriſtians purſuing them and killing them vntill they came to their gallies; where in ſtriuing who ſhould get in firſt, about foure hundred of them were drowned in the ſea, beſides eighteen hundred ſlaine in the battell at land: and had the Chriſtian ſouldiers wel known the country, they had ſlain them euery mothers ſonne. The Turks thus driuen to their gallies, lay there in the hauen all the next day, and moſt part of the night following: but a little before day, vpon the ſhooting off of a great piece, the ſigne of their departure, they al hoiſed ſaile for Gercia, leauing the Iſland of Malta ſore impoueriſhed and waſted. In this ſiege the Turkes loſt about foure and twentie thouſand, whereof moſt part were of their beſt ſouldiers: and of the Chriſtians were ſlaine about fiue thouſand, beſides two hundred and forty knights of the Or-D der, men of diuers nations, but all worthie eternall fame, whoſe dead bodies the Great maſter cauſed to be honourably buried. The Turkes in their batterie during the ſiege, ſpent as is accounted, threeſcore and eighteen thouſand great ſhot.

The Turkes depart from Malta.

If a man doe well conſider the difficulties and dangers the beſieged paſſed thorow in this fiue moneths ſiege, the manifold labors and perils they indured in ſo many and ſo terrible aſſaults, the ſmall reliefe to them ſent in ſo great diſtreſſe, with the deſperat obſtinacie of ſo puiſſant an enemy; he ſhall hardly find any place theſe many yeres more mightily impugned, or with greater valor and reſolution defended. The late beſieged, and now victorious prince, honorably acquited of ſo great an enemy, firſt commanded publique prayers with thankſgiuing to be made vnto the Giuer of all victory: after that, he rewarded the valiant, commended the reſt, and gaue thanks to all; he charitably relieued the ſicke and wounded, bewailed the ſpoile of the Iſland, and carefully prouided for the repairing of the breaches and places battered: & yet in all this doing, diligently inquired after the enemies courſe and purpoſe, and was not in any thing remiſſe or ſecure, as in victorie moſt men are. But becauſe ſo great harmes could not without great helpes in ſhort time be repaired, and the returne of the proud enemie, not without cauſe the next yeare feared; he by letters to diuers great princes, & eſpecially to the grand Priors of the Order, in diuers countries, requeſted help; amongſt whom George, grand Prior of Germanie, and founder of the caſtle of S. Elmo, was one of the chiefeſt. The copie of which letters, becauſe they briefly containe what we haue before in this Hiſtorie at large written, I haue thought good here to ſet down, that the ſame may in ſuch order be read, as it was by the Great maſter himſelfe reported.

The carefulnes of the Great maſter.

Brother Valetta, Maſter of the Hoſpitall of Ieruſalem, to the reuerend and religious our welbeloued brother in Chriſt, George of Hohenheim, called Bombaſt, Prior of our Priorie in Almainie, greeting.

The letters of the great maſter to the grād prior of Almaine, Concerning the manner of the Turkes proceedings in the ſiege of Malta.

Although wee doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you alreadie underſtand of the comming of the Turkes to inuade theſe Iſlands, or rather vtterly to ſubuert our Societie: And the happily and heauenly victorie by vs obtained of it: yet if the ſame things ſhall by our letters alſo bee brought vnto you, wee haue thought the ſame will be vnto you a thing much more pleaſing. For ſeeing that wee are certainely perſuaded, that you in this no leſſe happie than wholeſome ſucceſſe will giue moſt heartie thanks to Almightie God, and that the fruit of this good ſhall moſt of all redound vnto you, for the honour which you beare in our Order; wee haue willingly determined to participate this our ioy with you, and plainely and openly to proteſt, That we attribute this ſo notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Chriſt Ieſus, the greateſt King of all Kings, and authour of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willingly doe, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an hiſtorie) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the moſt mortall enemie of the Chriſtian name, and eſpecially of our Societie, not contented to haue ſpoyled vs of the moſt famous Iſland of the Rhodes, the caſtle of Tripolis, and almoſt whatſoeuer we had elſe; commanded a great and ſtrong fleet to be made readie againſt vs; which departing from Conſtantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arriued heere the eighteenth day of May: Which fleet conſiſted of almoſt two hundred and fiftie gallies, galliots, and other ſhips. The number of the enemie that bare armes, according to the truth, was about fortie thouſand more or leſſe: Generall of the land forces, was Muſtapha Baſſa; and of the fleet, Piall Baſſa was Admirall: who hauing ſpent a few dayes in landing their forces, viewing the places, pitching their tents, and ſetting things in order (as the manner of warre is) they began firſt to aſſaile the caſtle of S. Elmo (ſcituat in the mouth of the hauen) with great force & a moſt furious batterie. Which when they had many dayes done without intermiſſion, and had opened a great part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons aſſaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and prowеſſe of our Knights, and other worthie ſouldiers, kept and defended by the ſpace of thirtie fiue dayes with the great loſſe and ſlaughter of the enemie: although the Caſtle it ſelfe, in the iudgement of many, ſeemed not poſſible to be but a few daies defended againſt ſo great a force. At length the foure and twentieth day of Iune, when our men could no longer indure the multitude and furie of the enemie, enuironed and ſhut vp both by ſea and land, and deſtitute of all helpe, the caſtle was taken by the Turkes; thoſe few of our men which were left, being all ſlaine. Of which victorie they being proud, began to beſiege the caſtle and towne of S. Michael, and this new citie, eſpecially at the caſtle and Portingall bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillerie and warlike engines, they began in diuers places at once to batter and beat downe the walls. Which ſiege, the dreadful armie of the Turks by ſea and land, made to bee moſt fearefull and terrible, with ſuch huge great ordnance, as the like for bigneſſe and force was in no place to bee ſeene; day and night thundering out their yron and ſtone ſhot, fiue and ſeuen hands about; wherewith not the thickeſt wals, but euen the very mountaines themſelues might haue beene beaten downe and ouerthrowne: by furie whereof, the wals in many places were ſo battered, that a man might eaſily haue entered as on plaine ground. Where, when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, ſo often were they with great ſlaughter and diſhonour repulſed and beaten backe, many of their men ſlaine or wounded. Their Generalls, as well at ſea as land, after that they had in ſo many places, with all their forces in almoſt foure moneths ſiege and aſſault, with exceeding furie in vaine attempted the breaches, and loſt the greateſt part of their old ſouldiers, eſpecially Winter now comming on, wherein all warres by law of nations ought to ceaſe; thought of nothing elſe but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the King of Spaine his fleet, with ten thouſand ſelect ſouldiers (amongſt whom was at the leaſt two hundred and fourteene of our knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen; which onely with a Chriſtian zeale, voluntarily met together from diuers parts of the World to helpe and relieue vs) cauſed them to haſten. So haue you ſummarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turkes fleet, and the victorie by vs (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It ſhall be your part to conſider and coniecture, in what ſtate our Order and this Iſland now ſtandeth, into what poore eſtate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieued by the helpe and aid of our Brethren, eſpecially ſuch as you are, as we well hope, and aſſuredly beleeue we ſhall, our State will quickely take end. Fare you well.

From Malta the ninth of October, 1565.

The Great maſter thus deliuered of ſo great a ſiege, and bountifully relieued by the Chriſtian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order; ſpeedily repaired the breaches and places battered, and with new fortifications ſtrengthened thoſe places as he had by the late paſſed dangers perceiued to be moſt ſubiect to the enemies force.

After the returne of the Turks fleet to Conſtantinople, Solyman being exceeding angry with the gouernor of the Iſland of Chios his tributarie, as well for that he had during the late ſiege of Malta, had intelligence with the Great maſter, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turkes deſignes; as alſo for detaining of two yeares tribute, which was yerely ten thouſand duckets; and had alſo neglected to ſend his wonted Preſents to the great Baſſa's, who therfore the more incenſed the Tyrant; commanded Piall Baſſa his Admirall to make readie his fleet, and by force or policie to take that fruitfull and pleaſant Iſland wholly into his own hand. Who without delay, with a fleet of eightie gallies the fifteenth day of Aprill in the yeare 1566, being then Eaſter day, arriued at Chios. The chiefe men of the Iſland vpon ſight of the fleet, forthwith ſent Embaſſadors to the Baſſa with preſents, curteouſly offering vnto him the hauen, and whatſoeuer els he ſhould require. Piall with great kindneſſe accepted their offer, and preſently poſſeſſed himſelfe of the hauen in three places: and afterward landing, ſent for the gouernour of the city and twelue of the chiefe citiſens to come vnto him, as if he had had ſome ſpeciall matter to confer with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for Malta or Italie. Who hauing a little conferred together, went to him with great feare; and that not without cauſe; for as ſoone as they were come before him, he commanded them to be layd hold vpon and caſt faſt into yrons: which done, the ſouldiers forthwith tooke the towne hall, and without reſiſtance pulling downe the townes enſigne, (wherin was the picture of S. George with a red Croſſe) in ſtead thereof ſet vp one of the Turks: the like whereof was done with great reioicing of the Turks, thorow the whole Iſland. After that, they rifled the Churches, and againe conſecrated them after their Mahometan manner. The gouernour of the citie, and the Senators, with their families, the Baſſa ſent in fiue ſhips to Conſtantinople: as for the vulgar people, they were at choice, either there to tarrie ſtill, or depart, as beſt ſtood with their liking. And ſo the Baſſa, when he had there placed a new gouernour, one of the Turks, with a ſtrong garriſon, and ſet vp the Mahometane ſuperſtition in that moſt fertile Iſland, departed thence for Italie: where ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Apulia, he did exceeding much harme in burning and deſtroying the country villages, and carrying away of the poore people into captiuitie; and ſo returned.

At this time the kingdome of Hungarie was moſt miſerably rent in pieces by the lieutenants and captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperor, and Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſiluania Solymans vaſſall: who grieued with the harmes done vnto him by the Emperors captaines, wherof himſelf was the cauſe, and vainly hoping to haue obtained at Solymans hands the greateſt part of the kingdome of Hungarie, as had ſomtime king Iohn; ceaſed not continually to ſolicite him to come himſelfe in perſon to make a full conqueſt of the reliques of Hungarie, yet holden by the Emperor and ſome of the Hungarian nobilitie: and flattering himſelfe in that vaine hope, called himſelfe the king of Hungary: and increaſing his ſtrength by letters vnto the nobilitie and burgeſſes of the cities of Hungarie, ſummoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they ſhould all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of matters concerning their common good. Which thing as ſoone as Lazarus Suendi the Emperors lieutenant vnderſtood, he forthwith by other letters countermanded thoſe of the Vayuods; perſuading the Hungarians not to liſten to the charms of the Vayuod and the Turke, tending to their deſtruction, but rather to yeeld their obedience to Maximilian the Chriſtian Emperour, whoſe purpoſe was by the aid of the Chriſtian Princes, to protect and preſerue them in peace. And hereby it came to paſſe, that the remainders of this ſore ſhaken Kingdome, diuided into factions; and diuerſly carried, according to their affection, ſome to the one ſide, ſome to the other, began afreſh to worke one anothers confuſion, which fitly ſerued the Turks to incroach more and more vpon them: Who at the ſame time ſurpriſed the towne of Ainatſch (the captain whereof, with certaine of the gariſon G ſoldiers being gon about their buſines to Agria) and put to the ſword all them that they found in the towne. They thought alſo to haue taken the ſtrong town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant Countie Nicholaus Serinus gouernor thereof, couragiouſly encountred, and after foure houres hard fight ouerthrowne and put to flight. Not long after, they ranged vp and downe the country, and fet in booties as far as Iula and Rab, and did the country people much harme. For which cauſe, Maximilian the Emperor about the latter end of May brake vp the aſſembly of the Empire then holden at Auguſta, and began carefully to prouide things needfull for the war: appointing his captaines for the raiſing of ſuch forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the Princes and States of the Empire, in their late aſſemblie; but went himſelfe to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extreame H age was with a mightie army ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and marching thorow Bulgaria and Seruia, was come directly to Belgrade; where Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſyluania met him, and kiſſing his hand, had commended himſelfe and all his ſtate vnto his protection. At which time Suendi the Emperors lieutenant laid hard ſiege to the towne of Huſth in the borders of Tranſyluania. The Baſſa of Buda at the ſame time on the other ſide, by commandement of Solyman, with 8000 Turks and 25 pieces of great ordnance beſieging Palotta (a ſtrong towne about eight miles from Rab) had with continuall batterie by the ſpace of eight dayes brought the ſame into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. But hearing of the approch of George Countie of Helffenſtein, ſent by the Emperor with I certaine companies of Germans to relieue the ſame, he riſe in ſuch haſt from the ſiege, that he left certaine of his great ordnance and a great part of his baggage behinde him, and retyred towards Alba Regalis. The Countie hauing relieued the town, cauſed the breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new ſupplie ſtrengthned the old garriſon. Thus was a moſt lamentable war at once begun in diuers places of Hungarie. After that, the Countie of Helffenſtein, ſtrengthned by the comming of the Countie Salma with certaine companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Veſprinium a citie about two miles off, then holden by the Turks: which citie he tooke by force the laſt of Iune, and left not a Turke aliue therein, becauſe that they a few dayes before had cruelly ſlaine certaine Chriſtians whome they had taken priſoners. So leauing ſtrong garriſons both in Veſprinium and Palotta, they returned to K Rab. Shortly after, the Countie Salma laid ſiege to Tatta a ſtrong towne, otherwiſe called Dotis, betwixt Rab and Comara, which at length he tooke by aſſault the eight and twentieth day of Iuly, and ſlew all the Turks, except fiftie, which flying into one of the towers of the caſtle, yeelded vpon compoſition: amongſt whom was the late gouernor of Veſprinium, and the gouernor of this place, with the Baſſa of Buda his nigh kinſeman, who were all preſently ſent priſoners to Vienna. So the Countie following the courſe of his victory (the terror of his former good fortune running before him into the Turks ſtrongeſt holds) was on his way to haue beſieged Geſtes a town neere to Palotta: when the Turks there in garriſon vpon the firſt ſight of his Armie, left all and fled out at the farther ſide of the Towne to Strigonium. After whoſe example other of the Turkes garriſons in Witha, Tſchokiku, and Sambok, caſtles there- L abouts, ſet fire on that they could not carrie, and followed their fellowes to Strigonium alſo. The Emperor vnderſtanding of the good ſucceſſe of his Captaines, cauſed publique prayers with thankeſgiuing to Almightie God to be made thorow all the Churches thereabouts.

Countie Serinus Gouernour of the ſtrong towne of Sigeth and the Countrey thereabout, certainly aduertiſed of the comming of Solyman, ſent Caſparus Alapianus and Nicholas Cobub, two of his Captaines, with a thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe, to lie in wait for the forerunners of the Turkes Armie: who drawing neere vnto the place where theſe Turkes lay, not farre from Quinque Eccleſiæ, ſuddenly in the ſhutting in of the next day ſet vpon them, doubting no ſuch matter, and put them in ſuch feare, that they diſorderedly fled, ſome one way, ſome another, and were moſt of them ſlaine or wounded by the Hungarians in their flight. Hali Beg M one of the Turks great Sanzackes and leader of that companie, ſore wounded, and ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight in the Mariſhes, there periſhed: his ſonne and many other notable men amongſt the Turks, were there taken and carried priſoners to Sigeth. The ſpoile the Hungarians there tooke was exceeding great: for beſide plate and coine, whereof they

A found good ſtore, they tooke eight Camels, fiue Mules, threeſcore horſes, and ſix carts laden with all manner of ſpoile, and many garments of great price; wherein the Gentlemen attired, returned to Sigeth in great brauerie, with two faire red enſignes of the enemies.

Maximilian the Emperor long before aduertiſed of Solymans purpoſe for the conqueſt of the remainder of Hungarie; to withſtand ſo mightie an enemy, had beſide the forces raiſed in his owne Dominions, procured great aid both of the States of the Empire and other Chriſtian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. Firſt there repaired thither foure legions of German footmen, and vpwards of twentie thouſand horſemen, with foure thouſand Hungarians: the Duke of Sauoy ſent thither foure hundred Argoletiers, and many noble gentlemen out of diuers parts of Europe reſorted thither, to ſerue the Emperor in thoſe warres, of B their owne charge; eſpecially the Knights of Malta: and out of Italie, Proſper Columna and Angelus Caſius: out of France, Guiſe the graund Prior, Briſſack, and Lanſack, who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpoſe to haue ſerued there if the Turks fleet had come thither againe, as it was reported it would; but vnderſtanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungarie, with certaine other Knights of the Order. Many alſo of the Princes and free cities of Italie declared their good will toward the Emperor in this war; ſome ſending him men, as did Coſmus Medices Duke of Florence, who ſent thither of his owne charge three thouſand footmen: ſome money, as Mantua, Genoa, and Luca. Thither came alſo Alphonſus duke of Ferrara with a gallant companie of noble gentlemen, and other his followers. Beſide which land forces, the Emperour had alſo prouided vpon the riuer of Danubius twelue gallies, and C thirtie other ſhips for burthen, ſo made, as that the men could not be hurt with the Turkes arrowes: wherein was imbarqued three thouſand ſouldiers, moſt part Italians, vnder the conduct of Philippus Flachius a German and one of the Knights of Malta, who was afterward receiued into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

Solyman comming to the riuer Dranus, commanded a bridge to be made ouer that great Riuer, and the deepe fens on the farther ſide of the riuer towards Sigeth, for the tranſporting of his great armie; a worke of ſuch difficultie, that being thrice vnfortunately begun, it was againe giuen ouer, as a thing almoſt impoſſible. Wherwith Solyman was ſo moued, that in his rage he ſwore to hang vp the great Baſſa that had the charge of that worke, if he did not with as much ſpeed as were poſſible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the worke was againe begun, all D the boats that were to be found in the riuer taken vp, and timber for the purpoſe brought from far, for the making of that bridge. In this worke were imploied not the vulgar people onely, of the countrey which was tributarie to the Turks, but the gentlemen themſelues alſo, were by the imperious Turke (now commanding for his life) inforced to lay their fingers to worke day and night without ceaſing, vntill the bridge (which before was thought ſcarce poſſible to haue beene made) was by the reſtleſſe induſtrie and labour of ſuch a multitude of men, in the ſpace of ten dayes brought to perfection. Wherein the ſeuerity the barbarous Tyrant vſeth towards his ſubiects, is worth the noting; whereby he extorteth from them more than is almoſt poſſible for men to performe: ſo that it is not to be maruelled, that he hath ſo good ſucceſſe in whatſoeuer he taketh in hand. Ouer this bridge (a mile in length) paſſed Solyman, and E incamped at a place called Muhatchz, where he ſtayed certaine dayes, vntill his armie was all come ouer. The laſt of Iuly, ninetie thouſand Turks (the vauntgard of Solymans army) came before Sigeth, and incamped within a mile of the towne: after whom ſhortly after followed a hundred thouſand mo out of Solymans campe; of whom many in approching the town, were ſlain with great ſhot out of the caſtle: the reſt for all that incamped themſelues as neere vnto the towne as they could, and began the ſiege.

The towne of Sigeth is ſtrongly ſcituate in a mariſh on the North ſide of Dranus vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, commanding all the countrey round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a ſtrong bulwarke againſt the Turks, for entring farther into the country that way toward Stiria. In this town was gouernor Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the F Countie, a valiant man, and a mortall enemie of the Turks, with a garriſon of two thouſand three hundred good ſouldiers: who ſeeing the hugie armie of the Turks, called together into the Caſtle, the Captaines of the garriſon, and the chiefe of the Citiſens; where ſtanding in the midſt of them, he ſpake vnto them as followeth:

You ſee (ſaid he) how we are on euery ſide beſet with the multitude of our enemies, wherein reſteth G their chiefe hope: but let not vs be thereof affraid or diſcouraged; for that victorie dependeth not of a confuſed multitude of heartleſſe men, but of the power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleaſure manie times ouerthrowne the mightie armies of the proud; and will not in the middeſt of theſe dangers now forſake vs, if we putting our truſt and confidence in him, do what beſeemeth valiant and couragious men. Beſides that, our iuſt cauſe, with the ſtrength of the place we hold, our owne valour, and the helpe of our friends, who I aſſure my ſelfe wil not faile vs at our need, counteruaileth their confuſed multitude, forced together by their imperious commanders out of far countries, and whatſoeuer els the proud tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherefore let vs all as becommeth valiant men, for the truth of our Religion, and for the honour of our Prince and Countrey, liue and die together; knowing whatſoebefall, that to a life ſo loſt, beſide neuer dying fame, belongeth a moſt aſſured hope of ioy and felicitie. As H for my ſelfe, I am reſolued, and ſo I hope are you alſo, that as I am a Chriſtian, and free borne, ſo will I (by the grace of God) in the ſame faith and freedome end my dayes. Neither ſhall the proud Turke, ſo long as I am able to hold vp this hand, haue euer power to cōmand ouer me, or the ground wheron I ſtand.

This ſaid, he firſt tooke himſelf a ſolemne oath to perform what he had promiſed, and perſuaded the reſt to take the like: which done: euery man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman commeth into the camp at Sigeth.

The fift of Auguſt Solyman incamped within a mile of the towne, and the next day after came himſelfe into the campe, at whoſe comming the great ordnance and ſmall ſhot ſo thundred out of the Turks campe, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue gon together, the Turks after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Chriſtians anſwering them I with the name of Ieſus. The ſeuenth of Auguſt the Turks caſt vp a great mount, and thereon planted certain great pieces of ordnance. The next day following they began moſt terribly to batter the new towne in three places, and with incredible labor caſt vp a mount in the midſt of the mariſh, as it were in the towne ditch, from whence they the next day with certaine pieces of great artillerie day & night battered the inner caſtle of the town without any intermiſſion, & did great harme both to the caſtle and the defendants. The Countie perceiuing the new citie to be now ſo laid open with the furie of the Turks batterie, as that it was not poſſible to be defended, cauſed his ſouldiers to ſet it all on fire, and to retire into the old.

The tenth of Auguſt the Turks furiouſly battered the old towne in three places, & brought their ordnance into the new town: and with timber, earth, and rubbiſh, made a bridge, the more commodiouſly to goe K ouer the mariſh. For the ſpeedier accompliſhment whereof, all the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carrie wood, fagots, earth, and ſuch like things without ceaſing. There might a man haue ſeen all the fields ful of camels, horſes, and of the Turks themſelues, like emmets, carrying wood, earth, ſtones, or one thing or other to fill vp the mariſh: ſo was there with wonderfull labor two plaine waies made thorow the deepe fen, from the towne to the Caſtle: where the Ianizaries, defended from the great ſhot with ſacks of wool and ſuch like things, did with the multitude of their ſmall ſhot ſo ouerwhelme the defendants, that they could not againſt thoſe places without moſt manifeſt danger ſhew themſelues vpon the walls.

The Turks win the old towne.

So that what by their vigilant induſtrie, and the furie of the great artillerie, the Turkes (though not without great loſſe) by force entred the old towne the nineteenth of Auguſt, vſing in their vi- L ctorie ſuch celeritie, that they ſlew many of the moſt valiant defendants before they were able to recouer the ſafegard of the caſtle. Both the townes thus loſt, and ſo many worthy men ſlain, not without cauſe brought great heauineſſe vpon the reſt which were in the Caſtle with the Countie. The Turks poſſeſſed of the old town, the next day planted their batterie againſt the caſtle in foure places, and with fagots, rubbiſh, and earth, made two plaine waies vnto it, ſtil filling vp the mariſh: and hauing with continual batterie made it ſaultable, the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt they began fiercely to aſſaile the breaches: but when they had loſt many of their men, & done what they could, they were inforced with ſhame to retire. In this aſſault, amongſt many other of their beſt ſouldiers, was loſt one of their great Baſſa's alſo.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Solyman far ſpent with yeres, and diſtempered with his M long trauell, fell ſicke of a looſenes of his bellie, and for the better recouerie of his health, retired himſelfe (the ſiege yet continuing) to Quinque Eccleſiæ a citie neere to Sigeth, where ſhortly after he died of the bloudie flix the fourth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord 1566, when he had liued 76 yeares, and thereof raigned 46. He was of ſtature tall, of feature ſlender,

A ſlender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his noſe long and hooked, of nature ambitious & bountifull, more faithfull of his word and promiſe than were for moſt part the Mahometane kings his progenitors, wanting nothing worthie of ſo great an empire, but that wherin all happineſſe is contained, faith in Chriſt Ieſus. Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa (who all commanded in Solymans abſence) fearing the inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and leſt ſome tumult ſhould ariſe in the camp, if his death ſhould be known, concealed it by all means: and to be ſure of them that were of all others beſt able to make certain report therof, cauſed his Phyſitions and Apothecaries to be ſecretly ſtrangled, & by a truſty meſſenger, ſent in poſt, certified Selymus (Solymans only ſon, and his father in law, then lying in Magneſia) of the death of his father, willing him in haſt to repaire to Conſtantinople, to take poſſeſſion of the empire; and that done, forthwith to B come to the armie in Hungarie. But this could not be ſo ſecretly done, but that the Ianizaries began to miſtruſt the matter: which Muhamet Baſſa quickly perceiuing, cauſed the dead bodie of Solyman in his wonted apparel to be brought into his tent ſitting vpright in his horſe-litter, as if he had bin ſicke of the gout his wonted diſeaſe, and ſo ſhewing him to the Ianizaries, both deceiued and contented them, and ſo went forward with the ſiege.

Muhamet Baſſa concealeth the death of Solyman.

The Ianizaries hauing in the laſt aſſault loſt many of their fellows, began now to vndermine the greateſt bulwarke of the caſtle, from which the defendants with their great ordnance did moſt annoy them: wherein they vſed ſuch diligence, that the fift of September they with gunpouder and other light matter prouided for that purpoſe, had ſet all the bulwarke on a light fire; and by that means poſſeſſed therof, with al their force aſſailed the bulwark next vnto the C caſtle gate, from whence they were with great ſlaughter twice repulſed by the Countie. But the raging fire ſtil increaſing, he was inforced with thoſe which were yet left aliue, to retire into the inner caſtle, wherein was but two great pieces, and 14 others of ſmall force. Thus the Turks ſtill preuailing, and taking one place after another, the ſeuenth of September they furiouſly aſſaulted the little caſtle, whereinto they caſt ſuch abundance of fire, that in ſhort time it caught hold on the buildings, and ſet all on fire. The countie thus aſſailed by the enemy without, & worſe diſtreſſed with the fire within, which ſtill increaſing, left no place for him in ſafetie to retire vnto, went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new ſute of apparell, came preſently out again with his ſword & targuet in his hand; and finding his ſouldiers with cheerful countenance & their weapons in their hands, attending his comming, ſpake vnto them theſe D few his laſt words: The hard fortune of this ſinful kingdome hath together with our own ouertaken vs: but let vs, noble hearts, with patience indure what is to vs by God aſſigned. You know what we haue before promiſed, which hitherto God be thanked we haue accordingly performed, and now let vs with like reſolution performe this laſt. The place you ſee is not longer to be kept, the deuouring fire groweth ſo ſtill vpon vs, and we in number are but few: wherefore let vs as becommeth valiant men breake out into the vtter caſtle, there to die in the middeſt of our enemies, to liue afterwards with God for euer; I will be the firſt that will go out, follow you me like men. This ſaid, with his ſword and targuet in his hand, without any other armor, calling thrice vpon the name of Ieſus, he iſſued out at the caſtle gate, with the reſt following him: where valiantly fighting with the Ianizaries vpon the bridge; and hauing ſlaine ſome of them, he was firſt wounded in two places of his bodie with ſmall ſhot, and E at laſt ſtrucke in the head with an vnluckie ſhot, fell downe dead; the Turks for ioy crying out their wonted word Alla. The reſt of the ſouldiers in flying backe againe into the caſtle, were all ſlain by the Turks, except ſome few, whom ſome of the Ianizaries in regard of their valor, by putting their caps vpon their heads, ſaued from the fury of the reſt. In this ſiege, the Turks (as they themſelues reported) loſt ſeuen thouſand Ianizaries, and twentie eight thouſand other ſouldiers, beſide many voluntarie men not enrolled in their muſter-bookes, and three of their great Baſſies. Serinus his head was preſently cut off, and the next day (with the heads of the other ſlaine Chriſtians) ſet vpon a pole, for all the armie to gaze vpon. After that, it was taken downe, and by Muhamet the great Baſſa ſent to Muſtapha the Baſſa of Buda his kinſman, who by two country men, ſent it wrapped in a red ſcarſe couered with a faire linnen cloth, to F county Salma in the Emperours campe at Rab, with this taunting letter thus directed.

The great bulwarke vndermined & ſet on fire by the Ianizaries.

Serinus his head ſent to countie Salma.

Muhamet Baſſa to Eccius Salma, greeting.

The Baſſaes quipping letter to county Salma.

In token of my loue, behold, here I ſend thee the head of a moſt reſolute and valiant Captaine thy friend friend, the remainder of his bodie I haue honeſtly buried, as became ſuch a man. Sigeth biddeth thee farewell for euer. G

The death of this noble and valiant captain was much lamented of all the Chriſtian army, and his head with many teares by his ſonne Balthaſar honorably buried amongſt his anceſtors in Tſchacaturna, his owne caſtle. Solyman at his comming with this mightie armie into Hungarie, had purpoſed before his returne, if he had not been by death preuented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdome of Hungarie, and to haue againe attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accompliſhing of which his deſignes, he at his firſt comming ſent Parthauus Baſſa, with fortie thouſand Turks to helpe the Baſſa of Temeſware and the Tartars, in the behalfe of the Vayuod, to beſiege the ſtrong towne of Gyula, ſcituate vpon the lake Zarkad in the confines of Tranſyluania, H not farre from whence Suendi had but in Auguſt before ouerthrowne the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the ayd of the Vayuod, and ſlaine of them ten thouſand. And at the ſame time hee ſent Muſtapha Baſſa of Boſna, and Carambeius, with a great power to Alba Regalis; who ioyning with the Baſſa of Buda, ſhould keep the Emperor Maximilian buſie, whileſt he in the meane time beſieged Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthauus Baſſa comming to Gyula, and laying hard ſiege to the towne, was ſtill notably repulſed by Nicholas Keretſchen, Gouernour of the Towne: inſomuch, that in a ſallie hee had certain pieces of his great ordnance taken from him by the defendants, & the reſt cloied. But this braue captaine, not to haue been conſtrained by all that the Baſſa could doe, was at laſt perſuaded by his kinſman George Bebicus (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certaine caſtles, I for reuolting from the Emperour to the Vayuod) for a great ſum of money to deliuer vp the towne to the Baſſa: which he did, couenanting beſide his reward, That the ſoldiers ſhould with bag and baggage in ſafety depart; all which was franckly granted: who were not gone paſt a mile out of the towne, but they were ſet vpon by the Turkes, and all ſlaine except ſome few which crept into the reeds growing in the marriſh faſt by, and ſo eſcaped. The traitor himſelfe expecting his reward, was carried in bonds to Conſtantinople: where afterward, vpon complaint made how hardly he had vſed certain Turks whom he had ſometime taken priſoners, he was by the commandement of Selymus, who ſucceeded Solyman, thruſt into a hogſhead ſtrucke full of nailes with the points inward, with this inſcription vpon it, Here receiue the reward of thy auarice & treaſon. Gyula thou ſoldeſt for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy K Lord, neither wilt thou be to me: and ſo the hogſhead cloſed faſt vp, he was therin rolled vp and downe vntill he therein miſerably died.

A traitor well rewarded.

The Emperors campe then lying at Rab, and the Baſſa of Buda and Boſna with thirty thouſand Turks not farre off at Alba Regalis, and many hot skirmiſhes paſſing betweene them: it fortuned that the fift of September the Turkes in hope to haue done ſome great piece of ſeruice vpon the Chriſtians, came forth of the campe in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the army, of whom they ſlew ſome; the reſt flying, raiſed an alarme in the campe: whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with ſome others iſſuing out, purſuing the Turks, ſlew diuers of them: in which purſute George Thuriger deſcrying the Gouernor of Alba Regalis, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whileſt he liued, fiercely L purſued him in the middeſt of the flying enemies, and neuer left him vntill he had taken him priſoner: and at his returne preſenting him to the Emperour, was for that good ſeruice knighted, and rewarded with a chaine of gold. There was by chance then preſent a Spaniard, who had heard him ſay openly at Conſtantinople, That he alone with his owne power was able to vanquiſh the Germane King (by which name the Turkes commonly tearme the Emperour:) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the preſence of the Emperour, ſtill vrging him as it were to ſay ſomething for himſelfe, the Turke anſwered him in theſe few words following: Such is the chance of war, thou ſeeſt me now a priſoner, and able to doe nothing.

The Gouernour of Alba Regalis taken.

The Turks ſharp anſwere to the Spaniard.

All theſe troubles, with many moe like in ſhort time to haue inſued, were by the death of M Solyman within a while after well appeaſed. Muhamet Baſſa after he had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turke Gouernour of Sigeth, with a ſtrong garriſon for the defence of the place and commanding of the Countrey, called backe the diſperſed forces; and riſing with the armie, retired toward Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead bodie all the way ſitting vpright

The Turks armie returneth with the bodie of Solyman to Belgrade.

A right in his horſelitter carried by mules, giuing it out that he was ſicke of the gout: which thing the Ianizaries eaſily beleeued, knowing that he had beene many yeares ſo carried: yet ſtill wiſhing his preſence, as alwaies vnto them fortunate, although that he were able for to do nothing.

SELYMVS SECVNDVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR QVINTVS: FLORVIT Aº 1566

Diſsimilis Patri, Selymus regalia Sceptra, Corripit: & dira concutit arma manu.
Fœdus cum Venetis frangit (Quid fœdera proſunt?) Armataque manu Cypria regna rapit.
Inſtrauit tumidum numeroſis claſsibus Æquor: Vt Naupactiacas nobilitaret aquas.
Moldavum fœda mulctauit morte Dynaſten:
Et magni fines prorogat imperij.
Obruit Hiſpanos multa vi: Punica regna Deſtruit: & regnis adijcit illa ſuis.
Sed nimis in venerem pronus, vinóque ſepultus, Extremum properat præcipitare diem. R. Knoll.

Vnlike his father, Selymus the royall Scepter takes:
And ſhaking armes with cruell hand, exceeding ſtirs he makes.
With Venice State his League he breakes (With Turks what league can ſtand?)
And Cyprus kingdome takes from them by force of mightie hand.
He couered the ſwelling ſeas with hugie fleets to ſee:
That vanquiſhed, vnto thoſe ſeas he might an honour be.
The Vayuod of Moldauia he brought to wofull end, The borders of his kingdome great ſo that he might extend.
In Gulet he the Spaniards ouerwhelm'd with mightie power;
And thereby Tunes kingdome did the ſelfe ſame time deuour.
But wholly giuen to venerie, vnto exceſſe and play, He poſteth on before his time to haſte his fatall day. R. K.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

SElymus, the only ſon of Solyman then left aliue, by letters from Muhamet Baſſa vnderſtanding of the death of his father, haſted from Cutai, a citie of Galatia not far from Ancyra, towards Conſtantinople; C and comming to Scutarie, was from thence by Boſtanges Baſſa of the Court, conducted ouer the Strait to Conſtantinople: where by him and Scander Baſſa (Selymus his ſonne in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) hee was conueyed into the Imperiall Pallace the three and twentieth of September, in the yeare 1566, and there poſſeſſed of his fathers ſeat, was by the Ianizaries there preſent, ſaluted Emperour.
He was about the age of fortie two yeares when he began to raigne, a man of an vnconſtant and haſtie diſpoſition, wholly giuen to wantonneſſe and exceſſe: ſo that he neuer went to wars himſelfe, but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrarie to the charge of Selymus his grandfather, giuen by him to his father Solyman, whereof he was neuer vnmindful.
D The next day he came abroad, and ſhewed himſelf in his maieſty; and in the temple of Sophia, after the manner of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne praiers and ſacrifices to be made for his father: which done, he gaue vnto the Ianizaries a largious of 100000 Sultanines, with promiſe to augment their wages. And all things being now in readineſſe for his intended iourney, hee with a goodly retinue ſet forward from Conſtantinople the ſeuen and twentieth of September: and the twentieth of October a little from Belgrade met the army comming from Sigeth, gallantly marching vnder their enſignes, with the dead bodie of Solyman, whom the ſouldiers generally ſuppoſed to haue been yet liuing, but troubled with the gout, to haue kept his horſe-litter, as his manner was to trauell. Selymus alighting, came in his mourning attire to E the horſe-litter, looked vpon the dead bodie of his father, kiſſed it, and wept ouer it, as did all the other great Baſſaes alſo. And that the death of Solyman might then be made knowne to all men, the enſignes were preſently let fall, and trailed vpon the ground, a dead march ſounded, and heauie ſilence commanded to be kept through all the campe. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applauſe of the whole armie proclaimed Emperor, his enſignes aduanced, and euery one of the great commanders of the army, in their degree admitted to kiſſe his hand So marching forward, he returned againe to Conſtantinople the two and twentieth of Nouember: but thinking to haue entered his palace (which they commonly call the Seraglio) he was by the diſcontented Ianizaries but now come from the wars, prohibited ſo to doe; they with great inſolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue, together with the confirmation both of their antient and new priuiledges, before they would ſuffer him to enter. Againſt which their F great preſumption, the Viſier Baſſaes, together with the Aga, oppoſing themſelues, and ſeeking by all means to appeaſe them, were by them fowly entreated, and well rapped about the pates with the ſtocks of their calliuars; but eſpecially the two great Baſſaes, Muhamet and Partau, as the chiefe authours that their lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which ſo ſudden and vnexpected a mutinie of his beſt ſouldiers, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling vnto him the Aga(or captaine of the Ianizaries)demanded of him the cauſe thereof:who with teares trickling downe his cheekes for griefe; told him, That it was for money, Which by Selymus now promiſed vnto them,together with the confirmation of their liberties;& the Aga with faire words and heauie countenance moſt earneſtly intreating them,not to blemiſh the antient reputation of their wonted loyaltie with ſo foule a diſorder,nor to oppoſe the life of him their louing captaine,vnto the heauie diſpleaſure of their angrie Sultan;and farther aſſuring them,that he would not faile them in the leaſt of his promiſes,but content them to the full of their deſires;the mutinie was at length appeaſed,the inſolent Ianizaries againe quieted, and Selymus into the Seraglio receiued. Howbeit Muhamet, chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes,for certain daies after went not out of his pallace,neither came (as he was wont) into the Diuano,but kept himſelfe cloſe,for feare of ſome greater miſchiefe from them. This tumult thus ouerpaſſed,and all againe well quieted, Selymus with all royall ſolemnitie buried his father in a chappel which he after the manner of the Mahometan kings,had in his life time moſt ſtately built, with a colledge and an hoſpitall. Where faſt by his ſide is to be ſeene the tombe of Roxolana his beſt beloued wife,and of certaine others his murthered children: and by him hangeth his ſcimitar,in token that he died in wars; an honor not otherwiſe granted to the Mahometa princes. The reuenues ariſing of the country about Sigeth,of late woon from the Chriſtians,at the time of his death, were giuen to the maintenance of the houſes by him built of deuotion; which for the magnificence thereof, exceed all the reſt before built by the Mahometan kings and Emperors,except thoſe which were the buildings of Mahomet the Great, and Baiazet the ſecond. It was by many thought,that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as purpoſing that yeare to haue wintered in Hungarie, and the yeare following to haue done great matters againſt the Chriſtians both by ſea and land.

Selymus ſaluted Emperor of the Turks in the yeare 1566.

Troubles in Hungarie.

The great army of the Turks thus drawn out of Hungarie by the death of Solyman,in ſome part aſſwaged,but altogether appeaſed not the endleſſe troubles of that vnfortunat kingdom. Maximilian the Emperor on the one ſide,and Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſyluania with the Turks captaines on the other,renting it in pieces,as if they had ſworne the deſtruction thereof. The Vayuod deſiring to recouer the ſtrong caſtle of Tockay, in the frontiers of his countrey,but lately taken from him by Suendi the Emperors lieutenant,laid hard ſiege to it,& had brought it to great extremitie,although it was notably defended by Iames Raminger the captain thereof: when ſuddenly newes was brought vnto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his country to haue aided him againſt the Emperor)did with all hoſtility after their barbarous manner,burne and deſtroy his country before them,making hauocke of all things; ſo that the country people were glad in defence of themſelues, to take vp armes againſt them. Whereupon he forthwith left the ſiege,& went to aid his diſtreſſed ſubiects againſt the Tartars,with whom he had many an hot skirmiſh;and after much bloudſhed,at laſt ouercame them,and with much adoe rid himſelfe of ſuch bad gueſts. Now in the meane time, Suendi ſtrengthened with new ſupplies ſent vnto him from the Emperour, had taken the caſtle of Zackmar in the borders of Tranſyluania,and with like good fortune had the caſtle of Muncatz yeelded vnto him,and after that beſieged the towne of Huſth: ſo that the Vayuod was glad to craue aid of the Turkiſh Emperour Selymus, vnder whoſe protection hee was: who preſently commanded Partau one of his chiefe Baſſaes, and then his great Lieutenant in Romania, to goe with his forces into Tranſyluania, to relieue them. But hearing that Embaſſadours were comming from Maximilian the Emperour, hee called him backe againe, vntill he had heard the effect of that embaſſage. At which time alſo the Baſſa of Buda enclining vnto peace, ſent Preſents to the Emperour,requeſting him to remooue certaine Hungarian captaines from off the frontiers,leſt happily they ſhould interrupt the treatie of peace, then on both ſides purpoſed; promiſing for his part,to puniſh with death all ſuch Turks as ſhould make any further inuaſion, or raiſe any new troubles. He writ letters alſo to county Salma, That he could not but maruell,to what end Maximilian the Emperor was about to intreat with his lord & maſter of peace, whilſt Suendi in the meane time was raging in Tranſyluania,then vnder the Turks protection;which if he proceeded ſtill to do, Selymus would thereof take occaſion (as he ſaid)to turne all his forces that way: wherefore he requeſted him to perſuade the Emperour to take ſome more eaſie courſe in that behalfe; promiſing alſo,that hee would for his part effectually trauell with his maſter,to haue better liking of peace than of warres,wiſhing him alſo to doe the like. Which thing

The Baſſa of Buda deſirous to further the peace.

A thing as ſoone as the Emperour vnderſtood, he commanded Suendi to giue ouer the ſiege of Huſth, and to keepe himſelfe quiet vntill he might by his Embaſſadours vnderſtand what the Great Turke purpoſed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Maximilian & Selymus both deſirous of peace.

Now indeed theſe two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably diſſembled the matter) were both of them in heart deſirous of peace, and that for diuers great and vrgent conſiderations. Maximilian for want of mony ſaw it was not poſſible for him to ſend into the field ſuch an armie the next yeare as he had the yeare before. And Selymus, beſide his other troubles, was to take order for the appeaſing of a great & dangerous rebellion in the fartheſt part of his dominions in Arabia Fœlix; where the people riſing vp in arms, and hauing ſlaine the Baſſa's and Sanzacks their gouernors, were readie to haue caſt off the Turkiſh obedi- B ence: neither was he out of feare of the Perſians, readie (as was reported) to make war vpon him. For which cauſes he wiſhed rather for peace with the Emperour Maximilian, than wars: and ſo much the more, for that it was impoſſible for him to ſend an armie of any puiſſance into Hungary, for want of many neceſſarie prouiſions for the maintenance thereof, in a countrey ſo much impoueriſhed by reaſon of his late wars, wherein no victuals were to be found for the reliefe of ſuch a multitude of men as he was to ſend, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themſelues afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the laſt yere, might haue eaſily recouered the greateſt part of that kingdom before loſt: but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether inclining to peace; C and by Countie Salma aduertiſed from the Baſſa of Buda, That if he would ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, with the tribute woont to be there paid for Hungary, a peace vpon reaſonable conditions might be eaſily obtained; he reſolued vpon that point. And ſo certain meſſengers being ſent vp and downe to Conſtantinople to the ſame effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the tribute yet behind, and a large commiſſion for the treatie of peace, Selymus ſhould giue them his ſafe conduct, with libertie at their pleaſure to returne in caſe either of peace or war. Which agreed vpon and faithfully promiſed on both ſides, Selymus ſet at libertie the lord Albert de Vuis, who ſix yeares Leger in Conſtantinople, firſt for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been ſtraitly impriſoned in his owne houſe by the ſpace of 22 moneths, in ſuch ſort that neither he D nor any of his houſhold could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both day & night about his houſe, and his windowes alſo boorded vp, to the end that he ſhould not ſo much as looke out into the citie or any whither els more than the court of his houſe only. So the Emperour Maximilian now reſolued to ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the tribute money and diuers other rich gifts and Preſents, as wel to the Great Turke himſelfe, as the Viſier Baſſa's his Counſellors: and conſidering with himſelfe, whom to be moſt fit, with wiſedome and honor to bring this ſo weightie a matter about, hauing to do with ſo barbarous, couetous, and mightie a people, made choice of the lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Councell for the kingdome of Hungarie) a Prelat of great eſtimation, who being a man of 63 yeares old, beſide his great learning, had the experience of 27 embaſſages; wherin he alwaies ſo diſcreetly bare E himſelfe, as well contented his Prince, and purchaſed vnto himſelfe the reputation of a moſt graue & wiſe man; and about ten yeres before this embaſſage, being ſent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embaſſador to Solyman, and now by Maximilian, to Selymus at Conſtantinople, returning with good ſucceſſe, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Biſhop of Agria. Vnto which ſo honorable a perſonage, hauing the charge of this ſo weighty a matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this embaſſage, as alſo to purchaſe the greater credit to his embaſſador, ioyned vnto him a moſt honorable Baron called the lord Chriſtopher Teufenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counſellors alſo for the warres: who with full inſtructions both taking their leaue of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended vpon with a great and honourable Retinue, ſet forward the firſt of Iuly 1567, and ſo came to Comara a ſtrong towne in Hungarie not paſt a league from the Turks frontiers. In which place the Embaſſadors ſtaying vntill the ſeuenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the gouernour of Strigonium, demanding for their ſecuritie in the enemies countrey, to be met and receiued by ſome of his garriſon: which granted, they tooke their barkes brought from Vienna and Poſſonium, ſufficient for their greatneſſe to haue carried them downe the riuer to Belgrade, with horſe and waggon and their whole furniture: and ſo entring vpon the Turks dominion about a league or a little more from Comara, being ſo far waſted by the ſoldiers and gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks, with a Chiaus called Becram (ſent by the Baſſa of Buda) in certaine gallies armed with Turkiſh ſoldiers. To whom the Embaſſador at his landing deliuered his mind, and afterward his perſon, giuing them to vnderſtand, that they were with all ſafetie to conduct both him and all his to the Baſſa of Buda: which they anſwered they were ready to accompliſh; and ſo curteouſly inuited by the Embaſſadors, they came aboord their barke; and there dined together. Here they that were ſent with them, leauing them in the hands of the Turks, hauing licence to depart, returned to Comara: and they that day after fiue leagues ſailing arriued at Strigonium, where they were by the gouernor of the citie denied landing: for which ſo diſhonorable a part he was afterward ſharpely rebuked by the Baſſa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night vpon the water, certaine Turkiſh minſtrels, to do them honor, and to get a largeſſe, with their barbarous bawling inſtruments plaied them vp many a homely fit of mirth: and diuers others with ſundrie ſorts of vauting and tumbling, ſometime leaping one vpon anothers ſhoulders, and ſometime doing their trickes on the earth, all the euening ſhewed them great ſport and paſtime.

The Embaſſadors come to Buda.

From Strigonium they with fiue leagues ſailing came to Buda, leauing behind them the caſtle of Vicegrade, two leagues diſtant from Strigonium. In this citie of Buda lieth the great Baſſa by whom all Hungarie, with the prouinces thereto belonging (in the Turks power) is gouerned. This citie, ſometime the regall ſeat of the Hungarian Kings, is ſcituate vpon a little hill on the South ſide of Danubius, hauing in the South point thereof a caſtle, much higher than the citie, and of a moſt braue proſpect: in which caſtle lieth a captaine with a garriſon of fiue hundred ſouldiers (as the Turks ſay) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether ſo manie: it is the loſſe of his head to ſtir out of his charge; and beſide, he hath commiſſion to denie the Baſſa himſelfe entrance, vnleſſe he come very ſleightly accompanied: ſo jealous are the Turks of that caſtle, as if the ſtate of Hungarie depended thereon. Herein ſtandeth the kings Palace, which taketh vp moſt part of the place, greatly beautified by Matthias, and ſhewing outwardly to haue been a verie ſtately thing: for there are in it both large halls and faire Galleries, and chambers built in moſt royall manner; where amongſt other roomes, the Embaſſadors found a decaied Librarie full of pictures and Latine titles of bookes: all which things when they preſent themſelues to the eyes of the Chriſtian beholders, offer a iuſt conſideration of noble and reuerend antiquitie, and withall, ſtrike into their hearts a certaine compaſſion ioyned with horror, to ſee the renowned glorie of ſo many great Kings all waſted & brought to nothing. The next morning the Embaſſadors went to ſpeake with the Baſſa: whoſe houſe was reaſonable faire (conſidering their guiſe and cuſtome, not much delighting in the beautie of their priuat buildings) ſcituat vpon the riuer ſide at the bottome of the hill whereon the City ſtandeth.

Vnto this Baſſa the Embaſſadors preſented two great gilt cups, a clocke all curiouſly wrought in gold, and a thouſand dollars: which Preſent the Baſſa receiued in his Diuano (being a large hall) where he ſate with his counſellors, officers, and other Turks in their places and order; ſome on his right hand, and ſome on his left, all richly attired in garments of ſilke of diuers colours and faſhions, reaching downe to their anckles after their manner: their heads couered with their paſſing white and well made turbants: in which aſſemblie nothing beeing then to be ſeene but goodly order and graue ſilence, they ſeemed to the ſtrange beholders ſo many counſellors of exceeding grauitie and reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embaſſadors had audience, were many ſeats couered with Turkie carpets; the reſt of the roome being all vacant. The Baſſa in a place more apparant than the reſt, ſitting in great maieſty: before whom was ſet two little chaires, on which (after he had ſtood vp a while and embraced the Embaſſadors) he cauſed them both to ſit downe. Whoſe ſpeech deliuered in the Italian tongue, after they had diſcharged themſelues of the Emperours letters and greetings, was to effect this, viz. That his Imperiall maieſtie (for the common benefit of their ſubiects in Hungarie) requeſted him to continue in his good purpoſe and dealing for peace: and further, to giue ſafe conduct vnto them his Embaſſadours with their retinue, vntill they were come vnto the Turks court, where they were to entreat and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publique benefit of their ſubiects in generall. Which ſpeech with cheerefull and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embaſſadors followers were admitted to kiſſe the Baſſa's hand, accounted no ſmall fauour amongſt thoſe Barbarians. The Inter-

A pretor of theſe things was a Iew of Padua, who declared all that was ſpoken, in the Turkiſh language vnto the Baſſa, and in the Italian vnto the Embaſſadors. And although (if it had been their pleaſure) they might haue told their mind each to other in the Crouatian tongue without an Interpretor, yet the Baſſa ſtanding more vpon his reputation, and for ſome other reſpects beſide, would haue the matter propounded and likewiſe anſwered in the Turkiſh. In which ſort they alſo conferred continually afterward with the Baſſa's at Conſtantinople, vnles it were in ſome particular and priuat talke of ſmall importance, or els in ſome point beſide the matter; for then the Interpretor ſpake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to moſt of the Turks, but eſpecially to the men of war. Before this hall where the Embaſſadours B were entertained by the Baſſa, in the baſe court ſtood all the Ianizaries in goodly array, and his ſlaues with their red zarcul on their heads, and other ſouldiers with high and long plumes of feathers ſtanding vpright: all which made a beautifull ſhew, and gaue all great grace to the Baſſa's court. Theſe men ſtir not one foot in their ſtandings, and if the conſultation do laſt foure houres long, ſo long are they to continue ſtanding without mouing. The Embaſſadors hauing ſtaied two daies at Buda, were by the Baſſa diſmiſſed, ſending with them his Checai (the Steward or gouernor of his houſe) a man of great reputation, and Becram the Chiaus (the ſame that came to meet them at Comara, with a ſufficient guard and certain Ianizaries, ſent for their more ſafe trauelling, and to prouide for them from place to place, of all things neceſſarie for their diet, as alſo for their horſes, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they imbarqued the C tenth day of the aforeſaid moneth, towed vp the Turks gallies, which holpen by the ſwiftnes of the riuer, carried them downe in eight days to Belgrade, where they arriued the eighteenth of Iuly. So hauing ſtaid at Belgrade, & there leauing their boats, and taking their coaches, they ſet forward by land the twentieth of the ſaid moneth, and with great paines trauelling thorow Raſcia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and paſſing a part of the great mountaine Scardus, and after that, the mountaine Rhodope, ſo by the way of Philippopolis and Hadrianople, the two and twentieth of Auguſt gathered faſt vpon Conſtantinople: where many of the Spahies and Chiauſais of the court, with a number of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers, for their greater honour came to meet them a great way without the citie. By whom the Embaſſadors honourably mounted on horſebacke, were by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the midſt D of the citie; where the Lord Albert de Vnis the Emperors Embaſſador Lieger (not long before inlarged) hauing long looked for their comming, now moſt ioyfully receiued them. It was then Fryday the Turks Sabaoth, and a day of them aboue all other dayes in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone; at which time the Embaſſadors were no ſooner alighted, but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion, in the Moſchie of his father Solyman (as his manner was ſometime to do) paſſed along before the gate where the Embaſſadors lay, with the whole traine of his Court; and peraduenture ſomewhat more than ordinarie, to ſhew the magnificence of his power and ſtate, to the end that the Embaſſadors (aboue the former opinion by them conceiued) might hold him in the reputation of a moſt puiſſant and mightie Monarch. He paſſing by, vouchſafed not once to giue them a regard, E or ſo much as to caſt his eye aſide vpon them, although they were ſtrangers, and but euen then arriued: but with a countenance as if hee had knowne not ſo much as any thing of their comming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chief Viſier Baſſa, with the other Baſſa's and great Courtiers, in moſt gratious manner as they paſſed by caſt their eyes vpon them; all the curteſie they could then ſhew them. Six dayes after, being the eight and twentieth of Auguſt, the Embaſſadors all three went to viſit and ſalute Muhamet (or as the Turks call him Mehemet) the chief Viſier Baſſa, as the manner was, preſenting him from the Emperor, with foure cups of ſiluer all gilt, of moſt faire and curious workemanſhip; of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three ſpans high, the other two being not ſo high by a ſpan, but hauing in them two thouſand duckets of gold: beſide which, they gaue him alſo a clocke, being F a moſt curious piece of worke, and all ouer double gilt. After which greetings and preſents deliuered, beſide the contents of his Maieſties letters, they declared vnto him in generall points, the cauſe of their comming, and the mind of the Emperor well diſpoſed to a peace; and what great benefit would ariſe thereby to both parties: and laſtly turning ouer the blame of the late wars, and laying the fault therof to the charge of others, ſweetned thereby the ſowre of their former dealings. Neither was the Baſſa likewiſe for his part to ſeeke of good words, but anſwered them in Turkiſh by the mouth of Hibraim the chiefe Dragoman, who deliuered his mind to them in Latine or Italian, according as the Embaſſadours had before vttered theirs: which parle ſo ended, certaine of the chiefe of the Embaſſadors followers were admitted into the Diuano to kiſſe the proud Baſſa's hand. The ſame day the Embaſſadors alſo ſaluted Partau the ſecond Baſſa, and Ferat the third in order and authoritie. To Partau the preſented two cups of ſiluer all gilt, beſide a clocke of the ſame making with the afore named, and two thouſand dollars: and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to viſit the other three Baſſa's, Achomat, Piall, and Muhamet, preſenting euery one of them with two faire cups and a thouſand dollars. Theſe were the ſix Viſier Baſſa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authoritie went before all other in the Turkiſh empire, as in the courſe of this Hiſtorie may appeare. And ſo hauing viſited them in generall, the Embaſſadors to ſet their affaires on foot, the fourth of September cloſed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Eſtate-matters was eſpecially committed. Yet after this firſt conference, becauſe it was neceſſary before ſo weightie affaires were broached, firſt to do the Turke reuerence, and to deliuer the preſents, with the Emperours letters to him written; for ſome few dayes there was not any point at all of the Embaſſadors buſineſſe handled.

Selymus not long after the Embaſſadors were arriued, went out for his diſport and pleaſure on hunting: ſo that in the mean time, after the preſents were giuen to the Baſſa's, matters ſtood ſtill altogether vnaduanced, vntill the 21 of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his diſport) it was appointed that the Embaſſadours ſhould haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of thoſe that ſhould attend vpon them, which were not in all aboue twelue perſons: for they to whome this charge was committed, ſaid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine ſhould come before ſo great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but ſix a piece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of ſiluer and gilt, being moſt curiouſly and cunningly engrauen, one of the faireſt among the reſt was giuen to each of thoſe twelue to carrie, and they ordered to go by two and two before the reſt that came after in order with the reſt of the Preſent; which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bigneſſe to them before giuen to the Baſſa's, but far aboue them in value; & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpaied. The greateſt of thoſe cups was ſix ſpans and a halfe, and the leaſt two ſpans in height: ſome of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. The Embaſſadors (whoſe comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging; beſide many of the Spahi's and Chiauſi's, and others of good ſort (which were come to honor them with their preſence to the palace) putting themſelues in readineſſe betimes in the morning, and taking horſe ſet forward toward the court. The formoſt were they that did beare the Preſent in their hands, the people of the citie in euery ſtreet flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they paſſed: and verily there had beene ſeldome times ſeene the like embaſſage in thoſe parts: for beſides the fame that was blowne abroad in euerie quarter, That they were men ſent from one of the greateſt Princes in Chriſtendome; the diuerſitie of their attire (ſo few as they were) more than any thing beſide, did repreſent the Maieſtie of the Chriſtian Emperor to them that gazed vpon his Embaſſadors and their traine, the people conceiuing thereby, that he was lord and ruler ouer many prouinces & countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Biſhop of Agria (the chiefe Embaſſador) being attired in long & ſober garments of very fine purple cloath, hauing their ſhooes pieced ouer the ſoles with yron plates, and halfe their heads ſhauen, ſeemed to differ from them but little: but on the other ſide, the high-Dutch attired in blacke, with their veluet caps, & ſhort cloaks laied with ſiluer lace, & long breeches little leſſe than Rutter wiſe, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very ſtrange & vncouth to the Turkiſh people: ſo accompanied in this honorable wiſe, the Embaſſadors entred the firſt gate of the Great Turks palace. This gate is built of marble in moſt ſumptuous maner, & of a ſtately hight, with certain words of their language in the front thereof ingrauen & gilt in marble. So paſſing thorow the baſe court, which hath on the right ſide very faire gardens, & on the left, diuers buildings ſeruing for other offices, with a little Moſchy, they came to the ſecond gate, where all ſuch as come in riding, muſt of neceſſitie alight: here ſo ſoon as they were entred in at this ſecōd gate, they came into a very large ſquare court, with buildings & galleries round about it, the kitchins ſtanding on the right hand, with

to like ſeruices. There are moreouer many halls and other roomes for reſort, where they ſit in counſel, handling and executing the publike affaires either of the court or of the empire, with other matters, where the Baſſa's and other officers aſſemble together. Entring in at this ſecond gate, in one part of the court, which ſeem'd rather ſome large ſtreet, they ſaw the whole companie of the Solaches ſet in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto the perſon of the great Turke, & ſeruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vſe high plumes of feathers, which are ſet bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there ſtood the Capitzi in like array, with black ſtaues of Indian canes in their hands: they are the porters and warders of the gates of the palace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries, who B ſtood in ranke likewiſe in another quarter. And beſide all thoſe, with many more that were out of order, as well of the court as of the common people, thoſe Knights of the court which accompanied the Embaſſadors thither, with other great ones alſo of like degree, were marſhalled all in their ſeueral companies. And among the reſt, the Mutfaracha's, men of all nations and all religions (for their valor the only freemen which liue at their owne libertie in the Turkiſh empire) ſtood there apparelled in damaske veluet and cloath of gold, and garments of ſilke of ſundrie kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbants that they wore vpon their heads, being as white as whitenes it ſelfe, made a moſt braue and goodly ſhew well worth the beholding. In briefe, whether they were to be conſidered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their ſumptuous preſence, altogether without C noiſe or rumor, they made the Embaſſadors and the reſt of their followers there preſent, eye-witneſſes both of their obedience, and of the great ſtate and royaltie of the Othoman court.
Paſſing through them, the Embaſſadors were led into the hall, where the Baſſa's & other great men of the court were all readie to giue them entertainment: they of their traine being at the ſame time brought into a roome that ſtood apart vnder one of the aforeſaid lodgings all hung with Turkie carpets. Soone after (as their vſe & manner is) they brought in their dinner, couering the ground with table-cloathes of a great length ſpred vpon carpets, and afterward ſcattering vpon them a maruelous number of wooden ſpoons, with ſo great ſtore of bread, as if they had bin to feed 300 perſons: then they ſet on meat in order, which was ſerued in 42 great platters of earth, full of rice pottage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another, ſome of D them ſeaſoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; ſome with ſoure milke, and white of colour; and ſome with ſugar: they had fritters alſo, which were made of like batter; and mutton beſide, or rather a daintie and toothſome morſell of an old ſodden Ewe. The table (if there had any ſuch bin) thus furniſhed, the gueſts without any ceremonie of waſhing, ſate downe on the ground (for ſtooles there were none) and fell to their victuall, and dranke out of great earthen diſhes, water prepared with ſugar, which kind of drinke they call Zerbet. But ſo hauing made a ſhort repaſt, they were no ſooner riſen vp, but certaine yong men, whom they call Giamoglans, with others that ſtood round about them, ſnatcht it haſtily vp as their fees, and like greedie harpies rauened it downe in a moment. The Embaſſadors in the meane time dined in E the hall with the Baſſa's. And after dinner certaine of the Capitzies were ſent for the twelue of the embaſſadors followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their Preſents being alreadie conueied away) they were remoued out of the place where they dined, & brought on into an vnder roome, from whence there was an aſcent into the hal, where the Baſſa's were ſtaying for the Embaſſadors: who ſoone after came forth, and for their eaſe ſet them downe vpon the benches, whileſt the Baſſa's went in to Selymus, who before this time had made an end of dinner, and was remoued in all his royaltie, into one of his chambers, expecting the comming of the Embaſſadors. All things now in readineſſe, and the Embaſſadors ſent for, they ſet forward with their traine, and came to the third gate, which leadeth into the priuy palace of the Turkiſh Emperor, where none but himſelfe, his eunuchs, & the yong pages F his minions, being in the Eunuchs cuſtodie, hath continuall abiding: into which inward part of the palace none entreth but the Capitzi Baſſa (who hath the keeping of this third gate) and the Ceſigniers (that ſerue in the Turks meat) with the Baſſa's and ſome few other great ones; and that only when they haue occaſion ſo to do by reaſon of ſome great buſines, or ſent for by the Sultan. Being entred in at this gate, which is of a ſtately & royal building, the Capitzi by whō they were conducted ſuddenly cauſed them to ſtay, and ſet them one from another about fiue paces, in a little roome, which neuertheleſſe was paſſing delicate, all curiouſly painted ouer with diuers colours, and ſtood between the gate and the more inner lodgings. On both ſides of which roome, when all things els were whiſt & in a deep ſilence, certain little birds only were heard to warble out their ſweet notes, and to flicker vp and downe the green trees of the gardens (which al along caſt a pleaſant ſhadow from them) as if they alone had obtained licence to make a noiſe. Selymus himſelfe was in great maieſtie ſet in an vnder chamber, parted only with a wall from the roome wherein the Embaſſadours followers attended, whereinto he might looke through a little window, the portall of his ſaid chamber ſtanding in counterpoint with the third gate aboue mentioned. The Embaſſadors entring in, were led ſingle, and one after another, to make their reuerence vnto the Great Turke. And in the mean time certain of the Capitzi with the Preſents in their hands fetching a compaſſe about before the window, muſtered them in his ſight. All this while not the leaſt ſound in the world being raiſed, but a ſacred ſilence kept in euery corner, as if men had bin going to viſit the holieſt place in Ieruſalem. Yet for all that, the Embaſſadors followers placed one from another (as is aforeſaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was ſo neere, looking ſtil when they ſhould haue bin led on forwards all together: howbeit they were ſet in one after another, neither did they that were ſo ſet out, return again into the roome, but hauing ſeuerally done their reuerence, were all (except the Embaſſadors, that ſtill ſtaid in the chamber) by one and one ſent out another way into the court: neither could he that came after, ſee his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his reuerence: but ſuddenly as the former was let out, the next was aduanced forward to the doore, where Iſman the Capitzi-Baſſa and the Odda-Baſſa, taking him by both arms and by the necke, the one at the right hand, and the other at the left, & ſo leading him apace, by the way ſoftly felt his wriſts with their hands, leſt peraduenture he might haue ſome ſhort weapon in his ſleeue. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc. Antonio Pigafetta (the reporter of this negotiation) ſaith of himſelfe and ſome others alſo. Howbeit this hath bin, and yet is the manner of giuing of acceſſe vnto the perſon of the Great Turke, euer ſince that Amurath the firſt was after the battel of Caſſoua murdred by one of Lazarus the Deſpots men, who admitted to his preſence, in reuenge of the wrong done vnto his maſter, with a ſhort poinard that hee had cloſely hidden about him, ſo ſtabbed him in the bellie, that he preſently died. And thus like men rather carried to priſon by ſergeants, than to the preſence of ſo mightie a Monarch, they were preſented vnto his Maieſtie: he ſitting vpon a pallet, which the Turks call Maſtabe, vſed by them in their chambers to ſleepe and to feed vpon, couered with carpets of ſilke, as was the whole floore of the chamber alſo. The chamber it ſelfe being not very great, was but darke, altogether without windows, excepting that one whereof we haue before ſpoken, and hauing the walls painted and ſet out in moſt freſh and liuely colours by great cunning, and with a moſt delicat grace: yet vſe they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. The ſix Viſier Baſſa's before mentioned, were ſtanding at the left hand as they entred in at the chamber dore, one by another in one ſide of the chamber, and the Embaſſadors on the right hand on the other ſide ſtanding likewiſe, & vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber, neere the place where the Sultan ſat gorgeouſly attired in a robe of cloath of gold all embroidred with jewels: when as the Embaſſadors followers by one & one brought before him, (as is aforeſaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turke ſtanding on his right hand, with all reuerence taking vp the hem of his garment, gaue it them in their hands to kiſſe. Selymus himſelf all this while ſitting like an image without mouing, and with a great ſtate and maieſty keeping his countenance, dained not to giue them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again, neuer turning their backs towards him, but going ſtill backwards vntill they were out of his preſence. So after they had all thus made their reuerence, & were departed out of the chamber, the Embaſſadors deliuered vnto Selymus the Emperors letters, and briefly declared vnto him their meſſage: whom he anſwering in foure words, as, That they were to conferre with his Baſſa's, preſently they were diſmiſſed. And ſo comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horſebacke, & tooke the way leading towards their lodging, being at their returne accompanied with the whole order of the Ianizaries, with their Aga & other captains: among were certain of their religious men called Haagi (which vſe to follow the Ianizaries) who continually running about (and in their going, ſinging or rather howling out certaine Pſalmes and prayers for the welfare of their Great Sultan) gaue the Embaſſadours and their followers occaſion to wonder,

A wonder, that they either left not for wearineſſe, or fell not downe like noddins for giddineſſe. All theſe were ſent, the more honourably to accompanie the embaſſadors to their lodging: and beſide theſe, many more on horſebacke than attended them at their forth comming: in regard wherof, the embaſſadors when they were come to their lodging, to requite their gredie courteſie, franckly diſtributed amongſt them aboue foure thouſand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The embaſſadours after this entertainment at court, had diuers times conference with the great Baſſaes concerning peace, as Selymus had commanded: wherein by reaſon of the Turks vnreaſonable demands (as their manner is at their firſt meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: ſo that Selymus himſelfe being ſhortly after to depart for Hadrianople, where he was B to continue for ſome moneth (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree vpon a point of great conſequence) the treatie for peace was intermitted, vntill ſuch time as a meſſenger diſpatched in poſt, might returne vnto the Turks court, with ſome reſolute anſwer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the raigne of the late Emperour Ferdinand, that the Turke his ſubiects in Hungarie payed all their taxes and tributes vnto their old Lords and maſters, abiding and liuing in the Emperors iuriſdiction, as did the ſubiects of Ferdinand to their lords that dwelt in the Turkes dominion and territories: now in this treatie for peace, the Turks (amongſt other their vnreaſonable requeſts) demanded to haue their ſubiects freed, & yet the ſubiects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accuſtomed. Which as it was a C requeſt nothing indifferent, ſo was it no leſſe preiudiciall and hurtfull vnto the Emperor his ſubiects in Hungarie: for which cauſe the embaſſadors would not by any meanes conſent thereunto, before they knew the Emperors farther pleaſure concerning the ſame. Whereupon they diſpatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of Mantua, verie skilfull in the Turkiſh language and in ſuch like affaires, by reaſon that as well about this buſineſſe as at diuers times before about other the like, he had been employed from Vienna to Conſtantinople in the Emperours ſeruice. So Selymus ſhortly after, Viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Conſtantinople, in great magnificence paſſed by the gate where the embaſſadours lay, with his whole court, in armes, and in the ſame order that is vſually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great iourney. After whoſe departure the embaſſadors hauing ſufficiently viewed the citie of D Conſtantinople, and then at good leiſure, to paſſe the time and to ſee the countries they had ſo often both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both ſides that narrow ſea which diuideth Europe from Aſia, embarking themſelues, and croſſing the mouth of the hauen betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, paſſed all alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, vnto the Euxine or blacke ſea, and ſo backe againe by the other ſide of that ſtraight ſea: curiouſly noting the great ruins of the antient cities of Bythinia, with ſome others alongſt the Aſian ſhore, together with the pleaſant ſcituation they in former times had, whileſt they yet flouriſhed in their glory, but now for moſt part (or rather altogether) laid in the duſt & brought to nought: and ſo returned againe to Conſtantinople. But whileſt they thus deceiued the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their owne meſſenger ſent vnto the Emperour, as of Selymus E himſelfe: they were aduertiſed in all haſte to repaire vnto him to Hadrianople, whether the aforeſaid meſſenger was now come with full inſtructions of all things concerning the treatie for peace. For which cauſe they with great ſpeed making themſelues ready, and taking their leaue of Piall Baſſa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at Conſtantinople) ſet forward the firſt of Ianuarie in the yeare 1568, and ſo after nine daies trauel, at length arriued at Hadrianople about an hundred fiftie three Italian miles diſtant from Conſtantinople. Here they ſtayed vntill the peace was concluded, which was the ſeuenteenth of Februarie: the chiefe capitulations whereof were, That either of thoſe great Princes ſhould ſtill hold what they had got each from the other in the late wars: That the Emperour ſhould yeerely pay thirtie thouſand duckats to the Turkiſh Sultan, as a tribute for Hungarie, the tribute to F begin in the beginning of Ianuarie laſt paſt this yeare 1568: That the ſubiects of the Turke ſhould pay nothing to the ſubiects of the Emperour, neither the Emperours any thing to the Turks, but to be both of thoſe paiments free. And that vpon theſe conditions there ſhould be a firme and ſure peace betwixt theſe two great monarchs for eight yeares next following: wherein the Vayuod of Tranſyluania was (as the Turks tributarie) to be alſo comprehended. Neuertheleſſe, al things at this time thus agreed vpon, the Turks after their ſubtile manner finding ding ſundry cauillations, and raiſing many doubts about the aforeſaid capitulations, did what they might to haue in ſome part altered what they had before agreed vpon, to the bettering of G themſelues and the hurt of the Chriſtians: and ſo with many their vnreaſonable demands ſtayed the departure of the embaſſadors vntill the twentieth of March following. At which time hauing their diſpatch, and taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Baſſaes, accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embaſſador vnto the Emperour) they by land returned towards Vienna, where they with the ioyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arriued, being there two daies after at the court moſt honourably receiued. And fiue daies after, audience was giuen vnto the Turks embaſſador, who well heard and better rewarded, ſhortly after returned with a full concluſion of peace from the Emperou, to Conſtantinople.

Embaſſadours ſent from Tamas the Perſian king, to Selymus

But whileſt this peace was thus in concluding, and the embaſſadors yet reſident at Hadrianople, the ſixteenth of Februarie came an honourable embaſſage from Schach Tamas the Perſi- H an king, vnto the great Sultan Selymus, to intreat a peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the ſame, being before agreed vpon the controuerſies, for which they afterwards fell to open war. Which embaſſage for that it is no leſſe truly than plainely ſet downe in a letter ſent from Erzirum (a citie then in the confines of the Turkes dominions towards the Perſians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes, which Chiaus was of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, to meet the ſaid Perſian embaſſador: I thought it not amiſſe for the better vnderſtanding thereof, to ſet downe the effect of the ſame letter as it was tranſlated out of the Turkiſh into the Italian by the Emperors embaſſadors interpreter. I

After due ſalutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make knowne vnto your Lordſhip. Now at this preſent (to wit in the beginning of the moneth Giumma Sulacchir) is in good health arriued the Embaſſadour of Perſia, the Kings chiefe counſellour, called * Schach Culi Soltan, attended vpon with a hundred and twentie Gentlemen, with guilt Turbants on their heads, and well furniſhed with ſpare horſes led in mens hands. Beſides whom he was accompanied alſo with two hundred knights all apparelled in cloath of gold, with foure hundred Perſian merchants, in all about ſeuen hundred per- K ſons, with a thouſand nine hundred beaſts, Camels, Mules, and Horſes; fiue couple of drums, euery couple being placed vpon a ſeuerall Camell, fiue Nacars, three trumpets, fiue flutes, and other inſtruments, in all about thirtie muſitions, playing vpon theſe inſtruments: There were alſo two quiriſters or chaunters of the Alcoran, one Organiſt, one playing vpon a Turkiſh inſtrument like a Lute, two players vpon Sagbuts, with two other Muſitions, eight in all. There were alſo foure bondwomen ſeruing in the Embaſſadours owne chamber. Who when hee was with all this magnificent pompe come within one dayes iourney of Erzirum, the * Sayms and Spahies aſſembling themſelues together to the number of eight thouſand men, went to meet him: amongſt whome were an hundred and more, all apparelled in cloath of gold and Sattin: two thouſand men with guilt morrions on their heads: in which brauerie we marching forward, the Perſian Embaſſadour amazed to ſee ſo great maieſtie and pompe, L ſaid that all the armie of Conſtantinople was come to meete him: and ſo being come into the Citie, cauſed all the inſtruments to bee played vpon, euen from morning vntill night. The next morning the Embaſſadour inuited the Baſſa with all the Lords and officers; who being come, hee entreated them to heare his muſicke: and in like manner the Lord Baſſa inuited the Perſians. But as the Embaſſador was going to the banquet, came another Sultan of the Kings, who brought vnto the ſame Embaſſador a guilt Turbant, and a rich gowne wrought with gold, which he cauſed him to put on by the way. By this Embaſſadour the Perſian King hath ſent all the armour of Sultan Baiazet, with all his Camels and other wealth. The cauſes of the long ſtay of this Embaſſadour were ſpecially two; the one, for that the Perſian King had cauſed to bee made two pauilions of one peece, the curtaines being interlaced with gold, and the ſupporters imbroidered with the ſame: Beſides this, he ſent two bookes of Hiſtories, and two M hundred, which in weight weighed ten * Meſcals, one Balaſſe as big as a little Pearle, fourescore and two times an hundred * Tumenlich of ſtuffe, amounting to fourescore and two ſummes of Aſpers, and white Falcons: all which the Perſian King hath ſent vnto the Great Sultan, as to the onely Monarch and Patron of the world. This Schach Culi is the next in authoritie to the King, and ſo was in the time

A time of great King Hyſmael. Theſe two Perſian Sultans are the Kings chiefe Sultans and courtiers, and therefore ſet themſelues forth with all the pompe they can. Yet notwithſtanding all their brauerie, being come to Erzirum within the view of our armie, the Perſians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of theſe Perſians are returned againe into Perſia. And if it pleaſe God, at the comming of my meſſenger vnto you, your Lordſhip ſhall vnderſtand of what condition and ſtate theſe two Princes and Sultans are. They haue each of them yearely ſix Tumoni: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, ſix thouſand Aſpers. Your Lordſhip after this account may iudge of the reſt. The other cauſe of the long ſtay of this Embaſſador, was for that in Syruan the people were vp in rebellion, wherein many of them were ſlaine: to the appeaſing of which ſedition, this Schach Culi *was ſent, and now at laſt is come. From Erzirum in the beginning of the moneth of * Giama Sulacchir, in the* B yeare of the Prophet Mahomet, 975.

 December.*

This the Perſian embaſſador was with the greateſt pompe that might be entertained by the Turks at his firſt comming to Hadrianople, all the braue courtiers with the Ianizaries & other ſouldiers of the court going forth in moſt ſeemely order to meet him. Who now entred the citie, and come before the houſe where the Emperours embaſſadors then lay, and ſeeing certain of their retinue before the dore, asked of Iſnam the Capitzi Baſſa, what people they were, who told them that they were the followers of an embaſſador that there lay, ſent from one of the greateſt Princes of the Chriſtians, namely the Emperour, who was deſirous to make peace with the great Sultan his maſter. Whereunto the embaſſador replied, That he would C willingly ſalute them: which Iſnam hearing, ſtraight way turned his horſe towards the place where they ſtood. Now the Emperors embaſſador being ſecret within a lattiſe, and ſeeing him come towards them, went forth & ſtood vpon the dore threſhold, and ſo with ſignes and words ſaluted one another. Among the others the Perſian embaſſador ſaid vnto the Emperors, That he would gladly talke with him, if it might ſo pleaſe the grand Seignior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors embaſſadors, being interpreter. So hauing courteouſly ſaluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two daies after, the Perſian embaſſadors (according to the maner of thoſe barbarous nations, who with empty hands ſalute not one another) by his Checaia or ſteward of his houſhold, preſented all the Viſier Baſſaes with diuers rich gifts and Preſents, euery one of them according to their degrees & places: and D the day after went himſelf to viſit them, where by the way fel out a ſtrange matter, like enough to haue coſt him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embaſſador was going to viſit Muhamet the chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes for the firſt) meeting him, ſhot at him with an harquebuſh, with purpoſe to haue ſlain him; but as God would, miſſed him, & hurt but one of his chiefe followers in the arm. Wherwith the embaſſador not a little diſmaid, as ſuppoſing himſelfe to haue bin betraied, turning his horſe, was about to haue gone to his lodging: but the great Baſſa in the mean time hauing knowledge therof, preſently ſent out men to guard him, and to excuſe himſelfe of the fact. Whereof the embaſſador being aſſured, held on his way. In the meane ſpace, the fellow who ſhot the harquebuſh, being apprehended, was brought before the embaſſadour and the Baſſa; who asking him for what cauſe he diſcharged the ſhot againſt the embaſſador: E he without change of countenance boldly anſwered, That he did it for no other cauſe but for that the embaſſador was an heretick, and ſent from an hereticall king, and an enemy to their religion: and therefore that it was not conuenient hee ſhould come to intreat of peace with his lord; adding further, that he was not worthie of any peace. Which the Baſſa hearing, adiudged the deſperat villain the next day to be drawn at an horſe taile through the city, & then to haue his right hand cut off, and afterward his head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this, the Perſian embaſſador the 22 of the ſame moneth went to deliuer the Preſents ſent from his maſter vnto the grand Seignior, and to kiſſe his hand: ſending firſt before him the Preſents vpon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Perſia, and the other ten his owne. The Kings Preſent was an Alcoran, with the authoritie of Ali, as they hold. For this is their cuſtome, F alwayes to preſent one ſuch Alcoran vnto the Princes to whome they ſend their Embaſſadours. It was couered with gold, and garniſhed with moſt precious ſtones. Hee preſented alſo a booke of Hiſtories, couered as the other: he gaue alſo a box, wherein was a verie faire precious ſtone called Balaſſo, and two pearles of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with two purſes of an handfull long, full of Iewels. Beſides theſe, he preſented alſo 8 Firuari or Porcellane diſhes (which we call China diſhes) made of moſt pure earth, kept aboue fiftie yeres buried vnder the ground, to the end ſo to be fined and purified, which (as ſome ſay) wil melt and diſſolue if any poiſon be put into them. Hee gaue alſo two moſt ſtately pauilions, 20 great carpets of ſilke, and many other leſſer of ſilke and gold; alſo nine faire canopies to hang ouer the poſts of their pauillions, things not vſed among the Chriſtians. He gaue alſo nine verie faire carpets of camels haire, nine ſaddles ſet with ſtone after the Perſian faſhon, ſeuen ſtaues of ſiluer, ſeuen ſcimitars with red ſcaberts, ſeuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers, all wrought with gold and precious ſtone; he preſented alſo many other carpets called Teſtich, made of the fineſt lawne, and ſo large, that ſeuen men could ſcarcely carry one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way The preſents which the Embaſſadour gaue vnto the great Turke in his owne name, were alſo theſe: an Alcoran, a pauilion faire and large, certaine ſcimitars, bowes and arrowes richly garniſhed, with certain carpets of ſilk, & Camels haire. After which Preſents ſo deliuered, & reuerence don vnto the great Sultan by the embaſſador, and thirty of his followers al in cloth of gold, he returned to his lodging, very honorably accompanied, as wel by the Turks as them of his owne retinue. Firſt beſides many others, there were a great companie of the Spahies and Chiauſies, and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horſes, well furniſhed & in decent order: here might a man haue ſeen ſtore of cloth of gold, veluet, damaske, & other kinds of ſilke. After theſe, there followed about three hundred Perſian horſemen, apparelled after their manner, ſome with gowns made of diuers little pieces of taffata of ſundry colors, repreſenting the pictures of men, women, horſes, and other beaſts; and ſome of them imbroidered with flowers and fruits of ſundry ſorts; ſome had alſo gowns of cloth of gold, but not ſo faire as the Turks; and ſome of veluet, but very few of cloth; for that the Perſians haue no great plenty either of veluet or yet of cloth, except ſuch as they haue from the Portingals that trauel into thoſe Eaſtern countries; yet of ſilk & wool it appeareth they haue great plenty, moſt part of their gowns being of wooll quilted with bombaſt. After theſe horſemen followed many Perſian footmen, peraduenture all ſeruants; after whom came the Turkiſh horſemen: and laſt of al came a horſe of the embaſſadors led by a Perſian; after which horſe followed 200 Ianizaries: and in the rereward of all came the embaſſador alone, gorgeouſly attired both himſelfe & his horſe. He himſelf was inueſted with crimoſin veluet, mingled with ſome other colors: his ſaddle and bridle were all bedeckt with iewels: the capariſon of his horſe, was all imbroidered with Turquoies and other precious ſtones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Meteuenchia) was altogether wrought with gold, and ſet with precious ſtones: in briefe, vpon euery part of his bodie hanged iewels of great price. After the embaſſadour, followed about 140 Perſian horſemen, and others of his court apparelled as before, ſome well, ſome ill, according to their abilitie. Now although the Perſians (as is to be thought) ſhewed all their pompe, yet they made nothing ſo faire a ſhew as did the Turks; neither are they ſo faire men of complexion, being for the moſt part of a ſwart and browne color, and rather little men than otherwiſe, not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embaſſadour being departed, the Preſents were all brought & ſhewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary charges 500 ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great, and their beaſts many. Theſe expences beſtowed vpon the embaſſadors, do preſently begin as ſoone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end, ſo ſoone as the buſineſſe for which they come is finiſhed. But long it was not, but that this embaſſador hauing concluded a peace betwixt the two great Princes, Tamas and Selymus, & diſpatched ſuch matters as he came for, returned home again into Perſia. The Venetians alſo now at this ſame time, by their embaſſadors ſought to renew the league they had made with the great Turke, now expired: which as it was eaſily obtained, ſo was it of ſmal aſſurance, Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raiſing new wars, to the great hurt and diſturbance of that State, as ſhall forthwith appeare.

The embaſſadors preſent to Solyman.

An honourable allowance.

1569 Selymus now at peace with all the world (a thing of the Turks not much deſired) began to thinke of workes of charitie: and purpoſing to build a magnificent temple at Hadrianople for his owne ſepulture, with a Monaſterie, a Colledge, and an Almes-houſe (as had his father, and other his anceſtours before him at Pruſa and Conſtantinople, led thereunto with a vaine and ſuperſtitious deuotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endow the ſame with lands and reuenues ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo great a charge: for that the Mahometan Kings, are by their ſuperſtition prohibited to conuert any lands or poſſeſſions

A to ſuch holy vſes,other than ſuch as they haue with their owne ſword won from the enemies of their religion,which they may (as they are perſuaded) as a moſt acceptable ſacrifice,offer to their great Prophet : which deuiliſh perſuaſion,ſerueth as a ſpur to pricke forward euery of thoſe ambitious Princes to adde ſomething to their empire. This his deuout purpoſe once knowne,wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deuiſing ſome one thing, ſome another,as they thought beſt fitted his humour.But amongſt many things to him preſented, none pleaſed him ſo well,as the plot laid for the taking of the rich Iſland of Cyprus from the Venetians : a conqueſt of it ſelfe ſufficient,both for the eternizing of his name,and performance of his owne charitable workes intended, with a large ouerplus,for the ſupplying of what ſoeuer wanted in his fathers like deuout workes at Conſtantinople.But that which moued him moſt B of all,was the glory of ſuch a conqueſt, which as his flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predeceſſors, who in the beginning of their raigne,had vſually done or attempted ſome notable thing againſt the Chriſtians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Baſſaes to be conſidered of, without whoſe aduiſe and counſell, the Turkiſh Emperors ſeldome or neuer take any great wars in hand. Amongſt theſe graue counſellors, Mubamet the chiefe Viſier Baſſa,a man of greateſt authoritie (vnto whom Selymus was beholden,that he had ſo quietly obtained the empire)and a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, ſeemed much to miſlike of that motion,perſuading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alledging beſide the danger and vncertaintie of the expedition,that his father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him ſtraitly,that the league with the Venetians ſhould be religiouſly kept, C and that he could not with his honour without iuſt cauſe ſo quickly breake the league,which he himſelfe had but a little before moſt ſolemnly confirmed. But Muſtapha the ſecond Baſſa, ſometime Selymus his tutor,and therfore of him much honored, with Piall Baſſa the Admirall (both enuying at the great honor of the Viſier Baſſa)ſo mightily impugned that he had before ſaid,and ſo importuned Selymus with the ſhew both of honor and profit attending that action, as alſo with the eaſineſſe thereof(a great part of the Venetian Arſenall being but a little before burnt,and their forces much weakned)that he reiected the counſell of Mubamet,calling him in his choler,Chriſtian(which among the Mahometans is a word of no ſmal diſgrace)and yeelding wholly to the perſuaſion of Muſtapha and Piall, preſently cauſed preparation to be made both by ſea and land, for the performance of that his reſolution. Which was not ſo couertly D carried in the Turkes court,but that it was diſcouered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embaſſador,and not without cauſe ſuſpected by the Venetian merchants,whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut ſhort in their trafficke,looking big vpon them, as men ſuddenly changed,and euill intreating them with hard ſpeeches,the vndoubted ſignes of greater troubles to enſue. The Venetian Embaſſador now out of doubt of the Turkes purpoſe for the inuaſion of Cyprus,came vnto Mubamet the chiefe Baſſa,complaining of the breach of the league : and putting him in mind of the fidelitie of the Venetian State towards the Turkiſh Emperour; re-queſting him,that Selymus might not make too much haſt to begin that war,which would ſet all Europe on a broile;but rather by his embaſſadors firſt to declare his mind to the Senat,for E that ſo it might haply come to paſſe,that al might be quieted,to the good of both parties without war. Which the politick embaſſador requeſted not of the Baſſa for any hope he had to auert the war,for which the Turk had now al things in a readineſſe,but only by ſuch an hope of compoſition,to hinder the Turks endeauors,and to win time, vntill that the State(being fully certified of al theſe matters)might make ready their fleet & forces,and ſo in armes be ready to anſwer their armed foes : Neither did he euer leaue the Baſſa,vntill he had by his means procured, That one Cubates ſhould be ſent Embaſſadour to Venice, to prooue the mindes of the Senators,whether they would willingly deliuer the Iſland,or aduenture to haue it taken from them by force. Theſe things and ſuch like as were then done at Conſtantinople, beeing by letters ſent in poſt from the Embaſſadour,made knowne at Venice, brought a generall heauineſſe vpon the citie ;for why,that vnderſtanding and prouident State,warned by their former F harmes,of all others moſt dread the Turks forces. Cubates the embaſſadour accompanied with Aloyſius Barbarus the Embaſſadours ſonne, and Bonricius his Secretarie, departing from Conſtantinople, came by long iourneyes to Raguſium, where Angelus Surianus ſent from Venice to meete him, was readie to receiue him, who beeing taken into his gallie, brought him to Venice,

Hard to truſt vpon confederations.

In the meane time the Senators ſitting oftentimes in counſel, were diuided in opinions concerning the chiefe matter they conſulted vpon: ſome there were, that thought it not good to wage war againſt ſuch an inuincible enemie, nor to truſt vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of ſuch fortune as was vnto them in that war by the enemie propounded; they alledged, That they had alwaies vnfortunatly taken vp arms againſt the Turks, and that therefore they ſhould ſet before their eyes, what harmes they had ſuffered, and how that beſide the loſſes already ſuſtained, they had alwaies in the winding vp of the warres loſt ſomething more: that it were better to depart with Cyprus, ſo that they might quietly inioy the reſt, rather than to enter into armes: Time they ſaid, would at length giue them ſome one fit occaſion or other to recouer that they had loſt, and to reſtore their ſtate vnto their former honour, which for the preſent, was aboue their power to maintaine: To put their truſt in their confederats (they ſaid) was but to deceiue themſelues: they ſhould remember how often euen ſmall cauſes of falſe ſuſpition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly fruſtrated and broken in ſunder the moſt ſolemne capitulations of the ſtrongeſt leagues: how often deſtruction had come thence from whence ayd was alwayes to haue bin hoped for, they needed not to ſeeke farther for examples, than from their owne domeſtical affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Iſland was by force of armes to be defended: ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonorable, than without fight to depart with ſo notable a part of their ſeigniorie; neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour; neither would the proud Turks, with whom no aſſured league could be made (as they ſaid) hold themſelues content with this yeelding vp of the Iſland, but by intreating of them and giuing them way, become more inſolent: and when they had taken Cyprus from them, would alſo ſeeke after Creet & Corcyra, and ſo yeelding them one thing after another, ſpoile themſelues of all together: Ambitious and greedie Princes (they ſaid) grew more bold and inſolent by other mens feare; and that no great or notable matter was to be don without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merrie endings; that the fauor and good will of that inſatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with ſo great loſſe and charge as that ſuch a coſtly peace would be much more hurtfull than war it ſelfe: beſide that, it much concerned other Chriſtian Princes to haue the Venetian State preſerued, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermoſt of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too and fro, it was in the end reſolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, and by plaine force to withſtand the Turke.

So when Cubates the Turks embaſſadour came to Venice, neither did any man of courteſie meet him, neither was any honor done vnto him, or ſo much as common courteſie ſhewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat houſe with his two interpretors only, he deliuered Selymus his letters, incloſed in a little bag wrought with ſilke & gold; and ſo whileſt the ſame letters were in breaking vp, and tranſlating out of the Turkiſh language into Italian, deliuered alſo his meſſage by word of mouth, as followeth:

What great account the mightie Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwayes made of your moſt honourable friendſhip, is therein right well declared; That in the verie entrance of himſelfe into his Empire, hee foorthwith and without any hard or new conditions renewed his league with you: which hee hath on his part alwayes kept moſt faithfully and vnuiolate; worthily grieuing the like kindneſſe not to bee ſhewed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you; who by harbouring of Pyrats in your hauens, and murthering of his ſubiects, haue oftentimes broken the league. Which iniuries, although they were by war to haue beene reuenged; yet hath hee, ſo mightie a monarch, hitherto beene alwayes more mindfull of your honour and friendſhip, than of his owne maieſty and profit. But forſomuch as there is no end of theſe iniuries & wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbeare, might be imputed vnto him rather for cowardiſe than courteſie, as alſo that it much more concerneth your ſtate than him, and that therefore you ought no leſſe than hee to deſire, that all cauſes of vnkindneſſe might bee cut off, and order taken, that in ſo great and mutuall goodwill, there ſhould bee no falling out by new quarrells dayly ariſing: the onely remedie thereof is, if you ſhall deliuer vnto him the Iſland of Cyprus, the cauſe of all theſe grieuances. Now it beſeemeth you for your great wiſedome, to make ſmall reckoning of ſo ſmall a matter, in compariſon of the fauor of ſo great a Prince; which if you willingly of your ſelues yeeld vnto him, you ſhall right wiſely

A prouide for your affaires, and haue him ſo great a monarch alwaies your friend and confederat: whereas if you ſhall ſhew your ſelues obſtinate, and not to yeeld to this his ſo ſmall a requeſt, his purpoſe is, by ſtrong hand not only to take from you the Iſland, the cauſe of the war, but alſo to proſecute you with moſt cruell war both by ſea and land. And thereupon I take God to witneſſe, all the blame of the calamities to enſue of ſo mortal a war, to be imputed vnto your ſelues, as the worthy reward of your wilfulneſſe and breach of faith.

Which ſaid, he in the name of Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa told the Senatours, That he was right ſorie that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor Selymus & them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wiſely conſider of all things; yet he could B not for the good will he bare vnto them, but admoniſh them of ſuch things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholeſome: and therefore did moſt inſtantly requeſt them, and withall aduiſe them, not to enter into armes againſt ſo mightie a Prince, neither wilfully to plunge themſelues into ſuch dangers, as they could hardly or neuer find the way out; for that their ſtrength was nothing anſwerable vnto his, and that the euent of that war would be vnto them deadly: and therefore he tooke God and the loue that he bare vnto them to witneſſe, that he had in friendly ſort forewarned them of their harms, and aduiſed them for their good. Giuing them further to vnderſtand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out moſt cruell threats againſt their State; which his indignation was raiſed of the manifold complaints brought againſt them to his court at Conſtantinople.

C Selymus his letters anſwerable to his Embaſſadours ſpeech, was alſo full of falſe ſurmiſed grieuances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike maner entred into the frontiers of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had done great harme; that they had put to death certain Turkiſh pyrats whom they had taken aliue: that their Iſland of Cyprus was an harbor for the pyrats of the Weſt; and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, and ſurpriſed his ſubiects trauelling that way for deuotion vnto the Temple of Mecha, or otherwiſe about their affaires. And that therefore thoſe cauſes of diſcord might be taken away, and the hinderance of traffique remoued, he required them to yeeld vnto him the Iſland of Cyprus: which if they refuſed to do, he would by force of arms take it from them; and by force of ſtrong hand cauſe them to do that which they might the better haue done frankly and of their owne accord; and D further, to make them vnderſtand how far the Turks did excell all other men in martial proweſſe. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he ſaid he had renewed the ſame, not becauſe he had any liking thereunto, but becauſe he had as then ſet downe with himſelfe, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embaſſadours errand before his comming, hauing now read his Letters, gaue him ſuch anſwere as they had before reſolued vpon: which was, That the Venetians had at all times inuiolably kept their leagues with the Othoman Emperors, and had in regard thereof let ſlip many opportunities and fit occaſions for them to haue augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themſelues, haue deſtroyed the Turks fleet both at the Rhodes and Malta, and other places alſo; but that they more E regarded their honour; and alwaies thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to performe their faith once giuen, and in all their actions to be like themſelues. And therefore had diſſembled and put vp many grieuous & bitter indignities, leſt they might be thought to haue firſt broken the league: That they had neuer paſſed their owne bounds, or inuaded the Turks; only to haue taken order, that no pyrats ſhould at their pleaſure roame vp and downe the ſeas. Now whereas all duties being on their part ſincerely and moſt religiouſly kept; Selymus complained himſelfe to be wronged, whereas he himſelfe had done the wrong, and had contrary to the league, denounced war againſt them, expecting nothing leſſe: ſithence that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of arms defend F that Kingdome, which they by antient and lawfull right poſſeſſed, deliuered vnto them by their Anceſtors. That God, in whoſe helpe they truſted, would weigh in indifferent balance, all mens words and deeds; whom they tooke to witneſſe, that they were the authors of peace, and Selymus the cauſe of war: and that the ſame God would be now preſent vnto their iuſt complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them, which falſifying their faith and promiſe giuen, and violating the ſacred league, had enforced them to take vp moſt iuſt and neceſſarie armes, which they would with the ſame courage mannage, that they had taken them in hand.

With this anſwer the Embaſſador departed, let out by a ſecret poſtern, for feare of the people; who hauing got knowledge of the matter, were in great number aſſembled to the Court gate, muttering among themſelues, that it were wel done to rend in pieces that accurſed Turke, the meſſenger of his faithleſſe Maſter. Which outrage it was thought they would in their furie haue performed, had not ſuch as by the commandement of the magiſtrats garded him, better aſſured him of his ſafetie, than either regard of dutie or the law of nations; he by the way as he went ſtill ſtorming, and ſwearing by his Mahomet to be of that ſo great an indignitie reuenged. This anſwer of the Senat vnto the Turks Embaſſador concerning warre, was of ſome well liked and highly commended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed too ſharpe, liking of nothing that was ſaid or done to the further incenſing of the Turkiſh Emperor: being of opinion, that they might haue of him obtained a more indifferent peace by curteſie, than by rigor. As for the decreed warre, they vtterly diſliked, foraſmuch as all wars were wofull, but eſpecially thoſe that were to be maintained againſt them that are too ſtrong for vs. In ſuch diuerſitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat ſhould of that ſo honorable a decree reap ſuch commendation, as the euent thereof ſhould afford (than which nothing is more vnreaſonable:) if things fell out well, then was it wiſely and worthily done; if otherwiſe, then was it like to be reputed a fooliſh, a raſh, and wofull reſolution.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angrie Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their State: wherefore they forthwith ſent meſſengers with letters vnto the Gouernors of Cyprus; charging them with all carefulnes and diligence to make themſelues readie to withſtand the Turke, and to raiſe what power they were able in the Iſland, not omitting any thing that might concerne the good of the ſtate: and at the ſame time made choiſe of their moſt valiant & expert captains both by ſea and land, vnto whom they committed the defence of their diſperſed Seigniorie, with the leading of their forces. Hieronimus Zanius was appointed Admirall, Lucas Michael was ſent into Crete, Franciſcus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebaſtianus Venerius into Corcyra, all men of great honour, experience and valour. Other meaner captaines were alſo ſent with leſſe charge into the aforeſaid places, as Eugenius Singliticus a noble gentleman with 1000 footmen into Cyprus, who had alſo the leading of all the horſemen in the Iſland: after whom Countie Martinengus promiſed to follow with 2000 footmen moe. The ſtrong cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, armor, ordnance, and victual prouided, and whatſoeuer els they thought needful for defence of their State. And for as much as they well knew they had to do with too mightie an enemie, they by their Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, earneſtly ſolicited moſt of the Chriſtian princes to ioine with them in league, and to giue them aid againſt the common enemie, who as he was too ſtrong for any one of them, ſo were he not able to ſtand againſt their vnited forces. But the Emperor Maximilian excuſed himſelfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares, which he ſaid he might not breake: yet he had before his eyes a moſt pregnant example, what ſmall reckoning the Turke maketh of his faith and league, which he without any iuſt cauſe had broken with the Venetians. The like excuſed vſe alſo Charles the French king, and Sigiſmund king of Polonia; who both ſeemed to be verie ſorie for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not help them for that they were in league with the Turkiſh Emperor. Neuertheleſſe the French king did them the courteſie, to offer himſelfe to be a mediator, if they ſo pleaſed, betwixt them and Selymus. The yong king of Portingal Don Sebaſtian pretended alſo for his excuſe the great plague which had but a little before raged in his kingdome, & much diminiſhed his people; as alſo that he was to maintaine wars by ſea againſt the Turkes in the Eaſt-Indies, to the no leſſe benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, than if he ſhould aid the Venetians in the Mediterranian. Only Pius Quintus then Pope, and Philip king of Spaine, with certaine of the Princes of Italie; namely Philibert duke of Sauoy, Guido Vdebaldus duke of Vrbin, Coſmus Medices duke of Florence, & the knights of Malta, promiſed them aid, which they afterward moſt honorably performed.

The Emperour, the French king and the King of Polonia entangled with their leagues, refuſed to aid the Venetians againſt the Turks.

What Chriſtian Princes promiſed to aid the Venetians.

Selymus of himſelfe angrie with the Venetians, and firme in his reſolution for the conqueſt of Cyprus, was vpon the report of Cubates his Embaſſadors bad entertainment at Venice, further inraged: he deemed the Maieſtie of the Turkiſh Emperor contemned, and himſelf in the perſon

A perſon of his Embaſſador diſgraced: ſeeing that they whom he had thought would haue yeelded vnto any thing, rather than the league ſhould haue bin broken, had ſent him ſuch a ſhort anſwer, and ſo contemptuouſly vſed his Embaſſador, vnto whom they had not afforded ſo much as common curteſie. It did not a little moue him alſo, that the Venetians had in their letters ſent by his Embaſſador, omitted the glorious titles vſually giuen the Turkiſh Emperors: wherfore in ſome part to ſatisfie his angrie mood, he cauſed Marcus Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embaſſadour, and all the Chriſtian merchants of the Weſt thorowout his Empire, to be clapt vp in priſon, and their ſhips ſtayed vnder an arreſt. And ſetting all other things apart, ſet himſelfe wholly for the preparing of ſuch things as ſhould be needfull for the intended war.

But foraſmuch as the Iſland of Cyprus was the prey whereafter the greedie tyrant ſo much B gaped, and for which the bloudie wars betwixt the Turke and the Venetians with their Chriſtian confederats, preſently enſued; it ſhal not be from our purpoſe to ſpend a few words in the deſcribing thereof, as the ſtage whereon the bloudie tragedie following was as it were acted: as alſo how it came firſt into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them ſo long poſſeſſed (although it be in ſome part before declared) vntill it was now by Selymus the Great Turke, againſt all right iniuriouſly demanded, & at length by ſtrong hand by him wreſted from them. This Iſland lieth in the fartheſt of the Cilician ſea: it hath on the Eaſt Siria, on the Weſt Pamphilia, Southward it regardeth Ægypt, and Northward Cilicia, now called Caramania. It is worthily accounted amongſt the greateſt Iſlands of the Mediterranian, containing in circuit 427 miles, and is in length (after the deſcription of Strabo) 175 miles, and in bredth not C aboue 65. It aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, cotton wooll, ſaffron, hony, roſin, turpentine, ſugar canes, and whatſoeuer els is needfull for the ſuſtentation of man, whereof it ſends forth great abundance to other countries, of whom it craueth no helpe againe. It was in antient time called Macaria, that is to ſay, Bleſſed. The people therein generally liued ſo at eaſe & pleaſure, that thereof the Iſland was dedicated to Venus, who was there eſpecially worſhipped, & therof called Cypria. Marcellinus to ſhew the firtilitie thereof, ſaith, That Cyprus aboundeth with ſuch plenty of all things, that without the helpe of any other foraine country, it is of it ſelf able to build a tall ſhip from the keele to the top ſaile, and ſo put it to ſea furniſhed of all things needfull. And Sextus Rufus writing therof, ſaith, Cyprus famoſa diuitijs, paupertatem populi Romani, vt occuparetur ſolicitauit, ita vt ius eius inſulæ auarius magis quam iniuſtius ſimus aſſecuti, &c. Cy- D prus famous for wealth, allured the pouertie of the people of Rome to lay hold vpon it, ſo that we haue rather couetouſly than iuſtly got the rule thereof. In the heart of the Iſland ſtandeth Nicoſia, ſomtime the regall and late metropoliticall citie thereof. And in the Eaſt end thereof Famaguſta, ſometime called Tamaſſus, a famous rich citie, the chiefe and only port of all that moſt pleaſant Iſland. Other faire cities there be alſo, as Paphos, Amathus (now called Limiſſo) and Cyrene. This Iſland of it ſelfe long time maintained the maieſtie of a Kingdome, as then when Richard the firſt, King of England, paſſing that way with his fleet for the reliefe of the Chriſtians then diſtreſſed in the Holy land about the yeare 1191, was prohibited there to land; and certain of his people by force of tempeſt there caſt on ſhore, were by the Cypriots either E cruelly ſlaine or taken priſoners: which barbarous violence king Richard tooke in ſo euil part, that he there by force landed his armie, and reſted not vntill he had taken Iſaac the king priſoner, and ſubdued the Iſland. The king he ſent in chaines of ſiluer to Tripolis, there to be kept in cloſe priſon; the kingdome he kept a while in his owne hand, which not long after he gaue, or as ſome ſay, exchanged with Guido the titular King of Hieruſalem: for which cauſe the Kings of England for a certain time afterwards were honored with the title of the Kings of Ieruſalem. This kingdome by many diſcents came at length to Ianus ſon of king Peter, who in the yeare 1423, was by Melechel a Sultan of Ægypt taken priſoner; but afterwards for the ranſome of 115000 Sultanins was ſet at libertie and reſtored to his kingdome, paying vnto the Sultan and his ſucceſſors a yerely tribute of 40000 crownes. This Ianus left a ſon called Iohn, who after the death of his father maried the daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat: after whoſe death F he married one Helena of the moſt noble houſe of the Paleologi in Græcia, by whom he had one only daughter called Carlotte; but by another woman a baſe ſon called Iames. This King Iohn was a man of no courage, altogether giuen to pleaſure, & according to the manner of his effœminat education, ſhewed himſelf in al things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great ſpirit, quickly perceiuing, tooke vpon her the ſoueraignty and whole

gouernment of the Realme, gracing and diſgracing whom ſhe pleaſed, and promoting to the G Eccleſiaſticall dignities ſuch as ſhee beſt liked; aboliſhing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greekes, and tooke ſuch further order as pleaſed her ſelfe in matters of ſtate concerning both peace and warre; her husband in the meane time regarding nothing but his vaine pleaſure: wherby it came to paſſe that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the queenes friends. Now the queene her ſelfe was much ruled by the counſell of her nurſe, and the nurſe by her daughter: ſo that the people would commonly ſay, The daughter ruled the nurſe, the nurſe the queene, and the queene the king. The nobilitie aſhamed and wearie of this manner of gouernment, by generall conſent of the people, ſent for Iohn the king of Portingals couſin german (whom ſome call the king of Portingal) to whome they gaue Carlotte the kings daughter in marriage, with full power to ſupplie that want of gouernment which was in king Iohn his father in law. He taking the authoritie into his hands, quickely reformed the diſordred H kingdome, as well in matters concerning religion, as ciuile policie. The Latine Ceremonies were againe reſtored, and the gouernment of the daughter, the nurſe, and the Queene, brought to an end. But the miſchieuous daughter doubting the countenance of the yong king, perſuaded her mother, as ſhe tendred her owne life, to poiſon the king. Which thing the wretched woman (by the conſent of the queene mother, as was reported) in ſhort time performed, and ſo brought that noble prince, wel worthie longer life, vnto his vntimely end: whereby the gouernment was again reſtored to the Greeke queene, who in the name of her weake husband commanded again at her pleaſure. But aboue all, the nurſe and her daughter inſulted vpon the yong queene Carlotte: which ſhe not well brooking, grieuouſly complained thereof to Iames her baſe brother, requiring his helpe for redreſſe thereof: who not long after ſlew the nurſes I daughter, not ſo much in reuenge of the wrong by her done vnto his ſiſter, as to prepare a way for himſelfe for the obtaining of the kingdome: grieuing inwardly, that ſhee or her husband ſhould be preferred before himſelfe. Which thing Helena the queene quickly perceiuing, perſuaded the King her husband to cauſe his baſe ſon to enter into the orders of prieſthood, and ſo to become a Church-man, thereby to cut off all his hope of aſpiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her inſtance did, and made him Archbiſhop of Nicoſia. In the meane time Carlotte by the perſuaſion of her mother and the nobilitie of the country, married Lewis ſon to the duke of Sauoy: who being for that purpoſe ſent for, came with all ſpeed to Cyprus. After that, the queene mother and the old nurſe (deſiring nothing more, than to reuenge the death of K of the nurſes daughter, vpon Iames now Archbiſhop) deuiſed firſt how to thruſt him out of all his ſpirituall promotions, which were great, and afterward quite baniſh him the kingdome.
Hereupon the queene wrot letters againſt him to the Pope, to haue him diſgraded, for that he being a man baſe borne, with his hands imbrued with guiltleſſe bloud, was vnworthie of holy orders. Which letters by chance came to Iames his hands: who inraged therewith, accompanied with a number of his friends and fauorits, ſuddenly entred the court, ſlew ſuch of his enemies as he found there, diuided their goods amongſt his followers, and as king poſſeſſed himſelfe of the regall citie. In this broile the Greeke queen Helena died, and ſhortly after her husband alſo. All things being thus in a hurley and out of order, certaine of the nobilitie for redreſſe thereof, ſent for Lewis the husband of Carlotte, as for him to whom that kingdome in the L right of his wife moſt iuſtly belonged: who vpon his arriuall was of all ſorts of men ioyfully receiued & welcommed as their king. Iames the vſurper vnderſtanding before of the comming of Lewis, and perceiuing the inclination of the people towards him, fled with diuers of his friends to Alexandria to craue aid of the Ægyptian Sultan: in whoſe court he found ſuch fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commandement royally apparelled and honored with the title of the king of Cyprus, which he promiſed for euer to hold of the Sultans of Ægypt as their vaſſal and tributary. At which time the Sultan alſo by his embaſſadors commanded Lewis to depart the Iſle: who by all means ſought to haue pacified the Sultan, declaring vnto him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and to allow vnto Iames a yerely penſion of 10000 duckets during his life. But all in vaine; for Iames ſtill preſent in the Sultans M court, and wiſely following his owne ſuit, at laſt concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king, than to confirme a king) and receiuing of him a great armie, returned into Cyprus: where in ſhort time he ſo diſtreſſed Lewis, that he was glad to forſake the Iſland, with his wife, and to returne into his country; leauing the kingdome of Cyprus

A again to Iames: who now by the ſupportation of the Ægyptian Sultan poſſeſſed therof, yet liued not without care of Carlotte & her husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cipriots wonderfully affected. Wherfore for the more aſſurance of his eſtate, he thought it beſt to ioyne in league and friendſhip with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at ſea, and of all other fitteſt to croſſe whatſoeuer Lewis ſhould in the right of his wife attempt againſt him. Which league he afterwards made, and the better to confirme the ſame, tooke to wife Catharin Cornelia, the daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senat, and euer after their reputed daughter. Not long after this marriage, Iames died in the yere 1470, leauing the queene great with child, who in due time was deliuered of a faire ſon; vnto whom with the mother the Venetian State became tutors, as their adoptiue fathers, & in their B behalfe tooke vpon them the gouernment of the realme. This childe ſhortly after died alſo, not without ſome ſuſpition of poiſon; after whoſe death great troubles aroſe in the kingdom, inſomuch that Andreas Cornelius the queens vncle, a moſt graue counſellour, and gouernor of the Realme vnder the queene, was by the conſpiracie of certaine noblemen ſlaine, and all the Iſland readie to reuolt from the queene. For appeaſing of which troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to ſend their admirals with their gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perſuaded by George Cornelius her brother, whileſt it was yet in her power, as a louing daughter to yeeld vp the kingdom vnto her adoptiue fathers, which ſhe deſtitute both of counſell and power, could not long hold ſo far from her friends, beſet on the one ſide with the Great Turke, and on the other with the mightie Sultan of C Ægypt. She I ſay thus perſuaded by her brother, came to Venice, where ſhe was with the greateſt honor that could be deuiſed, receiued by the Duke & whole State at ſea in their great and goodly ſhip the Beucentaure, and ſo with all royall triumph brought thorow the midſt of the citie vnto the place moſt richly for the time appointed for the receiuing of her: where ſhortly after attired in all her royal habiliments ſhe came in great maieſtie vnto the Senat houſe, and there before the tribunal ſeat of Auguſtinus Barbadicus then duke of Venice, laied downe her crowne and ſcepter, and as a moſt louing daughter reſigned vp her kingdome, to the great honor and profit of her country. Thus the kingdome of Cyprus was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the yeare 1473; which they peaceable held from that time, paying vnto the Sultans of Ægypt ſuch tribute as had the late king Iames: which yearely tribute they in like D manner payed vnto the Turkiſh Emperors, after that the kingdome of Ægypt was by Selymus the firſt conquered in the yeare 1517, as due vnto him by law of armes: with which yearely tribute both Selymus himſelfe, and Solyman after him, held themſelues well contented. But now this Turkiſh Emperor Selymus the ſecond, of whom we ſpeake, deſirous both of the honour of ſuch a conqueſt, and of ſo rich a prey, made no account of the accuſtomed tribute, but of the fruitfull Iſland it ſelfe: whereof he, as is before declared, hath by his Embaſſadour made a proud demand, but is thereof denied by the Senat.

Sabellic. Enne. ad. 10. lib. 8.

Selymus throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the inuaſion of Cyprus, in the beginning of Februarie ſent a great power both of horſe and foot into Epirus, and the frontiers of E Dalmatia, to forrage the Venetian territorie, eſpecially about Iadera; of purpoſe by that war ſo neere at home, to withdraw them from the defence of Cyprus ſo far off. About the middle of April following he ſent Piall Baſſa with foureſcore gallies and thirtie galliots to keepe the Venetians from ſending aid into Cyprus. This Piall was an Hungarian, borne of baſe parents, but turning Turke, and giuing himſelfe to armes, was firſt preferred for his valor ſhewed againſt the Chriſtians at Zerbi, and afterward by many degrees riſe to the honor of one of the greateſt Baſſa's. He departing from Conſtantinople, and cutting through Peloponeſus and Heleſpontus, came to Eubœa, and there for certaine dayes lay in ſuch order, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen the enemie battell: but vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Venetians grieuouſly viſited with the plague, and ſlowly relieued by their friends, were not like in haſte to come out, he tooke his courſe to Tenos an Iſland of the Venetians, to haue taken it from them. F This Iſland is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature ſtrong, but ſtronger by the induſtrie of the defendants; who liuing far from the Chriſtian countries, and compaſſed about with ſuch cruell and warlike enemies, as people far diſtant ſtood in dread of, could neuer for any feare or danger be remoued from the Chriſtian religion, or induced to ſubmit themſelues to the Turks gouernment, as moſt of the other Iſlands had. Piall here landing his forces, ſought both by faire meanes and foule to haue perſuaded the Inhabitants to haue yeelded vp their Towne: but when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, he began by force to aſſault the ſame. Two dayes the Towne was valiantly both aſſaulted and defended: but at length the Turkes perceiuing how little they preuailed, and that the defendants were reſolutely ſet downe for the defence of themſelues and their Countrey, ſhamefully gaue ouer the aſſault, and abandoning the Iſland, directed their courſe toward Cyprus. For Muſtapha authour of that expedition (for his antient hatred againſt the Chriſtians made Generall by Selymus) had before appointed Piall Baſſa at a time prefixed to meet him at the Rhodes, and that he that came firſt ſhould tarrie for the other, that ſo they might together ſayle into Cyprus.

Muſtapha hauing before ſent a great part of his armie by land into Pamphilia, embarqued the reſt with Haly Baſſa Generall of the forces at ſea, who yet ſtaied for him with the reſt of the fleet at Conſtantinople. This Haly was one of the chiefe Baſſa's, a man of great account, and ſometime an eſpeciall and noted follower of Muhamet Baſſa, but now (as it is oftentimes elſewhere ſeene, that men together with the change of fortune, change their mindes and affections alſo) was become a great fauorite of Muſtapha. Now to colour ſo manifeſt a wrong & breach of the Turks faith, Muſtapha the Generall, according to the Turkiſh manner, a little before his arriuall in Cyprus, gaue the Venetians there to vnderſtand by letters of his comming, as alſo of his purpoſe for the taking of that Iſland from them: for that without ſome ſuch ſlender denouncing of war vnto them againſt whom it is intended, the Turks generally account their expeditions not to be altogether ſo lawfull or fortunate as otherwiſe; and therefore writ vnto them in this ſort:

Muſtapha Baſſa vnto the Venetians.

Muſtapha Baſſa his Letters vnto the Venetians.

That the kingdome of Cyprus by antient right belongeth vnto the kingdome of Ægypt, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turks, is together with it become of right a part alſo of the Othoman Empire: that Iſland we come to challenge, leading after vs two hundred thouſand valiant ſouldiers, vnto which power, and the wealth of the Othoman kingdomes (all which, the moſt mightie Emperor is about, if need ſhall be, to ſend thither, and to bend his whole ſtrength thereon) all the vnited forces of the Chriſtian kings are not comparable; much leſſe the Venetians, ſo ſmall a part of Europe, forſaken of their friends, can ſuffice. Wherefore we will and exhort you, for the antient amitie which hath beene betwixt your State and the victorious Othoman Familie, to yeeld this kingdome vnto the moſt puiſſant Emperour, whoſe verie name is become dreadfull vnto all the nations of the world; and quietly and without reſiſtance to leaue the Iſland, with the loue and friendſhip of ſo great a Monarch to be for euer inuiolably kept betwixt him and you. Whereas if you ſhall before ſuch wholeſome counſell, fondly prefer your vaine hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of war, with ſuch dreadfull examples as the angrie Conquerors vſe to make of their vanquiſhed enemies. For reſolution whereof, we yet giue you halfe a moneths ſpace to bethinke your ſelues in: and ſo fare you well.

Muſtapha Baſſa goeth for Cyprus.

The Turks fleet deſcried in Cyprus.

The Turks land in Cyprus.

All this being now in readineſſe, and a moſt royal gally of wonderfull greatneſſe and beauty by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Baſſa the Generall; he together with Haly Baſſa and the reſt of the fleet departed from Conſtantinople the ſix and twentieth of May, and at the Rhodes met with Piall, as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at that time conſiſted of two hundred gallies, amongſt whom were diuers galliots, and ſmall men of war, with diuers other veſſels prepared for the tranſportation of horſes: with this fleet Muſtapha kept on his courſe for Cyprus. They of the Iſland in the meane time carefully attending the enemies comming, from their watch-towers firſt diſcouered their fleet at the Weſt end of the Iſland, not far from Paphos: from whence the Turks turning vpon the right hand, and paſſing the promontorie Curio, now called Del Le Gate, landed diuers of their men, who burnt and ſpoiled certaine villages, and with ſuch ſpoile and priſoners as they had taken, returned againe vnto the fleet; which holding on their former courſe, came at length to a place called Salinæ (of the abundance of ſalt there made) where they knew was beſt landing, and there in an open roade came to an anchor, where the Baſſa's without any reſiſtance vpon a plaine ſhore landed their armie.

A Now all the hope of the Chriſtians, was to haue kept the Turks from landing, which they ſhould with all their ſtrength and power haue done; neither was it a matter of any great difficultie, for had the defendants but kept the ſhore, and from the drie and firme land valiantly repulſed their enemies, they might vndoubtedly with their ſhot and weapons haue kept them from landing, or els haue done them greater harme: knowing in the mean time, that in all the Iſland was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road ſubiect to all wind and weather, they could not long without danger of ſhipwracke ride it out: but they either terrified with the greatneſſe of the fleet, or preuented by the celeritie of the enemie, to their great hurt omitted ſo faire an opportunitie, as the wofull ſequell of the matter declared. It exceedingly incouraged the Turkes that they had ſo eaſily footed the Iſland, which they B thought they ſhould not haue done without a bloudie fight.

The Baſſa now landed, preſently intrenched his army, and forthwith ſent the fleet to tranſport the reſt of his forces out of Pamphilia into the Iſland. And at the ſame time ſent out certaine ſcouts to take ſome priſoners, of whom they might learne the ſcituation of the country, the beſt waies to paſſe them with his army, the ſtrength of his enemies, & what they did, and many other ſuch like things which it concerned him to know. But the greateſt queſtion among the Turks themſelues was, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet vpon Famaguſta or Nicoſia? Famaguſta ſtandeth low, altogether ſubiect to the ſcortching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeare, and nature of the countrey required: wherefore the Baſſa for feare of diſeaſes to ariſe in his army of the immoderate heat and vnwholſome ſcituation of the place, C thought it better to begin his wars with the ſiege of Nicoſia, and to make that city the ſeat of the warre, for the conqueſt of the reſt of the Iſland. So hauing put all things in order, and well viewed the countrey, and finding nothing he needed to ſtand in doubt of, he ſet forward with his armie toward Nicoſia, which was about thirtie miles diſtant, being the chiefe and richeſt citie of all the Iſland. Which way ſoeuer the army marched, it ſpread a great deale of ground, and the neerer it came, the greater was the ſlaughter of the countrie people, and the number of priſoners taken of al ſorts. But when newes of the enemies approch was brought into the city, a generall feare preſaging future miſerie poſſeſſed the hearts of all men. There was not in the citie any valiant or renowned captaine, who as the danger of the time required, ſhould haue taken vpon him the charge: neither any ſtrong army in the Iſland to oppoſe againſt the enemy: D the Gouernour of the city was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a man too weake for ſo great a burthen; who alwaies brought vp in ciuile affaires, was to ſeek how to defend a ſiege. Of the citiſens and country people he had taken vp foure thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſemen, all raw ſoldiers, commanded by the gentlemen of the country, men of all others moſt courteous: but as well the captaines as the ſouldiers, as men brought vp in a plentifull countrey, fitter for pleaſure than for war. The greateſt hope and ſtrength of the city, was repoſed in twelue hundred Italian footmen, and ſix hundred horſemen. The whole number of the ſouldiers in garriſon for defence of the city, was deemed about 8000 horſe and foot; too weake a companie againſt ſo fierce and ſtrong an enemy; and the more, for that the Baſſa an old and moſt expert Generall was there in perſon himſelfe preſent, a moſt ſeuere and abſolute commander, whom E it would haue beene a hard matter to haue withſtood with equall power. The Venetians had euer had great care of the Iſland of Cyprus, as lying far from them, in the midſt of the ſworne enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to haue fortified the ſame: yet fearing thereby to ſeeme to diſtruſt or dread the Turks, and ſo giue them occaſion of offence, left it ſtill vndone. This citie of Nicoſia ſtandeth in the middeſt of the Iſland, in a plaine and champaine country, compaſſed round with a wall, as if it had been drawne with a compaſſe, and is in circuit about fiue miles: for the manner of the ſcituation, and magnificent buildings, as well publicke as priuat, many haue compared it vnto the beautifull citie of Florence in Italie: and was for the wholeſome and commodious ſcituation thereof notably peopled. This citie had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and eleuen F ſtrong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raiſed three great fortreſſes for defence of the wall, which they furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon, great ſtore of artillerie, and other warlike prouiſion. Neuertheleſſe, they found by experience in this war, That fortifications are ſtrengthened by the defendants, rather than the defendants by the fortifications.

The deſcription of Nicoſia.

The Turks before Nicoſia.

The 22 of Iuly, the Baſſa with his army incamped within a mile & a halfe of the city, when G preſently the Turks by troups iſſuing out of the campe, rid contemptuouſly before the walls and gates of the citie, and with often & lowd outcries vpbraided the defendants: which by them being anſwered with ſilence, was taken as a token of their feare. And Muſtapha himſelfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and ſcituation of the citie. Shortly after, the enemy drew neerer vnto the citie into a more open plaine, and with their tents filled the lower part of the hil, which they called Mandia: but the Baſſaes tent they ſet aloft vpon the hill, to the terrour of the defendants and incouragement of the Turks. The campe being fortified, the Turkes with incredible labour and celeritie brought their trenches from far, and at the firſt caſt vp ſome few forts, but afterwards, as their armie increaſed, many mo, which they raiſed ſo high, that they ouertopped the wals of the citie, and made the place H more dangerous for the Chriſtians to defend. There hauing placed 70 great pieces of batterie, they began to batter the citie both day and night without intermiſſion, with ſuch an horrible thundring, that the earth trembled, the houſes ſhooke as if they would haue falne down: at which time many were ſlaine, both with the deadly ſhot, and the broken pieces of ſtones beaten out of the wals: neuer was ſuch a feare as then within the citie of Nicoſia: euery day the enemie brought his trenches neerer and neerer, and reſted not vntill he had with reſtleſſe labour brought them vnto the verie brim of the towne ditch, which the citiſens before the comming of the Turks had not well ſcoured. Being come ſo nigh, they firſt skirmiſhed a farre off with their ſmal pieces: but afterwards, they not only battered the wals with their great ar-tillerie, but with ſmall ſhot, arrowes, and ſtones, ouerwhelmed the defendants, as if it had bin a I ſhower of haile, ſo to haue driuen them from off the wall & rampiers. In few daies, not onely all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarks, was by the furie of the great ordnance beaten downe, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the aſſailants & defendants. For although the Chriſtians fought at great diſaduantage, both for the number of men, and indiffe-rencie of the place: yet deſperation ioyned with extreme neceſſitie, of all other the greateſt weapon, gaue them ſuch courage, as with ſhot, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, to keep down their enemies, and defend their wals, and oftentimes to make great ſlaughter of them, with their ar-tillerie & murthering pieces, bent vpon them as at a certain marke, who the thicker they ſtood the greater was their harme. They alſo oftentimes diſmounted many of the great pieces and made them vnſeruiceable, and with featherbeds and ſacks of cotten wool, made vp their brea- K ches: which the Turks labored again to burn with pitch barrels, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turkes entring the ditch, made themſelues two wayes to the walls, which they fortified on both ſides with fagots & earth, in ſuch ſort, as that they were ſafe from the loupes of the bulwarks which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, ſome pre-ſently ſet vp ſcalling ladders: others filled the ditches with rubbiſh, wood, fagots, & earth, and others in the mean time with mattocks and leauers were digging down the foundations of the bulwarkes Conſtance and Podocatera, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge in the building thereof. The Chriſtians fight valiantly indured the firſt aſſault of the enemie, and ſtrucke downe dead into the ditches many of them that were climing vp the ladders: & had in ſhort time ſlain mo than they were themſelues in number, & inforced the reſt to giue ouer the L aſſault. Theſe things were done in the beginning of the ſiege, whileſt yet both parties were ſtrong: in which hard conflicts a great number of ſouldiers were loſt, & moſt of the canoniers ſlain. After this aſſault, both parties for a while buſied themſelues & ſpent the time in their ingenious deuiſes: wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much cunninger in deuiſing of means to take cities, than were thoſe Chriſtians in defending the ſame.

Nicoſia battred and aſſaulted, & by the Chriſtians valiantly defended.

Now had the Venetians in the firſt motions of theſe warres, prayed aid of diuers Chriſtian Princes, from moſt part of whom they receiued but cold comfort, as is before declared: yet now at length (though ſomewhat late) they had drawn into the confederation of this war, the Pope & the king of Spain: by whoſe example ſome other princes of Italie moued, put to allo their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter moſt concerned, had in good M time put their fleet to ſea, but knowing themſelues too weake to incounter the Turks, they lay ſtil vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, about Iadera, expecting the comming of the Spaniſh Admirall with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now paſt in this expedition, and yet no newes of his comming: ſo that what the ſpeed and induſtrie of the

A Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniard, marred. Beſides that, the plague began to ariſe in the fleet, lying ſo long in one place; which at length grew ſo hot, that many of the gallies had neither mariner nor ſouldier left in them: neither did this mortality ſo ſeaſe, vntill there were twentie thouſand dead thereof; amongſt whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might haue done their country good ſeruice, had they been in time imployed.

Sommer now almoſt halfe ſpent, and the plague well ceaſed, the Venetian Admirall weary of expecting of the comming of Auria the Spaniſh Admirall; gathering together his fleete which he had before diſperſed to auoid the infection, ſailed to Corcyra, where he met with Venerius, another of the Venetian commanders, who there ſtaid for him, hauing but a little be- B fore taken from the Turks Ceſtria, now called Suppoto, a town vpon the ſea coaſt ouer againſt Corcyra. The whole fleet of the Venetians beeing aſſembled together, was an hundred and ſeuenteene ſaile, amongſt which were 12 great galeaſſes; but all too weake to giue battell to the Turks, as being themſelues ſtronger in ſhipping than in men. Neuertheleſſe, the Admirall ſorie and wearie to ſee the ſpoile of the Venetian territorie, & moued with the diſtreſſe of the beſieged in Nicoſia, rather than for any hope he had with that ſtrength to do any good againſt the Turkes fleet, departed from Corcyra towards Crete, and the twelfth of Auguſt landed at Suda, a port of that Iſland. In the latter end of this month, Columnius the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of Spaine, arriued there alſo, whom the Venetian Admirall welcomed with great ioy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat Princes now at length C met together, conſiſted of an hundred ninetie two gallies, and twelue galeaſſes, beſide victualers and other ſmall veſſels, laded with munition and other neceſſarie prouiſion for the fleet. Of theſe gallies the Pope had ſet forth twelue, the king of Spaine fortie two, the reſt with the galeaſſes were the Venetians. In this fleet were imbarked thirteen thouſand ſix hundred threeſcore ſouldiers: of whom the Pope ſent eleuen hundred, the king of Spaine three thouſand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty. Theſe three great commanders entring into counſell, what courſe to take in their proceedings in this war, after long diſcourſe too and fro, at length by the perſuaſion of Zanius the Venetian Admiral, reſolued to go directly for Cyprus, and to giue the Turks battell, in hope thereby to raiſe them from the ſiege of Nicoſia. About the middeſt of September, this great fleet furniſhed with all things D needfull for ſuch an expedition, looſed from Crete, and with a faire gale of winde ſet forward for Cyprus; in all their courſe keeping ſuch order, as if they ſhould preſently haue met with the enemie. In the middeſt of theſe troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, leauing the reſt of the care of that warre to Aloyſius Mocenicus, who ſucceeded him in the Dukedome.

The Chriſtian fleet ſetteth forward toward Cyprus.

Whilſt the Chriſtans thus ſlowly proceed in their ſo weightie affaires, Muſtapha in the mean time laid hard ſiege to Nicoſia: and diuiding his armie into foure parts, aſſaulted foure of the bulwarkes of the citie, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the ſiege. The aſſault was both long and terrible: furie, and the very ſight of the warlike Generall, who was there a preſent witneſſe, and beholder of euery mans forwardneſſe or cowardiſe (a E matter of great moment) beſides their natural fierceneſſe, carried the Turks headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other ſide, the greatneſſe of the danger, the feare to loſe both life and libertie, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: ſo that the Turks could not approch the wals, or mount the ſcaling ladders, but they were preſently ſlain, or together with the ladders thrown to the ground. Many of the Turks were there ſlain, but eſpecially ſuch as were moſt forward: and of the defendants were alſo more loſt than ſtood with the ſafetie of ſo ſmall a number: and foraſmuch as few or none eſcaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a ſmall number. Many ſkilful men were of opinion, that the citie might haue bin that day taken, if the aſſault had by the Baſſa bin longer maintained, by bringing ſtill on freſh men: but ſuch was his loſſe, as that he was glad for F that time to giue ouer the aſſault, and ſo with diſhonour to retire.

After this aſſault, it was by ſome of the captaines thought good, that they ſhould (whileſt they were yet of ſome reaſonable ſtrength in the city) ſally forth vpon the enemie: ſo to make ſhew, that they had yet ſome good hope in themſelues, and withal by ſo ſudden an eruption to performe ſomething vpon the ſecure enemie. Of which motion, Dandulus the Gouernor in no caſe liked, as loath by ſuch a dangerous piece of ſeruice to diminiſh the number of the defendants, and ſo to giue the enemie an eaſier means to take the citie. Yet ſeeing all the captaines generally of another mind, he yeelded vnto their deſire. So in the hoteſt time of the day, when as the Turks leaſt thought that the Chriſtians would haue ſallied out, certaine Italian companies vnder the conduct of Caſar Plouianus of Vincentia, and Albertus Scotus, iſſued out by the gate that leadeth to Famaguſta, and vpon the ſudden brake into the enemies trenches: where they found the Turks ſome playing, ſom ſleeping, but fearing nothing leſſe than that the Chriſtians, whom they dayly braued, durſt to haue aduentured to come forth. At the firſt entrance the Italians preuailed, and brought a great feare vpon that quarter of the Turks army, and ſlew many. But when the Turks, awaked with the alarme, came running in on euery ſide, the Italians oppreſſed with the multitude, were glad to retire: in which retreat diuers of them were ſlain, and amongſt them their two leaders Caſar and Albertus: ſo that this ſally ſerued to no other purpoſe than to weaken the defendants themſelues, & to cauſe the Turks to keep better watch and ward againſt ſuch ſudden eruptions.

All hope of long defending the citie now almoſt loſt, and that the defendants could hardly ſtand vpon the wals, or ſhew their heads without preſent danger; they for want of better counſell, rather than for any hope of good ſucceſſe, ſent out certain ſcouts, men ſkilful of the waies and paſſages of the country (whom they had for great reward induced to vndertake the matter) to craue aid of the country people, that were in great multitude fled into the ſafety of the mountains: and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their reliefe, their wiues & children, whom they had before ſent into the citie, muſt needs in ſhort time fall into the enemies hand, or periſh with hunger: but theſe meſſengers were by the vigilant enemy intercepted, & in the ſight of the beſieged tortured to death.

Letters ſhot into the citie.

Muſtapha Baſſa in vain perſuadeth them of Nicoſia to yeeld

About the ſame time diuers letters were ſhot with arrows into the city, to perſuade the beſieged Chriſtians to yeeld themſelues; for that in ſo doing they ſhould find the Baſſa a mild and mercifull conqueror: wheras otherwiſe if they ſhould by wilfull holding out delay his victory, they were ſure to indure whatſoeuer could be indured or ſuffered. But when Muſtapha had thus in vaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called forth to parley certaine ſouldiers that were ſtanding vpon the bulwarke called Conſtantius, of whom ſome were by the conſent of the Gouernor ſent forth vnto him: vnto whom Muſtapha by his interpretor complained, That no anſwer was giuen vnto his letters; he ſet forth vnto them the glory, power, and greatneſſe of the Turkiſh empire; and debaſed the ſtrength of the Venetians: then he perſuaded them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miſeries that would fall vpon them if the city ſhould by force be taken; which he threatned would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to vndertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none ſo much as themſelues, whether the city were giuen vp by compoſition, or els woon by ſtrong hand: he ſhewed vnto them the profit that ſhould ariſe vnto them by yeelding of it vp, & offered to them large entertainment, if they would ſerue him: and to conclude, told them, that they ſhould neuer afterwards find at his hands ſo great grace as was at that inſtant offered them. The crafty Baſſa did what he might to haſten the winning of the city, both for that hee doubted the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, & that his great armie was exceedingly troubled with contagious & grieuous diſeaſes, ariſing of the immoderat heat and drought in that ſo hot a country. But the ſouldiers thinking any thing more aſſured than the Turkiſh faith; anſwered him, That they did not as yet doubt their own ſtrength, & that they were ready to indure any thing that could happen, rather than to prefer the vncertain friendſhip of an vnknowne prince, before the gracious fauour of ſuch worthie princes as they had ſo good experience of.

Muſtapha encourageth his ſouldiers.

This anſwer cut off all the Baſſaes hope for taking of the citie by compoſition: wherewith being both grieued & enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the aſſault: and the more to encourage his ſoldiers, promiſed vnto them great rewards & honors that ſhould firſt or ſecond mount the wals. After that, he gaue a general aſſault vnto the city with al his power: wherein both he as a moſt worthie captaine, and his ſouldiers, fought moſt fiercely. You haue to do (ſaid he) with the ſmall and laſt remainders of your enemies; which are ſcarce able to ſtand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than with enemies indeed: ſhall you not then eaſily ouercome them, being both few & feeble, that haue vanquiſhed them when they were many & luſty? The end of al your labors is at hand, your hoped rewards approch; onely

A play you the men,and faint not in this aſſault;the ſpoile of this rich city ſhal be the worthy reward of your labours;the fruit of all your trauell conſiſteth in this one moment. Whileſt he thus incourageth ſome, and reproueth others, they mindfull of his promiſes, and theſe of the diſgrace,altogether with their thick ſhot ſuffer no man to ſtand in ſafety vpon the wals,& out of their forts alſo with their great ordnance greatly annoied the defendants.This done, they attempted by the ruines of the wall, and in other places by ſcaling ladders to haue entred the citie.Which terrible aſſault was by the cruel enemy maintained,not for ſome few houres,but for diuers daies together without any intermiſſion,freſh men ſtil comming on in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlain.Yet did the defendants valiantly indure all that ſtorm,and in ſuch weake caſe as they were,worthily performed what was poſſible for ſo few to doe: yet ſtill in B hope (the poore comfort of men in miſery) that reliefe might come by the approch of the Chriſtian fleet. At length,when the matter was brought to this point,that the Turks were in great hope to haue gained the wals,& Muſtapha himſelfe probably gueſſed,That the Chriſtians were now weary of the long aſſault, and ſore weakned with wounds & other infinit miſeries, not to ſeeke in a city ſo hardly diſtreſſed, and was in that his opinion alſo confirmed by certain fugitiue Chriſtians:he neuertheleſſe vpon the ſudden cauſed a retreat to be ſounded,& ſo retiring into his trenches,lay ſtil all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had giuen ouer the aſſault,becauſe of ſome aid that was comming to their reliefe, became more careleſſe of the enemy, & vpon the vain hope of ſuch aid,with leſſe diligence C repaired their breaches and prouided for the repulſing of their enemies. But the Baſſa in the mean time had choſen out of his whole army about 200 of his beſt captains & ſoldiers, all men of approued valour and agility of body, whom the next day after,he ſent early in the morning,to make proofe if they could with ſcaling ladders ſecretly and without any noiſe ſet vp,get into the foure bulwarkes which hee had before ſore ſhaken with his great ordnance.
Theſe reſolute men leading the way, got firſt vp,after whom followed diuers others,and ſo tooke the aforeſaid bulwarks: when preſently after,other companies of their fellowes which ſtood ready for the purpoſe,comming on forward,did with their ſcaling ladders in diuers places recouer the top of the wals: for now the matter was not done by ſecret ſurpriſe, but by open force. In euery one of theſe bulwarkes were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there D kept watch and ward;theſe men part aſleep, as fearing no ſuch danger,and part lying laſily vpon the ground,were there ſurpriſed on the ſudden and ſlain: other ſome of them awaked with the ſtrange and vncouth noiſe,betooke not themſelues luſtily to their weapons, but forſaking their ſtations leapt down out of the bulwarks at ſuch places as were next vnto them, ſome for feare ran vnawares into the middeſt of their enemies.Vpon this alarme ſome of the Chriſtian captains came ſpeedily to the walls with their companies,as did Eugenius, who whileſt hee in vain crieth out to ſuch fearefull ſouldiers as he met, that they ſhould not ſo cowardly flie, and ſtaieth others that were flying,was himſelfe ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Other captains in other places likewiſe labored in vain to haue ſtaid the flying ſouldiers, whoſe perſuaſions, requeſts,and authoritie in ſo generall a feare, nothing at that time preuailed.

Nicoſia moſt terribly aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turks gain the bulwarkes and walls of Nicoſia.

E The defendants thus beaten from the wals & bulwarks,gathered themſelues into the market place: but the citiſens ſtealing home to their owne houſes, there ſtood in the entrances of the ſame,fearefully expecting the deſtruction of the country,together were their owne.In the meane time the Gouernor of Aleppo with his regiment ſcoured the wals of the city round about, as he had in charge from the Generall: and without reſpect put to ſword all that he met, armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called Barbarus,it fortuned him to light vpon a companie of Italians,who for a while fought deſperatly,but were in the end ouerthrowne and ſlain.
When he had thus cleared the wals,& left ſuch companies as he thought good in places conuenient for the keeping of them,he came downe into the more open places of the city:& ſeeing them that were gathered together into the market place to haue caſt themſelues into a ring F and to fight as men altogether deſperat,he cauſed certain murthering pieces to be bent vpon them: which they perceiuing,layed downe their weapons,and yeelded themſelues vnto the mercy of the enemy. By and by all the gates of the city were ſtrongly guarded by the enemy, to the intent that no man ſhould go in or out. Dandulus the Gouernor,& Contarenus the Biſhop of Paphos,with the reſt of the nobilitie, & better ſort of the citiſens,had got themſelues into the towne hall,and there ſtood vpon their guard: vnto whom Muſtapha ſent word, that hee would take them all to mercie,if they would without further reſiſtance yeeld themſelues. But G whiles meſſengers run too and fro, the Turkes violently brake in vpon them, and there ſlew them euery man. After the death of theſe noblemen, the cruell enemy ſpared none: and hauing ſlain ſuch as they found abroad in the ſtreets,brake into the houſes,where they made hauocke of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the armes of their mothers, virgins were ſhamefully rauiſhed,and honeſt matrons before their husbands faces deſpightfully abuſed,churches were ſpoiled,and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies:the ſtreets were in all places ſtained with bloud,for in the city was ſlain that day fourteen thouſand eight hundred threeſcore & ſix perſons. Neither was there any end of the ſpoile, vntill the greedie enemy had carried away all the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken,amounted to twentie hundred thouſand millions of duckats: 200 of the moſt goodly and beautifull youths were choſen out of purpoſe to be ſent to Conſtantinople for a H preſent for Selymus. In the city were taken alſo 250 pieces of great ordnance: whereof ſome were by the enemie carried away, and the reſt left for defence of the citie. Thus the famous citie of Nicoſia, ſometime the regall ſeat of the kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks,the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570,in whoſe power it ſtill remaineth.

Cyrene yeelded vnto the Turks.

Muſtapha hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of all things in Nicoſia, with the very terrour of his name,rather than by any force,brought moſt part of the reſt of the townes in the Iſland vnder his obeiſance;and by faire intreaty and promiſe of good vſage,brought backe again vnto their wonted dwellings the rude country people,who vp the comming of the Turks were fled with all that they had into the mountaines:them as men not to be feared,he commanded to till and ſow their land as they were woont. The city of Cyrene is ſtrongly ſcituated,not far I from the ſea,and was then well furniſhed of all things needfull for the induring of a long ſiege.
Hither the Baſſa ſent one of the Sanzackes to ſummon the citie,more to proue the courage of the defendants,than for any hope he had to haue the citie deliuered vnto him. But Alphonſus Palacius then Gouernor of the city, terrified with the loſſe of Nicoſia,no ſooner ſaw the enemie, but that without any further deliberation or force vſed againſt him, he deliuered vp the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardiſe, That he might in ſafetie depart from thence with all his garriſon ſouldiers: which was eaſily granted, and the citie ſurrendred.

Famaguſta beſieged.

Muſtapha raiſeth his ſiege.

Not long after, Muſtapha leauing a thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot in garriſon K in Nicoſia,marched with the reſt of his armie to beſiege Famaguſta. And the more to terrifie them of the citie,he by a poore countrey fellow,whom he had for that purpoſe ſet at libertie, ſent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Gouernour of Nicoſia, and at the ſame time ſent before him diuers horſemen, who vpon their horſemens ſtaues carried the heads of many of the noblemen ſlaine at Nicoſia, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the citie. Which thing he did,in hope that they of Famaguſta terrified with ſuch a ſpectacle, and the late ouerthrow of Nicoſia,would for feare of like miſery yeeld themſelues. But deceiued in this his expectation,he encamped his armie about three miles from the citie. Afterwards hauing taken view of the citie, and well conſidered of the ſcituation thereof, he with wonderful celeritie caſt vp diuers mounts againſt the ſame,and at the ſame time cauſed batterie L to be laid againſt the great tower which defended the hauen:he himſelfe alſo in the meane while battering the gate that leadeth to Amathus. But perceiuing by the deſperat ſallies of the defendants,their great courage,and that it was like to haue much more to do in this ſiege than he had in the winning of Nicoſia,and Winter alſo now drawing faſt on (being about the latter end of September)he thought it beſt betime to prouide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with ſo much labor and danger before gained: and the rather, for that it was commonly reported,that the Chriſtian fleet was at hand: wherefore he riſe with his armie, and retired himſelfe further off into the countrey, where he ſhortly after bilited his ſouldiers in the villages round about for that Winter.

The Turks at ſea aduertiſed of the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, prepare themſelues for battell.

The Baſſaes at ſea, Haly & Pial, lying before Famaguſta,doubting the comming of the Chriſtian M fleet, which then lay at Creete,ſent out ſix galliots to diſcouer the doings of the Chriſtians: who returning with certaine priſoners taken in the Iſland of Creete, declared vnto the Baſſaes what they had learned concerning the Chriſtian fleet,and that it was already vpon the way to Cyprus. Vpon which intelligence the Baſſaes put their fleet in order of battell, and ſet

forwards towards Limiſſo to haue met with the Chriſtians: who with a proſperous winde were comming betwixt the Iſlands of Caprathos and the Rhodes: but there vnderſtanding by their eſpials, that Nicoſia was loſt, and that the Turks were come to beſiege Famaguſta, they called a Councell of all the chiefe commanders in the fleet, to conſult what were beſt to do in ſo dangerous a caſe. Columnius the Popes Admirall, and then chiefe commander in the fleet, with Zanius the Venetian Admirall, were of opinion, That it were beſt to hold on their courſe for Cyprus, and to relieue Famaguſta: for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late victorie, were for deſire of prey, for moſt part gon aſhore into the Iſland, and ſo left their fleet but ſlenderly manned. Beſide that, they alledged, That the Venetian Senat had expreſly decreed, That they ſhould giue the Turks battell. But Auria the Spaniſh Admirall thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficultie and danger, was quite of another mind, ſaying, That he could not but maruell, how the Venetian Senators ſitting at their eaſe in counſell, could before they knew their own ſtrength, and power of the enemie, the nature of the countrie, and purpoſe of their foes, determin what were fit for martial men to do; vnto whoſe actions no certaine rule could be preſcribed. All the ſhores (he ſaid) were kept with the enemies garriſons; ſo that what need ſoeuer they ſhould haue, they could neither come by water or wood, or put into any harbor. Beſides that, the enemie would giue them battell at his owne pleaſure, & not at theirs: for that they were not of ſo much power, as to inforce him to fight: And that if the Senate, which vſed to do all things warily, and with great aduiſement, did but ſee the weakeneſſe of their gallies, wanting both ſoldiers and mariners, they would be of another mind. He alledged further, That they were to wage war in the enemies countrey, where there was no port to receiue their fleet, no peaceable place, no confederate Citie, nor King to friend: whereas the time of the yeare grew euery day worſe and worſe, when as they had neither harbor to put into, neither were able to abide the ſea. And now that Nicoſia was loſt, for the reliefe whereof they were come ſo far, there was no reaſon longer for them to ſtay, the enemie ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſing the Iſland with his great armie, as that there was not any hope to do any good againſt him. And that to keepe him from victuall, and ſo to diſtreſſe him, was not poſſible, lying in a moſt fertile Iſland, and in the midſt of his owne dominions: whereas they, who were to be ſtill relieued from far, ſhould ſooner feele the want than the enemie. He was victualled (as he ſaid) when he came from home, but for three moneths, in hope to haue made a ſhort diſpatch, and had now two thouſand miles home. He ſaid moreouer, that he had expreſſe commandement from the King, to returne to Meſſana before Winter, and that therefore ſo ſoone as the moneth was out he would depart. The Venetian Admirall deſiring nothing more, than by battell at ſea to ouerthrow the Turkes, and ſo to relieue the diſtreſſed Cypriots, vrged the Spaniſh Admirall to proceed in the voyage; ſaying, That ſo great aid was not ſent from the Pope and the King, onely for the reliefe of Nicoſia, but to deliuer the whole Iſland from the danger of the Turke. Of the ſame opinion with the Spaniſh Admirall were diuers other great captaines in the fleet; namely Sfortia: who ſaid, That nothing was to be ſo done, as might raſhly expoſe vnto caſualtie or power of the enemie, the publique fortune and majeſtie of the Chriſtian commonweale, which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer ſtay might bring further danger: that in that fleet conſiſted the whole welfare of the commonweale, wherin more might be loſt, if any miſhap ſhould chance thereunto, than was good to be gained by the relieuing of Famaguſta. The great commanders thus differing in opinions, the Councel was in a heat diſſolued, and nothing concluded. Vpon which ſo foule a diſagreement the fleet began now to returne backe againe, but ſo, that it was not now as before, one, but three Fleets, euery admiral by himſelf drawing after him his fleet. Auria the Spaniſh Admiral, who firſt returned, after he had been two days wonderfully with tempeſt toſſed at ſea, came at laſt to Carpathos, and departing thence, with much ado arriued with his fleet in the Iſland of Crete: from whence he by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe, requeſted leaue of Columnius the Popes Admirall, that he might with his good will preſently returne home. Whereunto Columnius anſwered, That he would giue him no ſuch leaue: but rather charged him, in the dutie he owght to the good of the Chriſtian commonweale, not to depart; but to keepe companie with the reſt of the fleet vntill it were paſt Zacynthus, that ſo with their vnited forces they might more ſafely paſſe by the enemies countries: whereas otherwiſe, if any thing ſhould by his haſtie departure fall out otherwiſe than well, it ſhould be imputed to the diſhonour of him that had for-ſaken his friends,and not of them that were ſo by him forſaken. But vnto this Auria anſwered, That the welfare of the kingdoms of Sicilie and Naples conſiſted in the ſafety of this fleet: G and that therefore hauing haſt home, he could not ſtay to keepe companie with their heauie galleaſſes and other ſhips of burthen,which muſt oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure; yet ſecretly ſought (as it was deemed) to finde an occaſion whereby to withdraw himſelfe (being as he accounted the better man at ſea) from the command of Columnius,whereunto he was full ſore againſt his will ſubiect.

After they had thus a while ſpent the time with reaſoning the matter to & fro, Auria of himſelfe without further leaue hoiſed ſaile,& ſo at length came to Meſſana in Sicily: neither did Columnius & Zanius ſtay in thoſe quarters long after him, but hauing endured much trouble at ſea,arriued at laſt, Columnius in Italie, and Zanius at Corcyra. Thus this mightie fleet, which H had all this Sommer filled the Mediterranian with all the countries thereabout, with the expectation of ſome great matter, was by the diſcord of the Generals diſſolued, hauing done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thouſands of right valiant men loſt their liues, being dead of diuers diſeaſes proceeding of change of diet,and vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather in that hot climat; amongſt whom was the valiant Countie Hieronimus Martinengus, ſent by the Senat with three thouſand ſouldiers for the defence of Famaguſta; who alſo moſt of them periſhed in that voyage. The Venetian fleet was no ſooner arriued at Corcyra,but Auguſtinus Barbadicus was ſent from the Senat to diſcharge Zanius the Admirall of his office, and to ſend him priſoner to Venice: in whoſe roome was placed Sebaſtianus Venerius Gouernor of that Iſland. I

Zanius the Venetian admiral diſcharged of his office, and ſent in bonds to Venice.

The Turks Baſſa's at ſea certainly aduertiſed of the departure of the Chriſtian fleet, were not a little proud thereof; as by the confeſſion of their enemies,their betters. Yet foraſmuch as the ſeas began then to grow rough,and no enemie appeared,they thought it to no purpoſe to keepe the ſeas with ſo great a fleet,and therefore reſolued to leaue Muſtapha with his army in Cyprus,the next yeare to make an end of his conqueſt ſo happily begun; and ſeuen gallies at ſea before Famaguſta,that no reliefe ſhould that way be brought into the citie,and ſo to depart themſelues with the reſt of the fleet to Winter in more ſafer harbours: Piall with the greater part of the fleet to Conſtantinople,and Haly with the reſt to the Rhodes. And becauſe they would for their greater credit prepare ſome worthie preſent for their great Lord & Maſter Selymus, they fraughted a great gallion of Muhametes the chiefe Baſſa's, and two other tall K ſhips,with the richeſt of the ſpoile of Nicoſia,and the choice of the priſoners there taken. But when they were now readie to hoiſe ſaile and depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion, certaine barrels of gunpouder which Muſtapha the Generall had commanded for his better prouiſion to be landed, a noble gentlewoman captiue in the gallion, wiſhing rather to die with honor,than to liue diſhonored,ſecretly fired the pouder; by force whereof the ſaid gallion with the other two ſhips, were ſuddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therein blown vp into the aire. Of all that were in thoſe three veſſels, none eſcaped with life but the maſter of the gallion,and two Chriſtian captiues, but there periſhed together with the rich ſpoile. But the Baſſa's following their former reſolution, departed from Cyprus,and afterwards in ſafetie arriued at Conſtantinople: where both then and all the Winter following, ſuch preparation L was in making,as if Selymus had the next yeare purpoſed ſome far greater matter than the conqueſt of Cyprus.

A deſperate fact of a woman.

Whileſt Sebaſtianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at Corcyta,the rude Acroceraunian people,more famous for nothing than for their theft and want of all things; by truſtie meſſengers promiſed to deliuer into his power the ſtrong caſtle of Chymera,kept by a garriſon of 300 Turks,if he himſelfe with a few gallies and a conuenient number of footmen, would come into the bay of Ambracia: offering him good hoſtages for the better aſſurance of their promiſe. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a companie of horſemen, three thouſand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no ſooner landed,but that preſently a thouſand of thoſe rough mountaine people came vnto M them: with which power taking the hill, and repulſing the Turkes garriſon comming to the reliefe of the caſtle, he ſo diſcouraged them that were in the Hold, that the next night they let themſelues downe with ropes into the valley below; but being deſcried,were there all either taken or ſlaine. And ſo in a verie ſhort time was that ſtrong caſtle taken by the Admirall, The ſtrong caſtle of Chymera taken by Venerius.

and

A and a ſtrong garriſon of Chriſtians put into it in ſteed of the Turks.

Quirinus taketh a caſtle of the Turkes in Peloponeſus.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmiral a man of great courage, landed with 24 gallies in Peloponeſus neere the bay of Maine, and there vpon the ſudden both by ſea and land beſieged a ſtrong caſtle, which the Turks but two yeres before had build to trouble the Chriſtians paſſing that way. Which caſtle he tooke in fiue houres, and put to the ſword fiue hundred Turks which lay there in garriſon; and razing it downe to the ground, carried away with him foure and twentie great pieces of Artillerie into the Iſland of Zacynthus.

At ſuch time as Muſtapha before lay at the ſiege of Famaguſta, Bragadinus gouernour of the towne, and Baleanius a moſt expert captaine, from out of the high places of the citie beholding B the great armie of the Turks (which couered the ground almoſt as far as they could ſee, with the cunning manner of their fortification, were therwith much moued: and therefore thought it good betime to giue the Senat knowledge thereof, and in ſo great a danger to craue their aid. And that their requeſt might be of more weight, and haue the better hearing, they intreated Hieronimus Ragazonius Biſhop of the citie, a reuerend and deuout man, to take vpon him that charge; vnto whom they ioyned Nicholas Donatus a noble gentleman of Cyprus. The Biſhop at the firſt was very vnwilling to go, as loth in ſo great danger to leaue his flocke: but at length ouercome with the intreatie of the gouernour, and teares of the beſieged, ſuffered himſelfe to be intreated: and embarked in a gally about the going downe of the Sun, looſing out of the hauen, and hoiſing ſaile, with a faire gale of wind paſſed through the Turks fleet, which C then lay at anchor before the city; and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of ſight. After foure dayes ſailing he came to Crete, & ſo at laſt to Venice: where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, ſo there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous eſtate of the citie, the ſtrength of the enemie, the weakenes of the defendants againſt ſo great a multitude, and the want of many things needfull for the holding out of the ſiege: and to be briefe, that except they ſent ſpeedie reliefe, the citie could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the beſieged, cauſed foure tall ſhips to be laded with all manner of victual and a great quantity of gunpouder, and put into them 1700 ſelect ſoldiers, all which he ſent from Crete to the reliefe of them of Famaguſta; appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the beſt gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the ſame thither. This Quirinus was a D moſt valiant and expert captaine, meanely diſcended, but by ſeruice growne to be a man both of great reputation and wealth: and therefore Zanius at his departure to Venice, although hee knew the matter required haſte, yet preſuming vpon his wiſedome and carefulneſſe, left it to his diſcretion, when and how to performe that piece of ſeruice. Quirinus (not without cauſe) doubting to ſet forward, the ſeas as then full of the Turks gallies, ſtaied vntill Winter was wel ſpent, and then ſetting forward the ſeuenteenth of Ianuarie, kept aloofe from the ſhips, which with a proſperous wind came directly before Famaguſta, in hope that the Turks gallies which lay in the mouth of the hauen, might ſo be drawne farther into the ſea, in hope of ſome good bootie, he himſelfe ſtaying with his gallies in place conuenient out of ſight. Neither had the euent deceiued his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the ſame: for the Turks vp-E on the dawning of the day deſcrying the ſhips, made haſtily toward them: but Quirinus not able longer to ſtay himſelfe, and before deſirous to fight with them, ſhewed himſelfe too ſoon in the open ſea, before the enemie was come neere the ſhips: whom as ſoone as the Turkes had ſeene, and that there was no hope to withſtand him, they ſtaied their oares, and with all ſpeed retired. But Quirinus following faſter vpon them, they were glad for ſafegard of their liues, with all the power they could to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to ſhoare themſelues: which three gallies, Quirinus did with his great ordnance beat all to pieces, and ſore gauled the other foure. The hauen thus cleered, he returned againe vnto the ſhippes, and brought them with the ſupplie in ſafetie to Famaguſta: vpon whoſe arriuall was great reioycing both amongſt the garriſon ſoldiers and the citiſens: for the Turks thought nothing leſſe, than that the Chriſtian gallies durſt at that time of the yere haue put into thoſe dangerous ſeas: which Quirinus well knowing, came forth againe with his gallies, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure, tooke two of the enemies ſhips richly laded comming to the camp, with which booty he inriched his ſoldiers: & further incited by occaſion, landed his men in diuers places alongſt the ſea coaſt in Pamphilia, and there did great harme. So hauing filled the Countrey with the terrour and fame of his name, he returned againe to Famaguſta, where he notably encouencouraged the garriſon ſoldiers, perſuading them to remember their wonted valor: and filling them with hope that the Chriſtian fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next G Sommer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raiſe the ſiege. So hauing in twenty days diſpatched that he came for, and done what good ſeruice els he could, he departed from Famaguſta, and within fiue daies after arriued at Crete.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late ſupplie put into Famaguſta, and of the harmes done by Quirinus; wherewith he was ſo highly diſpleaſed, that he commanded the gouernor of Chios his head to be ſtrucke off, and the gouernour of the Rhodes to be diſgraced, whoſe charge it was to haue kept thoſe ſeas, ſo that nothing ſhould haue been conueied into Famaguſta. Neither ſpared he Piali Baſſa, but depriued him of his Admiraltie, and placed Partau Baſſa Admirall in his ſteed, for that he had not the yeare before diſcomfited the H Chriſtian fleet at the Iſland of Crete, as it was ſuppoſed he might haue done.

From the beginning of this war, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly fauored their cauſe, had moſt earneſtly from time to time ſolicited Philip king of Spaine, to enter with them into the participation and fellowſhip of this war; which their requeſt ſtanding indeed with the good of his State, he ſeemed eaſily to yeeld vnto: and therefore ſent Auria, his Admirall the laſt yeare, with his fleet to aid them, but with ſuch ſucceſſe as is before declared. As for to ioine with them in perpetuall league and confederation (as it was termed) againſt the common enemy, that he referred vnto the diſcreet conſideration of the two Cardinals, Granuellan and Pace, and Io. Zunica his Embaſſador, ſent for that purpoſe to Rome: promiſing to performe whatſoeuer they ſhould on his behalfe agree vpon or conſent vnto. At the ſame time, I and for the ſame purpoſe lay alſo Surianus the Venetian Embaſſadour at Rome: vnto whome the Pope ioined Cardinal Morone, Aldobrandinus, and Ruſticucius, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderat and compoſe ſuch differences & difficulties as ſhould ariſe betwixt the aforeſaid Commiſſioners for the King and the Venetians, concerning the intended league. But theſe graue men, ſent from ſo great Princes about ſo great a matter (as well there could not be a greater) were no ſooner met together and ſet in conſultation, but that forthwith they began to iar about the capitulations of the league. Neceſſarie it was thought that a league ſhould be agreed vpon againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an enemie, but to find the way how the ſame might be concluded to the contentment of all parts, ſeemed a matter almoſt impoſſible. Oftentimes theſe commiſſioners ſat, but the oftner the farther off: K if one difficultie were by the diſcretion of ſome appeaſed, in ſtead therof at the next meeting ariſe three others. The chiefe command of the army to be raiſed, the proportion of the forces, the manner of the war, with many other like circumſtances incident to ſo great actions, made great differences among them: but moſt of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spaniſh commiſſioners ſeeking to turne the greateſt part thereof vpon the Venetians, & the Venetians vpon them: which was done with ſuch earneſtneſſe & ſtudy of euery man towards his own part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular ſtate from which they were ſent, rather than for the common good: For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keepe the frontiers of his large dominions in Italie, Sicilie, Sardinia, Corſica, Majorca, Minorca, yea and of Spaine it ſelfe, with ſtrong garriſons for feare of the Turke; now that the war L was riſen betwixt the Venetians & him, & the danger therof tranſlated far off into other mens territories; enioied now in his own an vnwonted quietnes, to the great content of his ſubiects, and eaſing of his owne charge in maintaining of ſo many garriſons as before; whereof many were now thought needleſſe. Beſides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raiſed ſuch great ſummes of money vpon his Clergie, as was thought by many, ſufficient to diſcharge the charge of the war: For which cauſes he cared not for entring in any further league with the Venetians, but as it were in courteſie to ſend them a yearely aid, to maintaine a defenſiue lingering warre, and ſo to keepe the Turkes buſied vpon the Venetian, a farre off from his owne Territories. But the Venetians, in whoſe Dominions the fierce Enemie dayly raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were euen for the ſame reaſons mooued to haſten and ſhorten the war, M that the Spaniard was to protract it: for beſide the neerneſſe of the danger, and the infinite calamities by them ſuſtained, their yerely reuenues ariſing for moſt part of their cuſtomes, were greatly impaired, and their traffike (the maintenance of their ſtate) almoſt quite cut off; which cauſed them more earneſtly to confederate themſelues with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A to ioine in one, States ſo far differing in reſpect of their particular profit, and almoſt by nature contrarie. Thus was all the laſt yeare, and a great part of this alſo, ſpent by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners in turbulent and fruitleſſe conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the league: which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themſelues too weake for ſo mightie an enemie as was Selymus, and yet no other certaine ſtrength from their friends to reſt vpon. But whileſt they ſtood thus doubtfull of the league with Spaine, and quite out of hope of any attonement with Selymus; vpon the ſudden when they leaſt expected, it was by good fortune laied as it were in their laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before moſt earneſtly deſired) ioine in league with the Pope and the King of Spaine, or els fall to agreement with Selymus: and that by this meanes.

Muhamet Baſſa a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, puts them in hope of peace.

B Muhamet the chiefe Baſſa, a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honored, had no great liking of the proſperous ſucceſſe of Muſtapha in Cyprus, & therefore deuiſed night and day, how to croſſe the riſing of him, the competitor of his honor; and withall to helpe the Venetians, vnto whom he was much beholden. He by ſecret meſſengers had before oftentimes ſounded the mind of the Venetian Embaſſadour, and put him in hope, that if ſuit were made vnto Selymus for peace, it would vndoubtedly be granted; and further promiſed, to be himſelfe a helper and interceſſor for the ſame. But finding the Embaſſadour to caſt many perils, and to giue ſmall credit vnto their talke, who had before by truſting them deceiued him: he did not ſo giue ouer the matter, but referring the further tempering with him vnto a more fitter time, for the preſent he tooke opportunitie to enter into diſcourſe with C Selymus himſelfe concerning the Venetians; and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long altercation they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, & now deſtitute of all hope & aid, would now haply of their owne accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiuing him not vnwillingly to heare ſo of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleaſure what he would haue done therein; cunningly by the way of good counſel perſuading him vnto that which he moſt wiſhed himſelf to be done. Immediatly after, he ſecretly aduertiſed M. Antonius the Venetian Embaſſador, That there was great hope of peace, & that therefore the Senat ſhould vnder the colour of exchanging of priſoners, and redeeming of merchants goods, ſend ſome fit man to Conſtantinople, with whome he would in ſecret confer of al ſuch matters as might farther the pacification. This vnexpected D newes from the Embaſſador brought to Venice, was wel heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concerne their State, to haue a way opened whereby vpon tolerable conditions to make peace with the mightie tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the king of Spaine could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Iacobus Ragazonius to goe about the matter to Conſtantinople. This Ragazonius was a man of great ſpirit and dexterity of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deepe iudgement in the managing therof; and withall exceeding rich, and of ſo good carriage of himſelfe, as that he was therefore famous: all which things were thought of great moment to win the fauor of that couetous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proof what men thought of the E matter, yet doubted they not, but that vpon the report of the ſending of this notable man, men would thereof diuerſly diuine, euery man according to his owne fantaſie; and that many of the wiſer ſort would indeed ſurmiſe, as the truth was, that he was ſent for to intreat of peace, although the exchange of priſoners, and redemption of merchants goods, were the only things were openly pretended: & the Senat, although they thought it not amiſſe to haue it ſo vnderſtood, becauſe ſuch a ſuſpition was like enough to ſtirre vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of ſuch conditions of the deſired league, as they had before reiected; yet leſt the hope of the league (which they for many cauſes thought good to cheriſh) therby cut off, might cauſe the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Chriſtian Princes, of the ſending of Ragazonius; yet of purpoſe concealing the ſecret drift of his going. Ragazonius thorowly inſtructed by the Senate, was in a gallie conducted to Raguſium: which Caſſan beg (the great Baſſa Muhametes ſon, gouernor of Liburnia) vnderſtanding, met him vpon the frontiers, & told him, That he was ſent by his father, both to meet him and ſafe conduct him: which the martial man, contrary to the manner of the Turks, courteouſly performed, honorably entertaining him, and afterward ſending him with a ſafe conuoy vntill he was out of all danger. Ragazonius comming to Conſtantinople, was there by night ſecretly recei-ued into the city, and at firſt brought into a little baſe Inne, and a guard ſet ouer him that he G ſhould ſpeake with no man. But after three dayes he was remoued to a much better place, and preſented with diuers kinds of daintie diſhes of ſundrie kinds of meats. The effect of his meſſage was, to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Embaſſador, to entreat of peace. At length hauing acceſſe to the great Baſſa Muhamet, after he had deliuered vnto him (as he had in charge) his meſſage concerning the exchange of priſoners and merchants goods; Muhamet asked him, If he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made? Wherunto he anſwered, that he had, but that he muſt firſt ſpeake with the Embaſſador, without whoſe aduice and counſel he was not of himſelfe to do any thing. At that firſt incounter, the Baſſa to terrifie the meſſenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horſemen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainly boaſted) was able by force or H policy to withſtand: alſo his great and inuincible fleets at ſea, with whom all the power of the Chriſtians joined together, was not able to encounter; and much other ſuch like ſtrength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to withſtand Selymus, than they were in times paſt to reſiſt his father and his anceſtors. Yet he diſcourſed of this matter in ſuch ſort, as not therby to cut off the hope of the pacification: but ſaid, That the Venetians ſhould beſt haue prouided for the ſafetie of their ſtate, if at the firſt they had liſtned vnto him, friendly & faithfully aduiſing them not to haue entred into armes, in which doing they ſhewed more courage than power: and that yet, as the caſe now ſtood, and that Selymus was in a moſt aſſured hope, in ſhort time to become lord and maſter of the whole Iſland, it ſhould be to their great I good, to prefer the fauor and good will of the Turks before war, & by the voluntary yeelding vp of Cyprus, gaine vnto themſelues perpetuall peace and tranquilitie. As for the Iſle it ſelfe, it was not now worth the hazarding of ſo many dangers, being deſtitute of inhabitants, which were almoſt all either ſlaine or fled, the cattel driuen away, the townes ranſackt and burnt, and the whole countrey, of late moſt pleaſant and beautifull, now ſo ſpoiled & vnpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that ſhould haue it, any profit or commodity. Ragazonius being a coole and aduiſed man, and withall perceiuing that the Baſſa was not to be contraried in his talke, ſo tempered his anſwer, as that he ſhewed no token of feare, neither let any word fall that might offend his eares, ſaying, That he was right glad that he had found ſo much fauor in his ſight, as to haue acceſſe and leaue to talke with ſo great a prince, who for wiſdome K and grauitie excelled all the reſt of the princes of the great Emperours court: who ſo far as he might with his loyalty towards his ſoueraigne, had alwaies moſt gratiouſly fauored the Venetian ſtate: who alſo not ignorant of the vncertaintie of worldly things, knew of all others beſt, that on both ſides were both men & armes, and that moſt mighty princes had oftentimes with ſmall forces bin ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiuing men more than in matters of warre: no power vpon earth being ſure, which could not within ſome bounds containe the ſtrength of it ſelfe: and that therefore he was in good hope, that he ſo worthy a man knowing beſt what belonged both to peace and war, would deuiſe ſome ſuch courſe as might ſort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkiſh empire; in which doing hee ſhould find ſufficient matter for his eternall praiſe and glory, if by his diſcreet wiſdome a pacification L might be made. Such talke hauing paſſed at their firſt meeting, Ragazonius had leaue to ſpeake with the Embaſſador, who then lay at Pera vnder ſafe keeping. In paſſing ouer to Pera, Ragazonius might ſee a fleet of Turkiſh gallies encountring one with another in manner of a fight at ſea, which the Turks had of purpoſe prouided to ſhew vnto him as a ſtrange ſight. Wherat Ragazonius ſmiling, ſaid vnto the Turks that were preſent with him, That it was a pretty childiſh ſport for him that had neuer ſeen the like before: but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with theſe matters in earneſt; as the Turks ſhould wel know whenſoeuer they had a mind to make proofe what they were able to do at ſea. Ragazonius comming to the Embaſſador, had conference with him at large, & reſolued with him what to do in his negotiation. And ſo returning to Muhamet, eaſily diſpatcht with him for the exchange of priſoners & merchants goods: but when they came to talke of the capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the firſt they M were ſo far off, as if they would neuer haue met: but after much and often conference, ſomtime the one yeelding, and ſomtime the other, the matter was brought to ſome conformity, ſo that there was no ſuch great difference betwixt them, but that they were like enough to haue agreed: Pius the Pope, and Philip the king of Spaine, aduertiſed of the ſending of Ragazonius

The Pope and the K. of Spaine fearing leſt the Venetiãs ſhould make peace with the Turk, haſten the confederation.

A to Conſtantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was ſent about ſome treatie of peace, what colour ſoeuer the Senat pretended to couer the ſame. And therefore doubting leſt the Turkiſh Emperor hauing once made peace with the Venetians, ſhould turne his great forces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that peace, now with all ſpeed to haſten the league, which they had ſo long before delayed. For which purpoſe the Pope ſent the noble Columnius to Venice: who admitted into the Senat, declared at large how matters had paſſed at Rome concerning the league: and afterwards, what profit might ariſe of ſuch a league concluded, & what harmes might enſue of the ſame, neglected. And to haſten the matter, ſet as it were before their eies, how much it concerned the B common good, but them eſpecially, to haue the ſame with ſpeed confirmed. As for to giue any truſt vnto the Turks, was (as he ſaid) not beſeeming their deep wiſedome & iudgement, ſeeing they ſo often had bin by them rather deceiued than vanquiſhed. In concluſion, he requeſted them, That for his Holineſſe ſake, moderating in ſome part their hard demands, they would with ſpeed ioyn with him & the king in a moſt firm & Chriſtian league. Although this ſpeech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, ſo that many inclined to the league; yet were there many doubtfull thereof, and could not be reſolued whether it were better to embrace peace with the Turke, or the league with the Pope and the king. Peace pleaſed them, neither did the league diſpleaſe them: it ſeemed a matter moſt difficult, whether to reſolue vp-on. They were fearefull of the league either receiued, or reiected: the hope of victory, the in-C conſtancie of the Turks, their owne ſtrength at ſea, the large promiſes of the Chriſtian Princes, the certain hope of the league, & vncertainty of the peace, perſuaded them to embrace the league. On the other ſide, the bad ſucceſſe of the yeare before, their forces ſhaken, and almoſt ſpent in Cyprus, the ſuſpected & doubtful faith of their confederats, with the vncertaintie of the ſucceſſe, induced them to prefer the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in ſuſpence betwixt both, gaue the embaſſador daily more doubtful anſwers than other: neither by promiſe binding themſelues, neither by flat denial cutting off the hope of the league, by examples and arguments rather refelling what was by others alleadged, than any way declaring what they themſelues thought. Somtime they alledged ſuch things as might make a man beleeue, that they were willing to ioyne in league, and by & by again they would ſeem neither to D reiect nor accept of the ſame. In which doubtfulneſſe many daies paſſed. At length the matter being propounded in the Senat, there found not vnlike diſpoſition of minds that it had among the meaner ſort; for ſome of the Senators inclined to the league; whoſe reaſons were grounded not vpon profit only, but vpon credit and honor alſo, which they wiſhed to be chiefly regarded; declaring alſo, what great ſecurity, honor & glory, ſhould redound vnto them, by en-tring into ſuch an honorable league. But the remembrance of former loſſes, the ſtrength of the Turke poſſeſſing a great part of the world, compared vnto their own, the terror of the enemies name, the feare of euill ſucceſſe, the ſmall hope of preuailing, induced others to like better of peace: whoſe opinion was alſo confirmed by this, That the confederation with thoſe Chriſti-ans, was of no more aſſurance or continuance than the Turks peace: beſide that, they alledged, E That leagues were therfore of leſſe aſſurance, for that confederations & amities were ſeldome or neuer ſincerely & faithfully kept on both ſides, euery man commonly ſeruing his own turn, without care of other men. They alſo ſet as it were before their eys what great occaſions, euen ſmal ſuſpitions might giue princes to breake their leagues, what ſtrange effects the feare of the loſſe of goods, or ſome part of their territory might worke. After this ſo weighty a matter had bin thus with great contention thorowly debated on both ſides in the Senat, it was at laſt put to voices: & ſo by the conſent of the greater part, the league was as more honorable receiued, and the Turks peace reiected, and a decree of the Senat to that effect made. Ragazonius by ſecret letters from the Senat vnderſtanding of al theſe matters, began to deale more warily with Muhamet the great Baſſa in matter concerning the pacification, & more hardly to yeeld to his F demands, and propounding many difficulties of purpoſe deuiſed, requeſted of him, That hee might by his good leaue returne to Venice, to be reſolued of many things by the Senat, wher-of he was not able himſelfe to iudge, and ſo to return to him again with more certaine inſtru-ctions: aſſuring him, that the Senat would vpon knowledge of the conditions of the peace doe and deuiſe many things for the furtherance of the ſame: which could not ſo well be done by letters, as if he were there himſelfe preſent to reſolue them vpon euery particular. This his re-queſt obtained,he with great ſpeed got him out of Conſtantinople:but was ſcarcely got out of the gates,when report of the league which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the king of Spaine,was brought vnto the court,and had in ſhort time filled the citie: which made all the way as he trauelled more troubleſome,and fruſtrated that alſo which was before concluded concerning the exchange of priſoners and merchants goods. Ragazonius being come to Venice,declared at large in the Senat the drift and purpoſe of the Turke,and what conference he had had with the great Baſſa,and in what forwardneſſe the peace was:for which his diſcreet carriage of the matter,his wiſedome was highly by the whole Senat commended,and he himſelfe afterward honourably rewarded.

A perpetuall league concluded betwixt the Pope, the K. of Spaine, and the Venetians.

The proportioning of the charge of the warres againſt the Turke: and the other capitulations of the league.

In the meane time the Commiſſioners at Rome after long conſultation concluded a league, which they would haue to be perpetuall, as well for inuaſiue as defenſiue warres againſt the Turke: and was by ſolemne oath confirmed by the Pope,the king of Spaine,and the Venetian Senat the 24 day of May,in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league,it was agreed vpon, That the ſea and land forces ſhould conſiſt of two hundred gallies, an hundred ſhips,fiftie thouſand footmen,and foure thouſand fiue hundred horſemen;with a proportionat quantitie of great artillerie,victuals,and other things neceſſarie,to be euery yeare ready in March,or at fartheſt in Aprill,to meet together at ſuch place in the Eaſt, as ſhould be vnto them for that purpoſe appointed,to be imploied as the Admirals ſaw cauſe,& as the preſent ſtate of things ſhould require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the king of Spain ſhould defray the one halfe,and the other halfe to be diuided into three equal parts;whereof the Venetians ſhould beare two parts,and the Pope the third; which if it ſhould be too heauie for him, then that remained by him vndiſcharged,to be diuided into fiue parts;whereof the king was to diſcharge three,and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they tooke order alſo for the prouiſion of victuals,to be at a reaſonable price taken vp in any the confederats dominions,where the army or fleet ſhould chance to ſtay: yet ſo,that it ſhould be at the King of Spaine his diſcretion, out of his kingdomes of Naples and Sicilie, firſt to take his prouiſion for the victualling of Guletta,Malta,and his owne nauie. It was alſo agreed, That if the king of Spaine ſhould at any time,when as the confederats had no common war, inuade Algiers,Tripolis,or Tunes,that then the Venetians ſhould of their owne charge, aid him with fiftie gallies well appointed: as alſo,that the king ſhould in like manner and with like forces aid them as oft as they ſhould by the Turks be inuaded. But if it ſhould fortune the Roman territorie to be inuaded,that then the aforeſaid princes ſhould be bound with all their forces, to the vttermoſt of their power, to defend thoſe places,and the perſon of the Pope. And that in managing of the confederat war,the three Admirals ſhould conferre together of all matters,and whatſoeuer the greater part ſhould agree vpon, that to be reputed as agreed vpon by them all: That Don Iohn of Auſtria, Charles the fifth his naturall ſonne, and brother to the king, ſhould haue the chiefe command of the forces both at ſea and land: but not to diſplay his owne enſigne, but the common enſigne of the confederats: Alſo, that ſuch places as ſhould be gained from the Turke by the confederat armie,ſhould be diuided amongſt the confederat princes, excepting Tunes,Algiers,and Tripolis,which ſhould remaine onely to the king of Spaine: That all controuerſies ariſing amongſt the Generals ſhould be decided by the Pope, vnto whom the Venetians ſhould lend twelue gallies,furniſhed of all things ſauing men and victuals,which the Pope ſhould of his owne charge ſupplie: Which gallies at the end of the warre hee ſhould againe deliuer, in ſuch caſe as they then were: That an honourable place ſhould bee left for Maximilian the Emperour, the French King, the King of Polonia, and the King of Portingall to enter into this league, whome with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, it ſhould beſeeme the Pope to ſtir vp in ſo good a quarrell: and that it ſhould not be lawfull for any the aforeſaid confederat Princes to intreat of peace,or enter into league, without the knowledge and conſent of the other confederats. And for the better proceeding of al things,it was agreed, That euer in Autumne the confederate Princes ſhould by their Embaſſadours at Rome conſult of the next yeares warres, and according as the time and occurrents ſhould require, to determine, whether their forces were to bee increaſed or diminiſhed. This League thus at length with much adoe concluded, was not long after in Iune with great pompe and triumph openly proclaimed in Rome,Venice,and Spaine, to the great ioy of the greateſt part of Chriſtendome.

The league proclaimed.

Whileſt

The Venetians the more to trouble the Turke, ſeeke to ſtir vp Tamas the Perſian king to take vp armes againſt him.

A Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the Venetians the more to intangle the Turke, thought it good to make proofe, if they might by any meanes ſtir vp Tamas the Perſian king to take vp armes againſt him: who as he was a prince of great power, ſo did hee exceedingly hate the Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Perſians and them about matters of their vain ſuperſtition, as for the manifold iniuries hee had oftentimes ſuſtained. There was one Vincent Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State, who hauing eſcaped out of priſon at Conſtantinople, was but a little before come to Venice, a warie wiſe man, and of great experience; who for his dexteritie of wit, and ſkilfulneſſe in the Turkiſh language, was thought of all others moſt fit to take in hand ſo great a matter. He hauing receiued letters and inſtructions for the Senat, and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, trauelling through Germanie, Polonia, and the B forreſts of Mœſia, in Turkiſh attire, came to Moncaſtron, a port towne vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea, at the mouth of the great riuer Boriſthenes: where he embarked himſelfe for Trapezond, but was by a contrarie wind driuen to Sinope, a citie of great traffique; from whence hee trauelled by rough and broken wayes to Cutay, keeping ſtill vpon the left hand, becauſe he would not fall vpon any part of the Turks army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all thoſe countries) neuertheleſſe he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himſelfe, being taken for a Turke, and by blind & troubleſome wayes, through rocks and foreſts, arriued at length at Erzirum, a ſtrong city of the Turks, then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This iourney of Alexanders was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was vented at Conſtantinople by a ſpie, who vnder the C color of friendſhip, haunting the Venetian embaſſadors houſe at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Perſia. Whereupon certaine courrors were ſent out with all ſpeed to beſet the three ſtraight paſſages into Perſia, whereby it was ſuppoſed he muſt of neceſſitie paſſe, with certain notes alſo of the fauor of the man, of his ſtature, and other markes, whereby he was beſt to be knowne. But he in ſo dangerous a country doubting all things, and fearing ſuch a matter, leauing his company behind him, with incredible celeritie poſted from Erzirum to Tauris, and was a great way gone before the Turks currors came into thoſe quarters: who yet hearing of him, followed after as far as they durſt, but could not ouertake him. Alexander comming to Tauris, vnderſtood that the court lay at Casbin, about twelue dayes iourney farther vp into the countrey; comming thither, the fourteenth of Auguſt of this yere D 1571, he chanced to meet with certaine Engliſh merchants, with whom he had before beene acquainted: by whoſe help he not onely got to ſpeake with Ayder Tamas the kings third ſon, but learned of them alſo the manners and faſhions of the Perſian court, and how to beare himſelfe therein. The Perſians by reaſon of the intollerable heat do moſt of their buſineſſe at that time of the yeare by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Aider, declared vnto him the cauſe of his comming: and the next night admitted vnto the ſpeech of his aged father, deliuered his letters of credence, and in the name of the Senat declared vnto him, with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkiſh Emperour was about to take away Cyprus from the Venetians, with what greedineſſe and pride he had ſet vpon the Chriſtians, and that diſcharged of that war, he would of all liklyhood ſet vpon the Perſians; hauing the ſelfeſame E quarrell vnto the Perſians that he had vnto the Venetians, that is, an ardent and inſatiable deſire of ſoueraigntie: a ſufficient cauſe for the greedie Turke to repute euery King the richer that he was, the more his enemie. After that, ſetting forth to the full the proweſſe of the Chriſtians, the wonderfull preparation they had made both at ſea and land, he perſuaded the King with all his power to inuade the Turke, now altogether buſied in the wars of Cyprus; and to recouer again ſuch parts of his kingdom as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him. Warres he ſaid were more happily managed abroad than at home: that ſithence he alone (the Chriſtian princes all then at quiet) had withſtood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his moſt proſperous ſucceſſe, the Chriſtian princes now ioining with him. That he was much vnmindful of his former loſſes & wrongs, if he thought he inioyed an F aſſured peace; which he ſhould find to be nothing els but a deferring of war vnto more cruell times: and that the Turke if he ſhould ouerrun Cyprus, would forthwith turne his victorious armes vpon him: The end of one warre was (as hee ſaid) but the beginning of another: and that the Turkiſh Empire could neuer ſtay in one ſtate: and that hee would obſerue not the Turkes wordes, but his deeds; and how that the Othoman Emperours according to the opportunitie of the times, vſed by turnes, ſometime force, ſometime deceit, as beſt ſerued their purpoſes: G That no princes had at all times by diſſembled peace and vncertaine leagues more deluded ſome, vntill they had oppreſſed others. He wiſhed alſo, that at length this his cunning dealing might appeare vnto the world: and that Princes would thinke, that being combined together, they might more eaſily ouercome the Turk, than being ſeperated, defend their own: That in former times ſometime will, ſometime occaſion, was wanting to them to vnite their forces: & that therefore they ſhould now combine themſelues for their common good againſt the common enemy: That it concerned no leſſe the Perſians than the Chriſtians, to haue the power of the Turke abated: and that this taking vp of arms, ſhould be for the good of the Perſian king howſoeuer things ſhould fall out; if well, he ſhould then recouer what he had before loſt, with much more that was the Turks: if otherwiſe, yet by voluntarie entring into arms to H countenance himſelfe, and to giue the Turks occaſion to thinke that he feared him not: which was (as he ſaid) the onely way to preſerue their common ſafety, which would be vnto all the confederat princes eaſie enough, if they themſelues made it not more difficult than the power of the enemy. The ſpeech of the embaſſador was willingly heard: wherunto the King anſwered, That he would conſider therupon what he had to do: and in the mean while, a faire houſe was appointed for the embaſſador and his followers, & bountiful allowance appointed of the kings charge. He was alſo many times ſumptuouſly feaſted by the noblemen, whom he ſtil requeſted to be mediators to the king, to take that honorable war in hand. The king had at that time a ſon called Iſmael, a man of a great ſpirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that he with I too much inſolencie made roads into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, to the diſturbance of the league his father had before made with the late Turkiſh Emperour Solyman: vnto him Alexander hauing acceſſe, was of him courteouſly heard; who fretting & languiſhing for verie griefe of reuenge vpon the Turks, wiſhed, that either the king his father had his mind, or hee himſelfe the power of a king: and ſaid, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtaine the kingdome, he would indeed ſhew what he then in mind thought. But of him more ſhal be ſaid hereafter. Whileſt this matter went more ſlowly forward in the Perſian court than the Embaſſador would haue had it, newes was brought vnto the court, of the great victory which the Chriſtians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at ſea: vpon which occaſion the embaſſador ſolicited Tamas more earneſtly than before, to make himſelf partaker of the victorie K of the Chriſtians, by entring into confederation with them, & by taking vp of arms, rather than to hold vncertain friendſhip with the Turks in their miſeries, by whom he had bin ſo often wronged. This he ſaid was the only time for the Perſian king to recouer his former glory, the like offer wherof would neither often chance, neither long ſtay: & that if he ſuffered ſo fit an oportunitie to ſlip away, he ſhould afterwards in vaine wiſh for the ſame, when it were too late. This ſo wholeſome counſell was well heard, but preuailed nothing to ſtirre vp the aged king: who then troubled with rebellion in Media, or weary of the former warres he had had with the Turke, & glad of ſuch peace as he had then with him, anſwered the embaſſador, That foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Princes had made a perpetuall league amongſt themſelues, hee would for two yeares expect the euent, and afterward as occaſion ſerued, ſo to reſolue vpon L peace and war. This improuident reſolution of the king, brought afterward vnprofitable and too late repentance vnto the whole Perſian kingdome; when as within a few yeares after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embaſſadour (as true prophets) foretold, redounded vnto the great ſhaking thereof. For the Cyprian war once ended, & peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the ſonne of Selymus, ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh Empire, inuading the Perſian king, tooke from him the great countrey of Media, now called Siruan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regall citie of Tauris, as ſhall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Perſian, who now refuſed to take vp armes, or ioyne in Muſtapha Baſſa returneth to the ſiege of Famaguſta.

Muſtapha the great Baſſa and Generall of the Turks armie, furniſhed of all things that could bee deſired for maintenance of his ſiege, and ſouldiers in great number dayly repairing vnto him out of Cilicia, Syria, the Leſſer Aſia, and the Countries thereabout, beſide great ſupplies brought vnto him by Haly Baſſa from Conſtantinople; inſomuch, that it was thought

A thought he had in his army two hundred thouſand men: began now that Winter was paſt, in the latter end of Aprill, to draw neerer vnto Famaguſta, and with incredible labour to caſt vp trenches and mounts againſt the city, of ſuch height, that the defendants from the higheſt places of the citie could ſcarcely ſee the points of the Turks ſpeares, or tops of their tents, as they lay incamped: which was no great matter for the Baſſa to performe, hauing in his campe fortie thouſand pioners alwaies ready at his command.

The citie of Famaguſta is ſcituat in the Eaſt end of the Iſland, in a plain and low ground betwixt two promontories, the one called S. Andrews head, and the other the head of Græcia. It is in circuit two miles, and in forme foure ſquare; but that the ſide toward the Eaſt, longer and more winding than the reſt, doth much deforme the exact figure of a quadrant: it is almoſt on B two parts beaten vpon with the ſea, the other parts toward the land are defended with a ditch not aboue fifteen foot broad, a ſtone wall, and certaine bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to Amathus ſtandeth a ſix cornered tower: other towers ſtand out alſo in the wal, euery of them ſcarce able to containe ſix pieces of artillerie. It hath a hauen opening toward the Southeaſt, defended from the iniurie of the weather by two great rockes, betwixt which the ſea commeth in by a narrow paſſage about fortie paces ouer, but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbor to ſhips, whereof it cannot containe any great number, and was now ſhut vp with a ſtrong chaine. Neere vnto the hauen ſtandeth an old caſtle with foure towers, after the antient manner of building. There was in the citie one ſtrong bulwarke, built after the manner of the fortification of our time, with paliſadoes, curtaines, caſemets, and ſuch like, in C ſuch manner, as that it ſeemed almoſt impregnable. All which, although they made ſhew of a ſtrong and well fortified citie, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weak long to hold out againſt the great power of the Turke: but what wanted by reaſon of the ſcituation and weake fortification, that the Gouernor and other noble captaines ſupplied in beſt ſort they might, with a ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſouldiers, the ſureſt defence of ſtrong places. There was in the citie two thouſand and fiue hundred Italians, two hundred Albanois horſemen, before entertained by the Gouernor; and of the Cypriots themſelues were muſtered two thouſand and fiue hundred moe, all men reſolutely ſet downe to ſpend their liues in defence of their countrey.

Muſtapha with wonderfull celeritie hauing brought to perfection his fortifications, planted D his batterie of 64 great pieces; amongſt which were foure great baſiliskes of exceeding bigneſſe, wherewith he continually without intermiſſion battered the wals of the city in fiue places, but eſpecially that part of the wall that was between the hauen and the gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great morter pieces caſt vp huge ſtones, which from high falling into the city, with their weight brake down the houſes they light vpon, & fell oftentimes through their vaults, euen in the bottom of their ſellars, to the great terror of the beſieged. The wals in diuers places ſore ſhaken, and the houſes beaten down, he began to aſſault the city: which the defendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulſed, and not only defended their wals and draue the Turks from the breaches, but furiouſly ſallied out vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and E wounded many, wonderfully diſturbed their fortifications, & abated their courage: neither did the enemy with greater fury maintaine the battery or aſſault, than did the Chriſtians the defence of the city, ſtil ſending their deadly ſhot into the thickeſt of that great multitude; inſomuch that in few daies the Baſſa had loſt 30000 of his men: and the captains themſelues wondering at the valour of the defendants, as if they had not now to doe with ſuch Chriſtians as they had before ſo oftentimes ouerthrown, but with ſome other ſtrange people, began to deſpaire of the winning of the city. The Turks thus doubting, and almoſt at a ſtand, the Chriſtians in the mean time made vp their breaches with earth, baskets, wool-ſacks, and ſuch like, not ſparing their very beds and bedclothes, cheſts, carpets, & whatſoeuer els might ſerue to fill vp the breach. Among many wants they feared, the greateſt was the want of pouder, which with continuall ſhooting began greatly to be diminiſhed: wherefore to reſerue ſome part thereof againſt al extremities, they thought it beſt whilſt yet ſome ſtore was left, to vſe the ſame more ſparingly, and to ſhoot more ſeldome. But the Turks ſtill drawing neerer and neerer the city, and caſting vp mounts higher than the wals of the city, with earth & fagots filled vp the ditch: which done, they of the broken ſtones made wals on either ſide, to ſaue themſelues from the flankering ſhot of the Chriſtians; then giuing a freſh aſſault, they vſed not only their ſhot and

Famaguſta againe aſſaulted by the Turkes other miſſiue weapons, but came foot to foot, and notably fought in the breach hand to hand. G Which manner of fight (as if it had been ſo agreed vpon) they euery day maintained for the ſpace of ſix houres. And although the Turks by reaſon of their multitude were diuided into many parts, and freſh men ſtill ſucceeded them that were wearie, yet ſuch was the courage of the defendants, that euery man requeſted to haue the places of moſt danger, and from thence with couragious hand repulſed the Turks with exceeding great ſlaughter. But for all that, the furious enemy maintaining the aſſault, not only by day, but by often alarmes in the night alſo, kept the Chriſtians continually in doubtfull ſuſpence and readineſſe, as if they ſhould haue receiued a preſent aſſault: and as ſoone as it was day, with freſh men that had ſlept their fill, deſperatly aſſailed the Chriſtians almoſt ſpent and maigre for lacke of ſleepe and reſt. Force not H preuailing, the reſtleſſe enemie leauing nothing vnattempted, by a queint deuiſe was like to haue taken one of the gates of the citie: there was growing in the Iſland great plentie of a kind of wood much of the nature of the Firre or pitch tree, eaſie to be ſet on fire, but hardly to be quenched, but differing in this, that in burning it gaue forth ſuch a noyſome ſmell, as was not by any man well to be indured: of this kind of wood the Turks brought a wonderful quantity to one of the gates called Limoſina, which once ſet on fire, could not by the defendants by any means be quenched, although they caſt whole pipes and tuns of water at once into it, but moſt terribly burning cloſe vnto the gate by the ſpace of foure daies, with the vehemencie of the heat and loathſomneſſe of the ſmell, ſo troubled the defendants, that ſcarce any of them could indure to ſtand vpon the wall, but forſaking the ſame, were euer and anon like to haue giuen I the enemie leaue to enter.

Bragadinus the Gouernor, more carefull of the common ſafety than of his own danger, ceaſed not ſtil to be going about from one place to another, telling the Italians, That now was giuen the fitteſt occaſion they could deſire, for them to ſhew their valor in, & to gaine great honor of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glory, if by their only means without any other help, the city ſo far off from the reliefe of the Chriſtians might be defended, and the great power of the Turks defeated: this (he ſaid) was the onely time wherein it ſtood them moſt vpon to play the men; for if they could keep that little was left, the reſt of the Iſland would be eaſily recouered: and although the Turks armie exceeded far in number, yet did they excell them in proweſſe and valor, whereby a few, and as it were but an handfull of K men, had oftentimes preuailed againſt moſt infinit multitudes: now all the eyes of the world, as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, ſo that if they held out againſt ſo great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Chriſtendome extoll their inuincible courage and proweſſe; and that they themſelues ſhould thereby reape both great profit & honour: neither that any thing could be alledged, why they ſhould not be compared with the worthy knights of Malta, who to their eternal fame had deliuered themſelues out of the mouth of the Turke, & left vnto the world a moſt faire example for men valiantly to ſtand in ſo good a quarrell vpon their owne defence: Nicoſia (he ſaid) was loſt rather by the cowardiſe of the defendants, than by the valour of the enemie. He alſo praiſed the fidelitie and courage of the Græcians, who for any feare or danger could neuer be remoued from the Venetians, or indu- L ced to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turks gouernment: and perſuaded them, with the ſame reſolution to defend their owne city, that they ſaw in the Venetian ſouldiers, fighting for them, and for their owne honour to ſtriue with the Italians, in defence of their State, their countrie, their wiues, and children, againſt the tyrannie of the Turks; foraſmuch as aid would in ſhort time come, and ſet them free from all danger. The Senat alſo in like manner had ſent letters to Famaguſta, willing them to be of good cheere, and yet a while to hold out the ſiege, and that they ſhould be in ſhort time relieued. Baleonius alſo Generall of the garriſon ſouldiers, himſelfe in armes was preſent at euery skirmiſh, carefully foreſeeing what was in euery place and at all times to bee done; and by incouraging of his ſouldiers, and aduenturing of his perſon, ſhewed himſelfe to be both a worthie commander, & valiant ſouldier. Neither did the ſouldiers alone, but euen the women alſo what they might, ſtriuing aboue the power of the ſtrength M both of the minds and bodies, ſome bringing meat, ſome weapons vnto the defendants, and others ſtones, beds, cheſts, & ſuch like ſtuffe to make vp the breaches. But victuals beginning now to wax ſcant, 8000 of the vulgar ſort of people were turned out of the citie, who all in ſafetie were ſuffred to paſſe thorow the midſt of the Turks army, to ſeeke their liuing in the countrey.

A Thus whileſt open force preuailed not according to the Turkes deſire, they began in foure places to vndermine the citie, in hope to haue found entrance: but the defendants doubting ſuch a matter, by diligent liſtening, and great veſſels ſet full of water neere vnto the walls, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof diſcouered their workes, and with countermines fruſtrated thoſe of the enemy: yet in ſo great a ſtir and hurly-burly all things were not poſſibly to be diſcouered; wherby it came to paſſe, that whileſt the defendants were altogether buſied in defending the walls, a mine not perceiued was ſuddenly blowne vp neere vnto the tower ſtanding vpon the hauen; by force whereof a great part of the wall thereabout was in a moment with a moſt horrible noiſe ouerthrowne. With the fall thereof the Turkes thinking the city as good as taken, with an horrible ſhout and outcrie mounted the wall, and in B the breach ſet vp their enſignes; Countie Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the ſame, ſo ſuddenly ouerthrowne: which Neſtor Martinengus quickly perceiuing, came ſpeedily from his owne ſtation, to repulſe the enemy now readie to haue entred. The fight became there moſt fierce and terrible, on the one ſide hope, on the other deſperation, enraged their minds: the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themſelues but a little they ſhould forthwith win the city; and the defendants propounding nothing vnto themſelues but ſhamefull death and torture, fought as men altogether deſperat. The Turkes truſted to their multitude, and the Chriſtians to their valour: In the meane time, Andreas Bragadinus with certain great pieces aptly placed, out of the caſtle ſlew a number of the Turkes as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger, came in haſte with a C companie of couragious ſoldiers, to relieue them that were fighting at the breach, and cheering vp his followers, thruſt himſelfe with the formoſt into the face of the breach; and there not only appointed what was to be done, and with cheerefull countenance encouraged his ſoldiers, but with his owne hand hauing ſlaine many, tooke one of the Turks enſignes, when as he had before ſlaine the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the ſight wherof others incouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable battell, as men fighting for their laſt hope. In fine the Turkes were glad to retire, leauing behind them foure thouſand carkaſes of their ſlaine fellowes in the towne ditch, with fourteene of their enſignes, which were brought into the city. Neither was this victorie gained without ſome loſſe of the Chriſtians; about a hundred were ſlaine, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, Dauid D Nocius, Celſus Feto, Eraſmus Firmo, all captaines.

The Turks ſeeke to vndermine the citie.

The breaches notably defended.

For all this, they in the citie tooke ſmall reſt, the Turks great ſhot ſtill thundring in amongſt them; and that in ſuch furious ſort, as that in one day (which was the eight of Iune) were numbered about fiue thouſand great ſhot, ſhot into the citie. With which continuall batterie, one of the round bulwarkes of the towne was ſo ſhaken, as that a part of the front thereof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part ſtood leaning readie to fall, in ſuch ſort as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, preſently vndermined the ſame bulwarke, and in the mine placed certain barrels of gunpouder. The Turks comming to aſſault the place they had ſo ſore battered, the defendants after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, feigned themſelues to retire for feare, ſo to draw the enemie the faſter on; who was no ſooner come to the E place deſired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew vp the bulwark with all them that ſtood thereon; of whom ſome were ouerwhelmed with the earth it ſelfe, other ſome were blowne vp into the aire, and falling downe againe, miſerably periſhed; and other ſome, ſhot as it were out of a gun, fell downe a great way off, and ſo were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defendants a moſt pleaſant ſight. About ſix hundred of the Turkes periſhed at this aſſault, amongſt whom were Muſtapha Generall of the voluntarie ſoldiers, and Feregates a man of great marke amongſt the Turks. But by the haſtie firing of the mine, there periſhed alſo about an hundred of the Chriſtians, ouertaken in their owne deuice, amongſt whom were alſo ſome of great account.

The Turks inflamed with their loſſes, were more inraged with the ſpeeches and perſuaſions of Muſtapha their General; who moſt earneſtly exhorted them, with one conſent to aſſaile their enemies, now driuen into a corner of the Iſland, ſpoiled of all their country, truſting more vnto the ſtrength of the place, than of themſelues, entreating for nothing more, than with their liues to depart thence. But what place (ſaid he) is there impregnable for the Turks? Nicoſia, Zigeth, and ſuch other ſtrong Townes woon, what are they but the monuments and teſtimo-nies of the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, and the proweſſe of the Turks? This day (ſaid he) will G confirme your former labors and victories; which you before vndertooke for honor, but here ſhall you haue honor mixt with gold, and prey ſufficient to make you all rich. The Turks encouraged with this ſpeech of their General, as men forgetful of al dangers, began a more terrible ſiege than euer before; & hauing with incredible labor made three great mines, & blowing them vp, ouerthrew a great part with the wall of the caſtle, the notable defence of the hauen: which done, they with all their force oftentimes aſſailed the city, as if it ſhould haue bin their laſt labor; neither ceaſed they ſo to do night or day. At which time alſo that part of the city which is beaten vpon with the ſea, was aſſaulted by them in the gallies alſo.

The poore Chriſtians ſpent with deadly wounds, continual labor, perpetual watching both night and day, and now brought to ſmal number, hardly withſtood the furious enemy, aſſailing H them in ſo many places at once, and held out that tempeſt rather with courage than ſtrength. In the meane time the enemies armie increaſed daily, the Turks in hope of the like ſpoile they had at Nicoſia, continually repairing out of the countries round about, vnto the campe. The Chriſtian captaines ſeeing their men with continuall aſſaults ſore ſpent, (inſomuch, that how many ſoeuer they ſeemed to be, there was not aboue three hundred ſound men left) but ſeuen barrels of pouder remaining, want of all things daily increaſing, hope of aid ſtill decreaſing, and the Venetians (their onely comfort) ſo far from them; the captaines (I ſay) themſelues began to quaile in courage: and the rather, for that ſuch reliefe as was ſent from Venice, could not poſſibly be brought vnto them, but ſtaied at Crete; the Turks gallies ſtill lying before Famaguſta, I ſo that nothing could in ſafetie be brought thither. This feare of the captaines themſelues could not long be hid or diſſembled, but that it was by the citiſens perceiued: who hauing neither power to hold out the ſiege, neither place left to flie vnto, overcome with neceſſitie, came flocking to the Gouernour, crauing of him aid and comfort, and with aboundance of teares beſought him in this common deſperation to take compaſſion on them, their wiues, and children, a people that had alwaies ſo well deſerued of the Venetian State. Their walls (they ſaid) were beaten downe, their bulwarks ouerthrowne, the few ſouldiers that remained, ſpent with wounds, watching, and famine; the enemies ſtrength increaſing daily, ſo that they muſt needs in ſhort time all periſh with the ſword, if the citie were by force taken: wherefore they beſought him, that yeelding to neceſſity, which no power was euer able to withſtand, he would K at laſt, while time yet ſerued, prouide for the ſafetie of ſo faithfull and kinde a people, and not to refuſe any conditions, how hard ſoeuer.

The requeſts and teares of the citiſens of Famaguſta, with the due conſideration of the deſperat ſtate of the citie, moued Bragadinus to compaſſion; who comforting them in beſt ſort he could, perſuaded them to be of good cheere, for that he had care both of them & their ſtate, & would ſo prouide for them, as that they ſhould neuer repent themſelues of their fidelity and loialty to the Venetian State. He in the meane time conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger which preſently hung ouer all their heads, propounded the matter in a generall counſell called together for the ſame purpoſe: wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yeeld: only Baleonius at the firſt diſſenting, as doubtfull of the Turkes faith; but afterwards L yeelding vnto the opinion of the reſt. So an herauld being ſent vnto the Baſſa, a truce was taken for certain days to parley in, and hoſtages on both ſides giuen, during which time not ſo much as a dart was throwne, or an arrow ſhot from either ſide. After a few days parley the conditions were agreed vpon, whereupon the city ſhould be yeelded into the power of the Baſſa, which were theſe: Firſt, That the inhabitants of the city yet aliue, ſhould in ſafetie enioy their liues, libertie, and goods, with the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion: That the Gouernor with the reſt of the captains and ſoldiers might in ſafetie depart with bag and baggage, and at their departure to take with them fiue great pieces of ordnance, and three horſes, which ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe them to make choice of, and that the Turkes ſhould ſafely conduct them into Crete, finding them both victual and ſhipping. All which things were with more kindnes promiſed, than with fidelitie performed. Yet all theſe matters agreed vpon, and conceiued into M writing; as alſo by ſolemne oath on both ſides confirmed; the Gouernour ſending a meſſenger before, requeſted that he might haue leaue to come to ſee the Baſſa, and to deliuer vnto him the keyes of the citie. Leaue being granted, Bragadinus the Gouernour, Baleonius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Theupolus Earle of Paphos, Io. Antonius Quirinus, Aloyſius Mar- tinengus,

A tinengus with a great ſort of other captaines came into the campe: but before they entred into the Baſſa's pauilion, they were commanded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did. At the firſt meeting Muſtapha entertained them courteouſly, and with many glorious words, as if it had been in admiration, extolled their worthie valor and courage: ſaying, That he was glad now to know them by face, whoſe valiant minds he had before knowne by their moſt valiant deeds. Now proweſſe and valour ſeemed not only in ſafetie, but alſo honored of the enemie: when after a long diſcourſe the falſe Baſſa reuolued vnto the miſchiefe and treacherie he had before reſolued vpon; complaining that certaine of his men taken at the ſiege, had been afterward againſt all reaſon and order ſlaine. Which the gouernor and the reſt vtterly denying, he ſtart vp as in a rage, and with high words and ſterne countenance vrging the fact, commanded B them all to be forthwith caſt in bonds; and ſo bringing them out of his pauilion, in the ſight of the army, contrary to his oath and promiſe, cauſed them all to be ſlain. At which time Bragadinus & Theupolus were oftentimes commanded to lay down their heads, to haue had them ſtrucke off: yet was their execution deferred, and their liues reſerued, not to ſaue them, but with more exquiſit puniſhment and torture to ſatisfie the barbarous cruelty of the faithles and vnmerciful tirant. The next day after, Bragadinus hauing his ears before cut off in deſpight, was brought forth to be wondred at, and tortured with the moſt extremeſt kind of torture that tyrannie it ſelfe could haue deuiſed: for diſpoiled of his jewels and attire, and a basket laid vpon his ſhoulders filled with earth, he was inforced oftentimes to cary the ſame, to repaire the rampiers that were ouerthrowne; and euer as he paſſed by, the proud Baſſa inſulting vpon him to C fall downe and to kiſſe the ground at his feet: and ſo buffetted with the Turks fiſts, and ſpurned as a dog with their feet, was in great deriſion & deſpight asked, Whether he hoped that Chriſt his God would come to help him or not? Which indignitie of it ſelfe bitter & miſerable, the dignitie of the man made much more miſerable: whoſe comely and ſtately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extreame miſerie added vnto him a certaine majeſtie and grace. In this ſo foule a ſight of vertue troden vnder foot, the poore Chriſtians could neither wel ſtay their tears, nor let them fall, for feare of the diſpleaſure of the Turks. But the forſworne Baſſa, not only forgetfull of all humanity, but inraged rather with extreme cruelty, cauſed that noble and worthie Bragadinus to be ſet in a chaire, & his skin to be flaine off from him quicke: a puniſhment vnworthie of him that ſuffered it, but moſt worthie him that inflicted the D ſame. Yet in ſo great & horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word not beſeeming a faithfull Chriſtian and the honor of his country: only he called vpon God for mercie, & deteſted the Turks perfideous trecherie, and ſo breathed out his life. But the tirant, worthy eternal infamie, not ſatisfied with the torture of the liuing man, cauſed the head to be cut off from the dead bodie, and vpon the point of a ſpeare to be ſet vp on a high place for all men to looke vpon. His skin alſo ſtuffed with chaffe, he cauſed to be hanged vp at the yards arme, and ſo to be carried about; not ſo true a trophy of his victory, as a teſtimonie of his perfideous and Turkiſh cruelty. Two dayes after, Countie Theupolus after he had bin moſt ſhamefully intreated, full of the marks of the Turks crueltie, was (to make an end withall) ſhamefully hanged in the market place. With what cruelty the Baſſa had tyranniſed vpon the nobility, with the ſame he alſo raged E vpon the meaner ſort of the citiſens, of whom ſome he ſlew, ſome he chained in the gallies, & carried away the reſt into bondage. Three hundred Chriſtians, ſome ſoldiers, ſome citiſens, which came forth with the gouernour to ſee the Turks campe, were there alſo all ſlaine. Neſtor Martinengus a famous captaine eſcaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Baſſa's Eunuchs, who by the helpe of a Greeke fiſherman got to Leptis, and from thence to Crete, and ſo afterwards to Venice, where he faithfully reported to Aloyſius Moſenicus the duke, the whole proceſſe of that war, with the loſſe of the city; and that in the ſpace of threeſcore and ten days there was aboue a hundred and forty thouſand great ſhot diſcharged againſt the city. Such noblemen and gentlemen as eſcaped out of this ſo general a ſlaughter, baniſhed their country, and in miſerie, diſperſed without hope of returne, led afterward a miſerable & vagrant life, though F ſome of them euen at this day (as I haue bin credibly informed) are by the Venetian State right well maintained. The countrey people and artificers were generally by the Turkes ſpared, for the peopling of the Countrie. This was the fatall ruine of Cyprus, one of the moſt fruitfull and beautifull Iſlands of the Mediterranian: the loſſe whereof, not without cauſe, grieued manie Chriſtian princes, as ſometime a kingdome of it ſelfe, but now a prouince of the Turkiſh

The Turks arriue in Crete with a great Fleet.

Whileſt Muſtapha yet lay at the ſiege of Famaguſta, the other two great Baſſa's, Partau and Haly, the one the Admirall, and the other Generall of the ſouldiers (appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the ſea, that no reliefe ſhould be ſent by the Venetians to Famaguſta, and further as occaſion ſerued to infeſt their dominions) about the midſt of May arriued in Eubœa with two hundred and thirtie gallies; whither Vluzales Viceroy of Algiers, with diuers other the Turks notable pyrats, reſorted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from Eubœa, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Myſia, Ionia, Caria, and ſo directly toward the Rhodes, they were met with thirtie gallies moe of the Turks aduenturers. After that, hauing left certain galies for to lie before Famaguſta, they directed their courſe for the Iſland of Crete, & the 13 of Iune put into the bay of Amphimalea, now called Suda, and there landed 12000 men.

The deſcription of Crete.

The Iſland of Crete, now called Candia, is greater than Cyprus, but leſſer than Sicilia or Sardinia: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the Iſlands of the Mediterranian. It was in antient time famous for many things, but eſpecially for an hundred cities which therein ſtood, as witneſſeth amongſt others, Seneca: (Vrbibus centum ſpecioſa Creta) but at this time it hath only three; Candia a Colonie of the Venetians, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, Canea, and Rhetimo. The circuit of the Iſland is fiue hundred & twenty miles, full of hils; for which cauſe the people of the countrey are much delighted in hunting. In it is no nauigable riuer, or venomous beaſt. It is now moſt famous thorow a great part of the world, for the good Malmſey which there groweth, and is from thence in great abundance ſent into many far countries. Therin alſo growes great plentie of Cypreſſe trees, ſeruing for the vſe of ſhipping. It is at this day ſubiect to the Venetians. The Turks being landed, and ranging vp and down the country, did what harme they poſſibly could, burning and ſpoiling all as they went; vntill that at laſt they were vpon the ſudden encountred by Franciſcus Iuſtinianus, who but a little before their landing was come into the Iſland with a thouſand ſoldiers; and now joining with the Iſland people, notably charged them, being altogether diſperſed and ſeeking after prey; and hauing ſlaine many of them, inforced the reſt to retire to their gallies. The next day the Turkes landing againe in great number, burnt diuers townes, and ranſacked Setia and Rhetimo, where they tooke a rich prey, and carried away many priſoners: but loded with their bootie, diſperſed and fearing nothing leſſe than to be at that time ſet vpon, they were aſſailed by Lucas Michael a valiant captaine, two thouſand of them ſlaine, and with the loſſe of their bootie and priſoners, glad to retire vnto their gallies. Thus repulſed from Crete, they tooke their courſe to Cythera, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Iſlands ſubiect to the Venetians: where beſide other harmes by them done, they carried away with them ſix thouſand poore Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie.

Departing thence, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Epirus, they came to Suppolo an hauen towne in Epirus, which Venerius in the beginning of theſe wars had taken from the Turks, but was now againe by them recouered. After that, they came to Dulcigno, which the Turks had but a little before beſieged by land, for that the Gouernour thereof, and of Antiuari (another towne of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia) had compacted with three hundred Epirots, to ſtirre vp the countrey to rebellion, and to reuolt to the Venetians: for the effecting whereof, the Epirots requeſted of the Venetians ſix thouſand ſoldiers to make head, which the Venetians promiſed to ſend them. Whereupon the aforeſaid Epirots forthwith tooke arms, and raiſed moſt part of Epirus into rebellion: vnto whom was ſent at the firſt one captain with an hundred Italians from Catora. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promiſed aid, ſaw themſelues on euery ſide hardly beſet with their enemies, deſpairing of any good ſucceſſe, they yeelded themſelues to the mercie of Achmetes Baſſa, Selymus his great lieutenant in Græcia (who to repreſſe that ſo dangerous a rebellion, was come thither with an armie of fourescore thouſand Turks:) ſo was a moſt faire occaſion loſt, whenas the reſt of the Epirots, inflamed with the hope of libertie, were readie to haue come vnto their friends, alreadie in armes, and by their example like enough to haue raiſed all Græcia into rebellion. But now deceiued of their expectation, bewailed their miſery, and truſting to the promiſes of the Venetians, they had caſt themſelues and all theirs into moſt manifeſt danger. They of Dulcigno ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet both by ſea and land, ſent to Partan Baſſa, and couenanting with him, that A faire occaſion let ſlip.

A they might in ſafetie depart, deliuered vnto him the towne: and ſo Sara Martinengus Gouernor of the towne, with the garriſon ſouldiers, were in foure ſhips conueyed in ſafetie to Raguſium: as for the citiſens, promiſe was kept with them after the Turkiſh manner. In the ſame hurley the Turks tooke alſo the townes of Antiuari and Budua. Antiuari was both by ſcituation and fortification ſtrong, and furniſhed with a good garriſon: neuertheleſſe Alexander Donatus Gouernor thereof, a man of no experience in martial affaires, ouercome with the preſent feare, and deſpairing to be able to hold the towne, cowardly yeelded the ſame vnto the enemie. Which his beaſtly cowardiſe the Senat ſuffered not vnpuniſhed, but confiſcating his goods, and remouing him from the Senat, caſt him into exile. From Antiuari, the Turks following their good fortune, departed with their fleet into the bay called Rizonicus, but now the B bay of Catharo, and both by ſea and land laid hard ſiege vnto the ſtrong towne of Catharo, called in antient time Aſcriuium: againſt which they caſt vp two great bulwarks, and planted thereon nine great pieces of artillerie, wherewith to haue battered the towne and the caſtle: but the defendants as reſolute men ſallying out, put them from their ordnance, and inforced them againe vnto their gallies.

Dulcigno, Antiuari, & Budua, ſtrong towns of the Venetians vpon the coaſts of Epirus and Dalmatia, yeelded to the Turke.

Cowardiſe puniſhed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Vluzales and Caracoza, both men of great account and name among the Turks, got leaue for ten dayes of the Admirall, with 60 gallies to ſpoile the Iſlands neere thereabouts ſubiect to the Venetians. Who comming to the Iſland of Curzola, about eightie miles Eaſtward from Raguſium, landed their men, with purpoſe to aſſault the towne of Curzola, of the ſame name with the Iſland. Which Anthonius Contarenus the gouer- C nor thereof perceiuing, in the dead time of the night fled for feare out of the towne, into the rocks and places of more ſafetie, after whome the townesmen followed alſo: ſo that in the towne were not left aboue 20 men, and about 80 women, who with weapons in their hands, after the reſt were fled, came to the walls, as wiſhing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the barbarous enemie. But at ſuch time as the Turks began to approch the town, and the women with ſtones, fire, & ſuch weapons as they had were beating them off, & with greater courage defending the place, than was to haue bin in their ſex expected, by the goodnes of God a great tempeſt aroſe ſuddenly out of the North, which ſo outragiouſly toſſed the gallies, that Vluzales & Caracoza were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, & to get them thence into a place of more ſafetie. Sailing alongſt the coaſt, they by the way ſpoiled Lyſna, Bracia, and Liſſa, D little Iſlands vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, out of which they carried away with them 1600 poore Chriſtians into captiuity. Theſe arch pirats at their pleaſure roaming vp & downe the ſea, fortuned to light vpon a ſhip of the Chriſtians, bound from Meſſana to Corcyra, which they tooke, and in rifling thereof found certaine letters directed to the gouernour of Corcyra, certifying him of the league, then but lately concluded among the Chriſtian Princes: which letters they ſent in poſt to Selymus, to giue him knowledge thereof: who thereupon writ to his Admirals, with all hoſtilitie to infeſt any of the dominions of the Chriſtian confederats.

Curzola forſaken by the men, is defended by women.

Selymus aduertiſed of the league lately concluded betwixt the chriſtian Princes.

The Turks fleet thus raging and raigning in the Adriatique, brought a great feare not onely vpon the coaſts of Dalmatia, Iſtria, and the Iſlands thereabouts, which were by them moſt afflicted; but alſo vpon the ſea coaſts of Apulia, and all alongſt that ſide of Italie; yea and vpon E the citie of Venice it ſelfe: inſomuch that they were glad to fortifie as well the Citie as the frontiers of their dominions, with new fortifications and garriſons; as did alſo the King and the Pope in Italie: for why, no ſhip or gallie could now looke out of any port, but it was preſently ſurpriſed and taken by the Turks: which with the ſundrie calamities before receiued, ſo confounded the Venetians, that they in their aſſemblies and conſultations ſeemed rather to quake for feare, than after their wonted manner, grauely to conſult how the enemie was to be repulſed. Yet for the more ſafetie of their citie, and for feare leſt the Turks fleet ſhould forcibly breake in vpon them, they ſtrongly fortified the paſſages through the rock or banke which defendeth the city from the ſea, and kept continually twelue thouſand men in readineſſe in the citie for the more aſſurance thereof.

All the Turks fleet being againe met together, Partau and Haly departed from Aulona the 26 of Auguſt, and failed directly to Corcyra: which little Iſland ſeemed to be compaſſed in round with the great enemies fleet. Partau Baſſa at his firſt arriuall there, landed 800 horſemen and a thouſand foot, who ranging vp and downe the Iſland, did great hurt and burnt the verie ſuburbs of the citie: at which time the garriſon ſoldiers ſallying out vpon them with a thou-

Thus the Turks fleet hauing done wonderfull harme in the Venetian territorie, as well in the Iſlands, as vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, inriched with the ſpoile of thoſe countries, and carrying away with them fifteene thouſand moſt miſerable captiues; departing from Corcyra, arriued all in the bay of Corinth (now called the gulfe of Lepanto, where we will for a while leaue them to ride in ſafetie.

The Forces of the confederat Princes meete together at Meſſana.

Don Iohn of Auſtria.

At ſuch time as this great fleet (the terrour of that part of Chriſtendome) firſt put into the Adriatique, Venerius the Venetian Admirall then lying with fifty gallies at Corcyra, and fearing if he ſtayed there longer, to be inforced with ſo ſmall a power to fight againſt ſo ſtrong an Enemie, or els ſo to be ſhut vp, that he could not ioine his forces with the Spaniſh fleet, which was dayly expected; vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to Meſſana, there more commodiouſly and more ſafely to attend the comming of Don Iohn of Auſtria Generall of the Spaniſh forces. At his comming, Columnius met him with twelue gallies (which the Great duke of Florence had ſent in the aid of the Confederats) and three gallies of Malta, who onely were yet come thither, and with great honor receiued him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither alſo with ſixty and two gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the reliefe of Famaguſta, but now called backe againe to ioyne with the reſt of the fleet: and in ſhort time the gallies of Sicilie arriued there alſo. At laſt after long expectation, in the latter end of Auguſt came Don Iohn with the Spaniſh fleet, a man then about foure and twentie yeares old, in whom wanted no honorable parts, his mothers blemiſh only excepted: who although he was moſt deere vnto his father Charles the fifth, yet left he him nothing by his will, but only at his death commended him vnto his ſon Philip, as his brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with ſuch triumph and ioy, that all the former heauines before conceiued of his long ſtaying, was turned into gladneſſe, with moſt aſſured hope of triumphant victory: their doubled forces, and two great fleets joined in one, encouraged them aboue meaſure, filling all the Weſt with the expectation of ſome great matter. The Venetian fleet conſiſted of an hundred and eight gallies, ſix galleaſſes, two tall ſhips, and a great number of ſmall galliots. Vnto them were joined twelue gallies of the Popes, of whom Columnius was Admirall. And with Don Iohn the Generall, and Auria the Spaniſh Admirall, came foureſcore and one gallies, of whom three were from the knights of Malta. In this fleet, beſide mariners, were reckoned to be twenty thouſand fighting men: an army not onely beautifull for ſhew, as conſiſting of moſt choice bodies; but indeed moſt ſtrong and puiſſant, old beaten ſouldiers almoſt throughout it, in euery place intermixed with others of leſſe skill: many knowne to be men of great experience, rich and luſtie bodies, were by name called forth to this ſo honorable ſeruice; and diuers other of great nobilitie, as well old men, as young and luſty gallants, for the naturall hatred they beare vnto the common enemie, came, and as voluntary men cheerfully thruſt themſelues into that religious war: euery of which noblemen, as they were greater by birth or power, ſo had they drawne after them a greater number of their fauorits and followers, ſtrong and able bodies, of their owne charge brauely armed; who ſought for no other pay for their paines and danger, but by ſome notable victorie to eterniſe their names, or honorably to ſpend their liues in ſo iuſt a quarrell, as for the defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion. Amongſt theſe moſt honourable and reſolute men were three of greateſt marke, Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma, in time to be the honor and glory of Italie his natiue country, whoſe vntimely death in the Low-countries euen his honorable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cauſe and worthy deſert accounted amongſt the moſt politique and famous leaders of our age. The ſecond was Franciſcus Maria Prince of Vrbin, a yong man honorably diſcended and of an inuincible courage: and the third Pau. Iordanus Vrſinus, an honorable gentleman of the familie of the Vrſini in Rome.

Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma.

All the power of the confederat Princes thus met together at Meſſana, and all things now in readineſſe, a counſel was called by the General, to reſolue what courſe to take in thoſe moſt dangerous wars againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy: vnto which counſel were admitted only Don Iohn the Generall himſelfe, and Aloyſius Rechezenes, of ſome called Requiſenius great Commendor of Caſtile, the Generals Lieutenant, or rather director of his actions; Sebaſtianus Venerius the Venetian Admirall, and Auguſtinus Barbadicus Generall proueditor, of equall authoritie and reputation with the Admirall, and one Secretarie: Marcus Anthonius Columnius the Popes

Admirall,

A Admirall, with Pompeius Colonna his kinſman. The chiefe point whereon theſe great commanders were to reſolue, was, Whether they ſhould aduenture the generall fortune of a battell againſt ſo ſtrong an enemy, or onely ſeeke to defend the frontiers of their owne dominions? Which queſtion (as all other of like ſort) was of diuers diuerſly phantaſied, euery man pleaſing himſelfe with his owne reaſons. Requiſenius (Don Iohn his chiefe counſellor; without whom he willingly did nothing, and vndoubtedly a man of great valor and experience) ſpeaking firſt, ſaid, That the enemies ſtrength was neceſſarily to be knowne, before they committed all to the fortune of a battel: and that therfore delay was to be vſed, leſt improuident haſt ouerthrew all. Matters of war that were to be decided by the ſword, were (as he ſaid) with great & ſound aduiſe to be adminiſtred, for that the errors of battel, whereby al was to be put in hazard, were B not to be againe amended. He highly commended the aduiſe of Scipio Africanus, who counſelled great commanders, not to fight with the enemie but vpon ſome great aduantage, or elſe thereunto forced by neceſſitie. But as things now ſtood, what opportunitie could be miniſtred, or aduantage taken; the enemie keeping himſelfe cloſe within the bay of Corinth, and no apparant means how to draw him out from thence? Neither that he for his part was of ſo great ſpirit, as within the harbor in place of diſaduantage, without hope, to ſet vpon an enemy in common eſtimation ſtronger than himſelfe: for what diſhonour ſhould they incurre, if hauing receiued ſome notable loſſe, they ſhould be inforced with ſhame to giue ouer the enterpriſe begun? And to beſiege Oricus, Dirrachium, or Caſtrum Novum, frontier townes of the Turks, ſo to draw them out to battell; what were this other than to ſhew a certaine feare and C diſtruſt in themſelues, and to diſcourage the minds of the ſouldiers? for as well the enemy, as the common ſouldier, would forthwith deeme ſuch a poore attempt to proceed of a meere feare, as to make a vain ſhew of ſomething doing, when as they durſt not incounter the enemy in his full ſtrength. As for the other reaſon drawne from Neceſſitie: what neceſſitie had they, ſo deſperatly to ſet vpon the enemie: who vpon the approch of Winter muſt needs in ſhort time lay vp his gallies; and being already in ſafe harbor, would neuer be drawn to the hazard of a battell, eſpecially like hope, like ſtrength, and like danger appearing on both ſides? Wherfore, it were beſt (in his opinion) only to make a great ſhew of their forces, ſo to terrifie the barbarous enemy: but in no caſe to hazard the hope of the whole Chriſtian common-weale, vpon the fortune of a battell. He farther alſo propounded vnto them, the vncertaine euents of D things, the common chance of war, the ſtrength of the enemie, as wel by ſea as by land; with whom they themſelues were not (as he ſaid) indeed comparable: then, what an infinit heap of miſeries was like to ouerwhelme the Chriſtian common-weale, if they ſhould in any thing miſcarrie: and that therefore, ſafe aduiſe was in this caſe to be preferred before that which was attended vpon with greater danger.

On the other ſide, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were farre of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadicus not onely vehemently perſuaded, but moſt inſtantly requeſted the Generall & the reſt of the great commanders, that ſo ſoone as opportunity ſerued, they would commit the matter to the trial of a battel, & not to make that counſell, which their couragious minds might make moſt glorious & E fortunat, by declining of battell to become diſhonourable or fruſtrat. If deſire of honour (ſaid they) moue vs not, ſhall neither theſe things moue vs? the loſſe of ſo great and chargeable a preparation, the ſpoiling of our frontiers, & the inſolencie of our enemies, which we encreaſe by delay? We defend our ſelues and ours, we inuade not them: we go not about to driue the Turke out of his empire; but that we our ſelues be not by him driuen out of our owne countries. Wherefore we ought ſo much the more readily & ſpeedily to thinke of battell, by how much the neceſſity of him is greater that repulſeth a danger, than of him that offreth the ſame. What, are our weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? ſhall the Turkes ſo often prouoke vs, and we ſtill be vnreuenged? ſhall we alwaies ſhew our weapons, & neuer fight? one fortunat battell is able to blot out the infamie of former time, and to fil vs with the hope of future hap- F pineſſe: if nothing elſe, let the verie indignitie of the matter ſtirre vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there, but that the enemy ſwelling with pride, will come forth with his fleet, and giue vs battell? Thinke you that a ſmall diſcredit will inſue to our honour & reputation, if contented with a vain brag, hauing not once skirmiſhed with the enemy, or ſo much as ſeene him, we ſhall return home, to the general ſhame of all Chriſtendome? See how many peſtilent inconueniences will enſue, if we ſhall take this courſe. This manner of proceeding will fill all mens minds with deſpaire: the people will murmure, That they are to no purpoſe oppreſſed with exactions and tributes: the confederat princes (carefull of this war) will ſay, that they haue in vaine wearied themſelues with often embaſſages and care therof: the proud enemy will account our departure, or declining of battel, for a manifeſt victory. The next yere we may look for him again with a greater and a ſtronger fleet, which will not only make a more heauie war, but deſtroy and beare downe all before it: at which time, who can aſſure vs that the Chriſtians ſhall haue the like preparation, if we ſhall now delay to fight? What labour is to be taken, what coſt to be beſtowed, to ſet forth again ſo great a fleet? Vnto theſe cauſes which impoſe vpon vs a neceſſitie and force to fight, is adioined not onely a ſingular regard of our honor, but a moſt notable opportunity alſo offered: we neuer had a greater fleet, nor better furniſhed with men, munition, & all things elſe to be required for the gaining of a notable victory: and who knoweth not, that the Chriſtian gallies are far ſtronger than the Turks? beſides that, the greateſt part of their beſt ſouldiers are in hope of prey gone into Cyprus, who there ſeeking after the ſpoile, and forgetfull of the enemy, without controlment glut themſelues with the pleaſures of that rich Iſland; whereby their fleet is ſo much the weaker. All which things, as they promiſe no hard victory, ſo do they propound vnto vs honor, glory, fame, and moſt honorable rewards; and open vnto vs the way both for the defence of the preſent, and recouerie of that hath been before loſt. What then ſtand we ſtill looking for? or why do we not in Gods name ioyne that battell, which is vnto vs not onely neceſſary, but profitable alſo.

Cornea & Serbellio perſuade the giuing of battell.

Thus much ſaid, ahey began to intreat and beſeech the Generall and the reſt, not longer to ſuffer the Chriſtian common-weale to receiue loſſe vpon loſſe, but to repoſe their onely hope in the good ſucceſſe of one worthy battel: and neuer to look for the like opportunity, if they let ſlip the preſent. This matter of ſo great conſequence, thus throughly debated amongſt the greateſt commanders, they thought it good to heare alſo the opinions of other notable captaines, of no leſſe experience than themſelues (then in the fleet) before they would conclude any thing. Amongſt the reſt, Anthonius Cornea, and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, & for their great wiſedome and valour had in generall reputation of all men; being demanded their opinions; with moſt ſubſtantiall reaſons, declared the neceſſitie of giuing battell, and that it was not ſo dangerous, as to be therefore ſhunned or delaied: forſomuch as that violent enemy was far eaſier to be dealt withall at ſea than by land; where he muſt fight without his huge multitude of men, the Turks chiefe hope, and only means wherby they haue obtained ſo many victories againſt the Chriſtians. And ſo concluded their opinions, with an effectual perſuaſion to ſet forward to Corcyra, and without delay as occaſion ſerued to giue the enemy battel. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was ſhortly after by the Generall and the reſt approued, & a reſolution ſet downe for the giuing of battell: which was no ſooner known, but there was a general reioicing through the army, euery man cheerfully preparing himſelfe to lay down his life in the publicke defence of the Chriſtian common-weale, and that with ſuch an earneſt deſire of battell, that euery day ſeemed now nothing elſe, but a delay of a moſt aſſured victorie.

The confederats put their fleet in order of battell.

Yet before they ſhould come into the ſight of the enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the fleet into the ſea, and there to martiall the ſame, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould euen then preſently haue ioyned battel: to the intent, that by ſuch orderly diſpoſing of their fleet, & by appointing vnto euery man his place he was to keep, they might ſo acquaint them with the order of the battell, as that they ſhould when time ſerued, of themſelues without farther direction, martiall themſelues, and ſo more readily enter into battell. The next day the Admirals brought forth their fleets into the open ſea: in the right wing (which conſiſted of three and fifty gallies) was Auria placed: in the left wing was Auguſtinus Barbadicus with the like number of gallies alſo: and in the middle battel ſtood the Generall with ſeuenty gallies: on the right hand of the Generall ſtood Columnius, and on the left Venerius, his aſſociats, Thus with equall front the fleet ſet forward, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battell. Betwixt the wings and the middle battell, was left no more ſpace but for three gallies to row: in the rereward behind the Generall, followed Requiſenius, the great Commendor of Caſtile, with his gallies: after Columnius followed the Admirall gallie of Genoa, wherin was Alexander Farneſius prince of Parma: and behind Venerius came the Admirall gally of Sauoy, and in her the Prince of Vrbin: in the ſpace betwixt the middle battel and the left wing, was

A placed Paulus Iordanus: and betwixt the middle battell and the right wing, was Petrus Iuſtinianus with the gallies of Malta: vpon the left wing attended Anthonius Canalis: and Quirinus on the right. About halfe a mile behind all the reſt, followed Aluarus Bacianus Marqueſſe of Sancrace, and Admirall of the Neapolitan fleet, with thirtie gallies; a man of great experience in matters at ſea; and now ſo placed, to be at all times readie to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battel, or impreſſion of the enemie ſhould require. The Chriſtians had repoſed great hope in ſix galeaſſes; which furniſhed with great ſtore of ordnance & certain ſelect companies of moſt reſolute ſouldiers, ſeemed rather like caſtles than ſhips. Theſe galeaſſes conducted by Franciſcus Dodus, a moſt expert captaine, were placed about a mile before the fleet; two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: ſo farre B diſtant one from another, as that with equall ſpace they anſwered the whole breadth of the front of the fleet, which was almoſt the ſpace of fiue miles, & ſerued the ſame in ſtead of moſt ſtrong bulwarkes. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not cloſe together, but ſuch a conuenient diſtance one from another, as might ſerue for them at libertie to diſcharge their ordnance when time ſhould require. In the wings, as alſo in the maine battell, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equalitie of the danger they ſhould haue more care to relieue one another, than if they had ſerued apart. Ioannes Cardonius, a moſt valiant captaine, with 8 gallies of Sicilie and two galiots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet to deſcrie what hee might, of the enemies doings, and in his returne to ioyne the one halfe of his gallies to the one wing, and the other halfe to the other.

Six galeaſſes.

C In this ſort they departed from Meſſana, with purpoſe to ſeeke out the enemie: and not long after came to Paxo, where, of a ſmall broile at the firſt, was like to haue riſen a great miſchiefe: for the next day, whileſt Don Iohn ſtaied there to take a view of the Venetian gallies, and how they were furniſhed both of men and munition, he finding them but weakly manned for ſupplying of that want, appointed foure thouſand Spaniards and a thouſand Italians to be put aboord into the Venetian gallies, where moſt need was.

Amongſt theſe ſouldiers, was one company vnder the command of Mutius Tortona their captaine, a man of an vnquiet and furious nature: who going aboord the gallie of Andreas Calergus, firſt fell to words with the captaine of the gallie, and after much ſtir, into plain fight; ſo that in a trice they were altogether by the ears, as well the ſoldiers as the captains: of all which D ſtir, Mutius was the onely author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, ſent the captaine of his own gallie to appeaſe the tumult: who thruſting himſelfe into the midſt of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury fouly intreated, & diuers of them that came with him ſhrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himſelfe alſo of an hot nature) taking as done in diſgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedingly moued; to the terrour of others, cauſed Mutius & his enſigne-bearer to be hanged vp at the yards arme of the ſame gallie, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall alſo taking this execution in euill part, full of choler and indignation, grieuouſly complained, That he himſelfe as Generall, was therein not a little wronged, and that it became euery commander, to know what belonged to his place, and not to incroach vpon his betters: ſo ſhould the conditions of the league be the better kept, if E euery commander could keep himſelf within the bounds of his own authority. Venerius he ſaid, (whoſe authority was inferiour vnto his) could not of right without his command determine any thing againſt Mutius a Spaniſh captain: And that therin his honor was empaired: for which if he had not a publique and honorable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redreſſe his wrong, and the league being broken, to carrie away with him the kings gallies. Neither wanted there ſome, who fauouring Don Iohn his quarrell, and angrie with the Venetians, layed ſtill more coles on the fire that was alreadie too great. Hereunto Venerius ſent word vnto the Generall, That he ſhould do well to moderat his anger, and at leiſure to aduiſe himſelfe, & better to vnderſtand the matter, ſo ſhould he plainly ſee, that there was neuer more iuſt or wholſome execution done vpon any, than vpon thoſe mutinous perſons: But if he, carried away with the heat of youth, ſhould attempt any more violent courſe than ſtood with the common quiet, it were not to be maruelled if hee afterward repented. He (as hee ſaid) was alſo in armes, and readie to ſhew himſelfe a man. The matter was growne to that heat, that it was not onely not farre from the breaking off of the league, but euen at the point to haue ſet all on a broile, and to haue put the whole fleet in danger: had not Columnius the Popes Admirall, againſt

this tempeſt oppoſed himſelfe: he with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of the Generall, and to appeaſe his anger: telling him, That the common enemy would hardly be withſtood by them al, being at vnitie and concord amongſt themſelues; but if vnto the forraine danger were alſo ioyned domeſticall diſcord, then were the Chriſtian common-wealth vndone. But if he would moderat his anger, and more regard the honor and credit of the Venetian Admirall, than the puniſhment of a ſeditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, and enemies vnto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and ſtayedneſſe: yea, that howſoeuer the matter was done, it could not be now vndone. But whatſoeuer Venerius had done, was in his opinion iuſtly done: That it was alwaies ſo accounted and obſerued, that when many princes ioyned their forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the war, nothing was to be done without the command of the Generall: but in matters belonging to the priuat gouernement of euery mans regiment, euery Generall had power of life and death ouer them that were vnder his command: which to be ſo, was as hee ſaid hereby to be vnderſtood. King Philip was king of many kingdoms, & that he might long ſo be, he heartily wiſhed: now if any Millanoies had committed any capitall crime worthie death in the kingdome of Naples, ſhould the iudgement of that crime be of right to be referred vnto the king himſelfe, as the chiefe ſoueraigne? or vnto the Gouernor of Millaine, where the offender was borne? or rather to the ciuill magiſtrat of Naples, in whoſe iuriſdiction the fault was committed, and ſo of right there to be executed? What difference was there then, but that Mutius might rightly ſeeme to haue beene iuſtly puniſhed by Venerius, who although he were a Spaniſh captaine, had yet raiſed a mutinie in a Venetian gallie, which was vnder the command of the Venetian Admirall. Beſide that, the diſcipline of war ſometime required a ſeuere and exemplarie kind of puniſhment: for which cauſe it was both notably and truly ſaid of Clearchus, That a Generall ought to be more feared of his ſouldiers, than the enemy: and that amongſt the antient Romanes it had beene the cuſtome, euen for priuate men with more ſeuere puniſhment to reſtraine the factious citizen, than the moſt cruell enemy; that the fact was not ſo much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it: That it was the dutie of commanders to withſtand the madneſſe of the mutinous. The author of ſedition and tumult he ſaid had ſuffered but condigne puniſhment to his fact: who if he had eſcaped vnpuniſhed, would but haue bin the more diſordered; but now by his exemplarie puniſhment, would deter others from the like inſolencie. Beſides that, the externall danger was ſuch, as ought to reconcile them, were they neuer ſo much enemies: That ſuch men as they were, ſhould aboue al things regard what might profit or hurt the common cauſe; in contemplation whereof all priuat iniuries were to be remitted: and the rather, for that the honor and diſhonour of the good or bad ſucceſſe of ſuch an important action ſhould redound vnto themſelues, but eſpecially vnto the Generall. His owne duty he had as he ſaid diſcharged, in dealing ſo plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more but pray vnto God, with mercifull eye to behold the troubled Chriſtian common-weale in ſuch a moſt dangerous time.

Don Iohn ſtill beareth a grudge againſt Venerius.

Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor a notable man.

Thus was the mutinie at Paxo by the great labor of Columnius hardly appeaſed: neuertheleſſe Don Iohn could not afterwards indure to participat vnto Venerius his counſels, or ſo much as to come in his company: all was done by Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor. This Barbadicus was not inferiour to Venerius in courage and valour, but far beyond him in diſcretion; a tall and goodly perſonage, well coloured, his beard grizie, though not for age, for why he was not aboue fiftie yeares old: beſides that, in his eyes and countenance appeared a viuacitie or liuelineſſe of ſpirit; in his very gate and comely motion of his bodie, hee carried a certaine grace and maieſtie: his talke and ſpeech was alwaies calme and temperate, his counſell graue and ſound; ſo that hee was both greatly honoured and beloued of all men: his chiefe endeauour alſo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo well begun by Columnius. And ſo all things brought into ſome reaſonable tearmes, they departed from Paxo, and came to Corcyra; the ſpoile whereof well declared the enemies late beeing there. From thence they departed to Cephalenia: where they by Letters from Pau. Contarenus, Gouernour of Zacynthus, were aduertiſed, That the Turkes fleete of three hundred and three and thirtie ſaile, of one ſort and other, lay in the gulfe of Corinth, now called the gulfe of Lepanto. Whereupon they ſhortly after remooued, with purpoſe to haue gone to Petala, an hauen oppoſite ouer againſt the Iſlands (or rather rockes) called Echinades,

The Chriſtian fleet at Cephalenia.

A Echinades, but now Corzulares, and ſo to the Bay of Corinth, to draw the enemie forth to battell: but ſtaied with contrary windes, they put backe againe into the valley of Alexandria, another Port in the Iſland of Cephalenia: from whence they afterward departed to the Iſlands Corzulares, where by the way they vnderſtood by letters out of Crete, That Famaguſta was loſt: with which bad newes they were no whit diſcouraged, but rather inflamed with the deſire of reuenge. From the Iſlands they went to Galanga, a good harbour, where they ſtayed one night, purpoſing the next day to haue gone to the mouth of the gulfe of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battell.

The Turkes Baſſaes Partau and Haly, who then lay in good ſafetie within the gulfe, hearing of the approch of the Chriſtian fleet, began to conſult with the reſt of their moſt expert captains, B Whether to giue the Chriſtians battell, or to keepe themſelues ſtill within their ſafe harbour: vpon which doubt they were amongſt themſelues of diuers opinions. Amongſt the reſt Chirocbe a man of great yeares and authoritie, and withall a moſt noble captaine, exhorted the Baſſaes, in no caſe, when no need was, vpon a vaine glorie to aduenture all to the fortune of an vncertain battell: it was (as he ſaid) the part of wiſe and worthy commanders, to moderat with reaſon their happy fortunes, for that thereunto were incident many accidents whereby their former felicity might be diſgraced: they had already run alongſt the enemies coaſts, ſpoyled the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honor & greater ſpoile in ſafety returned, hauing increaſed the Turkiſh empire with many ſtrong townes of the enemies: the Iſland of C Cyprus was with wonderfull good fortune brought vnder the Turks obeiſance, the enemies great prouiſion at ſea fruſtrated, in ſuch ſort, as that hauing loſt diuers of their gallies, they were neuer yet able to draw their ſwords: they had with their fleet at their pleaſure romed vp and downe the Adraticke, & diſplayed their victorious enſignes almoſt vnto the very citie of Venice.
What could they then deuiſe or wiſh for more honourable or glorious, than with the ſafety of their fleet, yea without any loſſe at all, to haue performed ſo great matters? Now the three generall commanders of the enemies fleet to be ſo at diſcord among themſelues, as that they were ready to fall in ſunder of themſelues; who now vpon the approch of Winter, & for want of victuall, muſt needs in few daies return home with their fleet, neuer after to meet again with the like ſtrength at ſea: and therefore to what purpoſe were it, by force of armes and vncertaine D battell, with danger to ſeeke for the ſoueraigntie & command of the ſea, which would forthwith of it ſelfe without any danger fall vnto them? Neither ſhould they by the doubtfull victorie ſo much increaſe their honour, as by the vncertaine euent of a battell blemiſh the ſame, if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well. And that therefore they ſhould do well to take heed, that in ſeeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honor already gained; but wholeſomely delay the war, and keep themſelues in ſafety with their fleet within the gulfe, and not to goe out at the enemies pleaſure, but when they ſhould ſee good themſelues, at ſuch time as the enemy was not ſo well prouided: ſo ſhould they (as hee ſaid) without any great labour or danger attaine to the full of their owne deſires.

Chirocbe diſſuadeth the Baſſaes from giuing battel vnto the Chriſtians Partau Baſſa was of opinion, That the Chriſtians would not at all offer him battell: which E opinion the Chriſtians had alſo of him: and in this queſtion, for giuing or not giuing of battel, ſeemed neither to approue nor diſlike that Chirocbe had ſo grauely ſpoken, but as a man indifferent & loth to incurre any blame, ſhewed himſelfe ready either to ſtay or to ſet forward, as ſhould be thought beſt by the greater part. But Haly Baſſa, a man of an hoter ſpirit, and the great champiō of the Turks, could not indure to heare of any delay, but of preſent battel. The pleaſure of Selymus, the hope of victory, the remembrance of the diſpleaſure Piall Baſſa had the laſt yeare incurred, for not giuing the Chriſtians battell, induced him now in no caſe to refuſe battel, but forthwith to go out of the gulfe, & to accept therof, if it were offred. In which his opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous pyrat, and of great account among the Turks: who in a ſwift galliot taking view of the Chriſtian fleet, had reported F it to be much leſſe than indeed it was; deceiued as was afterward thought, by not taking full view therof, by reaſon of his poſting haſt; or els blinded by the Iſland, which lying behind the fleet, ſuffered him not perfectly to deſcry the ſame. Vpon which report there was great reioycing, amongſt the Turks, who now after their accuſtomed manner dreamed of nothing but victory & ſpoile. So that Haly, vainly perſuaded that his fleet was both the greater and ſtronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Chriſtians vpon firſt ſight of the Turks fleet would either retire and ſaue themſelues by ſhamefull flight: or elſe in aduenturing battell at ſo great ods, by their fooliſh hardineſſe receiue a notable ouerthrow. This opinion of the Baſſa was alſo not a little confirmed by the perſuaſion of Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his ſonne, Vluzales, and Chais-Beg, Gouernor of Smyrna, al men of great marke & experience, eſpecially in matters at ſea. And although Partau the other Baſſa ſtood wauering, as a man in doubt, and Chiroche Gouernour of Alexandria, with Carabuzes Gouernor of Silicia, and Mechmet Gouernor of Euboea, men of no leſſe worth than the other, vpon better conſideration, were of a quite contrary minde, for not giuing the Chriſtians battell: yet ſuch was the authoritie of Haly, or rather his opportunitie, forced to his owne Deſtinie, that his opinion preuailed; ſo that now out they needs muſt, and fight. Albeit that two other eſpials ſent out after Caracoza, and hauing more perfectly viewed the fleet, returning with ſpeed, told the Baſſaes, as truth was, That the Chriſtians very ſtrong and well appointed, were comming with enſignes diſplayed of purpoſe to fight: and that their fleet was in number much greater than was before ſuppoſed. With which newes ſo far contrary to their expectation, the Baſſaes were exceedingly troubled: and demanding whether the formoſt gallies were all Venetians or not: and being anſwered, that they were intermixt, ſome Venetians, ſome Spaniſh, and of the other Weſtern countries; they began to doubt the worſt, and became exceeding penſiue. Neuertheleſſe knowing themſelues to be of all things well furniſhed, hauing now victualled in the bay of Corinth, and there alſo taken in twelue thouſand Ianizaries and Spahies, drawn out of the garriſons of Ætolia, Acarnania, Peloponeſus, and the other countries thereby, all reſolute men, and foure thouſand other common ſouldiers, & that they could not now with their honor ſhrinke back, they held it ſtil for the beſt, to hold on their former reſolution for the giuing of the Chriſtians battell. Yet before their ſetting forward, calling together the captains and chiefe commanders of the fleet, Partau the more to incourage them, ſpake vnto them as followeth.

The Turkes reſolue to giue the Chriſtians battell.

Partau Baſſa encourageth the Turks.

Wee are to fight (ſaid hee) *fellowes in armes, with that kind of men whome our anceſtours haue driuen out of Eubœa, the Rhodes, Mitylene, Peloponeſus, and Tripolis, and wee our ſelues but yeſterday out of the famous Iſland of Cyprus: whoſe cities and ſtrong townes, in number infinite, our Emperour hath, as the rewards of his warres: whome we haue alwayes vanquiſhed as well by ſea as by land: and ſhall it then now repent you, that you in this warre, embrued in the Chriſtian bloud, haue ſunke or taken many of their Ships and Gallies? That you haue carried away great and rich ſpoils? That you haue taken whole Iſlands and Cities at the firſt aſſault? That we haue by proofe ſhewed vnto the World what force is in the Turke to ſubdue ſtrong Cities and Townes? and what little power is in the Chriſtians to defend the ſame? What direction brought vs victory before, the ſame ſhall alſo at this preſent giue vs the like. Not to ſpeake of that, that we farre excell them both in number of men and gallies, this is more to be reckoned of, that we excell them in valour and proweſſe: for you beeing old expert ſouldiers, from your infancie trained vp in the warres, hardened in infinite battels, and full of courage and ſtrength, ſhall fight againſt weake, freſh-water, and effeminat ſouldiers; who entertained for pay (of the refuſe of all nations) know nothing belonging to the warres; or forcibly preſſed out of cities, ſerue not becauſe they would, but becauſe they muſt neither will nor chooſe. But not to ſpeake more of the manner of the Chriſtian ſouldiers, who are nothing elſe than the perpetuall excercise of your renowne and proweſſe: and to come vnto him, vnder whoſe fortune and conduct they ſerue. What ſhould I ſay? Should I compare either of vs (who haue ſpent our liues in victories and triumphs: who borne and brought vp amongſt armes, haue with our right hands gained vnto our ſelues honour and fame) with this ſtripling and halfe moneths captaine, who neuer ſaw battels but theſe? who in a leſſe matter neuer ſhewed proofe of himſelfe, why ſhould he be accounted of in a greater? who in ſo weightie a cauſe needeth a tutour: and ſuch a one, as indeed beareth the name of a Generall, more for his honour, than for any worth in himſelfe. Beſides, amongſt the enemies is ſuch diſſention, that euerie man regardeth his owne priuat, ſerueth as pleaſeth himſelfe, contemneth, and is contemned: whereas with vs is ſuch conſent, that it cannot be deuiſed, how the ſouldiers in generall ſhould more truſt their commanders, or the commanders their ſouldiers. What things were by the diſcipline of warre or carefulneſſe of a Generall to be prepared, all thoſe you haue abundantly and plentifully in readineſſe: onely this laſt warlike labour remaineth; which once diſpatched, our enemies ſhall be diſcomfited euen in that wherein their greateſt confidence reſteth. They ſhall be diſpoiled of their honour and trafficke at ſea: and that * citie once ſubdued, which is alone the glorie of the ſea, there ſhall be no hope left*

A for the Chriſtians, whether by ſea or land: and (that we haue alwaies wiſhed) Italie, faire Italie (wherin theſe matters are plotted againſt vs) ſhall be in our hand and power: wherefore let vs with ſuch courage aſſaile our enemies, as beſeemeth moſt victorious conquerors, men ſo many times conquered: And ſo ſet forward, as if you ſaw our Emperor himſelfe encouraging you, and giuing you the ſignal of battel; of his bountie, and the preſent victorie, expecting all felicitie and bliſſe.

This comfortable ſpeech with great grauitie deliuered by the Baſſa, ſo encouraged the Turks, as that they all with one voice and mind ſeemed to deſire nothing more than battel: for they ſtill poſſeſſed with the firſt report of Caracoza, and encouraged by the Baſſa's ſpeech, were in good hope to haue fought the battell vpon great aduantage, and therefore thought vpon nothing but preſent victorie. B Whereupon ſetting forward with great cheerefulneſſe, they came out of the gulfe, and ſhaped their courſe for the Iſlands Echinades, about midway betwixt Lepanto and Patras, before little Iſlands, or rather obſcure rocks, ſcarcely appearing in the ſea, but now to be made famous thorowout the world, by the moſt notable battell that euer was fought in thoſe ſeas.

The Turks fleet commeth out of the gulfe of Lepanto.
The Iſlands Echinades, or Corzulares.

The Chriſtians alſo comming ſtill on towards the enemie, the ſeuenth of October in the afternoone vnderſtood by their eſpials, that the Turks fleet was comming, and euen now at hand: whereupon the Generall commanded the great Enſigne of the Confederats (the appointed ſignall of battell) to be forthwith diſplaid, and a great warning piece to be ſhot off out of C his Admirall gallie. And himſelfe gliſtering all in bright armor, with Cardona Admirall of Sicilia, and Soto his ſecretarie, in a long boat went to all the ſquadrons of the fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerefull countenance to follow their leaders, and to play the men: remembring, that they that day carried in their hands the wealth, honour, glorie, and libertie of their countries, yea and the verie religion of their forefathers; and that that daies victorie would bring vnto them and theirs perpetuall felicitie: whereas otherwiſe, if they ſhould as cowards ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome and vanquiſhed, it would be vnto them the beginning of all manner of moſt wofull calamities. To which and other his like ſpeeches, the Captaines and ſouldiers (before of themſelues cheerefull enough) in euery place where hee came, gaue ſuch applauſe with the ioyfull crie of Victorie, Victorie, ſo often and ſo cheerefull in all D places reſounded, as that it was taken as a luckie aboadment of the glorious victorie ſhortly after enſuing. In like manner Auria in the right wing, and Barbadicus in the left (for the fleet kept the ſame order that they had appointed before at Meſſana) ceaſed not by all comfortable ſpeeches to encourage their followers: ſhewing vnto them, That now the time was come they ſo long wiſhed for, wherein they not oppreſſed with multitude, might at length ſhew their true valour againſt the falſe and faithleſſe enemies; who being indeed nothing els but baſe & contemptible ſlaues borne to bondage, and hauing loſt their owne libertie, came to impugne the libertie of others; bringing with them a greater terror of their name, than valour of their perſons: and that therefore, if euer, they would now ſhew themſelues valiant and couragious, and that day, wherein of all others true force was to be ſeene, to abate the pride of the barba- E rous and cruell enemie, and to make their reioicing for the conqueſt of Cyprus ſhort, before they had well taſted the pleaſure thereof. At which time alſo, the Captaines generally thorowout the fleet, with cheerefull countenances and couragious ſpeech encouraged their ſouldiers; leauing nothing vnſaid that might hearten them on, or vndone, that might further the victorie.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themſelues (although it was fallen out much contrarie to their expectation, to ſee the Chriſtians, who they before thought durſt not haue ſhewed themſelues, now readie to dare them battell) but encouraged with their former victories, and furthered with a faire gale of wind, came on proudly with their fleet orderly and gallantly ſet after their wonted manner in forme of a Croiſant or halfe-Moon, their fortunat enſigne: neuertheleſſe in their comming on they were much troubled with the brightneſſe of the Sun, which then ſhining full in their faces, with his bright beames ſo dazled their eies, that they could not well ſee how to their moſt aduantage to direct their gallies. In this fleet of the Turks were two hundred and fifty gallies, fifty galiots, and twenty brigadines & other ſmall veſſels: all which a far off ſhewed like a thicke wood, but comming neere hand, preſented (as we ſaid) the forme of a Croiſant. The middle battell in number much like the Chriſtians, was conducted by the great Baſſa's Haly and Partau, attended vpon with Agan Maſter of the Turks Arſenall; Muſtapha Zelibi the Treaſurer; Achmat Bay, with Mahomet his younger brother, the ſonnes of Haly: G Achmat Aga Gouernor of Teuthrania: Aſſis Caiga Gouernor of Calipolis: Caracoza, Caſſanes the ſonne of Barbaruſſa; Malamur Gouernour of Mitylene: Dely Solyman Gider Captaine of Chios; Caſſambeius Gouernour of the Rhodes; Proui Aga Captaine of Nauplium; Giaper Zelibi Preſident of Calabra, Dordagnan, Dondomeni, and many others, whoſe barbarous names I purpoſely omit: all men of great account and place, and for their experience at ſea the chiefe ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire. The right wing was by the appointment of the Baſſa's commanded by Mahomet Bey with fiftie ſix gallies, with whome were alſo many worthie Captaines; and in the left wing was Vluzales the old Arch-pyrat, but now the Vice-Roy of Algiers, with ninetie fiue Gallies, accompanied with Caraiolo and Arabey his two ſonnes, H with a multitude of pyrats, men of his owne profeſſion, but moſt valiant and expert ſouldiours. In the reereward came Amurates Dragut, with thirtie Gallies, and diuers other ſmall veſſels.

The great and notable battell betweene the Turks and the Christians, commonly called, The battell of Lepanto.

Now was the day well ſpent, when both the fleets were readie to giue battell; the Enemie ſtil comming on almoſt in the ſame order that the Chriſtians did: for their middle battel came directly againſt our middle battel, and their wings againſt ours. So the ſignal of battel on both ſides giuen by the ſhooting off of certain great pieces: the Turks after their manner comming on with an hideous cry, firſt light vpon the ſix galeaſſes, which lying at anchor almoſt a mile before the fleet, as moſt ſtrong bulwarks, out of their forecaſtles poured out their murthering ſhot vpon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their paſſing by ſo plagued them, I by diſcharging their whole broad ſides, firſt the one, and eftſoons the other vpon them, that hauing receiued great loſſe, and diuers of their gallies ſunke, they were inforced to breake their order, and to fall further off. Which ſo much the more troubled the Turkes, for that they had before ſuppoſed, thoſe great carts & vnſeruiceable ſhips (as they accounted of them) to haue caried little or no great ordnance on their ſides, after the maner of their gallies: for the vſe of the galeaſſes was not vnto the Turks known, vntil now that they had receiued from them moſt notable harme: which as it was the beginning of their miſery, ſo was it vnto the Chriſtians of greateſt importance for the gaining of the victorie. At which time alſo the wind, which al that day had much fauoured the Turkes, was now (God no doubt fighting his owne battell) come about to the Weſt, and with a pleaſant gale in the time of the fight carried the ſmoke K of the great ordnance vpon the Turks, to their no ſmall diſaduantage. Yet for all this loſſe and diſorder in their fleet, the fierce enemie with wonderfull pertinacie paſſing by theſe galleaſſes, quickly repaired again to their places, & made good their diſordred ſquadrons, and withal their force aſſailed the Chriſtian fleet. The trumpets, drums, & other inſtruments of warre had ſcarcely wel ſounded, when all ſhook with confuſed cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillery, and other noiſe of the mariners & ſeamen: wherwith many were ſo aſtonied as if they had bin both deaf and blind, hauing vpon the ſudden almoſt loſt the vſe both of their ſight & hearing. At which very inſtant a man might haue ſeen the whole ſhowers as it were of arrows and darts mixt with the deadly ſhot, flying from the one fleet to the other; the maſts broken, the ſaile-yards ſtrucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confuſed with horror and feare. Haly beholding the Admiral gally (which was eaſie to be known by the flag) & vſing the ſurpaſſing cheerfulnes of his mariners & rowers, ran vpon her with ſuch violence as if he would haue preſently ſtemmed her: but being with like force incountred by the Admirall, they met together with ſuch violence, that both their beaks were with the feaze broken off, and ſo fel into the ſea. There began a moſt cruell fight betwixt theſe two great commanders, who had before drawne vnto them the ſtrongeſt gallies in their fleets, and the choiſeſt men in their armies. In the Admirall gallie of the Chriſtians were 400 ſelect men pickt out of the whole army, moſt of them Captains & Antients, men of approued valor; who not only valiantly repulſed the furious enemies, but with greater courage inforced them to ſhrinke backe, and preſſing hard vpon them, entred the gallie euen to the main maſt; where the enemy ſtrengthned with new ſupply, fought couragiouſly, repulſed the Spaniards, and cleered again their gallie. Many were there wounded on both ſides, and many ſlain. Don Iohn ſeeing his men giue way, ſent in new ſupply; wherewith the other encouraged, beſtirred themſelues more luſtily than before, and hardly charge the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The battell was like vnto the ebbing and flowing of the ſea: thrice the Turks were driuen euen vnto the maine maſt, and thrice ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, they with great ſlaughter repulſed the Chriſtians back againe.

Venerius perceiuing the danger of the General, was about to haue aſſailed the poupe of Haly his gallie, ſo to haue indangered her, being ſet vpon both before and abathe: but in comming thither he was incountred by Partau the other Baſſa, who with a companie of gallies oppoſed himſelfe againſt him, and that with ſuch celeritie, that hauing made ſhew as if he would haue charged him afront, he by and by ſet vpon his ſide. Which vnexpected manner of fight ſo ſuddenly faſhioned, at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians; who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themſelues. Venerius (vpon whoſe valor the Venetian State reſted) gallantly armed, not only incouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himſelf in the midſt of them fighting; whoſe great honor much moued the mindes of his ſoldiers, but his reuerend yeres more; to ſee him (being aboue 77 yeres old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthful commander, in the very face of the greateſt danger. The fierce enemy hauing ſlaine many of the Chriſtians, preſſed on more furiouſly, & fighting cloſe together, entred the prow of Venerius his gally now bared of defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valor oppreſſed the Venetians: who had there no dout bin ouercome, had not Ioannes Lauretanus and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant captains, and lying not far off, ſpeedily come to their reliefe. By whoſe comming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered; ſo that they which a little before fiercely aſſailed the Venetian gallies, were now glad to defend their owne: ſo for a ſpace the fight ſtood indifferent, but in proceſſe of the battell, thoſe two worthie captaines, whileſt they alſo performe the parts of moſt reſolute ſouldiers, were both ſlain; ſhot through with ſmal ſhot. The fall of theſe notable men did rather enrage than diſcourage the minds of their ſoldiers; ſo that blinded as it were with fury, and ſuddenly become other men, they deſperatly preſſed in vpon the Turks: ſo that whileſt they on the one ſide kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turned from them that were euen at the point to haue been vanquiſhed, vpon the victors; and our men after great ſlaughter of the Turks, tooke two of their gallies: Partau the Baſſa in a long boat eſcaped the danger, and ſo got him out of the battell. Not farre off thence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant Chiefetaine hardly aſſailed other of the Turks gallies, and made amongſt them great ſlaughter: one ſingled from the reſt, he tooke, and diſordred the other. Lignius the Admirall of Genoa with like courage thruſt himſelfe into the thickeſt of the enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an enemie fell about the Prince of Parma, Rueres, Vrſinus, Cornea, and Iuſtinianus; who for their preſent honor, and future fame, fought moſt couragiouſly.

Venerius comming to the relief of Don Iohn is incountered by Partau Baſſa.

Lauretanus & Malipetra ſlaine.

At which time Chiroche or Sirocke (of ſome called Mahomet Bey) with his right wing with great confidence came forward againſt the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the galleaſſes, was from out of them miſerably beaten with the great ordnance, hauing many of his men ſlaine, and diuers of his gallies ſunke and torn, few of the hugie and deadly ſhot falling in vaine into the ſea, by reaſon of the thicke ſtanding of the Turks gallies: where alſo diuers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wildfire caſt into their gallies out of the tops of the galeaſſes. Chiroche to auoid the danger of the galeaſſes, & to ſhun the dangerous ſhelfe betwixt him and the main (which the riuer Achelous running betweene the borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the ſea, maketh) ſent a great part of his gallies vnder the conduct of one Alis a notable renogat of Genoa, to caſt about aloofe vpon the right hand, and ſo to come vpon the backe of Barbadicus the leader of the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet. Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, and with their prows receiued the firſt onſet. The great ordnance firſt on both ſides diſcharged, diuers of the gallies grapled faſt together, in ſuch ſort, as that they incountred one another not with their miſſiue weapons onely (as with their ſmall ſhot, arrowes, and darts) but with their drawne ſwords foot to foot. Amongſt the reſt, the fight of two of the Chriſtian gallies was moſt notable; in the one was Barbadicus himſelfe, in the other Marcus Ciconia, vpon whom fell ſix of the enemies Gallies, and vpon Barbadicus fiue; who although they were on euery ſide diſtreſſed with a moſt doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they moſt valiantly with worthie reſolution endure the ſame. In the furie of this battell, Barbadicus encouraging his ſouldiers, and fighting himſelfe euen there where moſt danger was, was hit in the left eye with an arrow, and ſo ſtrucke into the braine almoſt through the head: wherewith falling preſently downe, he was taken vp for dead; howbeit he died not thereof vntill three dayes after. The ſuppoſed death of this worthie man much troubled the Chriſtians, and both the armies felt his fall (ſuch force there is in the valour of one worthie man) for the Turks now as conquerours luſtily boorded the galley, troubled with the loſſe of the Captaine, and the Venetians as men diſcouraged gaue way: the galley had there vndoubtedly beene loſt, had not Federicus Nanius and Syluius Porcia with their gallies ſpeedily come to her reliefe: by whoſe comming in ſuch an altoration was made, as that the galley before halfe taken, was not only cleered, but diuers of the Turks gallies alſo boorded, and ſome of them taken, not without the great ſlaughter of the Turkes. In this ſo hard and mortall a conflict, Syluius was grieuouſly wounded in the thigh and in his right ſide. It is reported of Barbadicus, That lying that euening at the point of death, the battell then ended, he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the victorie: and being told that the Chriſtians had got it, and that the Turkes fleet was moſt part taken, and the reſt ſunke or burnt; he with his eyes caſt vp to heauen, gaue vnto God immortall thanks therefore, and not long after joyfully departed this life, to liue in bliſſe for euer.

Ciconia hardly beſet, and in danger to haue been loſt, is relieued.

Ciconia in the meane time hardly beſet with ſix of the enemies gallies, (as we haue before ſaid) was himſelfe ſore burnt with wild-fire and hurt in the face; and hauing endured a long and terrible fight, was now euen at the point to haue been loſt; when ſudden reliefe comming in, he was now contrarie to all hope ſaued, and therewith ſo much encouraged, that with his wearie and wounded ſouldiers, as men from death reuiued, he afreſh charged the enemie, and tooke one of his principall gallies, with one of the Turks faireſt enſignes, which in the Venetian Armorie is yet there to be ſeene: of his worthy valour, his honeſt wounds in his face and the fore part of his bodie, were moſt certaine and vndoubted witneſſes.

Not far off, in the ſame wing Ioannes Contarenus an honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great ſhot exceeding great harme amongſt the Turkes gallies: which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith inraged, ran ſo fiercely vpon the ſide of Contarenus his gallie, that with his beake he had wel neere ſtemmed her; & preſently grapling faſt with her, was like to haue borded her: whom neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians notably repulſed, with greater ſlaughter than was thought poſſible for ſo ſmall a number to haue made: neither did the enemies fal vnreuenged, but all imbrued with the bloud of the Chriſtians. Seldome hath bin ſeene a more cruel fight, or more reſolute Captaines to incounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time ſtood doubtfull, the hope of the Chriſtians increaſed vpon two cauſes, for which the courage of the enemy quailed: firſt for that many of the Turkes being ſlaine or wounded, they were brought to a ſmal number; then for that both parties ſaw Chiroche himſelfe ſlaine: from which time the enemy, aſwel deſtitute of a leader to conduct thē, as of freſh ſupplies to relieue them, began to be cut down right, or taken. Which their danger was the more increaſed, becauſe the gally bulged with the great ſhot, was now leake, & in danger to ſinke: wherefore the Turks in that wing ouercome with diſpaire, began to thinke rather how to ſaue themſelues by flight than by fight, repoſing their truſt in nothing more than in the neernes of the main. But as they were turning about toward the ſhore, they were preuented by the Chriſtians: who entring the gally, and hauing ſlaine or driuen ouerboord almoſt all that were left, tooke Chiroche, yet breathing, but halfe dead; and ſeeing ſmal hope of his life, with freſh wounds made an end of him.

Chiroche ſlaine, and his Galley taken.

A hard and doubtfull battell.

Diuers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offered vnto euery man his enemy, ſo he fought; according as euery mans diſpoſition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with mo or fewer enemies, ſo was there here and there ſometime victorie, and ſometime loſſe. Many fights were in ſundrie places ſeene mingled together: ſome gallies whiles they run to ſtem others, are themſelues by others ſtemmed: ſome, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gallie or other, ſuddenly take them: other ſome, as if they had been of neither part, row vp and downe betwixt the battells. The chance of war in one place lifteth vp the vanquiſhed, and in another ouerthroweth the victorious: all was full of terror, error, ſorrow, and confuſion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Chriſtians at length began to appeare much ſuperior both in courage and ſtrength; and the Turks ſeemed now rather to defend themſelues, than to aſſaile their enemies.

Bacianus in the rereward intentiuely marked all the whole fight, and euer as need required, ſent in preſent aid, without reſpect whether they were the Popes gallies, the king of Spaines, or the Venetians, that were diſtreſſed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks ſeeing the Chriſtian Generals gallie hardly charged on the prow by Haly Baſſa, to be almoſt bared of defendants in the poupe, all the ſoldiers hauing their hands full before, were about to haue boorded her abaſte, and to that purpoſe were fetching a compaſſe about her: Which Bacianus quickly perceiuing, gliſtering in bright armour came ſpeedily in with certaine gallies, and by oppoſing of himſelfe againſt them, ſtaied their courſe. In all the battell was not ſeene a more cruell fight; for hauing diſcharged many volleys of ſhot, and arrowes and darts without number, they grapled at length together, and came to the ſword, where with the formoſt, Bacianus not only with words, but with his preſence and valour wonderfully encouraged his ſoldiers, hauing receiued in his targuet of proofe two ſmall ſhot. Many were on both ſides ſlain. The Spaniards attempting ſundrie times to haue entred the Turks gallies, were with great loſſe repulſed: but not giuing it ſo ouer, neither giuing the enemie leaue to breath, or ſo much as to looke behind him, valor was vanquiſhed by pertinacie, and the Spaniards hauing ouerthrown and ſlaine their enemies, enioyed their gallies.

Now had Don Iohn with like courage and ſtrength, but with doubtful victory, fought three houres and more with Haly Baſſa: when after ſo dreadfull and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts giuen and receiued, our men began to faint, and brought to the vttermoſt of their deuoire, were in danger to haue bin ouercome, had not Don Iohn betaken himſelfe vnto his onely and laſt refuge. He had (as is before ſaid) reſerued vnder the hatches 400 of his beſt and ſelect ſoldiers, for their valor choſen out of the whole army againſt all the euents of ſo long and dangerous a battell: theſe men attentiuely attending euery becke of Don Iohn, vpon ſigne giuen, as was before appointed, ſuddenly ſtart out, and with a terrible crie and deſperat onſet aſſailed the enemie, before almoſt ſpent with labor and wounds. This freſh and vnexpected company ſo ſuddenly grown vp, firſt aſtonied, and afterwards confounded, & with a great ſlaughter vanquiſhed the Turks, and poſſeſſed the gallie. The Baſſa deadly wounded in the head with a ſhot, and all imbrued with bloud, was taken, and as a joyfull ſpectacle brought to Don Iohn; who ſeeing him readie to breathe his laſt, commanded him to be diſpoiled of his armor, and his head ſtrucke off. Which preſently ſet vpon the point of a ſpeare, he for a ſpace held vp aloft with his owne hand, as a trophie of his victorie, as alſo with the ſight thereof to ſtrike a terror into the minds of the other Turkes, who in the other gallies faſt by fought yet right valiantly: neither was he therein deceiued; for the Turks beholding the knowne countenance of the Baſſa their late General, and a flag of the croſſe ſet vp in the top of his gally, and the noiſe of the Chriſtians, crying Victorie, running thorow the army; were therewith ſo diſcouraged, that confounded with feare they turned their gallies and with might and main made toward the land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus, yet breathing with the late ſlaughter of the Turkes, perceiuing, with their gallies hardly purſued the flying enemie, and ſunke and tooke diuers of their gallies. Partau his ſon by the ſtaying of the reſt got time to run his gallie on ground, and ſo forſaking her, ſaued himſelfe and his men by running aſhore: ſo did alſo diuers others run themſelues aground and forſake their gallies, which preſently became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In this hot conflict Caracoza the famous pyrat (who abiuring the Chriſtian religion, had turned Turke, and of long time done exceeding much miſchiefe vpon the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries) valiantly fighting, was ſlaine by Buzzacharinus of Padua, by whoſe death many were deliuered of a great feare.

Haly Baſſa ſlain

The Turks middle battell diſcomfited.

Caracoza the famous pyrat ſlaine.

Haly Baſſa had brought forth with him his two ſons Achmat and Mahomet, the one 23 yeares old, and the other 13, the nephews of the great Emperor Selymus, by his ſiſter married to Haly; them their father had placed in a great gallie, with a ſtrong guard of the Ianizaries: who ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the maine battel, with the danger now drawing neere vnto themſelues, were exceedingly affraid, and therefore to ſaue themſelues, thought it beſt with all ſpeed to make toward the maine. But in ſo doing they were preuented by Requiſenius the great Commendor, who with his furious Spaniards bourding the Turkes, alreadie diſmaied and running away, ſlew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruell execution done, tooke the gallie, and that which pleaſed him more, the two ſonnes of Haly both aliue: in the time of which fight, the poore Chriſtians who faſt chained in the gallie, had as ſlaues long ſerued in great miſery; now perceiuing the Chriſtians to preuaile, brake off their gyues, looſed one another, and with ſuch weapons as firſt came to hand luſtily laid about them, and notably furthered the victorie.

The doubtfull lying of Iohn Andreas Auria with the right wing of the Chriſtian fleet.

A notable fight of the Knights of Malta.

Vluzales flieth.

Notwithſtanding all this good ſucceſſe, the fortune of the battell ſtood yet doubtful in the right wing. There ſtood in either battell two of the moſt noble chieftains one againſt another: on the Chriſtian part Iohn Andreas Auria the Spaniſh Admiral; and for the Turks Vluzales: both moſt valiant & expert commanders, wel known the one to the other, for that they had of long vſed the ſame ſeas, equall for their military diſcipline, as alſo for their noble acts, but far vnequall for number of their gallies: for the Turks had of one ſort & other almoſt twice ſo many. Auria, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the battel warily decline the danger, and not hazard his gallies, wherein his chiefe honor would be alſo indangered; or elſe affraid leſt the enemy, who far exceeded him in number of gallies, ſhould extend his wing at large, and incloſe the Chriſtian fleet behind; vpon the ſignall of battell giuen, ſhrunke farther off from the reſt of the battel: but whether vpon policy, that it might be at his choiſe either to fight, if the reſt of the army preuailed, or to retire if they ſhould be ouercome; or that he vpon martial policy declined the force of too ſtrong an enemy; diuers men diuerſly gloſed: but what the cauſe was indeed, the wiſeſt could not ſurely tell. Howſoeuer the matter ſtood, it ſeemed his purpoſe was by policy to counteruaile what he wanted in ſtrength. This his falling off ſeemed vnto the Turks moſt ſtrange, to whom his quick departure ſeemed at the firſt in maner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that ſpace he had firſt ſeperated himſelf from the armie; but the ſecond time fell off further, and there ſtaying & houering aloofe off, ſeemed to await ſome good opportunity to take the enemy at ſome aduantage: hauing in the meane time one of the galeaſſes of Piſa lying before him, as it were in ſtead of a bulwark, which with often ſhot much troubled the enemy. Vluzales alſo extending his wing, tooke ſuch a ſpace, as that he ſeemed able to haue compaſſed in and incloſed Auria; yet offered not battel, but rather lay as expecting if any aduantage ſhould be giuen him by the Chriſtians, than raſhly or vnaduiſedly to offer himſelf or his galies to any deſperat danger. He had not long ſo lien, but that according to his deſire, 12 of the Venetian gallies, which had withdrawn themſelues from Auria, & without any order or direction romed to and fro, fell into his danger: theſe gallies cut off from the reſt, Vluzales with wonderfull celerity incloſed, and with the multitude of his gallies bording them one by one, ſlew the defendants, and tooke the gallies. In this fight many of the knights of the Order of S. Stephen moſt valiantly fighting were ſlain. Benedictus Superantius a noble Venetian, ſeeing moſt part of his men ſlain, himſelfe mortally wounded, and his gally now almoſt taken; reſoluing rather preſently to die, than to fall into the hands of his enemies, deſperatly put fire to the ſtore of pouder he had in the gally, and blew vp himſelfe, his ſoldiers that were left, with a great number of the enemies together. The report of the great ordnance, and noiſe of the battel in that part of the fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle battel got the victorie, together turned their gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one ſquadron together, but comming along one after another, as euery man had ſooner or later cleered himſelfe of his enemie: amongſt the reſt, Petrus Iuſtinianus (Admirall of the gallies of Malta) comming formoſt, was incountred with three of the Turks gallies, with whom he with his knights had a great and moſt terrible fight. Which Vluzales beholding, and aboue all others hating the knights of the Order, ſpeedily ſent in other three gallies to helpe their fellows. So Iuſtinian hardly beſet with ſix gallies, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, had loſt fiftie of his moſt valiant knights, with one of his enſignes, and with much adoo hardly defended himſelfe. But being now brought to the laſt caſt, and the gally in the iudgment of all men giuen for loſt, lo two other of the gallies of Malta, who had ſo valiantly fought with other three of the enemies gallies, that they were now vpon point to haue taken them all, ſeeing the danger of their Admiral, forſooke their vanquiſhed enemies, & with all ſpeed came to reſue him: where they found him yet aliue, but ſhot in with three arrowes, and ſtill fighting couragiouſly at the decke of his gally, with thoſe few he had yet left, beſet round with their enemies: but by the comming in of theſe two gallies, as if it had bin by help ſent from heauen, the Turks were notably repulſed, and the Admiral with his gally reſcued, as a prey out of the mouth of the greedie Lyon. Vluzales vnderſtanding that the maine battel and right wing of the fleet was ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians; for feare gaue ouer the fight, and leauing the gallies he had taken

A and hoiſing ſaile, was the firſt in that wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiuing, who was come in before the reſt, ſuddenly ſhewed himſelfe at his backe, and by aſſailing the hindermoſt gallies, did what he might to ſtay their flight vntil the reſt of the victorious gallies were come in. But whileſt he ſo eagerly purſueth the flying enemy, fifteen of the Turks captaines inraged with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, and mindfull of their wonted proweſſe, ſtaid their flight, and contrary to the expectation of the Chriſtians, turned themſelues and renewed the battell: What minds they bare, the euent ſhewed; for in a trice almoſt all Cardonius his ſouldiers and mariners were ſlaine: nothing letted the taking of the gallie, but that Vluzales ſeeing Don Iohn, Columnius, and Venerius neere at hand, and making towards him, and Auria alſo comming faſt on, was afraid longer to ſtay, and therefore giuing ouer the fight, fled as faſt as hee could: yet B carrying away with him one gallie of Cyprus, and one enſigne of the knights of Malta, as teſtimonies of his own valor when he ſhould appeare before Selymus. The Chriſtians although weary of the long fight which they had almoſt by the ſpace of fiue houres indured, yet ſo long as they were in any hope to ouertake any of their flying enemies, hardly purſued them in chaſe: but when they perceiued it preuailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to ſee to their wearie and wounded ſouldiers and mariners, they ſtaied from farther purſuit, for why the night came now faſt on, vnder the couert whereof the craftie old pyrat flying for life with ſailes and oares, eſcaped with thirtie (or as ſome write, fortie) gallies againe into the bay of Lepanto.

The Chriſtians hardly purſue the flying enemy

C It was a right horrible ſpectacle to ſee, how in this battell the ſea ſtained with bloud, & couered with dead bodies, weapons, and the fragments of the broken gallies; beſides the great number of them that were ſlain, & beaten into the ſea: many of the Turks blinded with feare, caſting away their weapons, to eſcape the fury of the enemy, threw themſelues headlong into the ſea; but finding no hope to recouer the land, laboured againe to come to the gallies, or els fainting by the way, were miſerably drowned. Others, either halfe dead, weake, and vnskilfull of ſwimming, or ouercharged with their armour, the ſea alſo deuoured: yea many that could well ſwim, wearied and wounded, ſunke for feare. Others vpon plankes and the pieces of the broken gallies, ſought to ſaue themſelues; and not knowing what to follow or what to ſhun, wofully periſhed. Other ſome ſwimming, and pitifully intreating their enemies, rather to take D them priſoners than to kill them, were (as it often times chanceth where things are done vpon choler, rather than vpon diſcretion) without compaſſion ſlaine: in which doing, the Chriſtians thought they did rather reuenge former iniuries to them done, than to do them any wrong: with ſome mercie more preuailed than wrath; who remembring the common chance of war, choſe rather to take the Turkes priſoners (wofully crauing nothing but their liues) than without mercie to kil them. The number of the Turks loſt in this moſt famous battell, could hardly be known, by reaſon that many of them were drowned. Antonius Guarnerius writing the hiſtorie of this war, reporteth two & thirty thouſand to haue periſhed: but they which write more ſparingly thereof, reported not paſt halfe ſo many to haue bin ſlaine: of whom theſe were of greateſt name; Haly Baſſa the Generall, Mahomet Bey (otherwiſe called Chiroche or Sirochus) E Gouernor of Alexandria, Caſſanes the ſonne of Barbaruſſa, with his ſonne Malamur Gouernour of Mytilene; Gider Gouernor of Chios, Caſſambeius Gouernour of the Rhodes, Proui Aga captaine of Nauplium, Muſtapha Zelibi the great Treaſurer, Caracoza the famous pyrat; with many others, whom but to name were tedious. The chiefe priſones there taken, were Achmat & Mahomet the ſonnes of Haly Baſſa, both afterwards ſent as Preſents to the Pope, of whom the eldeſt died by the way at Naples; the younger preſented vnto the Pope by Columnius at Rome, was there honorably kept priſoner: and Mechmet Bey, Gouernor of Eubœa; and about three thouſand fiue hundred others were in that battell taken alſo. The chiefe of them that eſcaped by flight, were Partau Baſſa, who ſeeing all go to wracke, fled in time in a long boat to land: and Vluzales, who (as it was afterwards certainly knowne) but with fiue and twentie gallies, and ten F galliots fled to Lepanto Of the enemies gallies were taken an hundred threeſcore & one, fortie ſunke or burnt: and of galliots and other ſmall veſſels were taken about ſixtie. The Admirall gallie then taken amongſt the reſt, was ſo goodly and beautifull a veſſell, that for beautie and richneſſe ſcarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable vnto her. The decke of this gally was on both ſides thrice as great as any of the others, & made all of blacke Walnut-tree like vnto Ebony, checkered, and wrought maruellous faire with diuers liuely colors and variety of hiſtories hiſtories. There was alſo in her diuers liuely counterfeits, engrauen and wrought with gold, G with ſo cunning hand, that for the magnificence thereof it might well haue bin compared vnto ſome princes palace. The cabbin gliſtered in euery place with rich hangings wrought with gold twiſt, and ſet with diuers ſorts of precious ſtones, with certaine ſmall counterfeits moſt cunningly wrought. Beſides this, there was alſo found in her great ſtore of the Baſſaes rich ap-parell, wrought with the needle, ſo curiouſly and richly emboſſed with ſiluer and gold, that his great lord and maſter Selymus himſelfe could hardly put on more royall or rich attire. His casket there alſo found with ſix thouſand duckats in it, with a yerely penſion of three hundred duckats, was giuen in reward to a Greeke, borne in Macedonia, which ſlew the Baſſa, and was therefore alſo knighted by Don Iohn: who had alſo giuen vnto him the Burrell of the Turkes ſtanderd, which at his returne to Venice (where he had of long time before dwelt, and ſerued in the Arſenall) he ſold vnto a goldſmith: whereof the Senat hauing intelligence, redeemed H it of the goldſmith, paying for euery ounce a duckat, and layed it vp amongſt the trophies of that moſt famous victorie. It was all of maſſiue ſiluer, guilt & engrauen round about with Turkiſh letters. On the one ſide was written, God doth conduct and adorne the faithfull in worthie enterpriſes: God doth fauour Mahomet. On the other ſide, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

The Greek that ſlew the Baſſa, honourably rewarded.

This notable victorie thus happily obtained, Don Iohn the Generall, with Venerius and Co- lumna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the Generall friendly embraced, but eſpecially Venerius, calling him father, & attributing vnto him the greateſt part of the victory.
Afterwards, all together with their hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen, they vpon their knees gaue immortall thanks to Almightie God. So did alſo the reſt of the captaines and ma- I ſters; commending one anothers valor and good ſeruice: but eſpecially theirs, who for their religion and countrey had there moſt honourably ſpent their liues; which were in number about 7566. Amongſt whom, the chiefe men that were ſlaine, were Ioh. and Bernardinus, of the honourable familie of Cordona in Spaine, Horatio Caraffa, and Ferantes Biballus. Virginius, and Horatius, noble Romanes, of the honourable Familie of the Vrſini. Of the Venetian Nobilitie, Auguſtinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Ioannes Lau- retanus, Marinus Contarenus, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Andreas Barbadicus, Mar- cus Antonius Landus, Franciſcus Bonus, Hieronimus Contarenus, Antonius Paſchaligus, Hieroni- mus Venerius, all of the order of the Senatours. Beſides diuers other honourable Gentlemen, K who well deſerued to be enrolled in the eternall monuments of Fame. Of the knights of Malta were alſo many ſlaine, amongſt whom of the Germane Nation theſe were chiefe: Ioachim Spart, Commendour of Moguntia and Franckfort, Ro. of Hambergh, Commendour of Hemmendorf, and Fra. Droſt. Of them that were wounded, theſe were of greateſt name: Don Iohn the Generall, Venerius the Venetian Admirall ſhot through the foot, Paulus Iordanus, Troilus Sauell, and Mar. Molinus, with diuers others of leſſe fame, to the number of almoſt ſeuen thouſand.

The number of the Chriſtians ſlain in the battell of Lepanto.

Great was the ioy conceiued of this victory, but to none more welcome, than to the poore Chriſtians faſt chained to the Turks gallies, of whom twelue thouſand were thereby deliue-red from moſt miſerable thraldome, and contrary to al hope reſtored to their antient liberty. L

A generall reioyſing, eſpecially in Venice, for the victorie.

Two daies after this victorie, Venerius ſent Humfredus Iuſtinianus with newes thereof vnto the Senat at Venice: who comming in at the Adriaticke port about noone the 19 of October, by ſhooting off of certain great pieces, gaue warning vnto the city of his comming, which at that time hung in a great ſuſpence betwixt hope and feare. The citiſens generally awaked with the report of the great ordnance, came flocking by heapes to the port, euery man longing to heare the firſt newes. There they might ſee Iuſtinian comming a far off with his gallie, but when he was come neerer, they might perceiue all the mariners attired like Turkes, & foure of the Turkes enſignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gallie, which filled their mindes with the hope of good newes, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the ſpoyle of the enemie. But after that Iuſtinian was landed (which he had much to doe for the preaſe) and was M gone to the court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for newes; and had there deliuered his letters, and at large diſcourſed of all the ſucceſſe of the battell (which was forthwith blowne into the Citie) and that the mariners alſo after his departure had reported the victorie, and that the enemy was in a great battell ouerthrowne: good God, how
the

A the people as men ouerioyed, ran vp and downe the ſtreets, doubling and redoubling the ioyfull name of victory. The Senatours alſo reioycing together, gaue thanks to God with publick praiers and ioyfull hymnes in euery Church: and afterwards by ringing of bels, peals of ordnance, bone-fires, and other ſuch like things, ſhewed al the tokens of ioy poſſible. And to make this ioy the more generall, all priſoners were ſet at libertie, and all debts that exceeded not the ſumme of fiue and twentie crownes, payed out of the common treaſurie; which was generally done through all the Venetian ſeigniorie: and a decree made, That that day wheron the victory was gotten, which was the ſeuenth of October, dedicated to the memoriall of Iuſtina, ſhould for euer be kept holy day: and for the perpetuall remembrance thereof, a great maſſe of money was coyned, with the impreſſion of Iuſtana vpon it, and an inſcription declaring B the victorie. Many alſo their neighbor Princes ſent their Embaſſadors congratulatorie to Venice; namely, the Dukes of Sauoy, Florence, Ferrara, Parma, Mantua, and Vrbin, and the Knights of Malta. In which ſo publicke ioy no man was ſeene to put on any mourning garments, or to ſhew any token of heauineſſe, although many had loſt their deareſt friends & neereſt kinſmen; whoſe liues they reckoned not loſt, but giuen vnto the Chriſtian common weale.
The like reioycing was alſo made in Rome, in Spaine, Naples, Sicilia, and Malta; eſpecially at ſuch times as Embaſſadors from their neighbor Princes, came to ioy them of this victorie: yea and afterwards in other countries further off was like reioycing and ſignes of ioy, as with vs here in England.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of Lepanto, fought neere vnto the C Iſland Curzolari, the ſeuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was neuer fought at ſea againſt the Turke, wherein he loſt his chiefe ſtrength at ſea, with moſt of his beſt ſea captains: and might thereby well perceiue what he and his ſucceſſors were to feare, if the Chriſtian Princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues, all diſcord ſet apart, ſhould in zeale of their religion ioyne their inuincible forces againſt them.

In the middeſt of all this ioy, generally conceiued of the late victory, one of the chiefe priſoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loſſe of Cyprus (for that Selymus had therein loſt his fleet, his beſt men of war, with great ſtore of ordnance) by a fit compariſon ſhewed it not to be ſo, ſaying, That the battell loſt, was vnto Selymus as if a man ſhould ſhaue his beard, which would ere long grow again; but that the loſſe of Cyprus was vnto the Venetians, as the D loſſe of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer be againe recouered. Declaring thereby the great inequalitie of the loſſe.

A wittie and fit compariſon made by a Turke to ſhew that the loſſe of Cyprus was greater than the loſſe of the battell at Lepanto.

The rich ſpoyle taken from the enemie in this moſt glorious victorie, was thus diuided amongſt the princes confederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted 19 gallies, two galliots, nine great pieces of ordnance, two and forty leſſer pieces, and foureſcore and one priſoners. Vnto the king of Spaine eight and fiftie gallies and an halfe, ſix galliots and an halfe, eight and fifty great pieces and an halfe, eight great murthering pieces & an halfe, an hundred twenty eight leſſer pieces, and a thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteen priſoners. Vnto the Venetians were aſſigned for their ſhare, nine and thirty gallies and an halfe, foure galiots and an halfe, nine and thirtie great E pieces and an halfe, fiue great murthering pieces and a halfe, foureſcore and ſix leſſer pieces, and a thouſand one hundred threeſcore and two priſoners. The reſt were beſtowed vpon ſuch other princes as had giuen aid, or otherwiſe well deſerued in that ſeruice.

The ſpoile of the enemy diuided amongſt the confederats.

The ioy conceiued of this victorie was not ſo great amongſt the Chriſtians, but that the ſorrow thereof was amongſt the Turks far greater. Selymus himſelfe was then at Hadrianople, where eight dayes after the battel, news was brought vnto him, That his fleet was ouerthrown and almoſt all taken or ſunke by the Chriſtians. Which ſo ſoone as he heard, he was ſtrucken with exceeding griefe: and ouercome with melancholy, would not that day ſuffer any man to ſpeake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow ſtill increaſing, had in ſhort time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heauineſſe: ſome bewailing their parents, ſome their children, ſome their husbands, ſome their friends or kinſmen, there loſt. But that which moſt grieued the Turkiſh Emperor, was the loſſe of ſo many worthy & expert captains, of ſo many skilfull maſters and notable ſouldiers; who brought vp all their liues at ſea, were not thought inferior to any then liuing: beſides the perpetuall ignominie and vnwonted diſgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his poſteritie for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to haue commanded all the Chriſtians in his dominions (in number infinit) to be put to death, death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they wearie of the Turkiſh thraldome, and deſirous of innouation, ſhould with weapons put into their hands, riſe vp againſt him, and take part with the other Chriſtians his enemies. But whileſt the other Baſſaes (as men diſmaid with the crueltie of the command) ſtood all ſilent, Muhamet Baſſa for his former deſerts in great fauor with the tyrant, thought it good to make proofe if his fury might by reaſonable perſuaſion be mitigated, and ſome better courſe taken, both for the honor of Selymus himſelfe, and the common good of the State: yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannicall gouernment, openly to ſpeake any thing contrary to the good liking of the wilfull Emperour, he durſt not apertly contradict him: but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleaſure, by little and little to draw him from himſelfe; & ſo before he were aware, to lead him into his owne deuiſe, and by delay moderat the rigour of his former fury. To which purpoſe, he cunningly ſet vpon him in this ſort.

Your anger (ſaid hee) moſt magnificent and inuincible Emperour, againſt the Chriſtians, is moſt iuſt: and in this my deſire exceedeth all others, That they ſhould endure and ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as they haue of right deſerued. Yet it behooueth vs ſo to ſatisfie our wrath, as men better regarding their owne good, than the hot deſire of reuenge. And foraſmuch as I am for your many and vndeſerued fauours, in all loyaltie bounden vnto your highneſſe aboue others; I reckon it in part my dutie, ſomuch the more franckely to deliuer my opinion, ſuch as it is, in matter of ſo great importance. Neither will I attemper my ſpeech in any reſpect to the comforting of your grieued minde: for how can it be that you, who following the worthie examples of your noble progenitours, haue alwayes heeretofore ſhewed your moſt heroicall and couragious minde, contemning all the chances of Fortune; ſhould not for euer after ſhew your ſelfe to be rather dreaded of all men, than dreadfull of any? Let others, whoſe Kingdomes built vpon vncertaintie are, ſubiect to the reuolution of time, and change of Fortune, yeeld vnto their euill haps: as for you, whoſe Empire is founded by the mightie hand of the moſt Higheſt, and compaſſed about with an impregnable defence, and are your ſelfe by the power of God appointed King and Commander of Nations and people in number infinite; Fortune may well a little pricke you, but neuer ouerthrow you. As for this late miſchance, if it muſt needs ſo fall out, as proceeding from ſome immutable and eternall cauſe; muſt it be therefore alwayes fixe and permanent? Onely thoſe miſeries and miſchiefes which the cowardiſe or fooliſhneſſe of men bring vnto themſelues, haue their firme and certaine calamities: other common euents comming from other cauſes, haue alſo their common and ſudden changes: but how this late miſhap at ſea may be amended, and your former glorie there againe recouered, is hereafter to be conſidered. Now for the preſent (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others moſt neceſſarie, to is be prouided, That the weake and worſt fortified places of your Empire, moſt ſubiect to danger, may be preſently ſtrengthened with ſtrong garriſons; and that by your preſent repaire to the imperiall Citie, you cheere vp the mindes of your heauie and diſmayed ſubiects: which done, what ſhall let, but that you may at your pleaſure be reuenged to the full of the Chriſtians? For there is no cauſe why we ſhould feare the Chriſtians, ſix hundred times and more before ouerthrown: both our enemies and we are the ſame men we haue been for many ages, we beare the ſame minds, the ſame bodies, the ſame ſtrength, the ſame weapons, wherewith wee haue gotten infinite victories, both of them and others. And although ſuch be the ſtate of man, as that hee cannot otherwiſe but ſometime or other taſte of the worſt tunne; yet I thinke this preſent misfortune to be rather imputed vnto ſome fatall cauſe to vs vnknowne, than to the valour of the Chriſtians. Beſides that, we may well enough oppoſe one ouerthrow againſt our ſo many and infinite victories: yea wee are to giue immortall thankes vnto almightie God, that we haue by force of armes ſubdued the rich and famous Iſland of Cyprus, and that your high deſignes haue in that point ſorted to your hearts deſire. And hard it is in mine opinion to iudge whether this late vnfortunat battell ſhall more hurt vs, or the Chriſtians: for beſides that the multitude of the Turkes hath no feeling of ſo ſmall a loſſe, they will not as men diſcouraged, giue themſelues to mourning and vaine lamentations, but with greater courage and furie come forth againe into battell, and reuenge this loſſe with the infinit calamities of the Chriſtians: who after this their good hap, will according to their woonted manner giue themſelues to exceſſe, pleaſure, careleſneſſe, and eaſe, vnto their owne farther confuſion. Thus haue I in briefe faithfully declared mine opinion: yet with that ſubmiſſiue loyaltie, as that whatſoeuer ſhall proceede from the mouth of your imperiall Maieſtie, ſhall be of me deemed moſt wiſely and magnificently conſidered of.

A The Baſſa was in ſuch grace and authority with Selymus, that his opinion in counſel preuailed, & the tyrants wrath by his perſuaſion was well aſſuaged. But by the comming of Vluzales to court, the remainder of his former griefe and malancholy was fully quieted: who after he had excuſed himſelfe of the late ouerthrow, & declared what he had himſelfe done in the battell, and in teſtimony thereof, preſented him with one of the enſignes of the knights of Malta, told him alſo, how that he had left the Chriſtian fleet ſo rent and torn, as that it could not poſſibly be made ſeruiceable againſt the next yeare: which newes was both of Selymus and the reſt gladly heard. In the mean time Selymus placed this Vluzales in the ſtead of Haly Baſſa that was ſlain: & ſtraitly commanded the great officers which had the charge of his nauie, to build new ſhipping night & day: and further inioyned euery Gouernor out of his prouince he had B in charge, to haue in readineſſe one gally or two againſt the next Spring, as wel for the defence of his own dominions, as to reuenge the loſſe he had ſo lately ſuſtained: whereunto alſo many of his great men put to their helping hands, & cheerfully furthered his deſire. New ſupplies of ſoldiers were alſo preſently raiſed, & put into his frontier towns, great ſtore of new ordnance caſt, weapons and armor prouided, and whatſoeuer els the neceſſity of the preſent time required. So with the Turks ſtood reaſon & induſtry, rather than with the Chriſtians, who (as ſome note) rather wanted diſcretion how to vſe the victory, than valor to gain the ſame: which whether it chanced for that proſperity begetteth negligence, or that men ioying in their preſent bliſſe, regard little the time to come, I leaue it to the iudgement of the wiſer to determine.

After this ſo memorable a victory, the three great commanders of the fleet ſat in counſell C to conſult, what farther courſe they were beſt to take. But foraſmuch as Winter began now to approch, and that they could not much doe vntill their fleet were new furniſhed and manned, they all reſolued for that time to diſſolue the fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of Aprill, to meet together againe at Corcyra. Whereupon Don Iohn and Columnius returned to Meſſana, where they in ſafetie arriued in Nouember; and departing thence, and taking their leaue the one of the other, arriued, Don Iohn at Naples, and Columnius at Rome: where they were in both places with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The chriſtian fleet diſſolued.

The Venetians for all that grieued with the loſſe of Cyprus, gaue not ſo ouer, but repairing their nauie with thirtie gallies, wherein were imbarked ſix thouſand ſouldiers, woon a caſtle in Epirus called Margarita: and alſo recouered the towne of Suppoto, which the Turkes had D that Sommer before taken from them; but now hearing of this ouerthrow, did vpon the approch of the Venetian fleet, againe forſake it. The gallies alſo of Crete conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turkes veſſels laded with captiues and the ſpoiles of Famaguſta, as they were paſſing thence to Conſtantinople.

Suppoto againe recouered by the Venetians.

Although vpon the late obtained victorie, a certaine reconciliation had bin made betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius, yet of the former diſſention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them againſt the other: for which cauſe, the Spaniards requeſted the Venetians to appoint another Admirall in his place. Venerius was now indeed a man of great yeres, and his ſtrength far ſpent; yet for that in his aged body reſted great wiſedome & courage, & that they thought him for his great deſerts worthy all honor, they were wonderfull loth, and vnwilling therein E to gratifie the Spaniard: for why, they well knew there was no other cauſe of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had ſtood againſt them vpon the honour of the Venetians: and farther, they liked not that the Spaniard ſhould ſo preſumptuouſly preſcribe vnto them, whom they ſhould place or diſplace, in or out of their honorable offices. Neuertheleſſe, not forgetting what commoditie came by concord, & what euils of diſcord, and that they might not againſt ſo mighty an enemy wel ſpare the help of the Spaniard, they reſolued to make choice of ſome other; who ſucceeding Venerius, might with one conſent manage their wars together with Don Iohn and Columnius. There was then one Iacobus Fuſcarinus their chiefe Gouernor in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Iadera and the other frontier townes, and for the ſpace of foureteene moneths had notably repreſſed the furious incurſions of the Turks: of F him then abſent and not deſirous of the place (as of a man of worthie deſert) the whole State by generall conſent made choiſe for their Admiral & General by ſea againſt the Turke: which moſt honourable place he receiued not with all the ſolemne ceremonies thereto belonging, at Venice, as the manner was, but at Iadera: from whence he in the Admirall gallie ſent for that purpoſe by Aloyſius Grimanus his ſucceſſour in Iadera, ſailed ouer to Corcyra: where he found the old Admirall Venerius, with no leſſe care prouiding for all things, than if he ſhould G himſelfe haue ſtill continued the war. Of which great care Fuſcarinus at his comming eaſed him, by taking it wholly vpon himſelfe.

Caſtra novum in vain attempted by the Venetians.

Whileſt Fuſcarinus thus lay making his preparation againſt the next Spring at Corcyra, Sara Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counſell of Venerius, who was now returned to Venice) vpon the ſudden landed his men, & beſieged Caſtro Novum, a ſtrong towne of the Turks in the borders of Iſtria; where at his firſt comming he tooke the ſuburbs, and had in ſhort time brought the towne to great extremitie. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the towne, hearing that the Beglerbeg of Græce was with great power comming thither, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege, and with all ſpeed to get him againe to ſea. The Turkes H in like manner, to diſtreſſe the ſtrong towne of Cataro, holden by the Venetians in the borders of Dalmatia, built a great and ſtrong fort vpon the paſſage from ſea to the towne, wherein they placed great ſtore both of men and artillerie: in hope by keeping them of the towne from all reliefe by ſea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attempted by force; for by land it was alreadie enuironed with the cruell enemy, poſſeſſing the countrey round about it. Iacobus Superantius the great Prouidetor, then lying at Corcyra with the Admirall, vnderſtanding how Cataro a towne of no ſmall importance, was thus both by ſea & land by the enemie diſtreſſed: with twentie gallies manned with the moſt choice ſouldiers could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the raſing of the fort, and relieuing of the towne. Superantius with this ſelect company, and certaine other gallies which met him by the I way, came by night before the mouth of the bay of Cataro, and there diuiding his fleet, left the one part thereof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himſelfe couragiouſly paſſed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turks out of the fort made diuers ſhot, but (by reaſon it was darke) to ſmall purpoſe. In paſſing by, Superantius tooke ſuch view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on that ſide to batter the ſame; as did alſo the other gallies on the other ſide: and withall, landed their men on both ſides; who vpon ſignall giuen, ran reſolutely to the fort, and by plaine force entering the ſame, preuailed vpon the fearefull Turkes, and put them to the ſword euery mothers ſonne; ſo that of all that great garriſon, was not one left aliue to carrie newes of the ſlaughter. This fort was in length fiue hundred paces, but not ſtrong towards land, from whence no ſuch feare was doubted. In it was taken ſeuenteen great K pieces of ordnance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and ſeuen galliots which lay at anchor vnder the fort. Cataro thus relieued, Superantius with victorie returned againe to Corcyra.

Superantius releeueth Cataro, and taketh a great fort of the Turks.

Fuſcarinus the Venetian Admirall with all things in readineſſe, hauing long lien at Corcyra, expecting the comming of the confederates, as was before appointed; ſent Superantius the Prouidetor with fiue and twenty gallies to Meſſana, to haſten the comming of Don Iohn, and to attend vpon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to haue found a great fleet and a ſtrong power in good forwardneſſe to haue ſet forward, he found ſuch ſmall preparation, as well ſhewed the Spaniards ſmall care for repreſſing of the Turke, and that they would not be very forward in the ſeruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, L cauſed him to complaine vnto himſelfe, of their vnfaithfulneſſe, and to bewaile the ſtate of his countrey, with the whole Chriſtian common-weale: for Don Iohn had before ſolemnely promiſed vnto the Venetian Embaſſadour, that all things ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the appointed time: but now a great part of Sommer was paſt, when ſcarce ſome few companies, & about fiftie gallies were met together at Meſſana; and when Auria would come with the reſt, no man could tell. So that the carefull Prouidetor ſtood now no leſſe in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus ſendeth out Vluzales with two hundred gallies.

Selymus, after the great ouerthrow he had receiued at the Iſlands Corzulares, for feare hee ſhould be driuen quite out of the ſea, was aboue all things carefull for the renewing of his nauy: and hauing partly new built, partly repaired two hundred gallies, commended them to the conduct of Vluzales, with expreſſe charge, That by how much things had fallen out worſe the M laſt yeare, he ſhould with ſo much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to goe out of the bounds of the Archipelago, or to aduenture battell but vpon aduantage, or at leaſtwiſe vpon an euen hand.

This Vluzales (otherwiſe called Occhiall) was an Italian borne in Calabria, who in his

A youth taken at ſea by the Turks,and chained in the gally,and afterwards renouncing his faith, by many degrees grew vnto the higheſt preferments among the Turks,& ſo became an exceeding plague as wel to his own country as all other of the Chriſtians bordering vpon the Mediterranian. He now Admiral for the Turke, after the manner of the proud Barbarians, threatned with fire and ſword to be reuenged vpon the Venetians: which knowne at Venice, much troubled them,as wel acquainted with the furie of the old Archpyrat. Beſide that, Ant.Barbarus their embaſſador,al the time of this war kept in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople,had by letters certified them,what a great fleet,& what a ſtrong army Selymus had prouided againſt them: and that he himſelfe told 250 ſaile of gallies when they ſet forward from Conſtantinople,beſide ſome other that were to meet with them at Calipolis: and that therefore they ſhould B beware how they incountred with the Turks fleet but vpon equal ſtrength. It was alſo at the ſame time commonly reported, That king Philip chiefe of the Confederats, careleſſe of the warres againſt the Turke in the Eaſt, was about to turne his forces vpon the kingdomes of Tunes or Algiers, neerer vnto him; as indeed he did the yeare following. The Venetians intangled with ſo many difficulties,were euen at their wits end,& day by day the Senat ſate from the riſing of the Sun to the ſetting of the ſame,conſulting how all theſe miſchiefs were to be remedied. But for as much as the greateſt danger was to be feared from the Turks fleet,as then houering euen ouer their heads; they by Letters commanded Fuſcarinus their Admirall, That whether the confederats came vnto him or not,he ſhould forthwith take his courſe toward the Eaſt, and there according to the enemies deſignes, and his owne diſcretion and valour, to doe C what he ſhould thinke beſt to be done for the common good of his country: and not to refuſe to joine with the enemy in battell,if he ſaw any good hope of victory. Neither ceaſed they at the ſame time,both by their Embaſſadors and letters,earneſtly to call both vpon the Pope and the King,to haſten their forces to incounter the enemy before he ſhould come out of his own ſeas; and to carry the terror of the war home to his owne doores, rather than to receiue it at their own. The like meſſage was alſo done to Don Iohn, putting him in minde what his place, what the time,and what the danger of the time required; intreating him (if it were poſſible) of himſelfe to adde ſomething vnto that haſt which the neceſſity of ſo important a cauſe required. Who neuertheleſſe,for all the meſſengers and letters to him ſent (which were many) went ſtill on faire and ſoftly, delaying from day to day; telling, That he would by and by D come,and that the Spaniards would alwaies be ſo good as their word. Which was ſo far from his thought,that afterwards finding one excuſe after another, he not only ſtaied his comming, but called backe againe Requiſenius alſo,whom he had ſent before with twenty gallies to Corcyra. Now were two months (fitteſt for the wars) vainly ſpent; when Superantius grieued to ſee time to no purpoſe ſo ſlip away,& fearing leſt the reſt of the Sommer ſhould to as ſmall effect in like maner paſſe alſo,with great inſtance importuned him to haſten his journy. Then at length Don Iohn anſwered,that the Venetians requeſted but reaſon,neither that he wiſhed for any thing more,than to ſatisfie their deſires; but that a greater care hindered the leſſe, which was firſt to be preuented: He was aduertiſed (as he ſaid) that the French king pretending the ſuppreſſing of certaine pirats,had aſſembled a great fleet at Rochel,with purpoſe indeed to E inuade Spain,now that the king was buſied in theſe wars againſt the Turk: and that therfore they muſt pardon him if he preferred the regard of Spain before others,being expreſly commanded from the king, not to depart from Meſſana vntil he had other commandement from him. But whether this excuſe by France proceeded of a true feare or otherwiſe, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather,for that the French king vnderſtanding thereof by the Venetians,was therwith(as reaſon was)exceedingly offended: proteſting,that he was euer ſo far from that purpoſe of hindering any the confederat princes in that their religious war, that if the troubles of his own country would haue ſo permitted,he would gladly haue giuen them aid therein. Many there were alſo that thought, Enuie the antient enemy of vertue and valor, to haue had a great power in this delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would more reioyce of the victorie well hoped for,if they ſhould joine with the Venetians; or grieue if the ſame ſhould by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius wearie of diſcourſes and long expectation,and almoſt out of hope of any helpe in time from the Spaniard; how vntowardly ſoeuer things went,thought better yet warily to moderate his griefe,than in ſo dangerous a time to giue any occaſion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet ſpake he not fauningly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certaine modeſt grauitie declared, That he had thought heauen would ſooner haue fallen, than that Don Iohn would not at the appointed time haue come to Corcyra. G And withall beſought him, and wiſhed him to beware that he brought not the common State into ſome great danger: if they had to do with ſuch an enemy as might be delaied with, then he ſaid he could eaſily abide delay; but now for that the war and the enemy was ſuch, as wherein, or with whom neuer any Generall had delaied without loſſe, to what end did he longer defer or trifle out the time? or what other fleet did he expect? If they ſhould diuide their forces, then were they all too weak, but vnited together, ſtrong enough to defend the common cauſe. The neerer the enemie came, the more haſte were to be made to joine with the Venetian fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honorable or glorious, than for him a noble yong gentlemen royally diſcended, of whome the world had conceiued a great hope, that he H would in martiall honour exceed the glory of his moſt famous anceſtors, againe to vanquiſh the proud Turke, the greateſt and moſt mightie monarch of the world; to fight the battell of the Higheſt, to aſſure the Chriſtian commonwealth againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, and to purchaſe vnto himſelfe immortall glorie and renown. As for the French, there was no ſuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with ſuch ſlender preparation, not worth the name of a fleet, was not ſo vnaduiſed as to ſet vpon a kingdome of ſuch ſtrength and power as Spaine. Furthermore he ſaid, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the king himſelfe, to haue the Turks repreſſed: whoſe kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia, & Spain, were no leſſe than their territorie, expoſed to danger by ſea. The good ſucceſſe of their affairs in the Eaſt would open the I way to the conqueſt of Affrick: but if the Turk ſhould preuaile, then were they to deſpaire, not of Affricke, but of all Italy, Sicilie, yea and of Spaine it ſelfe. The time (he ſaid) and neceſſitie of the war, with the extremitie of the danger of the whole and common State, required that he ſhould with all his power and ſpeed poſſible, take vpon him the defence of the common cauſe, or to ſay more truly, of the Chriſtian commonweale, then ſo dangerouſly impugned. Theſe reaſons drawne from the common good and the truth it ſelfe, much moued the Generall: but the kings pleaſure was to be preferred before all reaſons or dangers that could be alledged. But hearing afterward, what reſolute command the Venetian Senat had ſent vnto their Admirall, he became exceeding carefull: for hee feared leaſt if the Admirall ſhould without his helpe fight the battell and gaine the victory, he would conuert all the glory thereof vnto him- K ſelfe, but if he ſhould chance to be ouerthrowne, it would turne to his vtter reproch and perpetuall infamie, that in ſo neceſſarie a time he had withdrawne himſelfe from the common cauſe. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to do, he ſtood for a while as one at his wits end: yet at laſt, he vpon deliberation reſolued to take a middle courſe, and ſo neither without the command of the king (by whoſe preſcript order all was to be done) to depart with the fleet from Meſſana; neither altogether to fruſtrate the Confederates of the expected ayd. And to that purpoſe ſent two and twentie gallies vnder the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (a noble gentleman) to the Venetian Admirall at Corcyra; with whom went alſo Columnius with the Popes fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vgo Boncompanius, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his ſtead; who vpon the ſame conditions with L his predeceſſour, had entred into the league, and liking very well of Columnius, kept him ſtill for his Admirall.

Don Iohn in doubt whether to ſend aid to the Venetians or not.

He ſendeth Lilly of Andrada, with 22 gallies.

Long had Fuſcarinus expected the comming of the confederats, & albeit that the yere was far ſpent (Auguſt being then come) and no ſuch aid ſent as he had expected; yet deſiring to do ſomthing worth the remembrance, and beſeeming their honor, he earneſtly perſuaded Columnius and Lilly to ſet forward with him toward the Eaſt, and with their vnited forces to giue the enemy battel: telling them, That if they were al of like courage, they ſhould go not only to the glory of the preſent battel, but to the great honour and aduancement of the whole Chriſtian commonweale. After that, he extenuated the power of the enemy; ſaying, That he could not but maruell, from whence ſuch a number of gallies as was reported, could ſo ſuddenly be gathered, or whereupon ſo great confidence & boldneſſe was growne vnto them, ſo lately ouer- M thrown & put to flight: the enemies fleet (he ſaid) was the yere before ouercome & diſperſed, the captaines and mariners ſlaine, and that therefore it was not credible, that ſo many gallies could with ſuch celeritie be built, and ſuch a number of mariners and maſters as was needfull, in ſo ſhort time prouided: That the prouiſion of the enemy was by flying fame made farre

A greater than indeed it was or poſſibly could be: for why, they might eaſily gueſſe what the Enemy was able to do, by the Chriſtians themſelues, who could not without much ado & great labor build their fleets, and traine vp their mariners and maſters: and that therfore letting fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are; he was verily perſuaded, that the enemie was glad to vſe moſt vnskilfull & ignorant as well mariners maſters as ſoldiers; who ſuddenly taken vp in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not ſo much as the very names of the ropes and tacklings, and other equipage: and then thoſe gallies which they had were like enough to be but weake, as of them which were the laſt yeare rent and bruiſed, and now againe botched vp; or in haſte built of greene timber, could not be nimble or greatly ſeruiceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant men to ſet forward B againſt the enemie, and that with the greater courage, for that the laſt yeares victory had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it ſhould ſo fall out, as good hope there was, they ſhould thereby take from the proud enemie both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recouer his ſtrength at ſea: ſo that they in the meane time without feare, might at their pleaſure take the rich Iſlands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turkes declining battell, ſhould retire themſelues into the Helleſpont, then might they with fire and ſword ſpoile all the frontiers of their dominion on this ſide the ſtraits, and open a way vnto the Chriſtians to do great matters.

Hardly were Columnius and Lilly perſuaded by the Admiral: neither did they therunto giue their conſent, vntil it was decreed, That they ſhould not in any caſe joine battell with the ene- C mie, but with their gallions & galeaſſes firſt placed in the front of the battel, in whom conſiſted the greateſt hope of the victory. So ſetting forward toward the enemy, & come to Commentitia, letters were brought vnto them from Don Iohn, certifying them, That he was now by letters from the king commanded to come towards the Eaſt, and to joine his forces with the confederats; but yet that for certain daies he could not come, vntill he were better prouided of all things neceſſary: & that therefore they ſhould in the mean time carefully look vnto all things, promiſing ſo ſoone as he poſſibly could to come vnto them. Vpon theſe letters, Columnius and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the comming of the General: yet foraſmuch as he had not expreſly written any thing concerning their ſtaying, and Fuſcarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with their fleet diuided into three battels. The whole fleet D conſiſted of 155 gallies, ſix galleaſſes, and twenty tall ſhips: in the right wing was Superantius; in the left wing Canalius; and in the middle battel, Columnius, Fuſcarinus, and Lilly; and in the rereward followed Quirinus. Before each battel went two of the galeaſſes ſtil in readines for preſent battell. In this order they came firſt to Zacynthus (commonly called Zante) and ſo to Cerigo: the next day after to Colubraria (commonly called Dragonaria) ouer againſt Cerigo. Here Angelus Surianus a valiant gentleman, ſent before to diſcouer the enemy, & what ſtrength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admiral, That the Turks fleet, conſiſting of 160 gallies, ſixty galliots, and foure great ſhips, lay about Maluaſia, in the enterance of the bay called Sinus Argolicus, vpon the borders of Peloponeſus, about fifty miles off from the E Chriſtian fleet. Shortly after, the ſame fleet was againe diſcouered making for Malea: whereupon the Chriſtians, before reſolued to fight whereſoeuer they ſhould meet the enemy, forthwith put themſelues in order of battel, and ſo with their galeaſſes in the front, made with what ſpeed they could toward him. Theſe two fleets were thought for many reſpects almoſt equal: the enemie was in number moe, but inferior in ſtrength. The Chriſtian fleet by reaſon of the heauines of the galleaſſes, made but ſmall way; and the enemy afraid of the great ſtore of ordnance the galleaſſes carried, durſt not come neere them. The Turks fleet was rather nimble than ſtrong, but ours more firme and forward. Looke wherein each exceeded the other, therewith they endeuored to helpe themſelues and annoy the enemy. The Chriſtians fearing to be circumuented by the multitude of their enemies, oppoſed their ſhips & galeaſſes before them as a moſt ſure fortreſſe: and the Turke, by how much he had had the worſe ſucceſſe the yeare before, was ſo much the more carefull to beware how he indangered himſelf within the reach of the galleaſſes. The Chriſtians deſired nothing more than to fight and to come to handie blowes: but the Turke, who thought it ſufficient for the preſent not to be ouercome, ſomtime made away as faſt as he could, and by and by ſtaied againe, if happily he might haue taken the gallies ſeperated from the galleaſſes; neuer ſeeming willing to aduenture further than reaſon and diſſention were. The enemy ſeeing the Chriſtian fleet comming ſtill on, and readie to giue battell, firſt ſeemed as if he would haue done the like, but afterwards turned his courſe vp- G on the right hand, and kept aloofe alongſt the coaſt of Malea: At which time the Chriſtians, although they were very deſirous to haue followed them, yet the Turkes with their nimble fleet were quickely too far gon for the Chriſtian fleet to ouertake them, eſpecially with their heauie ſhips. That day almoſt ſpent as it were in the chaſe of the enemy, towards the going downe of the Sunne, the enemy put into the current of the ſea betwixt Cerigo and the Hares Iſland, in bredth about ten miles, and there diuiding their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the comming of the Chriſtians, with the prowes of their gallies turned, as if vpon the confidence of the place, which they had filled ouerthwart, they had purpoſed nothing more than to fight. Yet both fleets ſeemed reſolued; the one not to fight without the galleaſſes, and the other not to come neere thoſe hot ſhips, from whom they had but the yere H before receiued ſo great harme. And although the enemy, as was afterwards knowne, purpo-ſed nothing leſſe than to fight, but vpon great aduantage; yet fearing by open flight to diſhonor his lord and maſter, and by granting as it were of victorie, to increaſe the fame of the Chriſtians, the craftie pyrat made a great ſhew of that he leaſt indeed purpoſed. For pretending a great deſire to fight, he indeed deluded the Chriſtians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enemie would abide them battel, with much labor and rowing came ſo neere him, that the great ſhot began to flie too and fro on both ſides: but when the matter ſhould haue come to haue bin tried by dint of ſword, then it plainly appeared what the enemy had indeed purpoſed: for ſtill keeping the prowes of his gallies vpon the Chriſtians, he by lit- I tle and little ſhrunke backe; and beſide that the ſhadow of the night began then to approch, he cauſed al his great ordnance, charged only with pouder, to be ſhot off, & ſo in the thicke of the ſmoke retired vnſeene; colouring his ſubtill departure alſo, by certaine lights left in their cock-boats, making ſhew as if the whole fleet had ſtill there ſtaied. By this meanes the Turks with great celeritie eſcaped, being alſo holpen in this, that the Chriſtians hindred by the heauineſſe of the galleaſſes, could not but faire and ſoftly purſue them: for theſe galleaſſes, as they are veſſels of great ſeruice, ſo are they alſo heauie and vnweldie, and not fit for chaſe. The departure of the enemy at length knowne, the Chriſtians alſo vnwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two dayes after, the Turkes ſtayed in the bay of Tenarus (now called Meta- pan) & the Chriſtians at Cerigo; contented in that, that the enemy was the cauſe that the bat- K tell was not fought, and reckoning his wearie and couert declining of battell, as a ſecret con-feſſion of the victorie. The third day after, the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to ioine in battell with the enemie, in their former order ſet forward from Cerigo, and ſailing all the night, were in the breake of the day deſcried from land by the Turks: whereupon Vluzales by ſhooting off of certaine warning pieces commanded all his men to go aboord, and to put themſelues in readines for battell. And now the Chriſtians were not far off, when as the Turks (leſt declining of battell might reproue them of feare) came out of the hauen, with their fleet diuided into three battels: whereof the left wing was extended a great way into the ſea, the right wing ſtill keeping neere vnto the maine, and in the middle battell was Vluzales himſelfe: who came all on no faſter than the tyde draue them, ſtaying their courſe oft times of purpoſe, L to haue drawne the gallies of the Chriſtians from the galleaſſes and ſhips. Vluzales ſeeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galleaſſes, commanded both the wings of his fleet (hauing in each of them foureſcore gallies) to fetch a great compaſſe about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloofe off from the galleaſſes, and ſo to aſſaile the wings of the Chriſtians on the ſides or behinde: in hope ſo to haue diſordered their battell, and without danger to haue drawne the gallies from the galleaſſes and the other heauie ſhips.

Which their intent the Chriſtians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies alſo, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battell ſtill facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turkes fleet thus farre ſeperated from the middle battell, ſeemed to preſent vnto the Chriſtians a great aduantage: which Fuſcarinus (intentiue to all the offers of good fortune) M quickly perceiuing, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and ſhewing them the enemies main battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requeſted and perſuaded them, That not ſtaying for the heauie Ships and Galleaſſes, they would with him vpon the ſudden aſſaile the enemies middle battell now deſtitute of the wings: not doubting but ſo to ouerthrow Vluzales meaning nothing leſſe, yet maketh ſhew of battell.

the enemies greateſt ſtrength there, before the wings could, now they were ſo farre gon, ioyne themſelues to the battell againe. What could (as he ſaid) haue hapned more wiſhedly, than to haue their battel diuided? So that they might at more aduantage fight againſt euery part thereof, now ſeperated, than againſt all three parts at once. If they had thought themſelues not only equall, but too ſtrong for the whole enemies fleet vnited, ſhould they not the better ouercome them apart and diſperſed? The opportunity, as he ſaid, was but ſhort, and therefore to be forthwith reſolued vpon. If they would take the preſent occaſion of victory then offered, and as reſolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any ſuch thing, they ſhould by their celeritie and valour, teach the Turks what the Chriſtian diſcipline of war and power was able to do: but if they would therein vſe delay, they ſhould ere long in vaine wiſh for the like occaſion they had let ſlip, when as their battell was againe ſtrengthned with the wings. This the Admirals ſpeech was of moſt that heard it ioyfully receiued, and his counſell well liked; and that with ſuch a generall cheerefulneſſe of the ſouldiers, as ſhewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enemy preſent battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the ſame mind they had bin alwaies, ſaid it were dangerous ſo to do, for feare of drawing the whole three battels of the Enemy at once vpon them, againſt which they ſhould be too weake, without the help of the galleaſſes and heauy ſhips: and therefore ſaid flatly, That without thoſe veſſels ſo much feared of their enemies, they would not in any caſe hazard the fortune of a battell. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they ſo thought, or were ſo charged by Don Iohn (of whome they altogether depended) not to fight in his abſence, many doubted. The wings of the Chriſtians in turning about to confront the wings of the enemy, were a little diſordered: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the preſent opportunitie, with fifteen of their gallies were about to haue charged the ſtragling gallies: which Superantius perceiuing, to ſtay their courſe, went out couragiouſly againſt them with foure gallies, & made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius ſeeing fortie more of the enemies gallies comming towards him, and dodbting to be incloſed, with all ſpeed ſent for reliefe, which came preſently in, namely twentie gallies, with two of the galleaſſes: which forthwith ſent their thundering ſhot ſo thicke and furiouſly amongſt their enemies, that in a little time eighteene of their gallies were by them all rent and torne; and the Turks therewith diſmaied, were glad in ſuch haſt to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing at that fight but one of his gallies ſhot through, returned againe vnto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue bin the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuſcarinus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling again into their order, although the Chriſtians could not ſo faſt follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they ſo neere them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their ſmall ſhot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many ſignes gathered, that neither the Turks would abide preſent battell, neither the Chriſtians longer delay, if by their enemies they ſo might. The Chriſtians had agreed (as is before ſaid) not to ioine in battell without their galleaſſes and tall ſhips: which Vluzales well vnderſtood, both by the fugitiues and his owne eſpials, as alſo by their manner of ſailing. And he himſelfe, although he had no great deſire to fight, yet to be the better able to fruſtrat the endeauors of the Chriſtians (who with great labour drew with them the galleaſſes and other heauie ſhips) ſent his chargeable great ſhips to Maluaſia, there to be vnrigged; whereby he diſcharged himſelfe of a great burthen, and made himſelfe able at his owne choice and pleaſure, to leaue or take, to fight or not: and alſo with ſuch ſoldiers and other neceſſaries as were in the ſame great ſhips, ſupplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policie the matter was brought to that paſſe, that if the Chriſtians would needs draw the enemie to battell, they muſt of neceſſitie forſake their galleaſſes, their moſt aſſured ſtrength; or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any meanes inforce the readie enemie to fight. The day now declining, the enemy ſuppoſing himſelfe to haue done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Chriſtians, and encouraging of his own people, in ſeemly order, as one not affraid, ſailed with his fleet to Corona. The Chriſtians in like manner retiring themſelues to Cerigo.

The Turks fleet at Corona, and the Chriſtians at Cerigo.

Whileſt things thus went, Don Iohn by a frigot ſent of purpoſe, gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to Corcyra, ſharply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and that they ſtayed not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all other things ſet apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to reſolue of all matters.

Don Iohn ſendeth word to the fleet to meet him at Zacynthus.

Columnius wholly deuoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the fauour of Don Iohn before the reſt,hearing his meſſage,was in ſuch haſt to haue returned,that he would haue perſuaded Fuſ- G carinus to haue left the heauy veſſels and other weeke gallies at Cerigo, and with 100 of the beſt gallies with all ſpeed to haue returned to the Generall. Of which opinion was alſo Lilly.
But Fuſcarinus more careful than the reſt, as hee whome the danger more concerned,would not yeeld to that perſuaſion: for that in ſo doing,they ſhould(as he ſaid) leaue the ſhips & galleaſſes,the chief part of their ſtrength,in danger to be ſpoiled by the enemy; whom they now kept at a bay without the helpe of their Generall; and ſhould,as he well hoped, by often prouoking of him,at one time or other draw him to battell, and haue ouer him a notable victorie.
And therefore requeſted them for the loue of God,and the zeale they bare vnto the common good of all Chriſtendome, not to depart farther off, nor to ſuffer the enemy to eſcape out of their hands,neither by their departure to leaue the Iſlands of the Venetians ſubiect to the fury H of the enemy: whereas the Generall might at his pleaſure & without danger come vnto them, they lying betwixt the enemie and him. But Columnius and Lilly reſolutely ſet down,hap what hap ſhould, to do what Don Iohn had commanded, would not liſten to the reaſonable perſuaſions of the Venetian Admiral,but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had ſayd yeeld vnto them,they would forthwith leaue him vnto himſelf,& with their gallies preſently returne to Zacynthus,as the Generall had commanded. Whileſt they were yet thus diſcour-ſing,news was brought,that the enemy was come with his fleet into the fret of Cerigo: which cauſed them all with one conſent to reſolue in ſuch order to paſſe by the enemy, as if they ſhould haue giuen him preſent battel: wheras before,they were determined by the perſuaſion of Fuſcarinus to haue gon to Crete,and there leauing the ſhips & galeaſſes in ſafety, to haue af- I terwards returned to the Generall. In ſuch order the Chriſtians paſſed by the enemies fleet, which lay ſtill in the fret of the ſea without mouing,ſtanding as it were rather vpon the guard of themſelues,than reſolued for battel. In three days ſailing they came to Zacynthus, where they found not Don Iohn, but two of his gallies,& commandment,that they ſhould there leaue their heauy ſhips,& with their gallies come to Cephalenia,where they ſhould not fail to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieued,& muttered thorow the whole fleet, That the Spaniards bearing themſelues vpon their wealth,were too proud,aud in compariſon of themſelues, regarded neither the conditions of the league, neither any other mans credit, but troad all men vnder foot; and would now vſe the Venetians not as their friends & confe- K derats,but as their ſlaues and vaſſals,feeding them in the meane time but with vain hope. Yet foraſmuch as the time & neceſſity ſo required,they were content to be ouerruled: and ſo leauing the ſhips & galleaſſes at Zacynthus,went with the reſt of the fleet to Cephalenia: whither Don Iohn was not yet come,but had ſent word thither, That if they had any deſire to ioine their forces with his,they ſhould yet come further back vnto him in Corcyra. This meſſage(which they had rather feared than expected) much troubled the Venetians; who readier to ſuſpect euery miſchiefe,than to hope for any good, began to fret and complaine, That the Spaniards could very well tell the Venetians what they had to do,and forget in the mean time,what was on their own part to be performed. A hard thing it was to ſay,and yet to be ſaid,that now they had more to do with thoſe their dallying friends and confederats,than with their enemies: for L with their enemies they were to fight but in time of battel, but with them them they were to wreſtle at all times & in all places. They were by them (as they ſaid) drawne from the fight of their enemies,when as they might haue bin ouerthrowne: not to the intent that with their vnited forces they might more ſafely fight againſt them, or vnder the conduct of Don Iohn gaine the victory; but rather leſt any thing ſhould haue bin done which might be to the honour or profit of the Venetians: and that time which was to haue bin beſtowed in the managing of the war,ſpent in lingering and delaying, and vain going forward & backward to no purpoſe. One only way there was(as they ſaid)to haue diſpatched with the Turke, which was, by ouercom-ming him in another notable battell, and ſo to haue vtterly broken his ſtrength at ſea: which courſe the confederats made no leſſe difficult by their ofwardneſſe & delaies, than the enemie M by declining of battell: That they had long ago by many ſecret ſignes probably coniectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder and croſſe other mens doings, than to do any thing of themſelues: That their endeauors were to fruſtrate thoſe great hopes which promiſed vnto the Chriſtian Common-weale the greateſt felicitie and happineſſe, together with im-mortall

A mortall glorie: and, That the Turks of late diſcouraged with the fortunat proceedings of the Chriſtians, might againe reioice at their miſhaps.

The Venetians, notwithſtanding all theſe their murmuring ſpeeches, loth to fall off from the Spaniard, kept ſtil on with the reſt vntill they came to Don Iohn at Corcyra, who then lay with 53 gallies, & 18 ſhips at Spilca, in the vttermoſt end of the Iſland. At their firſt meeting, Don Iohn ſhewed himſelfe not a little offended, that they had not with more dutie before attended his comming: and they again not a little complained of his long ſtay, with many other their grieuances, which were tedious here to rehearſe. The fleet now all with much adoe at length met together, which conſiſted of two hundred gallies, nine galeaſſes, and thirtie ſix tall ſhips: it was by generall conſent agreed, That they ſhould againe ſet forward toward the enemie. B They were not yet vnder ſaile, when two of their eſpials brought them newes, that the enemies fleet (weakly furniſhed both of mariners and ſoldiers) was come to Nauarinum: which filled them all with good hope, that the Turks fleet ſo euill prouided, might in that place vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed, and the rather, if they came vpon them vnexpected. Wherfore, becauſe they would not be deſcried, they kept not their courſe on right forth, but ſailing by night, kept aloofe vpon the right hand: and hauing paſſed Zacynthus, came with great ſilence vnto the Strophades, where they lay at anchor all that day. In the euening they looſed thence, ſo caſting their courſe, that the more to terrifie the enemie, they might before day fal vpon him; and be ſeene in the mouth of the hauen where he lay, before there could be any report made of their comming thither. But this courſe ſo well ſet, the time was ſo euill caſt, that C it was faire day long before they could come to the appointed place; when the Turkes out of their watch towers diſcouered a farre off the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, gaue warning thereof vnto their fellowes: whereupon an alarme was preſently raiſed in the towne, and all men in armes ran headlong to the wals and to the hauen. But the Turks out of hope with their euill rigged fleet to be able to withſtand the Chriſtians, and not daring to truſt to that weake harbor, and all now in a great hurly burly, ran confuſedly hand ouer head, ſouldiers and mariners, aboord: and whileſt they had yet time, got them in haſt out of that harbor, & as men chaſed by their enemies, got them into ſafe harbour at Modon, a ſtrong towne of Peloponeſus, about ſix miles off. Columnius was ſent before the reſt of the fleet to haue purſued them: but they were got ſo far before him, that they had recouered the harbor before he could ouertake D any of them. The Chriſtian fleet comming before the harbor, and leauing a ſpace as it were of purpoſe for the enemy to come out into, there lay in the face of the towne, daring the Turkes battell. But when they had ſo lien almoſt all that day, and no man durſt come out; and now towards the euening certaine ſignes of tempeſt appeared, the Chriſtians fearing to be by force of weather driuen on ground, put farther off again to ſea. Then at length Vluzales ſent out certain light gallies to follow in the taile of the fleet, when the confederats ſuddenly ſtaying their courſe, and turning their powers vpon them, draue them headlong againe into the harbour: and afterwards retired themſelues with the whole fleet into the Iſlands Oenuſæ, now called Sapientia, right oppoſit againſt Modon. The next day wanting freſh water, they remoued vnto the bay of Meſſana, there to water in the mouth of the riuer Pamiſus, which there falleth E into the ſea: where in paſſing by Corone, they were oftentimes ſhot at out of the towne; and landing their men to water, were incountered by certaine troups of horſmen, ſent for that purpoſe by Vluzales. There was water dearly bought with the liues of many there ſlaine on both ſides: in the end, the Chriſtians preuailing, watered, and ſo againe returned vnto the Oenuſæ from whence they came.

The Chriſtian fleet altogether at Corcyra, ſetteth forward againe towards the enemie.

The Chriſtians offer the Turks battell.

Methone or Modon (for it is by both names known) ſtandeth almoſt in an Iſland ſtretching far into the ſea, where toward the Weſt runneth out a long point of the land a great way into the ſea; in the vttermoſt part whereof, ſtandeth a great round tower. The towne it ſelfe, is on the one ſide incloſed with the ſea, and toward the land ſo ſtrongly fortified, as that it ſeemeth almoſt impregnable: Towards the South commeth in a faire bay about three miles wide, ſafe F from all winds except the Northerly wind onely; & ſhut vp by a little Iſland in the mouth of the bay, maketh a ſafe & quiet habor, with two entrances therinto on either ſide of the Iſland. Within this bay lay the Turks fleet, with the ſternes of their gallies toward the land, and their prows towards the ſea. At the Southerly comming in of the bay ſtandeth an hil, which the inhabitants call Albus: on the top whereof, the enemy had placed ſix great pieces of ordnance, wherewherewith to keepe the Chriſtians from entring that way. So had they alſo vpon that point of G the maine, which (as we ſaid) runneth out from the towne, and vpon S. Bernards rocke, planted other great pieces of ordnance to defend that paſſage alſo. The Chriſtians comming vnto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet diuided into foure parts; but yet doubtfull what to doe: for beſide that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were alſo far more dangerous to be entred, by reaſon of the great ordnance planted vpon them. Neuertheleſſe, the Venetian Admirall in hope of good ſucceſſe, and loth to let the fearefull enemy ſo to eſcape out of their hands, would faine haue perſuaded the Generall with his whole fleet to haue entered the bay, and there in the harbor to haue oppreſſed the enemy: which he ſhewed to be no matter to do, for that the enemy was too weake in ſtrength, & could not be from land relieued. In which doing, they ſhould indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, H cut in ſunder all the ſinewes of the Turkiſh empire by ſea: and raiſing a tumult in the bay, and filling all with a generall feare, ſhould vndoubtedlly at the firſt onſet put the enemy to flight: Which done, what ſhould let, but that carrying about with them the terrour of the victorie, they ſhould with their victorious fleet, take from the Turke al the Iſlands of the Ægeum? That truly and wiſely it was ſaid of Themiſtocles, That whoſoeuer had the command of the ſea, muſt needs alſo preuaile in the reſt, and at length carrie away the victorie by land alſo. It was (as he ſaid) the part of good chieftaines, not to be wanting vnto themſelues when occaſion was offered: beſides that, they were the ſame Turks, whom they had but the yere before vanquiſhed; and what had that one yere either taken from them, or giuen vnto the Turks? or what ſhould they feare ſix pieces of ordnance mounted vpon a hill, who if they ſhould vndertake the battell, I were not to feare the great ſtore of ordnance in 260 of the enemies gallies and galliots? I my ſelfe (ſaid he) will be the guide and leader, in whatſoeuer ſhall ſeeme moſt difficult & dangerous: and will in perſon my ſelfe be the firſt that ſhall enter the harbour, and aduenture the firſt danger. Great victories (he ſaid) were not to be gained but with great aduentures; and that therefore the matter were to be haſted, before more aid ſhould be ſent vnto the Turks. Wherfore they ſhould as reſolute men attempt that, the Turks thought the Chriſtians durſt not to haue attempted; and with the ſame courage breake into the bay, wherewith they had but the yere before broken the ſtrength of the ſame enemie; & by the power of God, carrie away another notable triumph of the vanquiſhed Turks: who ouercome in a ſecond battell at ſea, muſt needs depart with all their maritime territories. With euill liking of the Spaniards was the K Venetian Admirall heard: and Don Iohn the General, deeming both the time and place vnfit for the attempting of ſo great an exploit; rehearſed on the one ſide, the ſtrength of the enemy, the diſaduantage of the place, the difficultie of the battell, with the manifold and great calamities receiued by the ouerhaſty and raſh attempts of their enemies: That the enemies ſtrength was not to be ſo much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reaſon; & that many in ſeeking to increaſe their former glory, had in ſo doing ouerthrown the ſame: That the Chriſtians in entring and aduenturing the harbor, ſhould on the one ſide be beaten with the artillerie from the hill; and on the other, with the artillerie out of the caſtle of Modon: and that it was not like that Vluzales ſhould if need were, lacke aid from land, who but the other day had ſent great troups of horſemen to haue kept the Chriſtians from watering: That a matter of ſo great importance, L was (by Fuſcarinus his leaue) not raſhly to be taken in hand, vpon an heat and hautineſſe of ſtomacke, but vpon graue and mature deliberation: fot if they ſhould in a place of ſo great diſaduantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it ſhould ſeeme that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the enemy, or elſe would make the bay of Modon more famous by the ouerthrow of the Chriſtians, than was the Curzulari by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Then what a ſhame would it bee, if they which were about to oppreſſe the enemies fleet, ſhould themſelues be ouerthrowne, and that in their owne deuice. He had rather (as he ſaid) preſerue his own fleet, than to take 600 of the enemies gallies, and to account the ſame for a greater honor.

Which he determined not, for that he would not haue any thing done; but that vnripe occaſions ſhould not be too much haſtned, and as it were thruſt headlong forward: whereas time M would giue opportunitie for the ouerthrow of the Turks fleet, ſo that they ran not blindly on headlong: & that in future time, the Venetians would reioice that they had ſo moderated their deſires. The Chriſtians (he ſaid) had ſufficiently preuailed, if thoſe things ſhould fall out well, which were warily and aduiſedly conſidered and reſolued vpon.

A The matter thus on both ſides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the fleet into the port of Nauarinum. This proceeding, as it diuerſly moued the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo brought it forth diuers ſpeeches, euery man ſpeaking in fauour of his owne nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That hee had moſt prouidently reſolued; for that how deere the counſell of the Venetian Admirall would haue coſt if it had been followed, the thing it ſelfe (as he ſaid) ſhewed, by the extreame danger thereof preſented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laied open before their eies. The Venetians on the other ſide more deſirous of battell, the neerer they had ſeene the opportunitie to haue preuailed vpon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured ſo aſſured a victorie to haue beene let ſlip out of their hands; and thereof ſpake accordingly.

The caſtle of Modon in vain beſieged by the Chriſtians.

B The Chriſtians lying at Nauarinum, conſulted of many things what they were beſt to take in hand: & reſoluing at laſt, by ſea and land to beſiege the caſtle of Modon, which kept the paſſage into the bay, and defended the Turkiſh fleet, they returned again thither, & landed 7000 of their beſt ſouldiers, to beſiege the caſtle. And at the ſame time, appointed the galeaſſes with certaine gallies to batter it alſo from ſea: which the more commodiouſly to doe, they ioined two of their greateſt gallies together ſide to ſide, which they made faſt with maſts and ſtrong ropes, and ſo bourded them cleane ouer, whereon as on a platforme, they placed gabions all afront, filled with earth, and great ordnance betwixt to haue battered the caſtle. But when this engine (in manner of a floating fort) ſhould haue performed the ſeruice for which it was deuiſed, it proued vnſeruiceable, after it had with much adoe beene brought thither, being ready C to ſinke with the weight of the great ordnance and other things wherewith it was ouercharged. For which cauſe, and for that they vnderſtood a great number of horſemen to be come into the towne, they gaue ouer the ſiege vainly begun, and put againe with their fleet to ſea. It fortuned at the ſame time, that a tall ſhip of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and comming alongſt the coaſt of Peloponeſus with prouiſion for the fleet, was deſcried by the enemie; who thinking to do the Chriſtians a great diſhonour, if they could almoſt in the ſight of their fleet ſurpriſe her, they ſent out certaine light gallies to haue taken her; Vluzales in the meane time with the reſt of his fleet, lying in the very mouth of the bay, ready to come out if the Chriſtian fleet ſhould once ſtir to relieue her. Which the Chriſtians perceiuing, and well hoping that ſo the enemy would be drawn to battel, ſent out Columnius with his gallies to reſcue D the ſhip, and others alſo which lying aloofe, might get in betwixt the Turks gallies & the bay: Don Iohn and the Venetian Admirall, lying ready to haue giuen battel, if Vluzales ſhould haue come forth: but the Chriſtians comming on with a ſmal gale, the enemy being afraid, by ſhooting off of certain warning pieces within the bay, in time called backe the gallies that were already gone out of the bay: who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the nephew of Barbaruſſa, a moſt famous captaine amongſt the Turkes, who as one of great courage, and deſirous of honor, ſtaied a little without the bay, with greater courage than diſcretion, expecting who ſhould aſſaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis ſet vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight: but in the end the Marques preuailing, ſlew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honor carried away the gallie. So the diſhonor which Vluzales would haue done the Chriſtians, fell E vpon himſelfe, hauing in his owne ſight loſt one of his beſt captains with his gallie.

Mahomet ſlain.

The next day, becauſe the yere ſhould not paſſe without ſomething done, nor the hope of ſo great a preparation come to nothing, the Chriſtians determined to beſiege the caſtle of Nauarinum (which was in antient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the natiue place of old Neſtor. The citie of Nauarinum ſtandeth vpon a riſing ground, ſtretching ſomewhat into the ſea, whereinto it hath a large proſpect, and a faire large hauen, but ſubiect to the Northwind. It is defended with a point of the main, running compaſſe into the ſea, whereon ſtandeth an old caſtle. Some ſent before to view the ſcituation of the place, brought word backe, that the caſtle might in three daies be woon. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furniſhed with F munition and victuall. He landing with two thouſand Italians, a thouſand Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began with twelue great pieces to batter the caſtle. And albeit that the batterie was plantdd ſo farre off, as that it did the enemie no great harme; yet happily the enterpriſe had taken effect, if by taking the ſtraight and troubleſome paſſages through a rough and thicke forreſt, the citie had bin kept from reliefe: but foraſmuch as thoſe paſſages were left free, the enemie cunningly oppoſed policie againſt force; for ſallying out of the citie, they gaue the G Chriſtians an hot skirmiſh: and in the mean time whileſt the Chriſtians were ſo buſied, by a port toward the foreſt on the other ſide of the city, receiued in great number both of horſe & foot. The report of this new come aid cauſed the Prince to raiſe his ſiege, and to goe againe a boord. And now reſted all the hope of the gaining of the towne in the ſtrength of the fleet; and that not ſmall, for that the Turks not relieued with victuals by land, were by the confederats kept from them alſo by ſea: for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great miſchiefes, the Plague, and Famine. For no prouiſion had there bin made, as in a thing not feared, and that little being ſpent that was in the towne, they were inforced to ſeeke for victuals further off: which comming but ſparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the ſouldiers that lay about in the countrey villages, wanting victuals no leſſe than H they in the citie. And the more men the Beglerbeg of Græce brought downe for defence of the ſea towns, ſo much the more the wants of all things daily increaſed. So that no man doubted, but that in ſhort time all would be brought to extreame penurie. What a death the mortalitie had made, the want of men in the gallies well declared: for many of the gallies for lacke of mariners and ſouldiers were ſent away into Eubœa, or left at Maluaſia, or carried away to Conſtantinople. Thoſe which ſtaid in the bay of Modon, were ſcarce 100 gallies, and 40 galliots: and they ſo ſlenderly manned, that the greateſt gallies had ſcarcely an hundred & twentie men left in them, and they ſo meagre & faint, as that they could ſcarcely hold vp their weapons. The Chriſtians vnderſtanding of theſe things, were in good hope, that by continuing the ſiege, they ſhould without danger gaine a notable victorie: for which cauſe Foſcarinus perſuaded I the Spaniards (of whoſe conſtancie he doubted) to hold it out, as men of reſolution; ſhewing them, that in the euent of this action reſted for them for euer to be feared or contemned of the Turks: who except they ſhould be changed into fiſhes or into birds, could not (as he ſaid) without a notable ouerthrow eſcape their hands out of the Bay. But vnto this his hope and counſel, the euent was not correſpondent: for the Spaniards, whether it were for the tediouſneſſe of the ſiege, or for want of victuals, or for the approch of Winter, or els moued with ſome other reaſons, began to thinke of the matter diuerſly: and at the firſt a report was raiſed, That the Chriſtians giuing ouer the ſiege, would ſhortly returne home: and the reaſon was, for that they wanted bisket, and had ſcarcely victuals left for fifteene dayes, which was to be reſerued K for their long iourney home: beſides that, the approch of Winter did call them from the action; and that hauing done what they might, they could neuer draw the enemy forth to battell; and that therfore hauing ſufficiently and as far as was poſſible already diſcharged their duties, they were now alſo to regard their ſafetie, and to foreſee that their fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was repoſed, were not too far endangered. At the firſt theſe ſpeeches were diuulged by the common ſouldiers and mariners of ſmall credit or reputation; but afterwards by moe, and they alſo men of better place and ſort: Yea Don Iohn himſelfe, whether it were to ſome other purpoſe, or that hee ſo ſpake in good earneſt, began to lay the fault vpon others, why that he, ſo lately come from Meſſana, ſhould in ſo ſhort time want victuals and all things elſe neceſſarie.

The weakneſſe of the Turkes fleet.

The Venetians murmure againſt the Spaniards.

With theſe vnexpected reports, and ſo far different from the confederation, the Venetian L Admirall with the reſt of the Venetian commanders were exceedingly troubled, and grieued aboue meaſure: for it ſeemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the moſt fertile and plentifull countrey of Sicilia, in all ages the moſt faithfull and abundant granarie and ſtorehouſe of Italie, both in peace and warre, could ſo ſoone want victuals. Could eighteene tall ſhips (which ought by the capitulations of the league to haue come loaded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and neceſſary prouiſion) become emptie? or but to haue brought ſo much as might but ſuffice for a month only? If this were done without the knowledge of Don Iohn, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winking therat, where was his zeale to the confederation, or to what purpoſe came he to Corcyra? was it to auert the Chriſtian fleet (hauing once or twice met with the enemy) from doing any good vpon him? Could M it come into any mans head (beſides that in ſo doing he was therein to extinguiſh the glory of a moſt certain victory, like to worke the Turks confuſion) by the infamy of a voluntary returne to increaſe the glory & renowne of his enemy, and bring a perpetuall ignominy and diſgrace vnto the honour of the Chriſtians? Verily the Spaniards, therein to ſhew themſelues not ſo willing

A willing to haue the power of the Turks abated, as the ſtrength of the Venetians not increaſed.

The Venetian Admirall perſuadeth the Spaniards in no caſe to returne from the enemy

These things Fuſcarinus and the Venetians ſometimes fretted at amongſt themſelues; and otherwhiles the Admirall himſelfe expoſtulated the ſame with Don Iohn and Columnius: & in the preſence of the greateſt counſellors ſhewed, not only how profitable, but alſo how neceſſarie perſeuerance was in all martiall affaires: That it was an old and viſual matter for men in beſieging of their enemies, to ſuffer many difficulties: if they ſhould, hauing performed nothing, return with the fleet, who would doubt but that both their labor & charge was again the next yere to be renewed? And what could this delay be els, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Chriſtian commonweale, although they had not all things in abundance, yet reſolutely and with patience to indure the ſcarcity of victuals.
B If want of bisket were feared, the Generall might eaſily remedie that matter, by ſpeedily ſending for thoſe ſhips which lay laded with victuals good ſtore at Tarentum, which thing might in ſhort time be performed. In the mean time he promiſed to ſupply the Spaniards wants with part of his owne ſtore: and that he had rather his men ſhould liue with rootes, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, ſo to eſcape his hands: That the deſire to protect the honour of the Chriſtians, would ouercome all difficulties. Beſides that, the matter would be but ſhort, if it were done at once, in one continued courſe, and would vndoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had ſo well begun, vntill they had accompliſhed it. They (as he ſaid) might in good ſafety lie with their fleet in the ports of Nauarinum, Sapientia, and Ca-
C praria: wheras the enemie, lying ſhut vp in the bay of Modon, ſhould haue but a bad & dangerous Winter harbor; and October being now begun, ſhould in ſhort time be in danger to periſh with bluſtering ſtormes and rage of the ſea, familiar vnto that time of the yere; or elſe enforced with the extremitie of the weather, and with want, to aduenture into the open ſea, and with their weake forces to ioyn battell. What ſhould therfore let, why they ſhould not for 10 or for 15 daies continue the ſiege, as beſt beſeemed the honor of themſelues, the valor of their ſouldiers, and worthineſſe of the Chriſtian name? What a terrour it would be vnto the enemy, to ſee the Chriſtians ready to indure all extremities and wants, to gaine the victorie ouer the Turks? Again, what diſhonor and diſcredit would it be vnto themſelues, if they ſhould ſuffer the enemy (ſhut vp and not daring to fight) to eſcape: eſpecially, when as they might ſitting D ſtill, end the war? The Senat of Venice, he ſaid, moſt reſted vpon the valor & courage of Don Iohn, & therefore he requeſted him not to deceiue the great hope they had of him conceiued: for how much ſhould he himſelfe blemiſh his owne honor, if when he had before relieued the afflicted ſtate of the commonweale, he ſhould now, when it was moſt of all to be holpen, forſake the ſame? Which ſhould not be much vnlike, as if a man ſhould with great labor purchaſe great ſtore of precious pearles, and vpon an humorous paſſion caſt them all into the ſea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the Generall, an honorable remembrance of his victorie, and regard of his valor; all which, how much the more pregnant and honorable ſhould they be, by the ſecond vanquiſhing and ſubduing the moſt mighty monarch of the world: and that if the action well begun, ſhould be effectually proſecuted by the goodneſſe of God, the E direction of the commanders, and the reſolution of the ſouldiers, in ſhort time the Chriſtians ſhould carrie the victorie from the Turks, and make him their Generall equall not only with the great chieftains of the preſent time, but euen with the moſt famous commanders of al former ages.

Don Iohn replieth vpon the Venetian Admirall.

Whereunto Don Iohn replied, That the action then in hand no leſſe concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life deſired nothing more, than to ſtand the Chriſtian commonweale in ſtead: That he pointed at the ſame marke with Fuſcarinus, & in zeale to doe good vnto the Chriſtian commonweale, gaue place to no man; but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to ſay it: leſſer things (he ſaid) were to be ouerpaſſed, to reſerue themſelues for the performance of greater: and therfore marueiled that Fuſcarinus alone could not ſee things moſt manifeſt before his eyes, who otherwiſe could with F his piercing wit ſee through the deepeſt matters: could he thinke by any other means to abate the power of the Turk, than if they kept their fleet whole; that it was euer the maner of the greateſt & moſt worthie cōmanders, rather to ſhun the preſent dangers, than to encreaſe their territories: That nothing was ſo well purpoſed, which might not be of ſome wrongfully ſuſpected: but his faithfull meaning to be pure and without ſpot; and albeit that the opportunitie ſerued not for him to ſhew it: yet was his deſire and endeuour nothing leſſe: And that Fuſcarinus rinus ſhould do well more intentiuely to conſider, what the cauſe, the matter, and the time required G: That the manner of war at land and at ſea, were much different: and that although warres of both ſorts were to giue place vnto the moſt vnſeaſonable time of the yere, vnfit for any kind of war, yet might men at land, better indure the Winter ſtormes in their tents & cabins, than at ſea in their gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wiſedome, nor valour helpe not: but that (except it be ſo prouided and foreſeene, that the ſeaſonable time of the yere, and commodious for ſayling, may be taken) all muſt together periſh by ſhipwracke. What, would hee haue them to ſtriue aboue their power with the winter ſtormes, and famin, the greateſt extremities of nature? Beſides that, he was verily perſuaded, that the Turks inioying the commodities of a good harbor, & of a rich citie, would there in ſafetie winter; the countrey of Peloponeſus relieuing them with all neceſſaries: when as the Chriſtians in the mean time, except H they in time returned home, ſhould lie expoſed to the rage of the ſea, ſtanding as it were in a continuall watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of Winter & dead time of the yere, which in reaſon ought to giue reſt to all men. And that therfore euery man ought for the preſent to beare his owne grieuances, and not by the harms of his friends and confederats, to ſeeke his own auaile. And that he, bearing himſelfe vpon the inward integrity of his good wil toward the Venetians, would this ſay, howſoeuer Fuſcarinus ſhould vnderſtand it, that if the kings fleet ſhould by long ſtaying there periſh, it would no leſſe concerne the Venetians, than the king himſelfe: and taking God to witneſſe, would ſolemnly promiſe, Nothing to be vnto him more leifer or religious, than to be preſt ſo ſoon as the time of the yere would giue leaue, and by his endeuour to make all men to know, that he had no leſſe care of the Venetian State, I than of the kings affaires; neither deſired any thing more, than to be accounted, & indeed to be a moſt conſtant vpholder of that moſt Chriſtian league; and that beyond all expectation, euen in the iudgement of the Venetians themſelues: but for the preſent they muſt pardon him, if he gaue place vnto the neceſſity of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their victuals, that would not be any helpe, but the deſtruction of both the fleets; for ſo they ſhould both ſooner feele the want: wherefore it were much better to preſerue the fleet, which they might vſe in the next yeres wars, than wilfully to caſt away the ſame by famine, & the rage of the ſea. In briefe, what an indignitie ſhould the Chriſtians ſuſtain, if they themſelues ſhould by the ſame means be ouerthrowne, whereby they had thought to haue ouerthrowne others.

The Spaniards about to return without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were ſo reſolutely ſet downe for their departure, that not only with- K out the conſent of the Venetians, but euen without their priuitie, their departure was reſolued vpon, and ſecret commandement giuen vnto the maſters of the gallies, with all the haſte that might be, to depart thence to Meſſana. Which the Venetian Admirall vnderſtanding, & therwith troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboord the General, & greatly complained of his purpoſe for ſo ſudden a departure: requeſting him a while to ſtay, vntil the two gallies made faſt together in the harbor of Nauarinum (as is beforeſaid) with the ordnance vpon them might be put in good ſafety, & neither they, or any thing elſe left for a prey vnto the enemie. With much adoe, Fuſcarinus perſuaded him to ſtay that night, that thoſe gallies might bee brought out of the harbor, and all things put in order for their departure. The reſt of the night was ſpent in debating of the matter too & fro: where Don Iohn would needs haue it conceiued L into a publike inſtrument in writing, That the fleet by the generall conſent of the three Admirals returned for lacke of victuals: whereunto the Venetian Admirall hardly conſented. But when the inſtrument ſhould haue bin made and confirmed, Don Iohn better aduiſed by one of his Secretaries, That the ſame would redound vnto the great diſhonour both of the king and himſelfe, that the fleet comming out of the fruitful country of Sicilia, ſhould in a months ſpace want victuals; changed his mind for the writing, & onely requeſted the Venetian Admirall to credit him & Columnius, in that they had ſaid concerning the want of victuals: promiſing him, that if vpon the way he ſhould meet with the victuals that were ſent for, he would forthwith return & giue him aid, as the time and occurrents ſhould require: but in the mean time to proceed by common conſent, to do that which was moſt needfull. Hereupon they returned: and M comming to Corcyra, they met the expected ſhip laded with victuals. Now is not Fuſcarinus vnmindfull of his dutie, but comming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promiſe; telling him, That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy ſo ſoone as hee vnderſtood of their departure, would come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards Conſtantinople; and being

A being but weake manned, and worſe furniſhed of mariners, might eaſily be ouertaken vpon the way and ouerthrowne. But Don Iohn was not by any meanes to be thereunto perſuaded, pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to returne. So the expectation of great matters to haue bin this yeare done, came to nought, but vaniſhed into ſmoake: and nothing performed worth ſo long a diſcourſe, more than to ſee with what difficultie great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their owne honor, or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the faireſt opportunities, & by their croſſe dealing, no leſſe than the enemy, hinder the common good, whereat they would all faineſt ſeeme to aime. From Corcyra Don Iohn departed to Meſſana, and Columnius vnto Rome. Fuſcarinus with greater honor than ſucceſſe returned to Venice, where he was with great joy receiued, B both of the Senat and the citiſens in generall: and ſo (no leſſe famous for his patience & moderation towards the other confederats, than for his policie and valour) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charge, in few yeares after to receiue a greater.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom much is before ſpoken in the life of Solyman) being but a little before driuen out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by little and little incroched vpon him) and as a priuat man liued in exile with his two ſonnes at Guletta with Franciſcus Touares Gouernour thereof; hearing of the great ouerthrow of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians, ſent Embaſſadours to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requeſting his aid for the C recouerie of his kingdome, promiſing to defray the whole charges of the warre, and for euer to hold his kingdome of the King of Spaine, as his vaſſal and tributarie. Whileſt his requeſt well conſidered of, and the matter thought of no ſmall conſequence for the ſafetie of the Chriſtian countries lying ouer againſt that part of Affricke, to haue ſo dangerous an enemie remoued; Don Iohn the yere following (in the beginning of October) by the commandement of the king of Spaine his brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and fiue gallies and fortie ſhips, arriued the next day about noone at Guletta, where the gallies of Malta came vnto him, and ſhortly after Iohn Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteene moe, and Columnius the Popes Admirall with fourteene moe, all well appointed. At his arriuall at Guletta, he vnderſtood by Amida and the Gouernour, the whole eſtate both of the citie and of the king-D dome of Tunes: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with ſo great a fleet, were about to forſake the citie. Wherefore hauing well viewed the place, he the next day after landed his forces about foure miles from the citie, and ſent two thouſand fiue hundred footmen before the reſt of the armie to the citie; who found it all deſolate, the Turks and Moores being before for feare fled, ſome to Carauana, ſome to Biſerta: who entring without reſiſtance, came to the caſtle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who ſaid they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no meanes ſuffer the Chriſtians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don Iohn, who then becauſe it was almoſt night, would not mooue, but early the next morning ſet forward with his whole armie; and entring the citie, before abandoned by the inhabitants, and ſo comming to the caſtle, found nothing therein but great ſtore of oile, E butter, and wooll.

Amida the late King, by the commandement of Don Iohn all this while ſtayed at Guletta. But whileſt Don Iohn was yet at Tunes, newes was brought to him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks garriſon before fled out of Tunes, with diuers Moores, comming to Biſerta, were there kept out by the citiſens, and not ſuffered to enter: for which cauſe they began to burne and ſpoile the country thereabout. Whereupon the Generall ſent Touares the Captaine of Guletta thither with part of the armie; who encountering with thoſe Turks ouerthrew them, and had the citie by the citiſens peaceably deliuered vnto him.

The kingdome of Tunes thus eaſily once againe recouered from the Turkes, Don Iohn thorowly informed of the faithles & cruell dealing of Amida the late king, and that in deteſtation F of the Chriſtians and their religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks, and procured the death of ſome of the Chriſtians; gaue this definitiue ſentence vpon him, being yet in the caſtle of Guletta: That foraſmuch as he had of long time bin the author of great diſcord and endleſſe troubles in that kingdome, and had moſt vnnaturally depriued Muleaſſes his father, firſt of his kingdome, and afterward of his ſight; and in like manner tyrannized ouer his naturall brethren, the rightfull heires of that Kingdome, whereby the Turkes had taken occa-ſion both to inuade and poſſeſſe the ſame: he ſhould therefore by the commandement of the king of Spaine be carried priſoner with his two ſonnes into Sicilia, there to remaine for euer. G Which heauie doome he taking moſt grieuouſly, and yet crying out for mercie, was forthwith thruſt into a gallie, and with his wife and children tranſported into Sicilia, there to liue in perpetuall exile: the iuſt reward of his mercileſſe and vnnaturall dealing with his father and brethren; God no doubt requiting him with the like meaſure hee had before meaſured vnto them.

Mahomet, Amida his brother, made King of Tunes, and vaſſal to the King of Spaine.

After that (the king of Spaine ſo commanding) Mahomet Amida his elder brother, and right heire of that kngdome, was appointed king in his place: who departing from Guletta to Tunes, was receiued as King, and there by ſolemne oath promiſed for euer to be the King of Spaine his vaſſal, and to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command.

H There was before departed out of Tunes fortie thouſand Moores, who now came and offered their ſupplication to Don Iohn, that they might againe returne and liue with their new king: which their requeſt being eaſily granted, they in great numbers euery day returned into the citie. Shortly after, fifteene hundred Turkes, with 3000 of thoſe wilde people which ſome call Arabians, ſome Alarbes, ſore troubled all the paſſages about the city: who were at laſt by the Chriſtians ouerthrowne, and an hundred and fiftie Chriſtians whom they had taken priſoners, reſcued. After that, Don Iohn by the aduice of his moſt expert and ſkilfull captaines, commanded a ſtrong caſtle to be built in the middle way betwixt Guletta and Tunes: and for the performing thereof left Gabriel Serbellio with two thouſand Italians; and Calazar a Spaniard with other two thouſand at Guletta. And ſo hauing performed that hee came for, I and diſpoſed of all things as he thought beſt, returned againe into Sicilia.

The Venetians weary of the delayes and croſſe dealing of the Spaniard, reſolue to ſue vnto the Turkes for peace.

A griefe of griefs it is, and ſorrow almoſt vnconſolable, when worthy actions moſt happily begun, ſort not to ſuch happy end as was in reaſon hoped for. The greateſt and moſt famous victory of all ages gained againſt the Turke, ſeemed to haue lightened the Chriſtian commonweale, and great hope there was, that the Chriſtians falling into vnitie amongſt themſelues, would by an happy exchange make the Turkiſh empire the ſeat of their wars, and to turn into the Turks dominions, the terrour, ſlaughter, and other calamities of war, which had ſo many yeres afflicted the Chriſtian commonweale. But by how much the more the joy was amiddeſt ſuch daily calamities and teares; ſo much greater was the ſorrow ſo great an hope to be come K to nought, and men to be ſo blinded with the darkeneſſe of enuy and diſdaine, that they could not ſo much as think, with what diſhonor and danger of the common ſtate, they ſhould ſhrinke from ſo iuſt, ſo honorable, and ſo needfull a ſeruice, including in it ſelfe the general good of all Chriſtendome. When poſteritie ſhall conſider what things might then haue bin done, and the deuices whereby the common cauſe was ouerthrowne; it will worthily blame and greatly lament ſo notable a victorie and fit opportunitie, ſent as it were from heauen for the effecting of great matters, to haue bin let ſlip & paſſed ouer ſo lightly regarded. This made, that they who before had repoſed all their hope in arms, had now no other confidence or hope of their welfare, but in concluding of peace. Truly the Venetians both ſpoke & thought honorably of king Philip, as of a moſt faithfull, juſt, deuout, and honorable prince: yet greatly blaming his officers and others of great authoritie about him, as men more regarding their owne priuate, than the L good of the Chriſtian commonweale. In theſe perplexities of the Venetians, king Philip promiſed them to ſet forth a greater and ſtronger fleet againſt the next yeare, and to be ſooner in readineſſe with all his forces and warlike prouiſion, and ſo to help them in all he might. Who for all that gaue ſmal credit vnto thoſe promiſes, for that with the like they had bin oftentimes before deceiued. And therefore as truſting moſt vnto their owne ſtrength, they with all carefulneſſe and expedition entertained moe ſoldiers; of whom ſome they put into ther fleet, the reſt they placed in their garriſons in Crete, in Dalmatia, and their frontier townes in Epirus. Neither were the Turks then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that war with greater fame than ſtrength: for they had of purpoſe giuen it out, That they would M the next Spring with diuers armies inuade the Venetian Territories in Crete, in Dalmatia, in Epirus, yea and in Italie it ſelfe; and with their innumerable multitude both of horſe & foot ſo ouerwhelme the Venetians, that they ſhould not be able poſſibly to hold out. This and more too they brauely vaunted of: but indeed Vluzales comming to Conſtantinople, had brought his Fleet ſo ſhaken and ſo weake, as that it ſeemed not poſſible but in long time to be againe repaired, and furniſhed with ſoldiers and mariners, in ſtead of them that had beene loſt, ſome in fight, but moe by the contagiouſneſſe of the infection. But howſoeuer the matter ſtood, the Venetians carefull with the expectation of great matters, and in ſmall hope of good ſucceſſe, comparing their own ſtrength with the ſtrength of the enemy: yet were they no leſſe diſcouraged with the delaies and croſſe dealing of the confederats, than with all the prouiſion of the enemy. It ſtucke in their minds, how that the Spaniards at ſuch time as Cyprus might haue bin defended, delaied their comming ſo long, that Nicoſia being loſt, it was time to returne: neither could they forget that lingering delay to haue bin the cauſe of the great mortalitie amongſt their men, dying in the fleet at Iadera: They remembred alſo, that the commodities which of ſo notable a victorie were moſt plentifully to haue bin reaped, were by the ſlender proſecuting of the ſame, ſo ſparingly taken, that the former dangers ſtill remained: And that Don Iohn, who ought by appointment to haue bin at Corcira in the beginning of Sommer, was ſcarcely come thither in the latter end of Auguſt: And that he in the third yeare of this war, at ſuch time as their fleet was with great labor and charge again repaired, would not or liſted not to aduenture to haue againe ouerthrowne the enemies fleet, but in the verie action to haue alwaies trifled away the greateſt part of Sommer, before his Spaniards could ſet forward: and when he might ſafely haue come to Cerigo, to haue called backe Fuſcarinus and the reſt, then facing of the enemy, & euen readie to haue giuen him battell: It was then ſecretly ſuſpected, the Spaniards to haue ſtayed of purpoſe, and to haue dallied on the time, that the Venetians hauing ſpent their forces, might be the more expoſed and ſubiect to their iniuries: It ſtucke faſt not in their mindes alſo, but euen almoſt in their eyes, what things had happened of former times in their confederations with that nation: they were grieued in the ſpace of three yeares an hundred times, twentie hundred thouſand duckats to haue bin to little or ſmal purpoſe ſpent in that war: Beſides that, they doubted leſt the Flemings with their confederats ſhould ſo intangle the king of Spaine in defending of his owne territories, as that he ſhould not be at leiſure to ſend any aid into the Eaſt: in which caſe, what hope or helpe were they to looke for? How ſhould they then defend the reſt of their Seigniorie in the Eaſt: How ſhould their emptie coffers ſuffice to maintaine ſo great armies both by ſea and land, as might withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie? Long were the diſcourſes, and effectuall the perſuaſions, that the Venetians had amongſt themſelues, to induce one another, and all in generall, more circumſpectly to conſider, not only what had alreadie paſſed, or was preſently in hand; but alſo more warily to foreſee what would be the courſe and what the euent of a matter ſo important: and betime to breake off the confederation, which they had alwaies found to haue ſtood them in ſmall ſtead. In reuoluing of theſe things, onely one remedie ſeemed moſt effectual for the curing of their afflicted State: which was, by deſiſting from war, to conclude a peace with the Turke, howſoeuer: which they were the rather in good hope to obtaine, for that diuers ſpeeches concerning the ſame had paſſed at Conſtantinople, and were from thence againe reported at Venice. All men thus inclining to peace, the Senat referred the proceeding therein vnto M. Antonius Barbarus their Embaſſador, (who all the time of theſe wars had lien in ſafe cuſtodie at Conſtantinople) willing him therein to vſe the helpe of the French Embaſſador, who had alwaies been a perſuader of peace.

Selymus himſelf deſirous of peace

Selymus hauing got the Iſland of Cyprus and diuers other places from the Venetians; & yet well wearied with the harmes and loſſes he had himſelfe receiued both by ſea and land, was alſo deſirous enough of peace. So that the French Embaſſador might, as it was thought, haue got a reaſonable and indifferent peace, if he had but expected the opportunitie of time. But he (whether moued with the common harmes, or ſome other ſecret cauſes to him beſt knowne) in making too much haſt, and ſeeming too deſirous of peace, much hurt the common cauſe of the Venetians, which he moſt deſired to haue furthered. Selymus hauing found him, reſolued with Muhamet the great Baſſa, what he would haue done: who at ſuch time as the ſame Embaſſador came vnto him about the matter, told him, That he had himſelfe many times moued, yea & ſo far forth as he might, importuned his great lord and maſter for peace, but could neuer find him willing to heare thereof, vntill that now at length ouercome and wearied with the continuall ſollicitation of ſuch as might do moſt with him, he had yeelded thereunto. So the thing that Selymus himſelf vndoubtedly deſired, that the crafty Baſſa ſeemed him with moſt difficulty to grant, rather vpon the inſtance and contemplation of them that labored for the ſame, than for any deſire he had thereunto of himſelfe. For certaine daies at the firſt the French Embaſſador G was moſt curteouſly heard, and the Baſſa with faire & cunning ſpeech promiſed, that the matter of pacification ſhould eaſily & in ſhort time be compoſed: and ſo at their firſt conferences things paſſed rather in general terms, than that any conditions of peace were particularly agreed vpon: only this was on both parties conſented vnto, That the Venetians ſhould ſend their embaſſador of purpoſe, for the ful concluding and confirming of the deſired peace. Which charge was by the Senat committed to Iacobus Superantius, in whoſe wiſdome and valor they had repoſed great hope and confidence. He was no ſooner come to Conſtantinople, and the Turkes deliuered of the feare of the Chriſtian ſword, by the diſſolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed, and the Venetians glad to endure the proud looks of the Turks, their diſdainfull eares, their deſpightfull ſpeeches, their long and inſolent attendance, with many H other ſhamefull indignities: Yea the Baſſa was ſo ſhameles, as proudly to aske them, How they durſt be ſo bold as to impugne the great Emperor Selymus his fleet at ſea. Whereunto the Embaſſador anſwered, That the Venetians had alwaies honored the Majeſtie of the Turkiſh Emperors, neither had at any time taken vp arms againſt him, but in their own reaſonable defence, when force was by force to be repulſed, a thing lawful euen for the wild beaſt in the wild wilderneſſe to do. At the firſt intreatie of the peace, the Baſſa ſeemed to put the Venetian embaſſador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his requeſt ſhould enioy their territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the ſame bounds, whereof they had in theſe wars loſt ſome part about Iadera. But when the matter ſhould haue come to the ſhutting vp, the Turke began to ſhrinke from that he had before promiſed, refuſing not I only the reſtitution of the territorie they had indeed by treaſon got; but by cautelous expoſitions of his meaning, framing the concluſion of the preſent peace vnto the forme of their former leagues, required, That as the Turkes had now yeelded vnto them Maluaſia and Nauplus, ſo now they ſhould redeliuer vnto them two other places of like worth and importance: As for not reſtoring the territorie they had taken about Iadera, to colour their deceit, they pretended that they might not by their law reſtore vnto the Chriſtians any towne or place wherein were any church or temple dedicated or conuerted vnto the Mahometane religion, as was there: and further, That the ſame territorie was alreadie giuen by Selymus in reward vnto his ſouldiers, men of deſert, from whom without great iniurie it might not be againe taken. Hereupon the French Embaſſador complained, That promiſes were not performed: and the Vene- K tians ſo fretted, that they were euen about to haue returned as men ſhamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks ſtil ſtanding vpon ſuch hard termes) the Embaſſadours by the appointment of the Senate concluded a peace with the Turke; wherof theſe were the chiefe capitulations: firſt, That the Venetians ſhould giue vnto Selymus three hundred thouſand duckets, one hundred to be preſently payed, and the other two hundred by equall portions in two yeres next following: then, That the merchants goods ſhould be indifferently on both ſides reſtored: and laſtly, That ſuch places of the Venetians as the Turke was alreadie poſſeſſed of, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto the Turks; but that ſuch towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks dominion, ſhould be again forthwith reſtored. For the firſt payment of the money the Turke was earneſt, thereby as by a fine L for an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honorable.

The Venetians ſend their Embaſſador of purpoſe to Conſtantinople to entreat a peace.

A peace concluded betweene Selymus & the Venetians.

The peace proclaimed at Venice.

This peace at Conſtantinople concluded the eleuenth day of Februarie in the yeare 1574. was by the decree of the Senat confirmed; and afterwards the 13 of April following ſolemnly proclaimed in Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederates. For the better ſatiſfying of whom, the Popes Nuntio, with the Embaſſador of Spaine, were ſent for into the Senat houſe. And although there were many things that grieued the Venetians, yet did they forbeare all hard ſpeeches, and of that their moderation receiued ſo much the more honor, as it is more difficultie for an angrie man to ouercome himſelfe, than others. The duke with calme & temperat ſpeech, framed to the purpoſe, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two euill counſellors, being ſet apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke: not for that he was deſirous M of the Turkes friendſhip, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not onely with loſſe, but euen with death it ſelfe to be maintained. How he had been ſpoiled of the kingdome of Cyprus, he further declared: and that the Venetian ſtate grew euery day weaker and weaker by the continual war:

A and that therefore, before it were by loſſe vpon loſſe come to the vttermoſt of extremity, they not able to maintaine ſo heauie a war, were to take ſome better courſe for the preſeruation of that which was yet left of their Seigniorie: for that the ſafetie of the Venetian State ſhould at all times be a ſure fortreſſe and defence of the Chriſtian commonweale againſt all the furious attempts of the enemie, and vncertaine euents of time.

The fame of this ſudden and vnexpected peace was for the iuſt and common hatred of the Chriſtians againſt the Turks, generally euill taken: and the Venetians for the concluding thereof hardly ſpoken of, as if they had betrayed the whole Chriſtian commonweale, or at leaſtwiſe their Confederates. For men were for the moſt part of opinion, that the Turkes peace would be but feigned and deceitfull; and that hauing gained time to ſet things in order, according B to his deſire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Chriſtians, come to his old courſe, and as he had alwaies done, breake the league and take vp armes. Some ſaid, That the Venetians forſaken of their friends and confederats, would in their owne deuices periſh; yet ſo, as that their deſtruction would turne to the generall harme of all Chriſtendome: and theſe men were of opinion, That in that caſe, and againſt that enemie, a dangerous warre was to be preferred before vn vncertaine and diſhonorable peace. Neuertheleſſe the Venetians, beſides that they for the preſent eaſed themſelues of many an heauie burthen, ſo haue they thereby enioyed the fruits of a long and happie peace, and found the ſame vnto their State both wholſome and profitable vntill this day. It was thought by the ſequel of matters, That Selymus was the more willing to haue peace with the Venetians, that he might the better recouer C the kingdome of Tunes and the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta from the Spaniards: who with the knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other port townes holden by the Turks vpon the coaſt of Barbarie, than how to defend the Venetians their Confederats. Thus with the loſſe of Cyprus and ſome part of the Venetian territorie in Dalmatia, ended the mortall and bloudie war betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the courſe whereof is well to be ſeene, what great matters the vnited forces of the Chriſtian Princes were able to do againſt this moſt mightie Enemie, if all diſcord and contention ſet apart, they would in the quarrell of the Chriſtian Religion joine with heart and hand againſt him, and fight the battell of Chriſt Ieſus.

The peace by experience found profitable vnto the Venetians.

Selymus now at peace with them who before moſt troubled him, to keepe his men of war D buſied, ſhortly after conuerted his forces againſt Iohn Vayuod of Valachia, and ſo at length ioined all that prouince to his empire. This countrey of Valachia was in antient time called Dacia: it hath on the Eaſt the Euxine (now called the Blacke ſea) on the South the famous riuer Danubius, on the Weſt Tranſyluania, and on the North Ruſſia. It is diuided into two parts, the one called Tranſalpina, & the other Moldauia (of the riuer Moldavus running thorow the middeſt thereof) but far paſſing the other both in greatneſſe and abundance of paſture. That part called Tranſalpina, Mahomet ſyrnamed the Great (which woon Conſtantinople) made ſubiect to the Turkiſh empire; but vpon Moldauia, the other part, he only impoſed a yearely tribute of two thouſand duckets. After which time the Vayuods of that country, aided ſometime by the Hungarians, and ſometime by the Polonians, riſe vp oftentimes againſt the Turks, and refuſed E to do their homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus Vayuod of that country, fauoring the Polonians, and joyning in league with them, liued much in Ruſſia, as purpoſing from thence alſo to haue taken his wife. Which Selymus ſuſpecting, with a great power chaſed him into exile, and placed in his ſtead one Iohn (called of his countrymen Iwan, and of ſome Iuonia) the ſuppoſed ſon of Stephanus ſometime Vayuod of that country: who with Ieremias Czarnieuiczius (a Moldauian, who afterward notably betrayed him) hauing of long time liued amongſt the Turks, to be the more gratious amongſt them, renounced his faith, and being circumciſed, turned Turke, and following the trade of merchandiſe, became among them a merchant of ſuch fame, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Baſſa's of the Court, and at length with Selymus himſelfe. He vnderſtanding by his friends neere about the Turkiſh Emperor, of his purpoſe for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Baſſa's, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayuod of Moldauia: ſtill increaſing the ſuſpition Selymus had conceiued of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he ſupported by the Polonians, was like enough in ſhort time to reiect his obedience to his Imperial Maieſtie. Selymus at the inſtance of the Baſſa's nominated this Selymus chaseth Bogdanus out of Moldauia, and placeth Iohn Vayuod in his ſtead.

Iohn to be Vayuod, who with a great power of the Turks horſemen entring into Moldauia, eaſily poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Countrey, Bogdanus being then abſent in Ruſſia, and as then ſuſpecting no ſuch matter: who yet afterwards attempted in vaine by the helpe of the Polonians to haue againe recouered his Countrey, but finding no poſſibilitie ſo to do, fled afterwards into Muſcouia, where he long time after liued. G Ioh the Vayuod falleth into ſuſpition with Selymus and the Baſſa's of the Court.

Iohn now quietly poſſeſſed of Moldauia, for ſome few yeares held the ſame with the good liking of the Turke, paying him his woonted tribute: but afterwards repenting himſelfe of his wicked reuolt from the Chriſtian Faith, and now eftſoones againe embracing the ſame, and (ignorant of his owne fortune) perſecuting with too much ſeueritie thoſe which withſtood his comming into the Countrey, eſpecially ſuch great men as tooke part with Bogdanus; and now after his returne vnto the Chriſtian Faith, not fauouring the Turks as he was woont, but H croſſing them in many matters, became ſuſpicious both vnto Selymus and the Baſſa's his old friends. Which the Vayuod of the leſſer Valachia (commonly called Valachia Tranſalpina) vnderſtanding, he became a ſuter vnto the great Baſſa's of the Court for his brother Peter, and earneſtly trauelled with them, that as Iohn ſupported by Selymus, had driuen Bogdanus out of Moldauia, ſo Peter his brother might in like manner by his helpe driue Iohn out alſo. In which his ſute he ſpared for no coſt, neither ceaſed by malicious ſuggeſtions to increaſe the ſuſpicion alreadie conceiued of Iohn the Vayuod: who hauing reiected the Mahometan Religion, and againe embraced the Chriſtian Faith, would (as he ſaid) in ſhort time, as had Bogdanus, joyne hands with the Polonians, and caſt off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whome he I had beene ſo highly promoted. Beſides that, this malicious man offered, That his brother Peter for ſuch his preferment, ſhould pay yerely vnto Selymus twice ſo much more as did Iohn, namely an hundred and twentie thouſand duckets by the name of a tribute.

The Baſſa's before corrupted, and moued with the greatneſſe of the tribute, perſuaded Selymus, by an Embaſſador to ſend for Iohn the Vayuod, to come vnto him himſelfe in perſon, and to command him to giue place to ſuch a man as he ſhould ſend thither in his ſtead: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. Hereunto Selymus, who had euen then much emptied his coffers with the loſſe of his fleet in the battell of Lepanto, and the chargeable warres againſt the Venetians, was eaſily induced: and to that purpoſe ſent his Embaſſador to the Vayuod: who hauing audience the one and twentieth of Februarie, at the ſame K time that Henry Valoys (afterward the French King) was crowned at Cracouia, deliuered his meſſage as followeth:

The commaunding ſpeech of the Turks Embaſſador to Iohn the Vayuod.

Selymus the Great Emperour of the Turkes ſendeth me vnto thee, Iohn, Vayuod of Valachia, his Tributarie; with this commaund, (whereunto his pleaſure is, that thou ſhouldeſt without delay ſend him anſwer:) firſt, he chargeth thee to ſend him not ſuch a tribute as he was wont, but twice ſo much more, to wit, an hundred and twentie thouſand duckets. If thou ſhalt refuſe ſo to do, there is another readie to giue it both for himſelfe and his poſteritie. But Selymus mindefull of thy conſtancie, fidelitie, and valour, will not be troubleſome vnto thee in thy gouernment, if thou forthwith ſend the aforeſaid tribute. Which if thou ſhalt refuſe to do, then his will is that thou ſhouldeſt giue place to another, and thy ſelfe L returne with me to Conſtantinople, there to anſwer the matter: otherwiſe, I am in his name to denounce all hoſtilitie and the calamities of war both vnto thee and thy countrey.

This proud meſſage of the Embaſſador ſtrooke farther into the minde of the Vayuod than any would haue thought: yet diſſembling his griefe, hee commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of ſo great importance, and ſo much concerning the whole State of his Countrey, hee could not giue him ſo preſent anſwere as hee required; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his Nobilitie and Counſell, hee would in ſhort time anſwere him accordingly. The Embaſſadour being gone to his Lodging, the Vayuod forthwith began deepely to conſider of Selymus his demands, and that in the Turkes Faith was no aſſurance, which hee kept or brake with the Chriſtian Princes as beſt fitted his owne turne: and beſides that, That if hee ſhould graunt to M pay that ſo great and heauie a Tribute in ſo great pouertie of his Kingdome, ſore waſted with ciuile warre, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, ſo long as any man would giue him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater, and in the end

A end ſuch an one as hee with all his ſubiects ſhould not be able to pay; which it ſhould not be ſafe for him at any time to refuſe, ſo long as any man would giue it. Wherefore calling together the nobilitie and States of his countrey, he brake with them in this ſort:

The ſpeech of the Vayuod vnto his nobilitie and ſubiects.

If euer you were to conſult and deliberate of a moſt important and difficult matter, this verily is that time: for Selymus the Turkiſh Emperour, enflamed with inſatiable auarice, and I know not by whoſe perſuaſion, not contented with his woonted tribute, exacteth of vs twiſe ſo much more. If you ſhall grant it, it ſhall not much concerne mee, as not to be payed by mee your Soueraigne, but by your ſelues and your poſteritie: if wee denie it, forthwith he denounceth vnto vs fire and ſword, with all the calamities of warre. And in this bareneſſe of our Kingdome, almoſt ſpoyled by ciuile warres, how B ſhall wee be able to pay it him? wherefore declare your mindes. Verily I foreſee, that if you ſhall in this yeeld vnto Selymus, and grant him ſo great a tribute, hee will not therewith long hold himſelfe contented, but euerie yeare extort a greater, vntill he haue altogether eaten vs vp. Wherefore it were better for vs (in mine opinion) to loſe our liues together with our wiues and children, than to ſuffer ſo great an indignitie: neither is it mine owne eſtate that troubleth me; for why, it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you liſt not to endure this ſo diſhonourable and baſe a ſeruitude, let mee forthwith ſo vnderſtand from you: and I will for my part ſo prouide, as that I will not onely not pay vnto the barbarous tyrant the new and heauie tribute he demandeth, but not ſo much as any tribute at all; ſo that you be not wanting both to your ſelues and me. I know right well (beloued and fellowes in armes) C what I owe both vnto you and the common-weale, for whoſe good and welfare I am alwaies ready to lay downe my life.

He had no ſooner thus ſaid, but that a ſecret ſorrow and vnwonted ſilence had as it were oppreſſed the whole aſſembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauie and dead ſleepe, they murmured among themſelues, that the Turkiſh Emperour ſhould ſo without reaſon oppreſſe them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not ſo plainly as truly ſpoken of the intollerableneſſe thereof: and that therfore they had rather die, than to indure ſo great diſhonor, ioyned with ſo foule a ſlauerie. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to ſerue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke D of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their liues and libertie, to fight it out vnto the laſt man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelitie, and taking of them an oath for the faithful performance of that they had ſo reſolutely promiſed, ſent for the Turks Embaſſadour, and gaue him this ſhort anſwer:

The anſwere of the Vayuod vnto the Turkes Embaſſadour.

I, for the antient fidelity and allegeance which I owe vnto my Lord and dread Soueraigne, the mightie Emperour Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute hee requireth, were it not that I know the mindes of my people to aborre the ſame: wiſhing rather to endure all calamities, hap whatſoeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto ſo diſhonourable and ſhamefull ſlauerie. Wherefore ſithence I cannot by any meanes extort the ſame from my ſubiects, tell my Lord Selymus, That I moſt humbly requeſt E him, not to take the ſame in euill part; whoſe amitie I wiſh to be vnto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than diſgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my ſingular fidelitie obtained of him the Vayuodſhip of Moldauia: which my good hope I moſt heartily beſeech him may not deceiue me.

With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the embaſſador vnrewarded, & with a ſafe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vſage of the embaſſador, cauſed him not a litle to be ſuſpected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embaſſadour ſent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the ſudden inuaſions of the Turks, forthwith began to raiſe his armie: and at the ſame time, ſent Embaſſadors vnto Henrie King of Polonia his neereſt neighbor, certifying F him of the dangerous ſtate of Moldauia, the ſureſt bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrowne, opened a faire and eaſie way for the common enemie into Polonia: and therefore requeſted him, that as the kings of Polonia had of antient time, euen for the ſafetie of their owne State, protected that countrey; ſo it would pleaſe him now in like manner in ſo dangerous a time, to giue him aid; or at leaſtwiſe to giue leaue vnto ſuch of his ſubiects as were willing to ſerue for entertainement, to come vnto him, whom he would with all honour and bountie vſe according to their place and qualitie. Whereunto the king anſwered, G that foraſmuch as he and his predeceſſors the kings of Polonia, had for the ſpace of more than an hundred yeres bin in league with the Turkiſh kings and Emperors, he could not either ſend him aide, or yet giue leaue vnto any of his ſubiects to ſerue againſt the Turke, as hee deſired.

The Vayuod entertaineth the Polonian Coſſackes.

With this anſwer the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceiued where he moſt hoped for reliefe: yet hearing of certain companies of the Polonian Caſſacks, which hauing long lien in hope of prey vpon the ſide of the great riuer Boryſthenes, were returning empty home, he by fit meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, offered them great entertainment to ſerue him in his warres againſt the Turke; of which his offer, they (as men liuing for moſt part by ſeruice) gladly accepted; and ſo without the knowledge of the king went vnto him, to the number of twelue hundred, with their captains, men of great courage and valor, of whom Suiercenius was chiefe:
who were by the Vayuod honorably entertained, and did him in theſe wars right worthy ſeruice. H Theſe Coſſacks are light horſemen, lying moſt commonly vpon the borders of the Polonian kingdome towards the Tartars: an hardie and valiant kind of men, whoſe beſt liuing, is the ſpoile they take from the enemie; and their beſt lands, their horſe and launce. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are moſt commonly in league with the Polonians, and ſeeme neuer ſo deſirous of peace; yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, vpon the ſudden break into the countries of Podolia, and Ruſſia, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there do great harme, if they be not in time repreſſed or cut off by the aforeſaid light horſemen, who for that purpoſe lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the Hawke for the prey.

Selymus ſendeth his forces againſt the Vayuod.

Selymus vnderſtanding the anſwer of Iohn the Vayuod, was therwith exceedingly enraged, I and the more by the bitter complaint of the embaſſador, who angry with the Vayuod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, ſpared not to the vttermoſt of his power, to incenſe the angrie Emperour againſt him, as if his honor had bin in the perſon of himſelfe contemned and violated. Wherefore without delay, he ſent thirty thouſand Turks, and two thouſand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of Valachia Tranſalpina, that ioyning thoſe forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and ſending him in bonds to Conſtantinople, to place Peter his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palatine glad of this command, and hauing raiſed his owne power, together with the Turkes & the Hungarians, ſwam ouer the riuer Moldavus, hauing in his army about an hundred and two thouſand fighting men: a power, not onely ſufficient to haue driuen the Vayuod out of Moldauia, but alſo to haue ſhaken a right puiſſant K king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the midſt of ſo great a ſtrength, little fearing, & leſſe regarding the ſudden comming of the Vayuod, ſuffred his men with their horſes to lie diſorderedly here and there, diſperſed in the large medows and paſtures al alongſt the faire riuer ſide; ſo the better to refreſh themſelues, wearie of their long trauel. In the mean time certain ſcouts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge army (the certaine number whereof they could not well deſcry) was come ouer the riuer: and now reſting themſelues, had turned off their horſes into the rich meadows thereabout, in ſuch diſordered and careleſſe manner, as that they might with a ſmall power be eaſily ouerthrowne. The Vayuod glad of this newes, forthwith ſent before Suiercenius with his Coſſackes, and 5000 other light horſemen, more certainly to deſcry what the enemy did, with the manner of his lying; L and he himſelf with the reſt of his army followed faire and ſoftly after. Suiercenius with great ſilence approching the enemies camp, ſuddenly light vpon the enemies ſcouts, in number about 500; who encloſed before they were aware, were taken euery man by the Coſſacks, and by them ſtraightly examined of the ſtate of their armie and campe. Who for ſafegard of their liues now in their enemies power, franckly confeſſed, how that the Palatine lay ſecurely thereby, reſting his armie, not ſo much for the refreſhing thereof after his trauell, as with greater ſtrength to ſet vpon the Vayuod with his freſh ſouldiers: and that in the army were about ſeuenty thouſand Valachians, thirtie thouſand Turks, and three thouſand Hungarians; who now diſperſed, and ſleeping in ſecuritie, might eaſily be ouerthrown. Of all theſe things Suiercenius M aduertiſeth the Vayuod; requeſting him with all poſſible ſpeed to haſten his comming, for the obtaining of a moſt notable and aſſured victory: he in the mean time lying cloſe with his men not far from the enemie. The Vayuod certified of all theſe things, came without delay, and

The Palatine with the Turks ouerthrowne by the Vayuod.

forthwith commanded Suiercenius with his men to giue the onſet vpon the enemy: purpoſing himſelf with the reſt of his army on the other ſide, to charge the diſordered camp in three places.

A ces. Suiercenius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, ſuddenly ſet vpon the ſecure enemies: who diſmaid with the ſuddeneſſe of the vnexpected danger, ſtood as men aſtonied, not knowing which way to flie, or how to make reſiſtance. But whiles Suiercenius with his light horſemen thus on the one ſide filleth the camp with tumult, terrour, ſlaughter, and feare, behold, euen as a ſudden tempeſt, commeth the Vayuod, bearing all the diſordered camp downe before him: neither had the enemies any means to flie, hauing put their horſes a great way off from them into the rich paſtures; but there taken vnarmed, were miſerably ſlain. In all the camp was lamentation and mourning, death raging in euery place with ſuch furie, that of ſo great an armie as of late paſſed the riuer, few or none eſcaped, more than the Palantine with Peter his brother, who by great chance with much ado getting horſes, ſwam ouer B the riuer, and ſo came to the caſtle of Brailouia in Valachia; all the reſt were ſlaine, and left to be of the beaſts of the field, and birds of the aire deuoured. It was a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſee the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, al ſtained with gore bloud, and their weapons of all ſorts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vayuod gaue vnto his ſouldiers, and there ſtaied foure daies to refreſh his wearied men. After that, he with his victorious armie entred into Valachia, the Palatines countrey, where he tooke many caſtles and townes, and put to the ſword all that came in his way, men, women, and children, without reſpect of age or ſex: and burnt all the country towns and villages before him as he went; ſo that all that part of the countrey of Valachia Tranſalpina, was couered with ſmoke and fire, to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in euery place drawne forth to C ſlaughter, the young babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and afterwards ſlaine: and in briefe all the crueltie that could be deuiſed, performed: in the bloudie execution whereof, the Vayuod commended his men, perſuading them in like manner ſtill to proſecute the victorie, & that the reſt of their labors was al but for prey and bootie, for the enriching of themſelues. In this hauocke of all things, it was told him, That the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom he moſt ſought after, were in the caſtle of Brailouia not farre off: whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his armie. The citie of Brailouia ſtandeth vpon the riuer Danubius, and had in it a caſtle of ſome good ſtrength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a ſtrong garriſon of the Turks, which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the key of the countrey: not far from this citie the Vayuod encamping his arD mie, writ vnto the captaine of the caſtle, forthwith to deliuer vnto him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortall enemies, who neuer wronged by him, had inuaded his countrey, and ſought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his further harm, conſtrained him by force to yeeld them. Theſe letters he ſent by two Valachian captiues, to be deliuered vnto the captaine of the caſtle: whereunto he returned anſwere by foure Turks, two of the citie, and two of his owne ſeruants, by whom he alſo ſent ten great ſhot, and as many ſmall, with two Turkiſh arrowes, and this meſſage.

For that I know thee to bee the ſeruant of my dread Soueraigne Selymus, I regard thee: and will not denie the ſame men to bee with mee, whome thou ſo much requireſt. But foraſmuch as I vnderſtand, that thou of late haſt ſlaine a great number of the ſeruants of the great Emperour, who by his commandement were bringing Peter the brother of the Palatine into Moldauia: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raiſe thy ſiege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with ſuch diſhes as theſe; whereupon thou and thine armie gorged to the full, ſhall all afterwards dangerouſly ſurfeit and caſt. Farewell.

The blunt anſwer of the captaine to the Vayuod.

This rough anſwer ſo much moued the Vayuod, that he commanded hands to be laid vpon the aforeſaid foure meſſengers; and their noſes, lips, and eares, being cut off, both their feet to to be with great nailes faſt nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and ſo with their heads hanging downward, to be ſet vp before the citie, & ſo left for the captain and the citizens to gaze vpon. Signifying withal vnto the captain that ſent them, that he himſelf with the other fugitiues his gueſts, ſhould in like manner be ſerued, if they fel into his hands. Immediatly after, he aſſaulted the citie, and vſing the cheerfulneſſe of his ſoldiers, by plain force tooke the ſame, the defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great ſlaughter of the Turks, wheras Barbarous crueltie.

The citie of Brailouia taken by the Vayuod & raſed down to the ground, no man was taken to mercie; the very babes were ſlaine, together with their mothers, & blood ran like riuers into the Danubius. For the ſpace of foure daies this bloudie execution indured: no place ſerued for refuge, euen the moſt ſecret and obſcure places were ſearched, and the poore creatures there found, drawn forth and ſlain. The fury was ſo great, that no liuing thing, no not ſo much as the very dogs were ſpared. Much gold, ſiluer, plate, iewels, and other rich ſpoile was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedie ſouldiers: for that citie was of all others in thoſe quarters the richeſt, as a place much frequented, and inioying long peace, as after ſuch time the Turks were fully poſſeſſed of Græcia, not being troubled with any wars; vntil now, that it was by the Vayuod firſt ranſackt, and afterwards raſed down to the ground, and nothing thereof left ſtanding, more than the bare caſtle it ſelfe: which the Vayuod durſt not aduenture vpon, for that it was wel fortified, and furniſhed with ſo ſtrong a garriſon, as that it could not without his great loſſe be taken.

The Turkes againe ouerthrowne by the Vayuod.

Whiles the Vayuod was thus buſied in the ſpoile of Brailouia, news was brought vnto him of the comming of fifteen thouſand Turks to the reliefe of the caſtle: againſt whom he forthwith ſent Suiercenius with his Coſſackes, and other eight thouſand Moldauian horſemen, who ſuddenly comming vpon the Turks, diſordered & fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew almoſt 14000 of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the caſtle of Teina. Of this victorie Suiercenius in all haſt certified the Vayuod; and withall, that there was another great power of the Turkes comming, which might eaſily be alſo ouerthrown, if he leauing the ſiege of the caſtle of Brailouia, would without delay come and ioyne his forces with his. He glad of that newes, and well perceiuing how difficult and dangerous that ſiege would be vnto him, riſe forthwith with his armie, and went to Suiercenius; and afterwards vpon conference had with him, laid ſiege to Teina: which city taken without much labor, he put to ſword all the people found therein, not leauing one aliue: and by the ſeruice of Suiercenius ouerthrew the Turks comming towards Brailouia.

Selymus in doubt to haue bin thruſt out of Valachia by the Vayuod.

Selymus in the meane time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayuod, and doubting to be quite thruſt out of Valachia Tranſalpina (which he was like enough to haue been, had not the treaſon of Czarniewiche hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that ſeruice; and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greateſt diſtreſſe, appointed generall ſupplications and praiers to bee made vnto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better ſucceſſe of his warres, the vndoubted ſigne of his feare.

The Vayuod after ſo many victories againſt the Turkes, purpoſing for a while to breake vp his great armie, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieuiche, vnto whom, as vnto the man hee of all others moſt truſted, he had reſolued to commit the charge, with part of his armie, to keepe the Turks from paſſing againe ouer the riuer Danubius into his countrey: and in deliuering to him his charge, ſpake vnto him as followeth:

The kind ſpeech of the Vayuod to Czarnieuiche

Sith Fortune hath hitherto anſwered our deſires (worthie Czarnieuiche*) with moſt rare and perpetuall ſucceſſe againſt the Turkes, our moſt cruell enemies, wee are thankfully to take the ſame, and to render moſt humble and heartie thankes vnto Almightie God, that it hath pleaſed him, the Author of all Victorie, ſo to haue proſpered our endeauours againſt theſe fierce and deuouring enemies. Now what remaineth for the preſent, but to diſband mine armie, wearied with labour and trauell, and to giue my ſouldiers leaue to depart home to reſt themſelues, that ſo I may as occaſion ſhall require againe of their freſh forces for our better ſeruice: you in the meane time with thirteene thouſand of my ſelect ſouldiers, ſhall lie vpon the ſide of Danubius, to keepe the Turkes from paſſing the riuer. Haue good regard I pray you, vnto this your charge, which I vpon an eſpeciall truſt, grounded vpon your antient loue and fidelitie, haue at this time impoſed vpon you. And let mee from time to time with all expedition vnderſtand from you of euerie motion of the enemie, that ſo we may in due time prouide for him accordingly.*

And ſo in token of his greater fauour, taking his leaue of him with a kiſſe (as the manner of thoſe people is) gaue leaue vnto the greateſt part of his ſouldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be alwaies in readineſſe whenſoeuer they ſhould be called vpon.

Czarnieuiche hauing receiued his charge, & promiſing vnto the Vayuod the vttermoſt of his faithful deuoire, went towards Danubius, & there moſt carefully kept the paſſages with continuall watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come downe

A to the other ſide of the riuer, and moe were ſtill comming, yet none of them was ſo hardie as to aduenture the great riuer, Czarnieuiche with his horſemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receiue them on the other ſide. Which the Baſſa whom Selymus had ſent with his armie, perceiuing, ſent certaine men pickt out for the purpoſe, to Czarnieuiche, to ſound him, if hee might by any means be drawn to come ouer, in ſecret to talke with him: & the more to moue him, beſide his conduct for his ſafetie, ſent him by the ſame meſſengers thirtie thouſand Hungarian duckats for a Preſent. With which ſo faire a bate Czarnieuiche allured, receiued the mony, & faithfully promiſed to come: and ſo ſhortly after, ſecretly paſſing ouer the riuer, had conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who then lay on the further ſide of Danubius, with a great power of the Turkes. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger B the Vayuod ſtood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his tributarie and vaſſaile ſhould worke the deſtruction of his ſo great armies: which his heauie diſpleaſure he could no otherwiſe ſatisfie but with his head: and that therefore hee ſhould no longer rule in Moldauia, for that gouernment was by the great Emperor giuen vnto him. Wherefore (ſaid he) if thou be wiſe, whileſt it is yet in thy power, gain the good will of Selymus by ſome good deſert: for an eaſie matter it is to begin any war, but an hard matter to end the ſame. Foraſmuch as it is not alwaies in the ſame mans power to begin wars, and at his pleaſure to make an end. Euery foole may when he liſt enter into armes, but muſt lay the ſame downe when it pleaſeth the conqueror. Now you haue a faire opportunitie, and it is in your own power to procure his friendſhip for euer, better ſtanding with your affaires than warre. And albeit you may hope C well of the power of the Vayuod, yet wiſedome would not, that you ſhould prefer vncertainties before things certain: you haue now receiued 30000 duckats, the earneſt of your further deſerts; which ſhal hereafter haue alſo their due rewards in moſt full and bountifull meaſure. Wherefore if you will do your ſelfe good, and prouide both for your ſafetie and preferment, confound not your owne good fortune, with the broken and deſperat ſtate of the Vayuod, but ſuffer the Turks to paſſe as friends ouer the riuer of Danubius: for I am come (ſaid he) with a great and puiſſant army from the mightie Selymus, to take vpon me the gouernment of Moldauia, and to ſend the Vayuod in bonds to Conſtantinople: and of me, being once Vayuod, what is it that for ſo great deſert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherefore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turks, and withdraw thy ſelfe from the riuer: ſo ſhall we paſ-D ſing ouer the riuer with our populous army, eaſily oppreſſe the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former iniuries and diſgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

Czarnieuiche hath ſecret conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who cunningly perſuadeth him to giue the Turks paſſage.

With greedie men what will not the foule deſire of gold worke? Czarnieuiche ouercome with the golden promiſes of Peter; and forgetfull of his faith before giuen vnto the Vayuod, yeelded vnto all he requeſted: and drawing his forces further off from the riuer, as if it had bin for his more ſafety, gaue the Turks free paſſage. There was then in the Turks armie two hundred thouſand men, well appointed, & furniſhed with great ordnance and all other things neceſſary both for the field and for ſiege, who by the ſufferance of the falſe traitor paſſed quietly ouer the riuer. Czarnieuich forthwith poſting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turks truſting to their multitude, had paſſed the riuer of Danubius, againſt whom he was not able (as E he ſaid) to make head: and that therefore he ſhould do well, without delay to goe againſt them with ſuch forces as he had then in a readineſſe, which ioined vnto his, might eaſily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good ſucceſſe, demanded of him what ſtrength the enemie might be of? They are (ſaid he) not much aboue twelue thouſand that be already come ouer, but are ſtill comming more & more, and will before your comming thither be aboue fifteene thouſand.

Czarnieuiche corrupted, giueth the Turks leaue quietly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Danubius.

The Vayuod lay then at the ſiege of the caſtle of Teina (hauing before taken the citie) but hearing this news, raiſed his ſiege, and ſo in foure daies came and incamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith ſent foorth Suierceuius with his Coſſackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horſemen, with ſix thouſand horſe, to take view of the enemies camp, and to vnderſtand what might be of their deſignes. Theſe two captains marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turks ſcouts, in number about ſix thouſand horſemen, with whom they had a light skirmiſh, and in ſhort time put them to flight. Of theſe ſcouts they tooke one, and him grieuouſly wounded; who being examined of the ſtrengh of the enemie, and feeling himſelfe wounded to death, told them diſſemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Coſſacks doubting of the truth of that report, & probably coniecturing by ſo great a number of ſcouts, G that the enemy was of far greater ſtrength than was ſuppoſed or reported, quickly certified the Vayuod thereof, wiſhing him in time to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and his army, and not too much to rruſt Czarnieuiche, whom they had a good while before ſuſpected. But the Vayuod nothing doubting of the faith of him whom he had a long time found moſt faithful in the time of his hardeſt diſtreſſe, and vſed as a moſt truſtie companion in all his trauels, anſwered nothing, but that he knew whom he truſted; & that it was not now time to ſtand in doubt, or to be afraid, and that he would ere long come and take view of the enemies camp himſelfe: for that he was not come ſo farre to flie, but to fight in defence of his countrey and ſubiects, euen to the laſt gaſpe. And ſo fortifying his campe neere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more conuenient watering of his armie) he ſet forward with all his power against H the enemie.

Neere vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had thought to haue deſcried the number of them, with the manner of their lying: but comming thither, he could deſcry nothing but foure companies of ſcouts a far off, one company from another; who alſo vpon the ſight of the Moldauians withdrew themſelues of purpoſe out of ſight vnto the army, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be diſcouered vntill a man were almoſt vpon it. The Vayuod ſuſpecting the enemy to be at hand, diuided his horſmen, in number 30000, into 30 companies, and placing before euery company certain field pieces, ſo marched ready to giue battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of people, I but vnto him of all others moſt faithfull, and armed with ſuch countrey weapons as they had, he placed by themſelues. So marching on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not far off eaſily deſcry the huge army of the enemie, and how he had bin by the treaſon of Czarnieuiche deceiued: whereupon he preſently ſent for him; who ſent him word back again, That he could not now come, the enemy beeing ſo nigh at hand, but that he ſhould forthwith ſee him in the field as forward as the forwardeſt againſt the enemy. Czarnieuiche had then vnder his command 13000 of the moſt choice ſouldiers in the army: who vpon the ſignall of battel on both ſides giuen (for the Turks were now alſo ready) firſt according to his promiſe ſet forward, as if it had bin to haue giuen the onſet: but being come neere vnto the enemie, forthwith (as he had before agreed) cauſed his enſigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the K points of their ſpears and ſwords, in token of their voluntary yeelding and ſubmiſſion, to bow downe their heads and bodies; whom the Turks with their ſpears and lances holden vpon hie, ioyfully receiued as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercy. The reſt of the army almoſt diſcouraged with this ſo ſudden a reuolt of ſo great a man, retired in haſt to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, That all was loſt. But he nothing diſcouraged therewith (as a moſt reſolute man in the moſt ſudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him againſt the enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwaies gaue not the victorie. The Turks perceiuing the Moldauians lately reuolted, vpon the ioyning of the battell (as men in conſcience wounded) to ſhrinke backe, thruſt them perforce into the head of their battel, making of them no more account, but to L blunt the enemies ſwords; and ſuch as hung backe, they themſelues ſlew: vpon whom as falſe tiartours the Vayuod cauſed his field pieces to be moſt furiouſly diſcharged; ſo that moſt part of theſe trecherous men there ſlain, ſome by the Turks, ſome by their owne friends, receiued the iuſt reward of their infidelity and treaſon, accompanied with perpetuall infamie. Ouer the dead bodies of theſe traitors the Turks comming on, were at the firſt notably encountered by the Moldauians; and after a moſt cruell fight, as if they had been diſcouraged, began to retire, but indeed of purpoſe to haue drawne the Chriſtians before they were aware, within the danger of their great ordnance, and ambuſhes, which they had before aptly & couertly placed for that purpoſe. Which Suiercenius well acquainted with the Turks fineneſſe, perceiuing, with much ado ſtaid their further purſuit, and ſo auoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks M deceiued of their expectation, came on againe afreſh, with no leſſe fury than at the firſt: whom the Ghriſtians right valiantly receiued, and made with them a moſt cruell and mortall battel; wherein many both of the Turkes and Chriſtians fell, and neuer riſe againe. But what was ſo ſmal a power againſt ſuch a world of men, after long fight, the Moldauians oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, began to giue ground: & ſeeing no other remedie, but either to fly

or

A or to die, betooke themſelues to flight, wherein moſt part of them were ſlain, the furious enemie ſtill hardly purſuing them at the heeles: of the Coſſackes were left onely two hundred and fiftie. The horſemen (the chiefeſt ſtrength of the Vayuod) thus by the treaſon of Czarnieuiche ouerthrowne, the Vayuod with twenty thouſand footmen, and ſuch horſmen as had now after the battell ioyned themſelues vnto the footmen, retired vnto a towne not far off, which he but a little before had raſed; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himſelfe againſt the ſudden and furious aſſaults of the Turks: who the ſame night ſo beſet the Vayuods camp with ſuch a multitude of men, that no man could go in or out of the campe; or the vttermoſt part of that hugie armie be from any place deſcried.

The Vayuod hauing fortified himſelfe within the ruines of an old towne, is beſieged by the Turkes.

The next day (which was the 11 of Iune) the Turks ſhot diuers great ſhot into the Vayuods B camp, but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Chriſtians had (for ſo ſhort a time) notably fortified themſelues within the ruines of the old towne. Which the Turks well perceiuing, and withall conſidering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to aſſault the Vayuod in his ſtrength: they ſent meſſengers vnto him, to perſuade him without delay to yeeld himſelfe, & to repoſe more truſt in the mercie of the Turks, than in his owne broken forces; eſpecially in his ſo hard diſtreſſe, being ſo beſet, as that he could not poſſibly eſcape; and out of hope of all reliefe, and therefore ſhould by ſuch voluntary yeelding, ſeeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a deſperat obſtinacie to caſt himſelfe into a moſt certain deſtruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Wherunto the Vayuod anſwered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treaſon of Czarnieniche and his followers, than by the valor of the enemie, C yet had left with him a ſtrong power of moſt valiant & reſolute men, who would in his quarrell and defence of themſelues, ſell their liues very deare vnto the Turks: neuertheleſſe, that to auoid the farther effuſion of bloud, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, ſo that the great commanders of the Turks army would condiſcend vnto ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould propound, & for the performance thereof giue him their faith, not once or twiſe, but ſeuen times by ſolemn oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted, willing him to ſet down the conditions: which were, firſt that the Polonian Coſſacks might in ſafety depart into their country, with their horſes and armor: then, that they ſhould without any violence offered to his perſon, ſend him aliue & in good ſafety vnto the great emperor Selymus, before him to anſwer his owne cauſe: as for the Moldauians, he ſaid he needed D not to couenant any thing, for that the iniurie offered vnto them tended alſo to the hurt of the Emperour himſelfe, and of him whom he ſhould appoint Vayuod, whoſe ſubiects they were.
Theſe conditions (as reaſonable) were well liked of the Turks, and ſo according to his deſire, confirmed ſeuen times by the ſolemne oath of euery captaine and commander in the armie, both for themſelues and their followers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought al his armie out of their trenches wherin they had lien ſtrongly incamped, and there with heauy heart tooke his laſt leaue of his ſouldiers, to the generall griefe of them all: amongſt whom he diuided ſuch mony & iewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindneſſe. And there in the ſight of them all diſarming himſelfe, accompanied only with Oſmolius a Polonian, went in maner of E a ſuppliant to the Turks camp, where he had ful foure hours talke with the great commanders of the armie; vntill that at laſt Capucius Baſſa (either offended with his ſpeech, or vnmindfull of his faith before giuen) with his ſcimitar vpon the ſudden ſtrucke him a great blow ouerthwart the face, and another croſſe the bellie: whom ſo wounded, & as yet but halfe dead, the Ianizaries tooke and cut off his head, which was forthwith ſet vp vpon a lance, for al men to behold.
His dead body they bound by the feet vnto two camels, & ſo ſhamefully tore it in pieces: and happy was he that could get any little piece therof, or embrue his ſword with the leaſt drop of his bloud. This was the lamentable & wofull end of Iohn the Vayuod of Moldauia, a right valiant and worthie man, ſhamefully murdered by the perfidious Turks; who had he been more conſtant in the Chriſtian faith, had not happily fallen into ſo great miſerie. Whoſe wofull fall may ſerue as a moſt notable example of the vncertaintie of theſe worldly things: for as no man for a time had of the Turks moe or more glorious victories, ſo in the end, and as it were in demonſtration of mans fragility, no man periſhed more miſerably. The Vayuod thus perfidiouſly murthered, the Turkes with like treacherie foorthwith ſet vpon the Moldanians, and ſlew them down right as beaſts appointed for the ſlaughter. Which the Coſſackes beholding, and hoping for no better meaſure, thruſt themſelues into the thickeſt of their enemies, & there valiantly liantly fighting were all ſlain, except ſome few of the better ſort reſerued for ranſome, among G whom was Seiuerceuius with ſome other captains; who were afterwards for great ſums redeemed, when as they could by no means be perſuaded to forſake their religion and turn Turke.

All Valachia made ſubiect to the Turks.

The loſſe of Moldauia dangerous to Polonia.

After this victorie and ſhamefull murder of the Vayuod, the Turks ouerran all Moldauia, & put to the ſword all the nobilitie of that countrie, with many of the countrie people: of whom they alſo as their manner is in countries new conquered, ſent great numbers in colonies into the farther parts of the Turkiſh empire: & for the more aſſured poſſeſſion therof, placed ſtrong garriſons in euery towne and caſtle, as they thought it moſt conuenient. Thus all Valachia (both the higher and the lower) fell into the Turks hands in the yeare 1574, and was by Selymus ioyned vnto the Turkiſh empire, none of the leaſt things by him done: for beſide the gaining of ſo great a country (the moſt aſſured bulwarke of Polonia) he hath therby opned a faire H and eaſie way for his ſucceſſours, at their pleaſure to enter into Podolia, or Ruſſia, parts of the Polonian kingdome, yea and into Polonia it ſelfe: which they will vndoubtedly in time doe, if God in mercy bridle not their immoderat deſires, and with his mightie hand protect the dangerous ſtate of that Kingdome.

Selymus at the ſame time, not a little grieued with the loſſe of the kingdome of Tunes, and that Don Iohn had there done the yeare before; began forthwith to caſt in his minde, how he might again recouer the ſame, and withall, thruſt the Spaniards out of the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta; which they had now almoſt fortie yeares kept, euer ſince that it was by Charles the fift taken from Barbaruſſa in the yere 1535: for he well ſaw it to be a matter of no ſmall moment, to I whom that ſtrong fortreſſe (ſtanding ſo commodiouſly in the frontiers of Affricke) belonged. There was (and ſtil is) vpon that coaſt diuers of the Turks aduenturers, which liuing altogether vpon ſpoile, had to that place ſafe recourſe, as to a moſt aſſured refuge: and if no bootie were to be met with therabout, then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, & the other Iſlands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into Italie and Spaine, and from thence carrie away with them great booties both of men and cattell, and whatſoeuer thing elſe came in their way: for which cauſe many of the Turks men of war reſorted thither in hope of purchaſe. But after that, Guletta was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards, they were not only depriued of that ſo commodious an harbor, but many times intercepted euen by them of that place, and by the gallies of Malta: which two places ſerued as two moſt ſure bulwarkes againſt the Turkes and Moores aduen- K turers, by whoſe meanes they many times came ſhort home. For which cauſe the Turks, eſpecially theſe pyrats (of whom the Turke maketh great account, as not his leaſt ſtrength at ſea) wonderfully deſired to haue both thoſe ſtrong places gotten out of the hands of the Chriſtians. In the caſtle of Guletta was continually a ſtrong garriſon of a thouſand Spaniards, who kept them of Tunes in great ſubiection, and oftentimes cut ſhort theſe pyrats and rouers, who much troubled thoſe ſeas. Wherefore the Turkiſh Emperor Selymus, hauing made great preparation both for ſea and land ſeruice, commanded Sinan, Piall, and Vluzales, his chiefe Baſſaes, & men of great experience, with all ſpeed to paſſe ouer with his fleet into Affricke, to beſiege Tunes and Guletta. Who when they had put all things in readineſſe according as they had in charge, ſet forward, and with three hundred ſaile of gallies came before Guletta the thirteenth L day of Iuly: whether alſo reſorted vnto them other the Turks men of war from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places in, ſuch number, as that al that coaſt ſeemed to be couered with ſhipping. The Turks at their firſt arriuall laied ſiege to the water tower, wherein were eight hundred ſouldiers well prouided of all things needfull for defence, who moſt valiantly maintained the place, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them being by the often aſſaults of the enemie ſlaine; the reſt by the commandement of the captaine retired to him into the caſtle. In taking of this tower the Turks loſt 3000 of their men.

Guletta beſieged by the Turks.

After that, they began to beſiege the caſtle of Guletta, againſt which they caſt vp diuers mounts, and from thence moſt terribly battered the caſtle: from whence the deadly ſhot was ſent again among them not ſparingly; ſo that in one day 200 great ſhot were reckoned to haue bin ſhot out of the caſtle amongſt the thickeſt of the enemies. But after many furious aſſaults, M too tedious to report, and much harme done on both ſides, the Turkes to their great aduantage tooke the channell of the lake of Tunes; and fearing leaſt ſome reliefe ſhould bee ſent to the beſieged, maintained their aſſault day and night without intermiſſion. Neuertheleſſe, certaine companies of Spaniards ſent from the new caſtle by Serbellio, got into Guletta; after

A which,they in the beſieged caſtle ſallied out,and the twentieth of Auguſt repulſed the Turks, with an exceeding great ſlaughter. But the Baſſaes fully reſolued vpon the winning of the place to gage their whole forces,and without ceaſing ſtill bringing on freſh ſoldiers,after they had all the day continued a moſt terrible aſſault,at length about two houres after Sun ſet,they tooke the caſtle the 23 day of Auguſt, when there was now ſcarcely two hundred ſouldiers left aliue to defend the ſame; who altogether with the other weake people in the caſtle were without mercie cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this caſtle, is hard to ſay; but certaine it is,that they had therein great ſtore of victuals, armour, ſhot,and pouder, and foure hundred great pieces of artillerie.

Guletta thus taken,the Turks forthwith laid ſiege to the new caſtle,appointed by Don Iohn B the yeare before to haue bin built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether finiſhed: wherein the two antient and valiant captains, Serbellio and Salazar (left there of purpoſe for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garriſon of foure thouſand good ſouldiers. The Baſſaes when they gaue the firſt ſummons to the caſtle, the foure & twentieth of Auguſt,required to haue it forthwith deliuered vnto them: to whom Serbellio ſtoutly anſwered, That he had promiſed the king his maſter, to giue him a better account of the place; & being now alſo very old,could not indure the Turkes heauie yoke, but would therefore hold it out vnto the laſt man: which both he & Salazar truly performed,not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; and ſallying out,ſometime the one,and ſomtimes the other,made great ſlaughter of the Turks,giuing them alſo repulſe vpon repulſe when they C came to the aſſault. But the great Baſſaes,little feeling, and leſſe regarding the loſſe of men, ſo that therby they might gain the place,after many moſt terrible and deſperat aſſaults,at length (namely the thirteenth day of September)when they had withal their force for the ſpace of ſix houres furiouſly aſſaulted the caſtle, and ſlaine moſt of the defendants,at laſt tooke it. Serbellio ſhot in with two bullets,and wiſhing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemie,thruſt himſelfe into the middeſt of the Turkes,there to haue periſhed: but by the haſtie comming in of Piall Baſſa, both he and Salazar were taken aliue,as for all the reſt that followed them, they were put to the ſword. The Baſſa in his rage ſtrucke Serbellio, and the more to grieue him,cauſed his ſonne to be cruelly murthered before his face. Neither was this victorie by the Turkes obtained without bloud, hauing in leſſe than three moneths ſpace that the D ſiege endured,loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men.

The new caſtle beſieged.

The notable anſwere of Serbellio.

The new caſtle taken.

Theſe ſtrong holds (the greateſt ſtrength of that kingdome)thus taken,the Turks marched to Tunes,which they eaſily tooke,and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications therof,becauſe it ſhould no more rebell. Mahomet the yong king,but the yere before placed in that kingdome by Don Iohn,was there taken,and in bonds ſent aboord to be carried with Carrera captaine of Guletta,priſoners to Conſtantinople:and thus the kingdom of Tunes, with the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta, fell againe into the poſſeſſion of the Turkes, to the farther trouble of the Chriſtian countries lying ouer againſt it. The proud Baſſaes hauing (as they thought)beſt diſpoſed of all things at Tunes and Guletta,departed thence,& with their fleet of 400 ſaile, came the fourth of October within ſight of Malta. But vnderſtanding that they of Malta were prouided for their comming,and remembring what diſhonor their moſt magnificent Emperor Solyman had not many yeares before there ſuſtained (whereof diuers of them had bin eye-witneſſes) they turned thence, and ſailed directly to Conſtantinople.

Tunes yeelded to the Turks.

Shortly after, this great Emperor Selymus ſpent with wine and women,vnto whom he had giuen his greateſt ſtrength,died the ninth of December,in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when he had liued one and fiftie yeares, and thereof raigned eight,and lieth buried at Hadrianople. He was but of a mean ſtature,& of an heauie diſpoſition,his face rather ſwollen,than fat,much reſembling a drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of leaſt valour,and therefore leaſt regarded, altogether giuen to ſenſualitie and pleaſure: and ſo dying, left his empire vnto Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, a man of more temperance,but not much greater courage; who neuertheleſſe by his valiant Baſſaes and men of war, did great matters, eſpecially againſt the Perſians,the mortal and dangerous enemies of the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter in this Hiſtorie declared.

AMVRATHES TERTIVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEXTVS: FLORVIT ANo 1574

Non ego fortis eram: Quis tanto nomine dignus?
Ni fortem faciat mens generoſa virum.
Me tumidum fortuna tumens euexit in altum, Et par fortunæ, mens mea ſemper erat.
Sic quamuis tenero mihi nil niſi molle placeret: Nominis augendi raptus amore fui.
Emiſique meos ad fortia facta miniſtros:
Per quos ſublatum eſt, nomen in aſtra meum.
Muſtapha, Ferhates, Sinan, & ter maximus Oſman: Terrores orbis ſuccubuere mihi.
Armenios domui fortes Medoſque feroces: Et mihi paruerat Regia Tauriſij.
Sed mihi quid prodeſt tantorum parta labore Gloria? Si ſubito maxima queque ruant?
Et nihil eſt tanti, quod non breuis auferet hora Sic mea cum multis gloria victa iacet.

RICH. KNOLLEVS.

In Engliſh thus:

The Worthies praiſe I challenge not:
  for who deſerues the ſame?
Except the noble Worthies minde, deſerue the Worthies fame.
Proud Fortune ſet me proud aloſt, in Honours higheſt grace: And ſtill my haughtie thoughts they were equall vnto my place.
So that although nought pleas'd but that beſt fitted my deſire: Yet to encreaſe my Fame, I ſtill did more and more aſpire.
And ſent my mightie Worthies out, to mannage my great Warres: By whoſe knowne valour, my proud name is mounted to the ſtarres.
Proud Sinan, Ferrat, Muſtapha, (all men of high degree, The terrours of the World ſo wide) were vaſſals vnto me.
Th'Armenians ſtout I vanquiſhed, and fild the Medes with feare: And Regall Tauris ſtately towers at my commandment were.
But what auailes my glorie great, got with ſuch Worthies paine, If in the twinkling of an eye it come to nought againe?
And nothing is of ſo great State, which Time ſhall not caſt downe: Euen ſo with many others moe, muſt periſh my renowne.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SIXTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

Amurath takes vpon him the Turkiſh empire the 25 day of Decemberin the yeare 1574.

THe death of the late Emperor Selymus was for feare of the inſolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Baſſa's, vntil ſuch time as Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, then in Aſia, by ſpeedie meſſengers aduertiſed thereof, about twelue dayes after arriued at Conſtantinople, and there receiued into the Seraglio, tooke poſſeſſion of the Empire the fiue and twentieth day of December, ſolemne amongſt vs Chriſtians, for the natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus. He was about thirtie, or as ſome write ſeuen and twentie yeares old when he began to raigne, of a manly ſtature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long: in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman Princes, being indeed himſelfe of a peaceable diſpoſition, a louer of iuſtice, and in the manner of his ſuperſtition very zealous. The riot and exceſſe growne amongſt the Turks by his fathers euill example, he reformed by his owne temperance, and the ſeuere puniſhment of notorious drunkards: yet is it reported, that he would oftentimes himſelfe drinke plentifully of wormewood wine: he was much ſubiect to the falling ſickeneſſe, and ſore troubled with the ſtone: more ſpare handed than was for the greatneſſe of his ſtate: and yeelding more to the counſell of his mother, his wife, and ſiſter, than of his great Baſſa's, which was of many imputed to him for ſimplicitie. At his firſt comming to Conſtantinople, to appeaſe the murmuring of the Ianizaries (grieued to ſee themſelues ſo diſappointed of the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iewes, which they were woont to take in the vacancie of the Empire) hee beſide the vſual largeſſe which the Turkiſh Emperours at their firſt entrance into the Empire beſtow vpon them, augmented alſo their dayly wages, and granted them this priuiledge, That their ſonnes as ſoone as they came to be twentie yeares old, ſhould be inrolled amongſt the number of the younger Ianizaries, and be partakers alſo of their immunities; whereby hee woon their fauours exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himſelfe of all competitors, he after the vnnaturall manner of the Turkiſh policie, cauſed his fiue brethren, Muſtapha, Solyman Abdulla, Oſman, and Tzihanger, to be all ſtrangled in his owne preſence. The mother of Solyman pierced through with the cruell death of her yong ſonne, as a woman ouercome with ſorrow, deſperatly ſtrucke her ſelfe to the heart with a dagger, and ſo died. At which ſo tragicall a ſight it is reported that Amurath let ſome teares fall, as not delighting in ſuch barbarous crueltie, but that the ſtate and manner of his gouernment ſo required.

The deſcription of Amurath.

He pacifieth the Ianizaries, and augmẽteth their priuiledges.

He ſtrangleth fiue of his brethren.

A deſperat woman.

In the beginning of his raigne he eſtabliſhed diuers wholeſome lawes, altered the coine, and bountifully relieued the poore. And albeit that he was of a milde and peaceable nature, yet becauſe he would not ſeeme to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his progenitors, he proſecuted his fathers wars, and by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, in the moneth of October in the yeare 1575 entred into Ruſſia, part of the Polonian Kingdome, where hee burnt and deſtroyed Ruſſia inuaded by the Turks.

Leon. Goreci. de Bell. Iuoniç.

deſtroyed two hundred noblemens houſes, beſides an infinite number of townes and villages, made great ſlaughter of the poore countrey people, and carried away great numbers of cattel and priſoners bound in thongs made of raw hides. But whileſt they were diuiding the ſpoile with Peter the new Vayuod of Valachia, who had before ſolemnely promiſed to giue the Tartars no paſſage that way, the Polonian Coſſacks, who had lien waiting for their returne vpon the riuer Boriſthenes, brake into the Tartars country, and there requited them with like harme, and brought backe with them a number of old captiues, who little expected that their ſo ſudden deliuerance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themſelues about the election of their new king; Henry Valoys their late king being the laſt yeare, after the death of Charles his brother the French King ſecretly ſtolne from them into France, to take vpon him that kingdome: after whoſe departure ſome of the Polonian Nobilitie made choice of Maximilian the Emperor: other ſome no leſſe inclining vnto the choice of the great Duke of Muſcouie; and ſome vnto others alſo. Whereof Amurath vnderſtanding, and loth that either of thoſe two great Princes his enemies, ſhould be inueſted or ſtrengthned with that ſo great a kingdome, and ſo neere vnto him; to hinder that their election, and to bring in another of leſſe power, & ſo leſſe dangerous vnto himſelfe, euen in the beginning of his raigne wrot vnto the Polonians to that purpoſe, commending vnto them Stephen Battor the Vayuod of Tranſyluania for their King, in manner following:

Amurath God of the earth, Gouernour of the whole World, the Meſſenger of God, and faithfull ſeruant of the great Prophet, vnto the moſt honourable Nobilitie and Counſellors of the Kingdome of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his letters vnto the Nobilitie of Polonia.

It is not vnto the world vnknowne (moſt honorable and mightie Senators) our Noble Progenitors to haue of long time and for many yeares holden good friendſhip and religious leagues with the kingdome of Polonia: For which cauſe it hath ſeemed good and reaſonable vnto vs, to put you in remembrance of this ſo antient a league and bond of friendſhip; for that we vnderſtanding your Kingdome to be of late become deſtitute of a King, by the departure of the noble King Henry your crowned King (diſcended of the royall race of the French Kings) our friend: who for the ſmall regard you had of him (ſo great and worthie a Prince) and for your diſloyaltie, is departed out of your Kingdome, without purpoſe of returning any more into Polonia. Whereupon, as it is reported vnto vs (but how truly we know not) you paſſing ouer your ſaid crowned King Henrie, are about to make choice of a new King, and eſpecially of Maximilian the Emperour, or of the Duke of Muſcouie, both men of running wits, and of vs greatly hated: for why, you may well know they will be troubleſome and grieuous not vnto euery one of you only, but euen vnto vs alſo. Wherefore be you ware that you be not deceiued; and take heed leſt your confederations and leagues cannot long by their valour and proweſſe be eſtabliſhed; and withall conſider well the great dangers and loſſes which you may thereby fall into, whereof we haue thought good to giue you a taſte: wherefore beware that heauier things befall not your State. We know there are right noble and wiſe men amongſt you, which know better than they how to rule and gouerne: and if ſo be it pleaſe you not to make choice of any of your owne Nation, there is not farre from you one Stephen Battor Prince of Tranſyluania, a man of great honour and valour, by whoſe labour and dexteritie you may eaſily procure the peace and quiet of your Kingdome. Whereas if you ſhall doe otherwiſe, we take to witneſſe your God, and his ſeruant our Great Prophet, to deſtroy all your wealth and goods, which together with your ſelues, your wiues, and children, ſhall be giuen for a prey vnto our ſoldiers; with the chiefe men of your cities of Cracouia and Leperis: which for all that we ſay not, as any thing at all doubting of your fidelitie and conſtancie toward vs. As for the reſt, which it pleaſed vs by word of mouth to haue told vnto you, we haue giuen charge vnto this our Embaſſador and Counſellor, vnto whom our deſire is that you ſhould giue full credence. From Conſtantinople the laſt of September, in the yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 983, and firſt of our raigne.

This the Great Sultans commendations ſo much preuailed with the Polonians, that notwithſtanding that Maximilian the Emperour was by the Archbiſhop of Gneſna and ſome others choſen king, yet was that his election by the greater part of the Nobilitie reuoked, and

both

A both he and the great Duke of Muſcouie being paſſed ouer, the noble Princeſſe Anne (of the moſt honorable Iagellonian houſe) choſen Queene of Polonia: yet with this condition, That ſhe ſhould marry Stephen the Vayuod of Tranſyluania, to them by Amurath commended: Who afterward elected King, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdome, not only defending the ſame in ſuch ſtate as he found it, but alſo notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with ſuch territories as he by force of arms got from his neighbors, eſpecially the Muſcouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boaſt and ſay, That he had giuen the Polonians their King. But of him, and of the league by him made with Amurath, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Stephen Vayuod of Trãſyluania vpon the commendatiõ of Amurath choſen king of Polonia

The yeare following, great troubles aroſe in Perſia, whereby the flouriſhing ſtate of that B moſt mightie Kingdome was ſore ſhaken, and opportunitie giuen for the Turkiſh Emperour to inuade the ſame; which he laying hold vpon, entred into that bloudie warre, which to the great quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale, for long time after exerciſed the forces of thoſe moſt puiſſant Princes one vpon another. For the better vnderſtanding whereof, it ſhall not be amiſſe compendiouſly to ſet downe the ſame troubles of the Perſian kingdome, the very ground of the long and mortall war betweene thoſe two moſt mightie Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Perſian King, ſonne to the noble Hiſmael, who with great glory had more than fiftie yeares worthily gouerned that large kingdome, and mightily withſtood the often inuaſions of the Turkiſh Emperors, now ſpent with yeares, died the eleuenth of May in the yeare 1576, leauing behinde him eleuen ſonnes; namely Mahamet the eldeſt, of an infirmitie C in his eyes ſyrnamed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet diſpoſition, more delighted with the ſweet pleaſure of a contented life, than the carefull honours of ſo great a Kingdome: Iſmahel the ſecond ſonne, of a more fierce and troubleſome nature, ſo much abhorring quietneſſe, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwixt his aged father and the Turkiſh Emperors Solyman and Selymus, he would now and then without his fathers knowledge vpon a youthfull heat breake out into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and there make great ſpoile; for which doing, although he was both of his father and the people the more regarded, yet was he by his fathers commandement (who in outward ſhew ſeemed to miſlike of thoſe his youthfull pranks, tending to the breach of the league) reſtrained of his libertie, and ſent to the caſtle of Cahaca, betwixt Tauris and Caſbin, where he remained at the time of his D fathers death: Aidere the third ſonne, no leſſe ambitious than was his brother Iſmahel, but not of like valour, kept by Zalcan, Pyry Mahamet, and other his kinſfolkes, all men of great power and authoritie: The other eight were, Mamut, Solyman, Muſtapha, Emanguli, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Iſmahel the younger.

The eleuen ſons of Tamas the Perſian King.

The old King before his death had by his laſt will and teſtament ſolemnly appointed Iſmahel his ſecond ſonne to ſucceed him in the kingdome; as of all his ſonnes moſt fit to take vpon him ſo great a charge. Which thing Mahamet his elder brother ſeemed not much to diſlike, contenting himſelfe with ſuch honours as his father had before beſtowed vpon him.

Iſmahel appointed by his Father to ſucceed him in the kingdome.

Tamas thus dead, Iſmahel was by the Sultans ſent for to Cahaca, to take vpon him his fathers kingdome at Caſbin; when in the meane time there aroſe a great tumult in the city, yea euen E in the kings palace: for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greateſt ſickeneſſe had entred the chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his ſight moſt preſumptuouſly ſet the royal crowne vpon his head, to the manifeſting of his ambitious deſires, for which he was then worthily reproued: now after the death of his aged father, caried headlong with the ſame aſpiring humor, and ſupported by Zalchan and other his mighty fauourits, had ſo effectually dealt with the great ladie Periaconcona his eldeſt ſiſter, and the other Sultans Counſellours of Eſtate, put in truſt to ſee the will of the dead king put in execution, as that the ſucceſſion could not be any longer kept from him, & preſerued for Iſmahel, but by the help of ſome fine and ſecret deceit. This ladie Periaconcona (elder than all the yong princes the ſons of Tamas, her brethren, a woman of great ſpirit and deep conceit) left in great truſt by her father, ſeeing the proceedings of her brother Aidere, durſt neither openly to moue any thing vnto the Sultans, preiudicial to his deſignes, neither could ſhe in her heart indure ſo great an iniury to be done to her brother Iſmael, appointed by his father to ſucceed him. Wherfore in this perplexity, ſhe caſt in her wily head, how to ſatiſfy her ambitious brother preſent, how to ſaue the right of Iſmahel abſent, the honor of her dead fathers will and teſtament, and the ſafety of the kingdome, dome. For hauing thorowly debated the matter with the Sultans, ſhe reſolued that Aidere G inueſted in royall apparell, and ſetled in the great gallerie, ſhould attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthroniſed as the very elected King. With which vaine ſhew the vnwiſe youth (blinded with ambition) ſuffered himſelfe to be led: and being ſet in his maieſtie, verily perſuaded himſelfe, that he ſhould now be honored both of his friends and foes, as King. But vnto theſe his ſo haſty and proſperous deſignes, the ſucceſſe that ſprung from the ſubtiltie of thoſe Counſellors and his diſſembling ſiſter, were nothing conformable: for that ſhe by their aduice tooke order for the gates of the palace to be preſently locked, leauing at euery paſſage a ſure gard, and onely one wicket open, ſafely warded with a companie of moſt faithfull and valorous captaines and ſouldiers, wholly deuoted to Tamas and Iſmabel: with ſtraight charge, to ſuffer euery man to enter in, ſauing onely the knowne friends of Aidere. In H this ſort did ſhe thinke to haue entertained the young man, vntill ſuch time as Iſmabel ſhould arriue at Cahaca, and ſo put in execution what he thought beſt for the honour of himſelfe, and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a king, repleniſhed with vnwonted joyes, receiuing honour from all men ſauing from his beſt friends. By means wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and moued alſo with the great ſtir of Zalcan his greateſt fauorit (who diſcouering the deceit, and crying vpon king Aidere, threatned the lady, the Sultans, and the reſt that waited vpon the feigned ſucceſſion, indeed ordained but for the ſcorne and diſpight of the ambitious man) ſtrucken with an exceeding feare, and full of ſorrow, hee withdrew himſelfe cloſely amongſt certaine women in the court, hoping ſo to find ſome way to eſcape with life. I

In the meane time ſo greatly increaſed the cries and threatenings of the friends and fauorits of Aidere (who now had all of them prepared themſelues for ſome dangerous and pernicious attempt) that the Counſellors, with conſent of the ladie his ſiſter, were inforced to take order, That to bereaue this tumultuous and ſeditious people of all their hope and courage, Aidere ſhould be depriued of his life. Whereupon Sahamal the Georgian, vncle to Aidere by the mothers ſide, by the appointment of the ladie Periaconcona & the Sultans, after long ſearch made for him, at laſt found him hidden amongſt the women, and without further delay taking him by the lockes, ſtrucke his head from his ſhoulders, and in the place where Zalchan and the reſt of his vnfortunate fauourites ſtood crying and threatning, amongſt the thickeſt preiſe of the proud conſpiratours flung the head all bloudie and as it were yet breathing for heat; crying K aloud vnto them, Behold there your King, enioy him at your pleaſure. At which ſudden and horrible ſpectacle euery man burned in rage and anger: neither for the preſent wanted there manie a raſh head, that vainly threatened moſt cruell reuenge: but in the end, when they perceiued the neere ſucceſſion of Iſmabel ineuitable, and the death of Aidere irreuocable, euery man betooke himſelfe to his owne priuat affaires, and ſo at laſt diuided themſelues one from another, and ſo departing from the Palace, ſcattered themſelues ſome one way, ſome another, euerie man as he thought beſt for his owne ſafetie.

Iſmabel ſaluted king.

He murdereth eight of his yonger brethren.

Shortly after, Iſmabel the deſired king arriued at Casbin, where he was of his ſiſter and the Sultans joyfully receiued as their lawfull & vndoubted ſoueraign, & with the great acclamation of the people ſaluted king: who as ſoone as he ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of the royal ſeat, & his L power now anſwerable to his deſires, he after the manner of the Turkiſh policie, moſt vnnaturally cauſed the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be ſtricken off: & withal vſed ſuch farther diligence, that not only all thoſe which were neere vnto them in bloud or affinitie were bereaued of their liues, but alſo all the fauorits of his late ſlain brother Aidere, were deſtroyed in that publike ſlaughter: ſo that all the ſtreets of Casbin were defiled with bloud, & all the city reſounded with mourning & complaints. Which vnexpected cruelty, altogether vnworthy ſo worthie a thought king, ſo altered the minds of his ſubiects in general, that all their former hopes were now conuerted into new fears, and their joy into mourning. But much greater and far more lamentable did the miſeries grow, as ſoon as it was giuen out, That he would change the religion of the Perſians (who with great deuotion honour their fooliſh Prophet Aly) into M the ſuperſtition of the Turks (who with no leſſe impietie obſerue & maintain the wicked rites of Ebubekir, Haumer, Oſman, & others, by them ſuppoſed to be the moſt true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet.) For by meanes of this vncouth noueltie and vnexpected change, and by force of an Edict concerning that matter, publiſhed by this new King, many of his prophane Prieſts, many of the gouernors of his friendly and ſubiect cities (too much deuoted to their former ſuperſtition, were driuen ſome into exile, ſome clapt into priſon, ſome had their eyes pluckt out (among whom was the Caliph of Casbin) and not a few others in ſundry ſorts depriued of their liues. Yea many Ladies ioyned in bloud with Iſmahel himſelfe, and diuers others of his kinsfolkes (to whom neither ſex, nor age, nor innocencie, could be a ſufficient defence) endured ſundrie torments and ſtrange calamities: ſo that in Perſia was neuer felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this ſo great an innouation, and among theſe tumults, there went abroad withall a general rumor, not in the cities of Perſia only, but in the regions of the Turks alſo, euen as far as Conſtantinople, That Iſmahel with a puiſſant armie of ſuch as fauored this new proclaimed vanity, was determined in perſon himſelfe to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receiue the crowne of the empire at the hands of him that he ſhould find to be the ſucceſſor of their great Calyph, and in the chiefe place among their vncleane Prieſts: as had ſometime Solyman the great Emperor of the Turks, and the Perſian kings of antient times. In this world of troubles, when as the feare of further miſeries increaſed, rather than any hope of antient quietneſſe; he was when he leaſt feared, by the helpe of the aforenamed Ladie Periaconcona ſuddenly bereft of his life: but whether ouertaken in ſome of his owne amorous practiſes, or poiſoned by his ſaid ſiſter; or that ſhe (as ſome probably affirme) hauing ſecretly conſpired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Baſſi (being all at that time men of great account, and as it were Preſidents of the kingdome) who diſguiſed in womens apparell, and brought in by her, ſtrangled him at ſuch time as he had priuatly withdrawne himſelfe amongſt his paramours, is vncertaine. Howſoeuer it was, ſufficeth it, that he by the helpe of the ſaid ladie Periaconcona, was by vnnaturall death taken out of this world the foure and twentieth day of Nouember, in the yere of Grace 1577; to the exceeding joy of all thoſe nations, who by his death thought themſelues now freed of many great and dangerous troubles: when he had raigned on yeare, ſeuen moneths, and ſix dayes.

Iſmahel thus taken out of the way, the ladie began forthwith to perſuade with the great Sultans (the miniſters of Iſmahels death) that as they had for the general good of Perſia contriued the death of the late king; ſo now that they would take vpon them the protection of that great kingdome, with the preſeruation of the maieſtie and libertie thereof, vntil ſuch time as it were knowne who ſhould worthily ſucceed in that Crowne, which now remained in their hands. There was at that time many of the greateſt Princes and Gouernours of that kingdome aſſembled at Casbin, there gaping after ſuch mutations of thoſe troubleſome times, as might beſt ſerue their priuat deſignes. Emir Chan burning in ambitious deſires, was in hope by meanes of a match to be made with a ſiſter of Periaconcona (who was alreadie greatly inclining vnto him) to be exalted to the ſoueraigntie of all Perſia. Mirizi Salmas the chiefe Sultan hoped on the other ſide to aduance into the Eſtate, either Mahamet Codabanda the eldeſt brother of the dead King, or els Hamze the eldeſt ſon of the ſaid Mahamet; and by beſtowing vpon him his daughter in marriage (as afterwards he did) ſo to increaſe the glory of his Houſe. Others there were that thought they ſhould be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemoſt ſonne of Mahamet) out of Heri, and to make him King. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aſpiring friends, whoſe Tutor waited likewiſe for ſome opportunitie to ſettle him in the kingdome, and ſo by meanes of his greatneſſe to make himſelfe greateſt amongſt his fellowes. A number of others there were, that ſecretly waited vpon euery occaſion that time ſhould preſent for their preferment. Howbeit in this ſo great varietie of thoughts, the Sultans anſwered the lady with one conſent, and promiſed her in moſt liberall termes, all the protection that their forces could affoord, or their weapons procure: and yet did euery one of them, both in action and word, Clerke-like diſſemble their ſeuerall imaginations, whereunto their minds were as prone and readie, as their hearts were cunning cloſely to conceale them.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor now wakened, firſt at the death of the old renowned Tamas, and then at the rumour of the deſire Iſmahel had to paſſe with an armie to Babylon, as alſo at the freſh report of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition newly publiſhed in Perſia; and withall throughly inſtructed what harme this late King had done in Perſia, what diſſentions he had raiſed, and how hardly the prouinces of that Empire had endured thoſe calamities; began foorthwith to thinke hereby a faire occaſion to bee miniſtred vnto him, to take vp Armes againſt the Perſians;

Amurath intentiue to the ſtirs in Perſia.

Mahamet reſolueth to take vpon him the Perſian kingdome.

Mahamet proclaimed king of Perſia.
The head of Periaconcona preſented to Mahamet on a Launce.

Perſians, and matter ſufficient ſuggeſted for him to put in execution the great deſire he had of ſome new conqueſt. For it is an antient cuſtome, which is growne to be as it were a law among the Othoman Kings, That they may not challenge their due honors in their life time, nor their proud monuments after their death, vnles they attempt ſome great and ambitious actions and enterpriſes, and performe ſome exploit conformable to their Majeſty. Amurath therefore bent vpon theſe great ſtirs in Perſia, would not direct his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, vntill he might firſt ſee what iſſue theſe marueilous innouations in Perſia would bring forth: which in the perſon of Mahamet the ſucceeding King, ſeemed to be more pregnant than euer before, and miniſtred vnto Amurath new occaſions of victorious and ſtrange hopes. For as ſoone as Iſmahel was dead, the afore named Mirize Salmas (in dignity chiefe man among the Sultans, though in bloud and nobility inferior to them all) after many letters diſpatched to and fro, at laſt aſſured Mahamet Codabanda, how with all quietneſſe of minde, and ſecuritie of perſon, he might come and poſſeſſe himſelfe of the kingdome. He was alſo aduertiſed by the ſaid Salmas, of the whole conſpiracie plotted againſt his brother to bring him to his end; and likewiſe made acquainted, how the fraudulent Ladie, with the Sultans, had capitally conſulted againſt himſelfe: and how ſhe, fauoring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri her nephew & his ſon, more than became her, did little regard the due and rightfull ſucceſſion of him being the eldeſt brother. So Mahamet bearing himſelfe vpon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas, and deſiring withall to ſee his eldeſt ſon Hamze Mirize aduanced to ſome ſuch ſoueraign dignitie as he ſaw was due to the liuely hope euery man perceiued to be in him, in regard of his vertue and prudence for managing the commonwealth and matters of warre (wherein alſo he ſhewed himſelfe vnto his father jealous and ſuſpicious, leſt ſome other man ſhould vſurpe vpon him that honor and authority which ſo properly appertained vnto him) reſolued in the end not to leaue the kingdome in the hands of priuate perſons, nor the lightneſſe of an vnconſtant woman of ſuſpected modeſtie, and a rebellious conſpiratour againſt her owne bloud, wherewith ſhe had without any pittie or remorſe of conſcience, now twice defiled her ſelfe. And therefore he wrot backe againe, That he was minded to take the rightful ſucceſſion vpon him, and that for the ſame purpoſe he was putting himſelfe vpon his journey: with ſtraight charge notwithſtanding, That Mirize Salmas ſhould before his entrance within the gates of Casbin, preſent him with the miſchieuous head of Periaconcona; a woman (in reſpect of the ſcorne exerciſed againſt her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Iſmahel, and of the peruerſe imaginations which ſhee had conceiued to cauſe the ſucceſſion to fall into other mens hands, & of the prodigal familiaritie which ſhe had with ſome of the Sultans) wel worthie of a thouſand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in execution whatſoeuer Mahamet had priuatly enioyned him, ſo that by his meanes he was preſently and ſolemnly proclaimed King of Perſia. And afterwards hauing gathered together many ſquadrons of men wholly deuoted to the bloud and name of Mahamet, the ſame Mirize Salmas met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Periaconcona vpon the point of a lance, with her haire diſperſed, and ſome other vncouth ſights to the terror of the beholders. From which noueltie (one miſchiefe as it were hudling vpon the necke of another) there ſprung vp diuers inward hatreds, ſundrie tumultuous ſeditions, and much ciuile wars: this new King by the inſtigation of Mirize Salmas, ſeeking on the one ſide to be reuenged on the Sultans for his brothers death; and they on the other ſide oppoſing themſelues with all their power againſt him, the State of Perſia began to fall into great inconueniences, and of theſe nouelties to reape new loſſes. Sahamal the Georgian fled into his mountaine of Brus, fearing the wrath of his new Lord: Leuent Ogli likewiſe another of the Lords of Georgia, vnderſtanding of the flight of Sahamal his neighbour, eſtranged himſelfe ſo farre from his old loue and antient deuotion towards the Perſian Kings, that he ſeemed now to deſire ſome new innouation. The Nations alſo that were neighbours to the Turks, and the people of Media Antropatia (now called Siuan) diſliked of this new King: and in the end it appeared, that Perſia vnder this king, through many mutations, was in ſhort time fallen into moſt notable miſerie, and the ſtate thereof more weakened than it had been of long time before.

Of all theſe things had Amurath from diuers places intelligence, but more particularly from Vſtreff of Van (a citie of Armenia the greater, ſcituate vpon the lake of Actamar) who ſent him moſt perfect information of all the ſtirres in Perſia; Diſcourſing vnto him of the death of Iſmubel, the conſultations of the Sultans, the trecheries and death of Periaconcona, the broils betweene the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King (being diſeaſed in his eyes, little eſteemed of his ſubiects, beſotted in affection towards his ſonnes) the facilitie to ouerrule the chiefe Gouernors of the Georgians, and the people of Siruan, euill affected towards the new King: and to be briefe, whatſoeuer had in truth ſucceeded in Perſia, and might enflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to conuert his forces againſt an enemie of ſmall counſell, and much confuſion: adding thereunto, That neuer was there greater opportunity to ouercome that king, than now was offered, and therefore wiſhed him, not in any caſe to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, as the Othoman Kings had neuer before, for the obtaining of ſo certaine and glorious victories.

Amurath of long time wholly bent to marke the euent of the troubles in Perſia, now ſtirred vp with theſe aduertiſements from Vſtref, ſetled himſelfe more deeply in his former conceits to proue his forces in ſubduing the Perſian king, the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors, and his onely corriuall and odious competitor in the Eaſt. But no one thing did more enflame him thereunto, than to thinke, how he ſhould haue to his enemie a king not acquainted with deeds of armes, doting vpon his children, and weakned with the diſſention of his ſubiects: and on the other ſide entring into the conſideration of his owne forces, of the infinit number of his men, both horſe and foot, of the meanes he had to find money; of his artillerie and engines of war, wherin he far ſurpaſſed the Perſians; he did more and more reſolue with himſelfe, to take the occaſion that was now offered him to begin the war. For the compaſſing of which his purpoſe he was greatly fauored by the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendome, at that time beeing wholly in league and amitie with him. So not finding any thing contrarie to his deſignements, hee reſolued at laſt to confer with the chiefe Baſſa's, which had the gouernment of his empire, Whether it were better vpon this occaſion to begin the prepenſed war; or if they thought not this opportunitie to be ſo fit, then to lay it aſide, and to conuert his forces and counſell againſt the commonwealth of Chriſtendome. For ſuch is the barbarous policie whereby this empire is mannaged, That it is lawfull for them to breake any league, be it by neuer ſo many promiſes or ſolemne oaths confirmed, whenſoeuer any enterpriſe is to be attempted for the aduancing therof. So that although this war could not be moued either againſt the Perſians or Chriſtians without breach of their promiſed faith: yet among the manifold conſultations that paſſed among the great Baſſaes, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but al with one accord, without further reſpect ſought to ſet forward the ambitious deſire of their proud lord and maſter. At laſt after long conſultation and large diſcourſes, it was agreed vpon by the great Baſſaes Mahomet, Sinan and Muſtapha, That it would by better and leſſe danger to attempt war againſt the Perſians, than againſt the Chriſtian Princes. Muſtapha amongſt the reſt preferring the valor of the Latines (whereof he had made good trial eſpecially at Famaguſta) before the armies & forces of the Georgians & Perſians. Wherby it is apparant to the world, that neither the zeale of their religion, nor any iniurie receiued from the Perſian king, but only the ambitious deſire of Amurath (to ſubdue a kingdome, both in his owne conceit and other mens relations, euill gouerned, by an effeminat and ſottiſh king, and through ciuile diſſention brought into great danger) was the firſt prouocation of making this war.

No aſſurance in the Turks league.

Ambition the cauſe of the Perſian war.

A conſultation holden amongſt the Baſſaes about the manner of the inuaſion of Perſia.

Vpon this reſolution there aroſe new conſultations touching the manner thereof, and vpon what coaſt they ſhould begin their iourny, for the more honourable ſucceſſe thereof. Which point Amurath greatly vrged; proteſting before his chiefe counſellors, That he would not enter into that warre, except he were in great hope to beare away the victorie. Some thought it moſt conuenient to ſend the army to Babylon, & from thence to Syras, called in old time Perſepolis, the chiefe citie of the country of Perſia: others there were that gaue aduiſe, That the armie ſhould be directly ſent to Tauris, there to erect ſtrong fortreſſes; and to take poſſeſſion of all the countrie round about it: and there wanted not ſome (as it is reported) that thought it better to ſend two ſeuerall armies for both the forenamed places, & ſo by bringing the enemy into a ſtrait, to enforce him to yeeld to whatſoeuer ſhould be of him required. But Amurath durſt not repoſe ſuch confidence in his forces, as to thinke, that with his battels diuided and ſo weakened he ſhould be able to conquer that enemie, who had alwaies moſt valiantly fought againſt the monſtrous and puiſſant armies of his anceſtours. And therefore firmely reſolued with himſelfe, to ſend one only army, and ſo with his vnited forces to ſeeke the ouerthrow of the enemie. And ſo preferring the ſtrong hope he had conceiued to conquer the countrey of Siruan, and the chiefe cities of Media the great, before the difficultie of making war vpon the coaſt of Scyras, repoſing alſo great hope in the notable helpe that was promiſed him by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, he confirmed the great Baſſaes his counſellors in the ſame opinion: and withall diſcouered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but eſpecially to Sinan, ſeemed moſt ſtrange; namely, that he was determined not to go himſelfe in perſon with his army, but to ſend one of his worthieſt captains in his ſtead. The cauſes why he ſo did, were many, but eſpecially, for that he was troubled with the falling ſickneſſe, and feared greatly (and that not without good cauſe) leſt his ſon Mahomet (being much fauored of the people) might peraduenture in his abſence be vntimely aduanced to the empire; beſide the dangers that he ſuſpected at the hands of the Chriſtian Potentates: and withall perſuaded it to be vnto himſelfe a great honour to performe thoſe things by his ſeruants, which had in thoſe countries bin vnfortunatly attempted by his moſt noble predeceſſors in their owne perſons. G

While they were thus conſulting about the expedition, and the great Baſſaes, Sinan, Muſtapha, and others, made means to be ſent as the Soueraigne miniſters of their lords deſignement, hee diſpatched away ſundrie poſts and light horſemen, with order to the Baſſaes and Gouernors of Van, Babylon, and Erzirum, in the frontiers of his dominions, That they ſhould by often inrodes ſpoyle the townes and caſtles of the Perſians, and by all means to doe them what harme they could. Which they were not ſlacke to put in execution, and eſpecially Vſtref (or rather Huſreue) Baſſa of Van: who with often incurſions did much miſchiefe, as well in the countries tributarie, as ſubiect to the Perſian king. A forcible preparatiue for greater troubles to enſue. I

Vſtref Baſſa beginneth the wars in Perſia.

Now in theſe great preparations for the Perſian war (which for many yeares after notably exerciſed the greateſt part of the Turkes forces, to the great quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale) Stephen Bathor the late Vayuod of Tranſyluania, but now by the commendation of Amurath become King of Polonia; in the beginning of his raigne, by his Embaſſadour the great lord Iohn of Syenna, entred into a ſtrong league and confederation with the great Turkiſh Sultan Amurath at Conſtantinople. Which for that it ſheweth in what tearmes that famous kingdome then and yet ſtandeth with the Turkes great empire, and withall containeth matter well worth the Chriſtian conſideration, it ſhal not be impertinent to our purpoſe (omitting the long and glorious ſtile of that barbarous Monarch, ſeruing to no other end but to ſhew the greatneſſe of his power) plainely to ſet it downe as it was on his part at the ſame time by him confirmed. K

The League betwixt the moſt puiſſant and mightie Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkiſh Emperour, and Stephen king of Polonia, agreed vpon and concluded at Conſtantinople, in the yere of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſu 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet 985.

The league betwixt Amurath the Turks Sultan, and Stephen king of Polonia.

I Sultan Amurath, the ſonne of Selym Chan, the ſonne of Solyman Chan, the ſonne of Selym Chan, the ſonne of Baiazet Chan, the ſonne of the Great Emperour Mahomet Chan, &c. Prince of theſe preſent times, the onely Monarch of this age, of power able to confound the power of the whole World, the ſhadow of Diuine clemencie and grace, Great Emperour of many Kingdomes, Countries, Prouinces, Cities, and Townes, Lord of Mecha, that is to ſay, of the houſe of the glorie of God, of the reſplendent Citie of Medina, and of the moſt bleſſed Citie of Hieruſalem, Prince of the moſt fruitfull Countrey of Ægypt, Imen, Zenan, Aden, and many other ſuch like: In moſt louing manner declare, That the moſt glorious and renowned Stephen King of Polonia, great Duke of Lithuania, Ruſsia, Pruſia, Maſouia, Samogitia, Kiouia, Liuonia, and many other Countreys, the Prince of the couragious followers of Ieſus, Gouernour of all the affaires of the people and Families of the Nazarets, the welcommeſt cloud of Raine, and moſt ſweet fountaine of Glorie and Vertue, eternall Lord and Heire of the felicitie and honour of the aforeſaid noble Kingdome of Polonia, vnto whome all the diſtreſſed repaire for refuge, wiſhing a moſt happie ſucceſſe and bleſſed end to all his actions: offering vnto vs many religious vowes and eternall praiſes worthie our perpetuall loue and moſt holy League, and with great deuotion performing theſe and other like honours, a L

ſu

A for the diſpatch of his Letters to our moſt glorious Court, for the new confirming of the moſt ſacred league and confederation with vs, ſending the honourable Lord Iohn of Synnia (his moſt faithfull counſellour) his Embaſſadour to our Imperiall Court; declaring his loue and integritie, and purging himſelfe of all the ſuſpition of hoſtilitie, hath requeſted the league and confederation to be renewed. At whoſe inſtance wee haue giuen theſe our letters confirming the ſaid league of peace and confederation: Wherein we command, That none of our Counſellours, Beglerbegs, Sanzackes, Generals of our Armies, Captaines, or Seruants, ſhall doe, or on my behalfe preſume to doe any hurt vnto the Kingdome, Countries, Cities, Caſtles, Townes, Iſlands, or whatſoeuer elſe to the Kingdome of Polonia belonging. And in like manner, that none of the Nobilitie, Generals, Captaines, or others whoſoeuer belonging vnto the king of Polonia, ſhall dare to doe any harme vnto my Kingdomes, Cities, Caſtles, or Townes confining vnto the B Kingdome of Polonia. In briefe, my will is, that he being a mortall enemie vnto mine enemies, and a faſt friend vnto my friends, ſhall doe no grieuance or harme vnto any my ſubiects, or things whatſoeuer vnto my iuriſdiction belonging. So in like manner commanding alſo, that no hurt by any meanes, or for any occaſion be done by our people vnto the ſubiects, or whatſoeuer elſe vnto the Iuriſdiction of the King of Polonia appertaining.

The creatures, Embaſſadours, Meſſengers, and men of whatſoeuer condition elſe, ſhall on both ſides freely without let or trouble come and goe without any harme receiuing, either in their perſons or goods.

It ſhall be lawfull alſo for the King of Polonia his ſubiects, to ſeeke throughout our Empire for any the Polonian captiues taken before the time of this league; and the ſame ſo found (if they haue not recei- C ued the Turkiſh Religion, but ſtill remaine Chriſtians) to redeeme without the contradiction of any man.

And that whatſoeuer ſhall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this league, ſhall be all againe freely and without any thing paying, deliuered and reſtored.

That the merchants on both parts may freely traffique with all kind of merchandiſe in the blacke and white ſea, as alſo vpon the maine; and ſo paying their vſuall and lawfull cuſtome, to be in nothing wronged or moleſted.

If any of the Polonian merchants ſhall die in our dominion, the goods of him ſo dead ſhall not be embeſeled, but kept in ſafetie vntill his brethren or other his friends ſhall come with the king of Polonia his letters: vpon the ſhewing whereof, hauing alſo our letters mandatorie, the goods ſhall be forthwith re- D ſtored vnto the dead mans heires. In which ſort alſo my merchants ſhall be dealt withall, if any of them ſhall chance to die in the kingdome of Polonia.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine Empire, vnto any belonging vnto the kingdome of Polonia, after the date of theſe letters confirming the league; the doer of the wrong ſhall by my commandement be ſought out, and being found ſhall be puniſhed, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction forthwith recompenced. And the like Iuſtice to be alſo on the behalfe of the king of Polonia adminiſtred.

If any debtor ſhall depart out of mine empire into the Polonian territorie, whereſoeuer he ſhall chance to be found by his creditor, he ſhall be brought to the Iudge of that place to be examined, and whatſoeuer it ſhall be prooued him of right to owe, the Iudge of that place ſhall according to the equitie of the cauſe E make the creditor to be ſatisfied.

But if the debtor cannot himſelfe perſonally be found, no other man ſhall by reaſon of another mans debt be taken, detained, or moleſted: neither ſhall the innocent be troubled for the guilty, in either or both our kingdomes.

In briefe, vpon whatſoeuer conditions and capitulations the league of peace and confederation was in the time of my father, my grandfather, or great grandfather of famous memorie, made with the kings of Polonia, vpon the ſame conditions and capitulations be it now made alſo.

Whatſoeuer hurt hath hitherto bin done to either part by reaſon of the diſagreement of the Gouernors and Captaines, ſhall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Alſo after the time of theſe letters confirming the league and confederation, Whereas the King of Polonia ſhall in time pay a certain ſumme of money vſed to be paied vnto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan and his ſonne Mirzeleby their Princes, ſhall reſtore the ſame again, and not to dare to ſuffer his armies by any meanes to hurt the Polonian territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their armies, no harme ſhall be done vnto the kingdome of Polonia: neither on the part of the Polonians, to the territories of the Tartars. And if any harme ſhall by the Tartars be done in the king of Polonia his territories, it ſhall by my commandement be againe reſtored. And ſo likewiſe on the part of the Palatine of Moldauia, or the inhabitants of the kingdome of Moldauia, no harme ſhall be done vnto the countries ſubiect vnto the King of Polonia: but if any be done and certainely knowne, to be by my commandement againe recompenced.

On the part alſo of the King of Polonia and his ſubiects, whatſoeuer harme ſhall be done vnto the territorie or ſubiects of the Moldauian Palatine, or Tartars, the harme ſo done to be recompenced, and the doers thereof puniſhed.

Alſo that all ſuch fugitiues as hauing done any notorious felonies or other villanies in Moldauia, and ſo are fled into Polonia, ſhall at my requeſt, or at the requeſt of the Palatine of Moldauia, be reſtored, and in no caſe denied.

That all the Polonian captiues within my dominions, yet profeſſing the Chriſtian religion, may by the King of Polonia his ſubiects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their Lords and Maſters paied: euery ſuch maſter of the ſlaue taking his oath that he coſt him ſo much. But ſuch captiues as haue receiued the Turkiſh faith, to be forthwith ſet at libertie: and ſo the Turks ſlaues in the Kingdome of Polonia to be likewiſe manumiſed.

That our Embaſſadors on both ſides (ſo long as we are in league and amitie) may freely come and goe, and not be ſtaied in any place, and being willing to meet together, may at their pleaſure ſo doe. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by ſome good and faithfull guide appointed vnto them, conducted vnto the place they are to goe vnto. And this to be on both ſides kept.

No man to dare to hurt, or ſtay any merchant, hauing paied his thirtieth part, or lawfull cuſtome.

If any of our ſubiects ſhall haue any ſuit with any of the King of Polonia his ſubiects, the Iudges ſhall without delay be bound to adminiſter Iuſtice. All theeues and robbers ſhall be diligently ſought out; and being found, to be ſeuerely puniſhed: and the goods taken away, without impeachment to be reſtored vnto the right owners, their heires, or to the King.

The SanZackes of Siliſtria and Bolograue, the Cuſtomers and Water-baylifes ſhall not ſuffer any man but merchants and ſuch as are ſent in our ſeruice, to paſſe ouer the riuer Nyeſter; who paſſing ouer, if they ſhall bring with them any ſlaue or bondman out of Polonia, he ſhall be ſent backe againe. The ſheepheards, if they will tranſport their ſheepe into the Iurſdiction of the King of Polonia, ſhall not ſo doe without the leaue of the Polonian Gouernours, before whom they ſhall alſo number their ſheepe: of whom if any ſhal be loſt, the Gouernours ſhall cauſe them to be ſought for, and to be reſtored vnto the ſheepheards, as alſo to pay for their hay.

The Zauzij, Ianizaries, or Poſts, ſhall not dare in time of peace or war, to take any horſes from the Polonian merchants, or other the Kings ſubiects comming into our Kingdome.

The Palatines of Moldauia, in whatſoeuer condition they haue been towards the former Kings of Polonia, they ſhall now alſo ſtill ſo be hereafter. The thirtieths and Cuſtomes of both parts, ſhall continue in their old manner, and not be encreaſed. The Polonian kings ſubiects and Merchants, as well Armenians as of any other Nation, whenſoeuer they ſhall enter into Moldauia, or any other part of our Empire, ſhall not trauell by vncertaine and vnknowne, but by the common and high waies: wherein if they ſhall ſuffer any loſſe or harme, either in their gooas or perſons, the doers of ſuch wrongs ſhall bee ſought for, and ſenerely puniſhed. Which merchants ſhall bee ſuffered without any moleſtation quietly to come and goe, hauing paied their thirtieths: and no merchant to be troubled for anothers debt.

If any the Polonian Kings merchants or ſubiects, be willing for ready mony to redeeme and carry away any ſlaues taken out of the Polonian Kingdome, and yet profeſſing the Chriſtian religion, the Iudges ſhall in no caſe withſtand them, neither preſume to take them from them, or againe to redeeme them. But if any of ſuch ſlanes haue receiued the Turkiſh religion, they ſhall not be againe demanded by the King of Polonia.

Such ſlaues as haue not receiued the Turkiſh religion, if after a certaine ſpace they ſhall be ſet at liberty by their maſters, and in the letters teſtimoniall of their libertie, it ſhall be declared that they haue receinea the Turkiſh religion; yet ſhall they not by the Iudges be therefore detained.

In the Citie of Buruſa, the Polonian merchants hauing paied their vſuall thirtieths, ſhall not be further preſſed with any other vnuſuall payment.

My will is alſo, that the territories at this preſent in the poſſeſſion of the King of Polonia, as hereafter to be by him taken from the Muſcouite or any other the Chriſtian Princes, to bee compriſed within this league, and ſo to be royally by him poſſeſſed.

A And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in theſe our letters of confederation contained, I ſweare by the power of the moſt mightie God, and of his moſt holy Prophet, and by the moſt cleane and pure Spirits of all the Prophets; That for all the daies of my life, and ſo long as nothing ſhall on the behalfe of the King of Polonia be done contrarie to the peace and league, nothing ſhall alſo on my part bee done contrary vnto the ſame. Witneſſe the Almightie, the vpright Iudge and diſcerner of mens actions. From Conſtantinople the yeare of the holy Prophet Mahomet 985, the 14 of the moneth Cziemaſi Eumel, and of Chriſt 1577.

This league betwixt theſe two mightie Princes Amurath and king Stephen thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen by Sigiſmund the third (which now raigneth) renewed, as it hath B bin euer ſince to the Polonian kingdom for the time commodious, ſo hath it as with an Adamantine band ſo bound that moſt famous Kingdome, as that in the hardeſt diſtreſſes of the Chriſtian commonweale, and moſt indeed concerning it ſelfe, it hath affoorded no more help than hath the members farther off, which is (I rue to ſay it) none at all. As in theſe late and preſent wars betwixt the Chriſtian Emperor and the two laſt Turkiſh Sultans, it is too plainly to be ſeene: wherein had it in due time giuen but ſuch reaſonable helpes as it might well haue ſpared, much no doubt might haue been done for the repreſſing of the common enemie, and the recouerie of the greateſt part of that is loſt of Hungarie: but thus bound, ſtandeth as a dead member, ſeruing to no vſe more than to the more ſpeedie deſtruction of it ſelfe, together with the reſt of the ſicke bodie. For what aſſurance it can haue in this long (I muſt needs ſay) but C euill aſſured peace, is well to be ſeene in that in the great conſultation of this great Sultan Amurath with his Baſſa's after the Perſian war, for the inuading of Chriſtendome, the Polonians for all this league ſo ſolemnly conſtrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the ſame ballance with the leaſt, and preſerued only by the Prouidence that all gouerneth: which leading the Turk againſt the Chriſtian Emperor their neighbor, hath giuen them that peace they were otherwiſe hardly to haue looked for. Vnto whom for all that, hauing to his endleſſe praiſe maintained a long and moſt chargeable war, they haue not lent any great help or friendly hand; yet lying themſelues ſtill in the Lyons mouth, and like enough to be the next (God grant I be therein deceiued) that is to be of him deuoured.

But leauing theſe the heauie conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forbodings of D that I wiſh not, to returne againe toward Perſia, Amurath his greateſt care. Amongſt many the ambitious competitors for the managing of theſe Turkiſh ſo great deſignes, was the great Baſſa Muſtapha (euen he, who in the raigne of the late Emperor Selymus conquered Cyprus, carrying thence together with his victorie perpetual infamie, for his faithleſſe and cruell dealing with Bragadine the worthie and renowned Gouernour of Famaguſta) appointed Generall of the Turks army into Perſia: and authoritie giuen him, to prouide whatſoeuer he ſhould thinke needfull for ſo great a warre. And commandement giuen vnto the Baſſaes, and other commanders of the greateſt part of the Turkiſh Empire Eaſtward, that they ſhould themſelues with their ſouldiers of all ſorts, bound by their perpetual annuities to go to the warre, in the begin-E ning of the Spring this yeare 1578, repaire to Erzirum, a citie of Capadocia bordering vpon Armenia, there to attend the command of their new Generall. Who hauing his diſpatch from Conſtantinople, and for faſhion ſake conducted by moſt of the court ouer the ſtrait to Scutari, and from thence paſſing through the countries of Amaſia and Siuas, in the very beginning of Sommer arriued at Erzirum, and there ſtayed vntill ſuch time as his people, victuals, artillerie, and other his neceſſary prouiſion was come thither. From whence he departed for Siruan, hauing firſt taken a diligent ſurueigh of his whole armie, muſtering the ſouldiers of euery Nation by themſelues: namely, of the Meſopotamians twelue thouſand, of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians foureteene thouſand, of the Syrians two thouſand, of them of the Leſſer Aſia (now comprehended vnder the name of Natolia) ten thouſand, of the Iews and Philiſtims one thouſand, and of the Cilicians foure thouſand. After whom followed the ſouldiers of Grecia, the glorie and hope of all the campe, valiant men, to the number of ten thouſand: and after them the familiar and faithfull guard of the Generall, ten thouſand Ianizaries of Conſtantinople, with harquebuſies on their ſhoulders, and ſcimitars by their ſides: of the citie alſo of Erzirum, and the Iuriſdiction thereof, appeared foure thouſand, vnder the enſigne of of Beyran Baſſa their Generall. All theſe were ſtipendaries to the Turkiſh Emperour: vnto whome other voluntary aduenturers ioyned themſelues,in number not inferiour to the reſt,but better furniſhed, G and of greater courage. So that in this generall ſuruey of the armie were found about an hundred and ten thouſand men, moſt part horſemen: yet was there not any ſtirred out of Arabia, Ægypt,Affrica,or Hungarie, or other places alongſt the ſea coaſts: neither were the Prouinces from whence theſe ſouldiers were drawne,left deſtitute or vnfurniſhed of their ordinarie garriſons. Beſides this multitude of men, Muſtapha brought with him fiue hundred ſmall pieces of artillerie,with many loads of mony for his ſouldiers pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at Aleppo,and other places,if his occaſions ſhould ſo require.He cauſed alſo great quantitie of corne to be tranſported by the Great ſea called in antient time Pontus Euxinus,to Trapezond,ſo to be conueied to Erzirum,beeing but foure daies iourney diſtant thence. To be ſhort, hauing taken order for all things hee thought neceſſary for the warre, H hee in ſeemely array departed from Erzirum, and in eight daies arriued at the ruines of Chars, and in the fruitfull countrie thereabout reſted himſelfe: but was there ſurpriſed with ſuch a violent tempeſt of wind and raine, as rent in ſunder his tents, and did great harme; by means whereof many fell ſicke and were conſtrained to forſake the armie.

Muſtapha at Chars.

Muſtapha cunningly encampeth his armie at Chielder.

Hauing ſtaied three daies at Chars,the bounder of the Turkiſh and Perſian empires,hee departed thence with his armie,and that euening lodged vnder the mountains of Chielder,ſuppoſed to be part of the hils Periardo: where hearing the Perſians to be in armes, hee thought it beſt for the ſecuritie of his armie, ſo to pitch his tents as that hee might well diſcouer the comming of the enemie,and not to be aſſaulted at vnawares. And therefore planting himſelfe in the plaine, he gaue order that Beyran, Baſſa of Erzirum, ſhould take poſſeſſion of a certaine hill on the right hand;and Deruis the Baſſa of Caramit ſhould keepe another hill that ſtood on I the left hand; and with them Oſman Baſſa, Mahamet Baſſa, Muſtaffade Baſſa, aduenturers,with many others as well ſtipendarie as voluntarie men, ſhould likewiſe pitch their tents vpon the ſame hils, in ſuch ſort, as that they making as it were two wings to the camp,might diſcouer the comming of euerie man,and yet he himſelfe being ſhadowed with the two hils,might lie vnperceiued of any.

Mahamet the new king of Perſia, as yet ſcarcely ſetled in his kingdome, ſtirred vp by the fame of theſe motions,reſolued in himſelfe to ſtand vpon the defence of his ſtate,& for a time to diſſemble the conceiued hatred which he bare to ſome of the Sultans of Perſia,and princes of Georgia,and to make ſome apparant ſhew that hee was reconciled to them; for that without K them he could not promiſe vnto himſelfe any form of an armie,or defence:wherein(notwithſtanding all the troubled ſtate of his kingdome) he wrought ſo cunningly,that almoſt all the great men of account tooke vpon them the protection of his ſtate and kingdome. And ſo Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and Gouernour of Reiuan, a famous man, well knowne vnto the Turks,and of great reputation amongſt the Perſians,was choſen Generall of this expedition; with charge,That gathering together the greateſt number of men he could out of Atropatia, out of Media the greater, and other places neere vnto the Turks,he ſhould by all means poſſible ſtop their paſſage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And therupon precepts were ſent out into all parts of the kingdome, That all the Chans, Sultans,and ſouldiers whatſoeuer, ſhould come readie preſt to attend vpon their new Generall.Many obedient to the kings proclamation, L came;but many there were that would not ſtir a foot,for their obſtinacie in the broiles begun, and for the ſuſpition they had of vnlooked for miſchiefes: at whoſe diſobedience the king much grieued;but now there was no remedie but to make the beſt of the matter,and for the ſafegard of his honour to make the beſt reſiſtance they could. So with thoſe few which for the loue of their prince and country were met together in thoſe parts, being in number not aboue twentie thouſand, Tocomac was diſpatched about his buſineſſe,if happily he might with theſe ſmall forces oppreſſe the enemy in ſome ſtrait and troubleſome paſſage, where the great multitude ſhould rather ſerue to the confuſion of themſelues, than to the helpe of one another.
Theſe twentie thouſand were all horſemen, armed with ſcimitar and bow,with ſome harquebuſiers among,and furniſhed with very fine and well tempered armour; but aboue all, M courageous they were,& reſolute,and wel the more,for the valor and proweſſe of their Generall.
So prouided of all things neceſſary, they ſet forward,and keeping the way of Tauris and Genge,they came to the turning of Chars, where they were aduertiſed,that the enemies army was already paſſed.

Tocomac Generall of the Perſians.

A They were now come within a days iourney of Chielder, when they ſent quicke and faithfull ſcouts, to bring them certaine news of the condition and number of the Turks army; who came thither euen at the very time that Muſtapha was incamping his armie between the two hils, wherupon the two Baſſa's Beyran and Deruis, with their people, had alreadie pitched their tents. Theſe ſcouts diſcouering the Turkiſh hoaſt aloft, perſuaded themſelues that there was not any other battell than thoſe which they ſaw vpon the hills; whereof with all ſpeed they could they returned newes to Tocomac, who at eaſe had followed theſe his ſcouts a far off. Tocomac thus miſinformed by his ſcouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpoſe to aſſault them; and hauing diſcouered their tents vpon the hils, was throughly confirmed in the opinion he had before conceiued of the number of his enemies, & the ſcouts B relation, and with ſo much the more confidence ſet forward to aſſaile them. But Beyran and Deruis, who quickly from the hils perceiued the Perſians comming in the plain, although they knew them to be men of great courage, yet repoſing an aſſured confidence in their Generals battell, with all ſpeed mounted vpon their horſes, and ran to meet them. So in the aforeſayd plaines vnder Chielder, within one houre after noone was ioyned a moſt bloudie battel, wherin at laſt were ſlain ſeuen of the Turks Sanzacks, with a very great number of ſoldiers, without any apparant loſſe at all among the Perſians, who fighting cloſe together in a great heat, and all bebloudied, vrged their happie and fortunate victorie.

But Muſtapha who perceiued all that had paſſed, and ſtaied waiting till the fight was at the hoteſt, and the medly at the thickeſt, that ſo the flight of the enemies might breed their greater C diſorder; and now ſeeing that his people could no longer endure the fury of the enemies rage (euen as if it had lightned & thundred, and as though the earth had ſhaken) with ſuch cries and acclamations as the Turks vſe in their aſſaults, for the more terror of the enemies, exciting his army, ran as it were headlong vpon his aduerſaries, and ſo renewed a moſt terrible battell. The Perſians wonderfull courage endured this vnexpected and dreadfull aſſault, and with incredible ſignes of valour, in that little time of daylight that was left (for the night began now to approch) continued their manifold ſlaughters, and at laſt being fauored by the darkneſſe of the night, withdrew themſelues with as little loſſe as poſſibly they might. Neither durſt Muſtapha any longer purſue them, but was glad by night to returne to his campe. Of the ſucceſſe of this battell the Perſians certified their king; as alſo of the greatnes of the Turkiſh army, with their D further purpoſe for the annoying thereof. And by the Turkes alſo were preſented to Muſtapha (who had alreadie ſent away poſts with news to Amurath) 5000 heads, which by their color, countenance, & beards, bewraied themſelues to be Perſians, and 3000 Perſiansa liue. Of this victorie Muſtapha greatly reioiced, and to make it ſeeme the greater (ſeeking by all means to conceale his owne loſſes, and to raiſe a greater terror by the fame thereof, amongſt his enemies, cauſed the heads of thoſe three thouſand that were brought before him aliue, to be preſently cut from their ſhoulders, and gaue order, that of thoſe heads there ſhould be framed a bulwarke in thoſe fields, for a moſt horrible and vncouth ſpectacle.

Muſtapha commeth with his battel to relieue his diſtreſſed people.

A bulwarke made of the heads of the ſlain Perſians.

The ſame day that Muſtapha imploied himſelfe about this barbarous and cruel worke, there came vnto him certaine meſſengers from Manucchiar the younger ſon of the Georgian widow E Dedeſimit (a great prince in that country) who told him, That with his good fauour and leaue, Manucchiar their lord and maſter was comming to ſalute him, and to offer himſelfe vnto him as his obedient and deuoted ſeruant. At which newes Muſtapha redoubling his joy, gaue commandement, That all the Baſſa's and captains of the army, with all ſolemne pompe, with trumpets, drums, peales of ordnance, and all other ſignes of munificall and joyfull entertainment, ſhould go forth to meet the ſaid Manucchiar, and to accompanie him to his preſence. Which they did accordingly; and ſo encountering him with all ſignes of honor, conducted him to the great pauilion of Muſtapha, who there cauſed him againe to be ſaluted with like triumph. Manucchiar diſmounted from his horſe, and againſt his wil beholding the ſtrange and vncouth pile of heads all pale and filthie to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant: yet notwithſtanding, before all other things hauing done his due reuerence to the great Baſſa, and according to his degree placed himſelfe next to his ſide, after he had preſented him with ſuch gifts as his country yeelded, he gaue him to vnderſtand, That for the honor & eſtimation which he bare to the Turkiſh valor, he was alwaies deuoted to the houſe of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes deſired to ſpend his goods & life in their ſeruice, ſo at this preſent time, moued by his antient deſire, allured by the ſtrange fame of this victorious and wonderfull armie, and G ſtirred vp by a particular fantaſie, to learne the painfull and hard precepts of the art militarie, vnder ſuch a Generall, commander of other commanders; he offered him all deuotion and ſeruice, more than euer he had done to any heretofore, & himſelfe hauing nothing in the world more deere vnto him, conſecrated his own life to his commandements; deſiring that the ſame might be imployed in the conflicts of war vnder his banners, among warriors and ſouldiers of fame and renowne: and therefore beſought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whoſe obedient vaſſal he vowed himſelfe to remaine for euer.

The anſwere of Muſtapha.

Graciouſly did Muſtapha receiue all this diſcourſe from Manucchiar, and hauing ſhewed him againe the pile of heads, together with his battels, armor, and prouiſion of war, told him, That as all theſe forces are the gift of God, who alwaies fauored the righteous counſels of the Othman Emperors, in ſuch ſort that they lord it ouer all the world, euen to the aſtoniſhment of all H that liue in the world at this day: ſo had he for his particular choſen the better part, in comming now to yeeld himſelfe, and to ſubmit his obedience to his Lord, although it had beene better if he had done it before. And as concerning the deſire he had to be his companion and fellow in theſe warlike affaires, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promiſed him all good entertainement and aſſured ſafetie. And ſo in exchange of the preſents which hee brought him, he apparelled him in cloath of gold, honored him with a battel-axe and targuet wrought with gold and ammell, and neuer permitted him to go from his pauilion without a traine of his ſlaues following him.

A terrible raine and tempeſt.

This Georgian prince thus ſolemnly entertained, the General gaue order thorow the camp, I That they ſhould the next morning remoue from thoſe mountaines: and now euery man was putting himſelfe in readineſſe, when as there riſe a moſt terrible tempeſt of winde and raine, mixt with thunder & lightning; which continued with ſuch violence by the ſpace of foure dayes together, as if the heauens had bin diſſolued into waters. Whereby it came to paſſe, that out of the dead carkaſſes & heads before mentioned iſſued a moſt horrible ſtink: ſo that thereby, & by the foulneſſe of the weather, with the other anoiances always attending vpon ſo great a camp, the whole army was exceedingly troubled, and diuers diſeaſes aroſe among the Turks. But at the laſt the weather breaking vp, Muſtapha riſe with his campe, and ſet forward toward Teflis: and being not able by reaſon of the foulneſſe of the way to paſſe any farther, that day ſtayed in the plains, where the lake Chielder Giol ſtandeth, and there refreſhed his ſicke and K wounded ſoldiers: remouing thence, the next day about noone he came to the caſtle of Archichelec, ſometime a caſtle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his wars againſt Muſtapha ſurueieth his army at Archichelec, & lacketh forty thouſand of his men.

Tamas, and euer ſince holden by the Turks. Here Muſtapha ſurueyed his army, and by diligent account taken, found himſelfe to want 40000 of his ſoldiers: wereof ſome were ſlaine in the battell, ſome were dead of ſickneſſe, and many wearie of ſo long and perilous a journey, were by night ſtolne out of the campe, and returned to take their eaſe at home. From thence the armie remoued, and lodged at night neere the mariſh called of the Turks Peruana Giol, or lake of ſlaues, and the next day came to Triala, where at this day are to be ſeene the ruins of a great citie and of many churches; whereof ſome are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Chriſtians, the reliques of thoſe happy and religious forces, that with ſo great and faithfull zeale L paſſed the ſeas and mountaines through thoſe barbarous nations into the holy land, men worthie of eternall praiſe. The next day the Turks aſcended the high and craggie mountaine that ſtandeth vpon Teflis: from the top whereof diſcending the day following, they ſeiſed vpon a caſtle of the Georgians, called by the Turks Giurgi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certaine plaines, the next day they came neere to the riuer that runneth by Teflis. But in theſe foure dayes march from Archichelec, where Muſtapha tooke view of his armie, many of the Turks who in ſeeking for victuals for themſelues and their horſes, had ſtragled from the army, were cut off by the Georgian captaines, who with a number of their owne countrey ſouldiers ſecretly followed the Turks armie, and well acquainted with all the wayes of the countrey, lay in ambuſh vpon ſuch places as the victuallers were to paſſe through, and ſo ſuddenly ſetting M vpon them, ſpoiled them at once both of their goods and liues.

Muſtapha comming to Teflis, found that caſtle empty, for that Daut Chan lord thereof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, forſook the ſame and betooke himſelfe to the fields, prouiding better for himſelf in ſo doing, than by ſtaying ſtil in the caſtle, to haue bin there taken priſoner.

A ſoner. This caſtle for the conuenient ſcituation thereof Muſtapha cauſed to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of artillery, and appointed Mahamet Baſſa Generall Gouernor of that place, with a garriſon of ſix thouſand ſoldiers, which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time thoſe of Soria, which had brought a thouſand loads of rent corne to the campe from Aleppo, being themſelues in number a thouſand perſons, with fiue hundred others of Omps (in antient time called Hus, the citie of the patient Iob) and other places of Soria, men neither of dutie bound, nor of themſelues willing to follow the campe, returned homewards towards their owne countrey: but vpon the way they were ſet vpon by Aleſſandro, Giuſuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all ſlaine except ſome few, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes eſcaped with Naſſardin their Captaine.

B Now after that Muſtapha had paſſed the diſcent of the ſteepe mountaines of Teflis, the next day he incamped in certaine low plaines; where the Embaſſadors of Aleſſandro ſyrnamed the Great, ſonne of Leuent a Georgian Prince, came vnto him and told him, That their Lord was readie, if it ſo pleaſed him, to come vnto him to do him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promiſe him that deuotion he had alwayes in minde borne to the Othoman Emperors. With a glad heart and cheerefull countenance did Muſtapha receiue theſe Embaſſadors: and preſently ſent them backe to will their lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendſhip ſhould be vnto him moſt deere and acceptable. And after their departure, tooke order with all the commanders of his armie, to receiue him with all the ſignes of joy that might be; which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had preſented vnto the Gene- C rall the rich gifts he had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Baſſa with moſt liuely ſpeeches he could poſſibly deuiſe, calling Amurath his Lord: ſeeming to take it in euil part, that he paſſed not through his territorie, where he ſhould (as he ſaid) haue had plentie of all things for the reliefe of his army; yet hoping that in his returne from Siruan he would take it in his way; whereas he ſhould find him moſt readie to beſtow all that he had in the ſeruice of his Lord: telling him moreouer, That although he could not for many vrgent reſpects go with him into Siruan, yet he would alwayes accompanie him in minde, and continually pray vnto the Creator of all things, for his proſperitie and moſt happie ſucceſſe. Courteouſly did Muſtapha receiue both his preſents and ſubmiſſion, and in exchange thereof beſtowed vpon him certaine gifts after the Turkiſh manner, and in magnificall termes gaue him anſwer; pro- D miſing him in his returne to paſſe through his countrey: and ſo diſmiſſed the Perſian Duke with like honour wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Aleſſandro the Georgian ſendeth Embaſſadors to Muſtapha.

Aleſſander curteouſly entertained by Muſtapha.

Muſtapha holding on his journey toward Siruan, through mooriſh and troubleſome wayes; in twelue eayes after he departed from Teflis, came into the confines of Siruan, neere to the riuer Canac, and there reſted on this ſide the riuer one day. At which time they of the city of Sechi, bordering vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure dayes journey from Sumachia, came to offer themſelues to Muſtapha, as ſubiects to the Turks. Of whoſe ſubmiſſion the Generall gratiouſly accepted, promiſing to them his aſſured protection.

The Turks army ouerwearied with the continual trauell of twelue dayes march, but yet far more afflicted with hunger, not finding in thoſe parts ſo much as one wild beaſt to aſſuage their greedie deſire of meat, ſought by all means, euery man for himſelf, to get ſomthing, eſpecially when they vnderſtood their Generall would paſſe the riuer into a countrey vnto them all vnknowne, where they were altogether vncertaine what to find for their reliefe. So whileſt they were inquiring among themſelues, who were able to conduct thē to ſome ſuch place as where they might ſupply their wants, behold, certain Perſians were taken, who being ſtraitly examined on that point, after much reſiſtance at laſt told them, that not farre off, after they had paſſed certain mariſhes, where Canac diſchargeth it ſelfe into Araxis, they ſhould find many fields ful of ryce & corne in the blade, and a little farther certain fat heards of cattel, ſufficient to relieue the whole army. Of this news was the general certified; who although he greatly doubted the ſubtiltie of his enemies, yet to gratifie his ſouldiers, and to make them more willing to follow him into Siruan, he licenſed euery man that had a deſire thereunto, to go and prouide himſelfe of victuals, and ſo ſuffered all that would, to go freely. Whereupon there went of themſelues, and were ſent by their Captaines, about ten thouſand ſeruile perſons, with Camels, Horſes, and Mules, to fetch away this prouiſion of corne and cattell: but the euent anſwered not to their deſires. For Tocomac with the other Perſian Captaines, and the reſt of the ſouldiers that were eſcaped from the ouerthrow giuen them in the plaines of Chielder, hauing gathered together the remainder of the army, and recouered ſuch places as they thought ſafe and friendly G for them, carefully attended the marching & paſſing of the Turkiſh armie. And being certainly informed by them of Reiuan and Georgia, what way they kept, and that of neceſſitie they muſt arriue at the banks of Canac, they began to deuiſe how they might in ſome meaſure be reuenged of their former loſſe, and impeach their enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather ſtrength than courage to aſſaile the whole armie, they thought it beſt to ſtay in ambuſh in ſome fit place, vntill ſome part of the Turkiſh armie (allured with the prey of the the corne and cattell) ſhould for the reliefe of their common neceſſities diſcend into thoſe fields. And the rather to draw them on, ſent out diuers men, who as if they had gon about their owne buſineſſe, and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turks campe, reuealed vnto them as H a great ſecret, what a good prey was hard by them. And ſo withdrawing themſelues out of ſight priuily, awaited the comming of the Turks: when as within the ſpace of three dayes it ſo fell out, that the aforeſaid ten thouſand forragers arriued at the wiſhed place; where they had no ſooner begun to charge themſelues with the prey, but they were ſurpriſed by the Perſians and all ſlaine, ſauing a few, who by haſtie flight ſaued themſelues. The noiſe of this hot skirmiſh being heard into the Turkiſh hoaſt, cauſed Muſtapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as indeed it was; and therefore riſing with his whole army, haſted with all poſſible ſpeed to haue ſuccored the poore people, who were now all ſlaine. And albeit hee came not in ſo good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he very fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Perſians, ſtaying too long to load themſelues with the ſpoile of their enemies. I

Ten thouſand of the Turks forragers ſlaine.

The place from whence the Turks were to haue had the aforeſaid bootie, was almoſt in manner of an Iſland, incloſed with the riuers of Araxis and Canac: whereinto Muſtapha entred with his whole power, Deruis Baſſa leading the one wing, as did Beyran Baſſa the other, and he himſelfe comming on in the middle with the maine battell. The Perſians ſeeing Muſtapha with all his forces haſting towards them, & withall remembring the late ouerthrow by them receiued in the plains of Chielder; began to bethinke themſelues how much better it had bin for them to haue contented themſelues with the late ſlaughter of the forragers, and with ſpeed to haue got them away out of that ſtrait, than by ſtaying longer, to be incloſed with the multitude of their enemies, as that they could now no way eſcape without moſt manifeſt peril. In this perplexity diſcourſing among themſelues, whether it were better to fly, or with ſo great diſaduantage K to join battel, and ſo rather to die honorably, than to liue with reproch: at laſt they reſolued to reſerue themſelues to the further ſeruice of their prince and country; deeming it rather a point of wiſdome than of diſhonor, not to aduenture vnto moſt deſperat and aſſured death, ſo many worthie men as might in future time ſtand their country in good ſtead: yet did they not ſee how by flight well to eſcape, for that they were in ſuch ſort ſtrained within the riuers, as that there was no ground left for them to eſcape by, than that which contrary to their expectation was by the Turks alreadie poſſeſſed. In theſe difficulties euery man began to betake himſelfe to his owne priuat conceit and fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan and other the great commanders of the armie, were the firſt that turned their backs, and by the helpe of their couragious horſes got ouer the riuer of Canac: whoſe example mooued many others to attempt the L like, though not with like fortune; for that their horſes being not of ſuch courage, and out of breath, lay many of them drowned in the riuer. Wherewith others being amaſed, as perceiuing ineuitable death in flying, preſent before their eyes, and repoſing all their hope euen in diſpaire, ran as it were headlong in a rage and furie vpon their enemies, and in fighting ſhewed vnſpeakeable valour: but what was one againſt an hundred? for there they were alſo all ſlaine, though worthie of immortall fame. Thus was the Perſian armie quite diſcomfited in this demie Iſland, being firſt ſtained with the bloud of the enemy, and afterward with the ſlaughter of the neighbour and proper inhabitant: and ſo became the perpetuall ſepulchre of a moſt couragious and warlike people. The Turks in this laſt conflict loſt not not aboue 3000 men, beſide M the ſlaughter of the 10000 forragers: although Tocomac to make his loſſe to ſeeme the more tollerable, made report to the king of a greater ſlaughter made. The Perſian Captaines full of ſorrow for this vnexpected ouerthrow, with the licence of their General departed euery man to his ſeuerall gouernment: as Emanguli Chan to Genge, Serap Chan to Naſſiuan, Tocomac himſelfe to Reiuan, and all the reſt to other cities, to the gouernment whereof they were before

The Perſians fly and in flying are many of the drowned in Canac.

A ſore by the King appointed, and ſo remained expecting his further pleaſure from Caſbin.

Muſtapha was now come to the riuer of Canac, which he was to paſſe ouer into Siruan; and therefore made ſtraight proclamation through his whole armie, That euery man ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the next day to paſſe the riuer. At which proclamation all his people ſuddenly aroſe in a tumult, and with iniurious termes euen to his face reproued his folly and inhumanitie, propounding vtter danger vnto himſelfe, & an vniuerſall confuſion vnto the whole armie: and therfore prayed him to ſurceaſe from proceeding any further, vnleſſe he were minded to caſt them all away. But his reſolute mind was not by their threats or intreaties to be remoued, neither gaue he them other anſwer than this, That ſo had Amurath commanded, and that if all the reſt ſhould ſhew themſelues vnwilling to obey their Soueraigne, he himſelfe would not nor could B not, but would be the firſt man to attempt and performe that which they all ſo abhorred and reproued. Valiant ſouldiers (he ſaid) were diſcouered and knowne not in idleneſſe and eaſe, but in great paines taking, and difficult enterpriſes: who neuer ought to be affraid to change this momentarie life for euerlaſting honour, or to ſhun death, if the ſeruice of their Prince ſo required. And for mine owne part (ſaid hee) I moſt earneſtly requeſt you, that after I haue attempted the paſſage of the riuer, if any thing happen vnto me otherwiſe than well, yet carrie my dead bodie to the other ſide of the riuer; to the end that if I cannot whileſt I yet liue execute the commandement of my Soueraign, I may yet at leaſt performe the ſame when I am but a ſpeechleſſe and liueleſſe carkas: foraſmuch as the deſire of my Lord is not in any ſort to be fruſtrated, for making too great account of mine owne life.

The reſolute anſwer of Muſtapha to his tumultuous ſouldiers.

Diuers and ſundrie murmurings & whiſperings followed vpon this ſpeech of the General, C who notwithſtanding the next morning did firſt of all wade ouer the deepe & ſwift riuer himſelf: after whom preſently followed the Baſſa's with all their ſlaues, by whoſe example the reſt alſo were induced at laſt to do the like, and ſo continued vntil the darkneſſe of the night interrupted their paſſage; by which occaſion more than halfe the armie could not then get ouer. In this paſſage, being with great tumult and diſorder attempted, it came to paſſe that about 8000 perſons carried away with the violence of the riuer, were miſerably drowned, with the great outcry of all the hoaſt. The like hapned alſo to many mules, camels, and ſumpter horſes, vpon whoſe backes diuers perſons being mounted, in hope to haue paſſed drie ouer the riuer, were likewiſe headlong ouerwhelmed therein. With great complaints and blaſphemous curſings was the whole night ſpent, by them that were yet on this ſide the riuer, whoſe fears were not D a little increaſed by the example of their vnfortunat fellows, before drowned. And like enough it was, ſome peſtilent ſedition to haue inſued thereupon, had there not a ſhallow foord by great chance bin diſcouered, which gaue ſafe paſſage to thoſe that were left: for in the paſſage which the people made that followed Muſtapha, the grauell of the bottome of the riuer being raiſed and remoued by the heauy hooues of the cattel, was driuen down the riuer to a place where by great good hap there was alſo a foord; and there gathered together in a heape, had in ſuch ſort raiſed the depth of the channel, that it made as it were a ſhelfe for their commodious paſſage, ſo that the remnant of the army, carriages, and artillerie paſſing ouer the ſame, there was not ſo much as one man that periſhed. So hauing with much difficultie at laſt got ouer the riuer of Canac, they reſted themſelues that day and the next, and there ſtaied vntill the whole armie was muſtered, and againe put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they incamped in certain barren champaines where was neither corne nor cattel: neither could they perceiue or learne, that in thoſe quarters were any villages at all. By meanes whereof the hunger of their beaſts increaſing, they were inforced to giue their horſes and mules leaues and ſtalks of verie drie and withered reeds, & ſuch other like things of little or no ſuſtenance at all: and the men themſelues were faine to ſatisfie their hunger with thoſe vttermoſt reliques which they were faine to picke out of ſuch poore victuals as now by corruption were become loathſome to mans nature: and that which worſe was, they ſaw no end of theſe miſeries they were ſo entred into. Notwithſtanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they muſt, and follow the fortune of their leaders: among whom Muſtapha before all the reſt ſet forward on his determined journey. He had not long marched, but there was diſcouered good ſtore of ſundrie plants, and ſhortly after a very large plaine countrey all greene and flouriſhing, and garniſhed with many trees; by the only ſight whereof euery man was refreſhed with the hope of reliefe, and with more than ordinarie paces haſted vntill they were entred into thoſe Champaines, abounding with all kinde of corne and fruits that could be of an hungrie man deſired. In this place did euery man ſatisfie his appetite, and forgot in part the forepaſſed calamities. Through this G fruitfull and pleaſant countrey Muſtapha leading his armie, at laſt arriued at Eres, the chiefe citie in that coaſt of Siruan, as you trauell from Georgia.

This citie of Eres was forſaken of a number of her inhabitants, as ſoone as it was knowne, that the Tyrks were come to Canac: who all followed their gouernor Samis Chan, who with Ares Chan gouernor of Sumachia, and other the gouernors of Sechi and other places of Siruan, forſooke the cities, & all together withdrew themſelues into the mountains, as places of more ſuretie, attending the euent of theſe ſo great motions. So that as the Turkes entred the citie vndiſturbed, ſo were they with the prey they found therein nothing inriched; for that in this common danger euery man had carried away with him the beſt things he had. Here ſtayed Muſtapha two and twentie dayes, during which time he erected a fortreſſe in the ſaid city; H whereupon he placed two hundred ſmall pieces of artillerie, and for the keeping thereof appointed Caitas Baſſa with a garriſon of fiue thouſand ſoldiers. In the meane time alſo he commanded Oſman Baſſa (one of the voluntarie captaines) with ten thouſand men to poſſeſſe Sumachia, ſometime the metropoliticall citie of that prouince, with the title of Viſier and Gouernor generall of Siruan. Giuing him further in charge, that in any caſe he ſhould cleere the paſſage to Derbent, and giue preſent aduertiſements to the Tartarians, of his arriuall there: whom he ſuppoſed by that time to be come into thoſe quarters, for that they had before ſo faithfully promiſed to Amurath. Oſman comming to Sumachia, preſently ſeiſed vpon the citie, and was friendly entertained of thoſe that remained there: whom he likewiſe curteouſly I entreated, without doing or ſuffering any outrage to be done vpon them. Of which his curteous vſage they of Derbent vnderſtanding, ſent preſently to offer their citie vnto him, beſeeching him to receiue them into his protection, and to defend them from the Perſians: vnder whom although they had long liued in ſubiection, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometane ſuperſtition, wherein they better agreed with the Turks.

Muſtapha returneth out of Siruan.

Muſtapha hauing thus brought the countrey of Siruan into the Turkiſh ſubiection, and finiſhed his fortreſſe at Eres, and put all things in ſuch order as he thought beſt; importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of Grecia, and ſomewhat inforced by the ſeaſon of the yeare, which was now far ſpent; departed from Eres, and turned his courſe homeward toward the countrey of Alexander ſyrnamed the Great, as he had promiſed in his late paſſage into Siruan. K And hauing trauelled a long journey, he ſent before him certaine engines and pioners to make a bridge ouer Canac, ſo without danger to paſſe ouer his armie. Hauing paſſed the riuer, hee gaue notice to Sabamall (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arriuall, who preſently came and yeelded himſelfe as vaſſal to the Turks: and being entertained of the Baſſa with great pompe, and rewarded after the Turkiſh manner, tooke his leaue, and ſo returned into his mountaine of Brus.

Muſtapha ſetting againe forward, and trauelling by night, becauſe he would not loſe the opportunitie of the faire weather, by the error of his guids loſt his way, and ſo fel into rough and difficult paſſages, whereby he was inforced to ſtay and wait for day light: which ariſing, did manifeſt vnto them, that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander. And L therefore he gaue forthwith proclamation through all the armie, That no man vpon paine of death ſhould be ſo hardie as to moleſt or diſquiet any of the ſubiects of Alexander, but to haue good reſpect vnto them, and to entreat them with all curteſie. The day following he ſtill trauelled on in the ſame country, when there arriued from Zaghen certaine Embaſſadors of Alexanders, with great abundance of cattell, corne, fruits, and other reliefe ſent for a preſent to the Generall, with a ſolemne excuſe that he came not himſelfe, becauſe the infirmitie of his bodie would not ſuffer him. Wherewithall Muſtapha reſted ſatisfied, and leauing the citie of Zaghen on the right hand, cauſed the meſſengers of Alexander to guide him the way to Teflis: which they ſo directly did, that within the ſpace of three dayes they conducted him thither with his armie, without the feeling of any annoyance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their paines by the Generall. Who now come to Teflis, found the garriſon hee had there left for the keeping thereof, ſo hardly pinched with famin, that they were glad to eat cats, dogs, ſheepskins, and ſuch like vnwonted food: for neither durſt they for feare of the enemie go out of the caſtle to prouide for themſelues, neither if they had ſo done, had it any thing auailed, ſuch was the carefulnes of the enemie in keeping of his things: but now by the comming

A ming of the Generall they were relieued with meat, money, and plentie of all things. Hauing ſtaied there two daies, he put himſelfe againe vpon his way; and with fire and ſword deſtroied whatſoeuer came in his way in the Champains ſubiect to the ſaid city: only the ſepulchres of Simons progenitors (lord of that country) were left vntouched by the Turks fury. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountaines, full of a thouſand difficulties, which were the more encreaſed by wonderfull great ſnowes that were fallen: by reaſon whereof, many ſoldiers, horſes, camels, and mules periſhed. In which diſtreſſe the army continued two daies; during which time the ſouldiers were fallen into ſuch a diſorder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies countrey wherein they were, euery man without regard tooke vp his ſeueral lodging apart, ſome here, ſome there, where they might finde either ſome thicke buſh or ſome B ſmall cottage, or ſome quiet valley to ſhelter themſelues in from the wind, the ſnow, and the ſtormes. Of which diſorder certaine Georgian lords vnderſtanding by the ſcouts which from time to time waited vpon the Turks armie, ioyned themſelues together, & in the night ſecretly approched vnto it, expecting the opportunitie of performing ſome notable exploit: and hauing obſerued, that Hoſaine Bey had withdrawne himſelfe with his regiment from the reſt of the armie vnder certaine mountains, to defend himſelfe from the ſtorme and wind, they tooke the occaſion preſented, and ſo aſſailing him, ſlew his ſlaues and al his ſquadrons, tooke a great bootie of many loads of money and apparell, led away with them all his horſes, and whatſoeuer elſe they could find, and ſcarce gaue him leiſure to ſaue himſelfe, by flying into the tents of Beyran Baſſa. The next morning the Turks remoued, and in the euening came to a caſtle called C Chiurchala, where they ſtaied a whole day to make prouiſion of victuall: which was attempted by ſending abroad many of their ſlaues into the fields, conducted by them of the caſtle, who were all miſerably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turks armie departed in great hunger, ouer diuers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes faine to reſt themſelues: and at laſt came to the confines of Dedeſmit, of her called the widowes countrey. In the entrance whereof, they muſt needs paſſe thorow a narrow ſtrait, betweene certaine mountaines, where the riuer Araxis windeth it ſelfe with a thouſand turnings in the low vallies: a dangerous place, and ſo narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once paſſe through it. Betweene this ſtrait and a very thicke and hillie wood, they lodged vpD on the banke of the ſaid riuer: and from thence they remoued the next morning, and trauelled ouer very ſteep mountaines and rough forreſts, ouer yce and ſnow more harder than marble, and ouer other hanging rocks, in ſuch miſerable ſort, that many camels, mules, and horſes, tumbling downe headlong into the riuer, there miſerably periſhed. Through theſe ruinous crags and diuers other miſeries, they marched al the next day, and after that another day alſo, as miſerable to the army as the former: and ſo at laſt being ſore afflicted with hunger, ſpoiled of the enemy, tormented with the hard ſeaſon of the yeare, and ſcituation of the place, they arriued in the territories that lay vnder Altunchala, or Golden Caſtle, the princely widowes pallace, where they had all maner of reliefe, for all the miſeries they had endured ſince their departure from Chiurchala, by the ſpace of ſix daies: which if it had bin a faire common trauelled way, E might haue been performed in one onely daies iourney.

The miſerie of the Turks army in paſſing the ſtraits of Georgia.

The widow, with Alexander her eldeſt ſonne, came downe from her caſtle, and went vnto the pauilion of Muſtapha; offering him diuers Preſents, & promiſing vnto him all faithful obedience. Whome Muſtapha courteouſly receiued, declaring vnto her, what honourable entertainment he had giuen to Manucchiar her younger ſonne there preſent, who had bin with him in all the expedition into Siruan. And for the preſent, diſſembling the priuy diſpleaſure he bare againſt Alexander (whom he thought to haue bin one of them that ſpoiled the Sorians in their returne from the campe) he embraced him courteouſly, and prayed her to be content to leaue him alſo there with him: giuing her farther to vnderſtand, that he would ſend both her ſonnes to Conſtantinople to Amurath, with letters of credence for their yeelded obedience, for their fauour ſhewed to his armie, in giuing it ſo ſecure paſſage, and ſo many helpes: and laſtly, that for their good deſerts, they might be of the ſaid great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged Ladie, although her mind was herewithall ſore troubled, yet outwardly in her countenance ſhewed her ſelfe pleaſed; and ſeemed courteouſly to yeeld, what ſhee was of neceſſitie conſtrained to grant: as well for that hee was alreadie poſſeſſed of one of her ſonnes, as alſo for that both herſelfe and her whole ſtate were now in his power; and as it were at his deuotion. And therefore leauing both her ſonnes behind her, ſhe returned her ſelfe G heauie to her caſtle.

Muſtapha commeth to Erzirum, & diſchargeth his armie.

In this place Muſtapha hauing refreſhed his army two daies, departed thence toward Chars, and after many daies trauell at laſt arriued at Erzirum, to the great reioycing of the whole armie, which was there preſently diſcharged by the Generall, without any muſtering at all, and leaue giuen for euery man to returne into his countrey.

Muſtapha magnifieth his own exploits to Amurath.

Muſtapha ſetling himſelfe in Erzirum, diſpatched poſts with letters of plentifull aduertiſements to his great lord and maſter, of all things that had paſſed: not forgetting to magnifie his own exploits aboue meaſure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Perſians, the obedience he had receiued of the Georgians and Siruanians, the mutinie of his owne ſoldiers, the fortreſſe hee had built at Eres, the garriſons left in that citie with Caitas Baſſa, and in H Sumachia with Oſman Baſſa: and in briefe, whatſoeuer elſe had paſſed, and whatſoeuer he had taken from the enemy. Neither did he faile to propound vnto Amurath, what he thought conuenient to be attempted the next yeare, for the ſtrengthening of thoſe places hee had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new enterpriſes. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any paſſage into Georgia or Armenia, by ſcituation fruitfull and commodious both for men and cattell. And withall he ſent vnto him the widowes two ſonnes, Alexander and Manucchiar, the Georgian princes, certifying him of their ſubmiſſion, and that hee had receiued in their countrey all good entertainement and friendly welcome: and withal declaring his opinion, That Manucchiar was the meeter man for gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to do him ſeruice. Greatly did Amurath commend the valor and diligence of Muſtapha, and highly pleaſed himſelfe with this con- I ceit, That of theſe beginnings might grow mightie conqueſts, to the enlargement of his Empire, and that by this means he ſhould be able to ſurpaſſe the glory of his predeceſſors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about theſe wars, the leſſe he troubled himſelfe with thinking how to annoy Europe with his forces.

It was not long after the departure of Muſtapha from Eres, but that the Tartarians hauing left the fens of Meotis, and the vnmountable ſhores of the Blacke ſea, and hauing paſſed ouer the rockes vpon Cholchis, and ſurueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine Caucaſus, were now arriued vpon the confines of Siruan, and there attended the commandment of the Turks. Theſe Tartarians beeing of them that are called Præcopenſes, to the number of thirtie thou- K ſand, conducted by their lord and captaine Abdilcherai, a yong man of great valor and fame, and of a comely perſonage, were come according to the faithfull promiſe of Tartar Chan, with a full reſolution to attempt whatſoeuer ſhould be commanded them in the name of Amurath. Now Oſman Baſſa vnderſtanding of their approch, according to the charge before giuen him by Muſtapha the Generall, enuited them to enter into Siruan, and by encreaſing of the Turkes forces, to further theſe beginnings of Amuraths glory, and theſe his conqueſts (or more truly to ſay, theſe magnifical & famous termes of victory.) All which was moſt diligently put in execution by Abdilcherai: who hauing entred the yron gates where Derbent ſtandeth (which by the Turks at this day is called Demir Capi, and ſignifieth the gates of yron) & ſo from thence paſſing into the countrey of Siruan, there ſtaied, and thereof gaue aduertiſement to Oſman, as L was by him appointed. Ares Chan late Gouernor of Sumachia, who for feare of the great army of the Turks, had abandoned the city, the chiefe place of his charge, and betaken himſelfe to the ſafegard of the mountains, hearing of the departure of the Turkiſh Generall, reſolued with the other Gouernours of Eres and Sechi (who following his example, had in like manner fled) now to returne againe to their forſaken country, and to make proofe if he could by any means take reuenge of the iniurie done vnto him by the Turks. So paſſing vnder Sumachia, & hauing put to the ſword certaine of Oſmans ſtragling victuallers that were gone out of the citie, he encamped with all his people a little from Sumachia, and by good fortune ſurpriſed certaine meſſengers ſent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Oſman Baſſa of his arriuall, and to know his pleaſure what hee ſhould put in execution. Theſe Tartarians brought before Ares, after M much torture diſcloſed the letters they carried: which the Perſian captaine read, and conſidering the great number of the Tartarians that were come (for the letters made mention of thirty thouſand) he reſolued not to ſtay any longer in thoſe quarters, but preſently raiſed his campe, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the king of thoſe nouelties, and

A vpon the banks of the ſaid riuer to attend the kings anſwer. The Tartarian captaine comming to Sumachia, was appointed by the Baſſa to paſſe ouer the riuer of Canac, into Genge, the country of Emanguli Chan, with the ſpoile thereof to enrich himſelfe, and by all means to make his arriual vnto the Perſians moſt terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirſting now for nothing more than for the bloud and ſpoile of the enemy: and with poſting iournies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet encamped: whom he vpon the ſudden moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, and like a deuouring flame diſcomfited all his hoaſt. And taking him aliue, ſent him to Sumachia to Oſman, who forthwith cauſed him to be hanged by the necke out of a lodging in the ſame ſtatehouſe where he had not long before ſate as Gouernour. The Tartarian after that, ſwimming ouer the riuer, and courſing a little aboue Genge, found Emanguli Chan with his B wife, and all his familie, and a great part of the nobilitie of Genge in a valley hunting the wild boore, and aſſailing him, put him to flight, tooke from him his wife, al the ladies, & many ſlaues; and ſlew many of the reſt that were come thither to ſee the ſport: and after that, rode on to Genge, which he tooke, and yeelded it wholly to the furie and luſt of his barbarous ſouldiers, who left no manner of inhumane crueltie vnattempted, in ſatisfying their immoderat and barbarous affections. And ſo being loaded with the ſpoiles, & weary with the ſlaughter of their enemies, they returned merrily toward Siruan: & paſſing again ouer Canac, came to the higher ſide of Eres into certain low champaigns, enuironed about with hils, & there hauing pitched their tents, without any feare ſetled themſelues to ſleepe and to reſt their wearie bodies.

Ares Chan hanged at Sumachia.

Emanguli Chan taken, & Genge ſacked by the Tartarians.

In the meane time, and long before theſe actions, were newes come to the Perſian court of C all the Turks proceedings: whereupon the Perſian king hauing gathered new forces, had diſ-patched Emir Hamze Mirize his eldeſt ſonne with 12000 ſouldiers to paſſe into Siruan, to ſee what hurt the enemy had done, and to attempt the reuenge of the forepaſſed iniuries; but aboue all things to puniſh the villany of them of Sechi, and the other cities of Siruan, that not induced with any neceſſit y, had ſo voluntarily yeelded themſelues to follow the obedience and religion of the Turks. The Perſian Prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued ſonne, was on his way towards Siruan, vnder the guiding and gouernment of Mirize Salmas, chiefe of the Sultans, and had now left behind them the countries of Ardouil and Carabach, when he was certified by the aduertiſe-ments come from Ares Chan, of the arriuall of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians, D and was thereby at the firſt ſtrucken into a great quandarie, and almoſt out of comfort: yet prickt forward with an honourable deſire of glorie and reuenge, hee proſecuted his intended enterpriſe for Siruan, and haſtening his iourney, came to Eres long before the king his father thought he could haue ſo done. This his notable celerity ſerued him to great purpoſe, for that Caitas Baſſa was boldly gone out of the fortreſſe, and went ſpoiling the country, carrying away with him whatſoeuer he met withall, and committing ſuch inſolencies as hungrie ſoldiers beyond all honeſtie vſe to do in ſtrange and fruitfull countries. But when he was in the midſt of theſe ſpoiles, and leaſt feared the enemy, he was ſuddenly aſſailed by the Prince, and hauing no means to eſcape his fury in this extremitie, after a fierce and bloudy battell (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet ſhewed many effects of valor) he was there ſlaine with all his ſol-E diers, leauing the fortreſſe, the ſpoiles, and the country committed to his cuſtodie, free to the pleaſure of the victor: which the Perſian Prince hauing once againe gotten into his poſſeſſi-on, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillerie that were left in the fort by Muſtapha, and preſently ſent them to Casbin to his father.

Eres recouerd by the Perſians.

The Prince encouraged with ſo happie a beginning, leauing his mother at Eres, followed on his iourney toward Sulachia, but by the way deſcending the hils, he diſcouered where the Tartarians lay encamped. Whereupon he ſtood in great doubt, whether to aduenture vpon ſo mightie an enemie, or to content himſelfe with the victorie he had alreadie gotten, and ſo to returne into Perſia: to returne he thought it too great a ſhame, and choſe rather to aduenture himſelfe to moſt manifeſt perill. And therefore deſcending the hill, and drawing nigh the F enemie, he perceiued that the armie was all laid downe to reſt, and that their horſes were ſome couched, ſome ſtanding, but al vnſadled: wherupon without any ſtay ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, he pricked forward with all his hoaſt, and moſt terribly aſſaulted the Tartarians, now buried in their ſpoiles and ſleep; and hauing ſlaine their firſt and ſecond watch, although with ſome loſſe, among the tumultuarie ſouldiers he made an vniuerſall confuſion and ſlaughter, putting ſome to flight, killing others, and taking diuers of them captiues. Among whom was their Generall Abdilcherai, who was taken aliue, and ſent to the king. G Sumachia beſieged by the Perſian Prince.

After theſe victories, the Perſian prince ſcoured to Sumachia, and compaſſed the city round about, wherein the Turkiſh Baſſa Oſman ſat as Gouernour, to the reproch of Perſia; and there encamping himſelfe, ſent word to Oſman, That if he would yeeld himſelfe, he would let him depart with life and goods: otherwiſe, if he would obſtinatly hold it out, and not yeeld the citie, which he ſo vniuſtly poſſeſſed, he ſhould be conſtrained to ſurrender it by force, & his life withall. Oſman who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but ſtil hoped of their returne, thought it beſt to entertaine the Prince with faire words vntill their comming; and therefore gaue him courteous anſwer, that he was very ready to yeeld vp the city; but withall intreated him, that he would ſtay but for three dayes, and grant him time to put all things in H readineſſe, that ſo he might freely depart, as it had pleaſed him in courteſie to offer. The prince glad of ſuch an anſwer, ſuppoſing it to haue proceeded of a ſincere meaning, expected of the Turke the performance thereof. But Oſman meaning nothing leſſe, than to commit himſelfe to the faith of his enemie, and ſeeing that the Tartarians whom he looked for, appeared not, hee reſolued to ſaue himſelfe by ſecret flight; doubting, as hee had good reaſon, that if he ſhould longer ſtay, to be betraied by the inhabitants of the citie themſelues: and therefore ſomewhat before the aſſigned term of three the daies appointed for the ſurrendring of the citie, he by the help of a darke night, and the couert of the high and rough crags, with great ſilence withdrew himſelfe out of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his ſubſtance, and ſo in ſafety arriued at Derbent.

Sumachia yeelded vnto the Prince.

The next morning the inhabitants of Sumachia opened the gates of the citie to the I Prince: who ſeeing their infidelitie, firſt by giuing of entertainment to Oſman, and now by helping him to eſcape, without giuing him any knowledge thereof, did put in execution the effects of his wrath & indignation, which euen at Casbin he had conceiued in his mind againſt them; and with great crueltie did puniſh the miſerable and vnfortunate citiſens, laying their houſes euen with the ground, raſing both the old and new wals of that citie, of late ſo deſired a receit for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence, he ſtood in doubt, Whether to go on to Derbent, or to returne to Perſia: the ſtrength of that citie, the approch of Winter, and the long iourney he was to take homeward, perſuaded him to lay aſide the enterpriſe for Derbent: whereupon he reſolued to returne to Casbin; yet firſt to make his returne by them of Eres and Sechi, and vpon them as vpon rebels to inflict well deſerued puniſhment. So making his pre- K ſent repaire thither, ſpared neither ſex nor age, nor any condition of perſons, but vpon them al poured forth his furious indignation, without exception. Which done, he with his aforeſaid mother Begum, and his armie, though ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to Casbin.

Abdilcherai beloued of the Perſian queene.

Young Abdilcherai the Tartarian was kept ſafe in the kings palace at Casbin, but with ſuch eaſie impriſonment as was agreeable to his calling: which was day by day ſo inlarged, as that he ſeemed not to liue as a priſoner, but rather as a companion of thoſe of the court, & as it were in apparant libertie. By which occaſion hauing inſinuated himſelfe into the loue of Begum the kings wife, he ſpent his time in courting her, and ſhe again in entertaining of him in all ſecret and couert manner. Yet theſe their mutual affections and interchangeable fauors paſſed not ſo L ſecretly, but that in the court and all ouer the citie it was a rife report, That the ſhameleſſe ladie, prodigall of her honor, had participated both her bed and her ſelfe with the Tartarian priſoner. Howbeit neither the king nor the prince knew any thing of it. But the king perceiuing the yong gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely ſtature, & withal nobly born (for he gaue it out that hee was the brother of Tatar Chan) perſuaded himſelfe, that it would ſtand with the great good of his ſtate, of a captiue to make him his ſon in law, by giuing him his daughter in mariage: wherby he was in good hope there might grow ſuch an amitie and vnion between the Tartarian Præcopenſes, and himſelfe, as that they would from thenceforth not only refuſe to fauor Amurath in thoſe wars, but alſo become enemies vnto him, and in the fauor of Perſia turne their arms and affections againſt him. Which his deepe M and conſiderate purpoſe ſo diſpleaſed the Sultans of Casbin, that they ſought by all meanes they could poſſibly deuiſe to auert the king from that ſo ſtrange a policie: but all in vaine, for the king being fully reſolued, and now vpon the point to make a concluſion of the marriage: the Sultans entering into the palace with their followers, and finding there the vnfortunate

The Perſian Queene made away.

A Tartarian, ran him through the body, and cutting off his priuie members, flapped them vpon his mouth after a moſt barbarous and filthie manner. It is reported, that the Queene was then alſo murdered by them: certaine it is, that the poore ladie neuer after that day ſaw the light of the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publicke intereſt, is not certainly knowne. Vpon theſe murders ſprung vp many troubles, and much ciuile diſſention, threatning the vtter confuſion of the Perſian kingdome, to the ſingular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous diſorders the king by brideling his owne affections, and the motions of his ſonne Emir Hamze Mirize, wel appeaſed, procuring at laſt a perfect vnitie, as then moſt neceſſarie for the defence of his kingdome.

Oſman Baſſa being in Derbent (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Siruan) B ceaſed not with all carefulneſſe to deuiſe what he poſſibly could, for the aſſuring of that country (of late woon, and now againe almoſt loſt) vnder the gouernment of Amurath. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof, together with his owne ſafety, he thought it good to enter into friendſhip with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of Brus. With this man did Oſman practiſe many tokens of good will, & he again interchangeably towards Oſman: whereupon there aroſe great friendſhip betweene them, at leſtwiſe in outward apparance: whereunto in ſhort time there was added a ſtrait knot of alliance: for that Oſman tooke to wiſe a daughter of the ſaid Sahamals, the greateſt ſigne of his ſincere loue towards him. Neuertheleſſe ſhortly after Oſman vpon ſome reaſonable coniectures began to ſuſpect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire ſhew of friendſhip he made towards him, might for all that receiue ſome C ſecret order from the Perſian king, to betray him, & to free the city from the Turks, and ſo to reduce all that prouince vnto the antient deuotion: in which iealous ſuſpition hee was fully confirmed by the ſpeeches of his wife, the daughter of Sahamal; who rauiſhed with the honor, valor, & riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that ſhe knew deuiſed againſt him, but frankly told him, That her father being ſecretly reconciled to the Perſian king, held friendſhip with him, and that letters went betweene them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of Siruan. Hereupon the Baſſa perſuaded himſelfe, that all the friendſhip of Sahamal was but deepe diſſimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuertheles he made ſhew vnto his wife, as if he had made no ſuch reckoning of it as indeed hee did, but kept it in ſtore to his owne ſafetie, and the deſtruction of Sahamal, D whom for all that he ſtill entertained with all honor and kindneſſe due vnto a moſt louing father in law. But to preuent the malicious purpoſe of Sahamal, hauing inuited him according to the cuſtome to a certain ſolemne feaſt, he acquainted certaine companies of his moſt truſtie & valiant ſouldiers with his determination, enioyning them, that as ſoone as Sahamal was entred into his court, euen in the very diſmounting from his horſe they ſhould all fal vpon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the ſword. Which his cruell command was by them accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his horſe being ſlain, and all his followers murdered, when forthwith were ſent forth by Oſman two thouſand horſemen to ſpoile and ſacke all the countrie of the ſaid Georgian Lord, to the great maruell and aſtoniſhment both of far and neere. The Perſian king hearing of theſe news, tooke the matter grieuouſly, as foreſeeing that the recouerie of that country and prouince of Siruan would proue a matter of great difficultie, and fearing greatly that it would ſtill remaine (as indeed it doth) in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks attempts againſt the Perſians in Siruan this yeare 1578, wherein they loſt aboue ſeuentie thouſand men, deuoured partly with the ſword, and partly with famine, & the other miſeries of war. And ſo Winter comming on very ſharply, euery man withdrew himſelfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, vntill the comming on of the next Spring.

The conſultations of Amurath

Amurath aduertiſed by letters from Muſtapha, of all that had hapned in the late expedition againſt the Perſians, vpon theſe proſperous ſucceſſes (which the Baſſa had for the aduancing of his own credit deſcribed to be far greater than indeed they were) began to caſt many deuiſes in his head, touching ſuch matters as were to be attempted the next yere. And firſt he thought it neceſſary to ſend his forces againe into Siruan, to recouer ſuch places as were firſt conquered by Muſtapha, but afterward againe ſubdued by the Perſian, ſo to eſtabliſh his gouernment in that countrie. But vpon better conſideration, he ceaſed further to thinke of that matter, for the great hope he had conceiued of the aid that was promiſed him by Tatar Chan, who had faithfully aſſured

aſſured both him and Oſman, that he would ouerrun that prouince anew, and do great matters in G furtherance of the Turks deſignes: all which for all that fell out to be but windie words: yet in reſpect of this hope hee laied Siruan aſide, and committed the defence thereof to the falſe promiſes of the Tartarian, and the valour of Oſman. And pleaſing his ambitious deſires with more haughtie thoughts, he began to deuiſe with himſelfe, for ſending his armie directly to Tauris, there to erect a fortreſſe; which being ſtrongly fortified and furniſhed with a garriſon of moſt valiant ſouldiers, ſhould neuer be again ſubdued by all the power of Perſia; and by this meanes to keepe in ſubiection all thoſe great countries betweene Tauris and Erzirum.
Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increaſed by the perſuaſion of others, very inward with him; euery man being almoſt of opinion, That it was an eaſie matter for ſo great an hoaſt in few daies to performe that ſeruice, and to pierce, not only H into Tauris, but farther to paſſe whetherſoeuer he would deſire. Yet after he had more deeply conſidered of an enterpriſe of ſo great importance, and with more indifferent iudgement compared his owne forces with his enemies, he began to finde many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious deſires he at the firſt ſaw not: for beſide the length and tediouſneſſe of the iourney, hee doubted that in ſending his armie for Tauris, it might be on the one ſide aſſailed by the Georgians (of whoſe obedience he had as yet no great aſſurance) & on the other ſide by the Perſians, & ſo brought into great danger; which he was alwaies to feare, whenſoeuer he ſhould haue occaſion to ſend new ſupplies vnto the fortreſſe by him intended at Tauris. Whereupon laying aſide all his former conceits, as too eager and perilous, he reſolutely concluded with himſelfe, firſt to make ſure his owne borders, and afterwards by little I and little to enter into the enemies country, ſtil fortifying in conuenient places as he went; and ſo ſurely, although but ſlowly, to triumph ouer his enemies, rather than by thruſting his armie headlong vpon vncertainties into places ſtrongly fenced both by nature & the power of moſt mightie enemies, to be inforced with ſhame to abandon the enterpriſe ſo haſtily begun.

Muſtapha careful to put in execution Amurath his command.

Of this his reſolution hee aduertiſed Muſtapha by writing; giuing him in charge, againſt the next Spring to prouide all ſuch things as ſhould be neceſſarie for the building of certaine forts vpon the way that leadeth from Erzirum into Georgia: that hauing made thoſe waies ſafe, and brought the people vnder his obedience, hee might afterwards attempt greater matters.
Whereupon Muſtapha preſently directed forth precepts to the cities of Aleppo, of Damaſco, Caraemit, and other places of Soria and Meſopotamia, for the taking vp of cunning workmen, K of pioners, & ſuch like, to the number of twentie thouſand: and likewiſe wrot to all the countries, out of which hee had raiſed his armie the laſt yeare, That all their ſouldiers (yea and in greater number alſo) ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the next Spring, to returne to the warres.
The rumor whereof he cauſed to be ſpread euen as far as Ægypt. He commanded alſo the taxes and tenths of thoſe countries to be collected, & further vſed the Chambers of Aleppo, and other places, for ſuch maſſes of mony as he thought neceſſarie for theſe purpoſes.

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, ſent (as we haue before ſaid) by Muſtapha to Amurath at Conſtantinople, in doubtful hope, expecting the end for which they were both ſent vnto the court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan damnable a change of his religion, although he knew he ſhould therefore be depriued of his ſtate: but proteſting his obedience at all times to Amurath, and his loue to his brother, requeſted only, that he might but as a priuate man goe and liue in his countrey, there to be buried amongſt his anceſtours. Which his requeſt the Turkiſh Emperour referred to the diſcretion of Manucchiar, to do therein as he ſaw good: who conſented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchia was circumciſed, and the name of Muſtaffa giuen him, with the title of the Baſſa and Gouernour of Altunchala, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Chriſtian, committed vnto him, and ſo both returned into their owne M countries.

Emanguli Chan taketh vpon him the defence of Siruan.

Now in the Perſian court at Gasbin, were many conſultations had for the repreſſing of the inuaſions of the Turks. And among others carefull of thoſe matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernour of Genge, doubting to loſe his honourable gouernement, by reaſon of the late ſacke of his citty, and ſpoile of his country by the Tartarian, by thoſe plots that were daily in contriuing for
the

A the ſending of men into Siruan to impeach the deſignements of Oſman Baſſa, and if it were poſſible, to driue him out of Derbent; tooke occaſion to offer vnto the King, vpon paine of his head to defend Siruan, and not to ſuffer Oſman the Turke to attempt any new fortifications, or further conqueſts in that Prouince. Of which his offer the King accepted, and thereupon the gouernment of Genge, and guarding of the countrey of Siruan againſt the forces of Oſman, was frankely committed vnto him: And commandement giuen to the Gouernours of Tauris, Reiuan, and Naſſiuan, and to diuers other captaines that were neereſt, to be readie at all times with their power to aſſiſt Emanguli Chan, if it ſhould fortune either the Tartarians or Turkes, with any great power to enter into Siruan: which order ſo taken, was thought ſufficient for the ſecuritie of that prouince.

But how to protect the Georgian Countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, euery man being almoſt of opinion, That ſome great power of the Turks ſhould be ſent thither, for the more aſſurance of the conqueſt thereof alreadie begun, and for the ſuccour of the fortreſſe at Teflis, which muſt needs otherwiſe fall againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter ſo troubled the Perſian King, as that he ſeemed to haue bent his whole counſels and thoughts thereupon: when Simon a Georgian a famous captaine (ſometime priſoner with Iſmahel the late King, at Cahaca, and by the familiaritie hee had with him, ſeduced from the Chriſtian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamas, choſen to liue depriued of his libertie and ſtate) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the Kings hand ſuch helpe as he had long deſired, for the recouerie of his dominion vſurped by Dauid, otherwiſe called Daut Chan, his yonger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Chriſtian religion) offered now vnto the King his faithfull ſeruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Countrey wherein Teflis ſtood (being in right, part of his owne Inheritance) againſt the Turks: reproouing by way of diſgrace, his younger brother of cowardiſe, and promiſing the performance of great matters in himſelfe, both for the defence of that euill defended countrey, and further annoying of the enemie. With great content did the Perſian King conſent to the requeſt of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdome which he poſſeſſed before whileſt he was a Chriſtian: and ſent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, with fiue thouſand horſemen, and certaine pieces of artillerie taken at Eres, when B Caietas Baſſa was ſlaine. Simon afterwards comming to Georgia, was joyfully receiued of his countreymen, and there preſſed about three thouſand ſouldiers of his owne and of his neighbours; excuſing himſelfe that he was become a Perſian, not becauſe he preferred the Mahometane ſuperſtition before the Chriſtian Religion; but only ſo to be deliuered from his long impriſonment, and by that meanes to maintaine his eſtate. And in this order were the affaires of Georgia aſſured and ſtrengthned in the beſt manner that might then be.

Now began the Spring to approch, and euery man prepared himſelfe to the diſcontinued trauels of the wars begun: and now were met together at Erzirum, out of all the wonted prouinces, all the Turks forces, with all things neceſſarie for the intended war. With this armie, in all things equall with the firſt, Muſtapha ſet forward, and in twelue dayes came to Chars, not perceiuing in his ſouldiers any ſigne of diſcontentment at all. And foraſmuch as here they were to ſtay, and to fortifie both with walls and ditches that ruinated Citie, and that with as great ſpeed as was poſſible; there was no remedie, but that beſide the pioners and enginiers that were brought for that purpoſe, many of the Spaoglani, yea and of the Ianizaries alſo, muſt be ſet to worke. Whereupon they all ſuddenly in a tumult, began with bitter proteſtations to tell the General, That their ſtipends wherwith it pleaſed the Sultan to fauor them, were not beſtowed vpon them to imploy their forces and vertues in ſuch ſeruile works; but onely with their ſwords and other weapons, to exerciſe that force and hardineſſe for which they were eſteemed worthie of that honour. Whereunto the Generall anſwered in moſt haughtie termes, and not yeelding one jot to their inciuilitie, but vſing all meanes of authoritie and terrour, brought them to worke ſo much as hee deſired. So that within the ſpace of 23 dayes the towers and walls were erected, the ditches digged, the artillerie orderly planted vpon the walls, and the water brought round about it. Many inconueniences happened in the armie while they were buſie in this worke; and namely vpon the 25 day of Auguſt, when they had almoſt euen finiſhed the whole building, the ſoldiers endured a moſt ſudden cold by reaſon of the ſnow that then fell in great aboundance.

1579

The meeting together of the Turks armie at Erzirum.

Chars fortified in 23 dayes ſpace.

Snows at Chars in Auguſt.

Haſſan Baſſa ſent with twentie thouſand to the ſuccoring of Teflis.

Chars thus fortified, the Generall reſolued to ſend ſuccors into Georgia to Teflis; without which it was moſt certaine that the fortreſſe would be yeelded to the Georgians: but in what ſort to relieue it he remained doubtfull. To ſend part of his armie with ſome valiant captaine ſeemed dangerous, and to go himſelfe with all his forces, would ſound (as he thought) to his diſcredit with his great Lord and maſter; whom he had already made beleeue, that he had ſubdued the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience and deuotion. In this ambiguitie, the deſire he had to preſerue his credit with Amurath preuailed: and ſo hee made choice of Haſſan Baſſa ſonne to Muhamet principall Viſier of the Court, a gallant gentleman, and of great valour, to whome he deliuered betweene eighteene and twentie thouſand ſoldiers; joining vnto him one Reſuan Captaine of certaine aduenturers that voluntarily offered themſelues to follow the forces of Haſſan; aſſigning vnto him likewiſe fortie thouſand duckets, and many loads of rice, meale, and barley, with other things neceſſarie both for dyet and war, and ſo ſent him away for Teflis.

The Perſians aſſaile the Turks, and make of the a great ſlaughter.

The Perſians ouerthrown, and Alichuli Chan taken.

The miſerie of the Turks in gariſon at Teflis.

Haſſan with this charge ſet forward, fully reſolued to put theſe ſuccours into Teflis, or to loſe all: and at length came to the famous ſtrait of Tomanis, where the ouergrowne woods on the one ſide, and the deep vallies & craggie rocks on the other, would aſtoniſh a right conſtant beholder. When vpon the ſudden, the Perſians and the Georgians, vnder the conduct of Aliculi Chan and Simon, at vnawares ſet vpon the Turkes, and joined battell with them. For theſe two valiant captaines remaining for the moſt part in the borders of Teflis and Tomanis with 8000 ſoldiers, waiting for ſome opportunitie to annoy either them of the the fort of Teflis, or elſe ſuch as ſhould come to their ſuccors; vnderſtanding by their eſpials, of the comming of Haſſan with this aid, had ſcattered themſelues all alongſt the ſaid ſtraight, in hope there to aſſaile the Turks, and holpen by the aduantage of the place, to driue them headlong into the deep valley, and at once to bereaue them both of their goods and life. But Haſſan carefull of nothing more than how to auoid that danger, choſe rather to make his journey through the thicke woods, and ſo as he might to eſcape the ambuſh that the enemie might lay for him vpon that ſtraight paſſage. And ſo entring with his armie into the wood, which he was to haue left vpon his left hand, to diſcouer what might be plotted againſt him, he was hardly charged by the enemy, and conſtrained to fight with a thouſand windings and turnings in & out, through a thouſand crooked paths and doubtfull cranks, in a moſt confuſed medly, with great ſlaughter of his men: who not accuſtomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the ſcituation of the place, were in the skirmiſh driuen ſo far, that downe they fell, and being not able to recouer themſelues, were preſently ſlaine. And thus with much ado he at length paſſed the ſtrait of Tomanis. Haſſan deeming himſelfe much diſgraced, by ſuffering his enemies, in number ſo far inferior, to haue done him ſo much harme, and ſo to haue eſcaped his hands; and further, conſidering that in ſuch places ſleights & ſtratagems more auaile than open forces; burning with deſire of reuenge would needs ſtay neere vnto thoſe ſtraits, as if it had been to refreſh his wearied army, but indeed to try if the Perſians would aduenture againe to trouble him, or no: and appointed Reſuan Baſſa with certain bands of the ſoldiers of Græce, and of his own aduenturers, to lie in ambuſh within the couert of the ſtrait, attentiue to euery ſtir of the enemie. Two dayes the Turkes armie lay thus diuided, and were now reſolued the third day to remoue thence towards Teflis: when as the Perſian captaines Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainely imagining that this ſtay of the Turkes was for feare of the Perſians, fooliſhly returned and gaue a freſh onſet vpon the flanke of Haſſans ſquadrons. Who forthwith raiſing all his ſouldiers, and giuing a ſigne to Reſuan, withall ſpeed compaſſed in his enemies, and ſtraightening them on both ſides, tooke ſome of them aliue, cut in pieces other ſome, and put all the reſt to flight. Among others that were taken aliue, was Aliculi Chan the Perſian captaine, who ouer raſhly charging vpon the face of Haſſan, fell into his hand. The next day following (being the eleuenth day after Haſſans departure from Chars) he joyfully arriued at Teflis, where he found among the poore beſieged Turks many miſeries; whereof ſome were alreadie dead, and ſome yet ſicke: for they were ſo plagued with famine, that they not onely deuoured their horſes, but euen the very skinnes of the ſame horſes, of ſheepe, and of dogs, and in ſuch moſt miſerable wants had paſſed the time: whom Haſſan at his arriual comforted with gifts and good words; exhorting them to perſiſt conſtant in the ſeruice of their King, whoſe honour (as hee ſaid) was neuer more than there to be reſpected. And for as much as the ſouldiers of the Fort did with one voyce requeſt

A Haſſan to appoint them a new gouernor, becauſe they did all miſlike Mahamet Baſſa; who the laſt yeare was left by the General in that fort; Haſſan remoued the ſaid Mahamet, and put Amet Baſſa in his place: and ſo after he had filled vp the places of the dead ſoldiers with a new ſupply, and ſet all things in order, he tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and cuſtodie of that fort to their truſt and valour. Haſſan returning from Teflis, and being without any trouble come to the ſtrait of Tomanis, was aduertiſed by his ſcouts, That it was ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the enemie, and ſo ſhut vp with artillerie, as that it was not to be paſſed through: for Simon thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Haſſan would returne that way, had ſo belayed that ſtrait, as that the Turks could not without moſt aſſured loſſe paſſe the ſame: which thing much troubled the Baſſa, and filled his head with many conceits, how he might make his journey ſome B other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to do, or which way to turne himſelf: Aliculi Chan the Perſian (who to purchaſe his libertie could haue bin content to haue done any thing) offered Haſſan to ſhew him a ſhort and ſafe cut, whereby he might without danger paſſe with his armie out of that troubleſome country; yet couenanting before, that he ſhould promiſe him to ſet him at libertie for his ſo good ſeruice. Which his requeſt the Baſſa did not ſticke in large manner to promiſe, although he afterwards to his great diſhonor performed not the ſame. So bending his journey on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through ſtrange and vncouth wayes, out of thoſe woods and dangers, not meeting ſo much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Perſian duke well hoping for his libertie, put the Turke in minde of his promiſe; he with deepe and feigned ſighs proteſted, That he was right ſorrie that he could not performe what he had promiſed to do for him, foraſmuch as it lay not in his power to ſet any man at libertie, that was taken in battell by the ſoldiers of his great lord and ſoueraigne: yet gaue him his faith, that ſo far as his intreaties and fauors with the Generall Muſtapha could preuaile, he would vſe all the moſt earneſt meanes he could, to procure his libertie and returne to his owne countrey.

Simon the Georgian perceiuing that the Turks were remoued, imagined forthwith, that they had taken this new way: but being afterward certified by his faithfull ſpies, that it was ſo indeed, he ran all headlong, & as it were deſperat, to meet with this ſo happy an army. And all inflamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turks, he fell vpon the taile of the Turkiſh hoſt: which with vnmeaſurable furie he wholly deſtroyed, leading away with him all the people, all the horſes, and all the treaſure of Mahamet Baſſa which he brought from Teflis, and all the treaſure of Haſſan Baſſa likewiſe. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon moſt greedily ſought for, he was ſent away in the front of the armie, ſo that he was not to be reſcued. Haſſan holding on his way, came to Chars in the ſpace of eight dayes after his departure from Teflis, and there preſented vnto Muſtapha the General, the Perſian captaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the dangers he had indured, & whatſoeuer els had hapned in that expedition. Aliculi the vnfortunate Perſian was by the commandement of Muſtapha carried to Erzirum, & there in the caſtle committed to priſon. Not long after, Muſtapha returned himſelfe alſo to the ſaid citie of Erzirum, with his army ſore weakned and diſcontented, which was there preſently by him diſcharged.

Simon deſtroieth the rereward of Haſſans Armie, & taketh from him his treaſure Muſtapha returneth to Erzirum, & there diſchargeth his Armie.

About the ſame time that theſe things were in doing, Amurath to make a ſafer and more eaſie paſſage for his forces into Georgia, ſent Vluzales his Admiral with a great fleet into the Euxine ſea to Mengrelia, called in antient time Cholchis; who entering the famous riuer of Phaſis (now Faſſa) there fortified, and layd ſuch a beginning, that it is now one of the Turks proud Beglerbegſhips, although thoſe fortifications ſhortly after the departure of the Admiral, were for the preſent againe by the Mengrelians demoliſhed. And this was the end of the ſtirres of this yeare 1579.

Of all theſe ſucceſſes Muſtapha afterwards ſent aduertiſements to the court to Amurath, recounting vnto him the fortifying of Chars, the deſerts of Haſſan, as well for the ſuccouring of Teflis, as for the taking of Aliculi the Perſian. And becauſe the ſaid General had the yere before perſuaded Amurath, That the country of Georgia and the people thereof were brought vnder his obedience, to the end that he ſhould not maruell at ſo many loſſes and ſo many battels, and therby doubt of ſome falſe informations, he declared vnto him, that al theſe troubles were not raiſed by the natural and homebred Georgians, but by two certain captains Aliculi and Simon ſent out of Perſia, who had made all theſe ſtirs: of which one of them now remained with him in priſon, for him to determine of at his pleaſure. With great delight did the Turkiſh Empe-

four read all that Muſtapha had written, and by two of his Gentlemen vſhers ſent to Haſſan a battle-axe all gilt and ſet full of ſtones, a targuet of gold and pearle, and a rich garment of cloath of gold, in reward of his good ſeruice, for which he greatly commended him: and withall gaue order, That Aliculi ſhould be kept where he was in the caſtle of Erzirum, in diligent and ſafe cuſtodie.

Theſe inuaſions of the Turks much troubled the Perſian King in his court at Casbin, conſidering, that now they had both throughly acquainted themſelues with all the paſſages into Georgia (in the difficultie and roughneſſe whereof conſiſted the chiefe defence of that prouince) as alſo that diuers of the Georgian Princes were more than inclining vnto the Turkes ſeruice, ſo that he could not but iuſtly feare, that his enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble cities of Media the greater, yea and peraduenture euen vnto Tauris before any of the reſt. Which his care of foreine inuaſion was doubled with domeſticall feares: Mirize Salmas his chiefe Viſier, and vpon whom he moſt reſted, ſtil filling his head with a jealous ſuſpition, That Abas Mirize his ſon (made gouernor of Heri by Tamas his grandfather) was about in theſe troubles with the Turk to proclaim himſelf king of Perſia, to the great ignominie of his father, and preiudice of Emir Hamze his eldeſt brother, the worthy and vndoubted heire of that kingdome. This Mirize Salmas (according to his longing deſire) had married a daughter of his to the ſaid Emir Hamze, with the conſent of the king his father: but yet not content with that honour, ceaſed not continually with ambitious deuiſes, to ſeeke out meanes how to bring to paſſe, that the Perſian eſtate might wholly remaine to his ſonne in law, vndiuided and entire from the participation of his brethren: & therefore little regarding the perils that might happen from the Turks, and blinded with the deſire of his owne greatneſſe, he went about to turne the King (being a man very credulous and inconſiderat) againſt Abas Mirize; either to take him and commit him to priſon, or at leaſt to bereaue him of all authoritie and command. And the better to perſuade the king thereunto, he diſcouered vnto him, how little Abas Mirize his ſonne had reſpected him in diuers occaſions; and that in theſe late wars he had not ſo much as ſent forth one man againſt the Turks, but had forbidden ſuch as were of his iuriſdiction of Heri, to come to Casbin, at ſuch time as they were ſummoned both by letters and commandement, to haue paſſed with Emir Hamze into Siruan; by reaſon whereof not one of them would ſtir a foot, anſwering, That they were enioyned ſo to do by Abas Mirize their lord; who had not only cauſed himſelfe to be called king of Heri, but had giuen it out, that he meant to claime the ſucceſſion in the whole kingdome. Theſe complaints much preuailed with the king, both in reſpect of the loue he bare to Emir Hamze his eldeſt ſonne, and alſo of the credit he gaue to his Viſier: eſpecially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the ſaid Viſier, who as he was very cunning in ſuch practiſes of himſelfe, ſo did he make them much more effectual with the effeminate king, by the meanes of diuers great Ladies, and other deuices that were to him very familiar and vſual. Inſomuch that the King carried away with light beleefe, did continually bethinke himſelfe how to find opportunity to repreſſe the boldneſſe of his diſobedient ſon; not forgetting for all that, to make ſuch preparation againſt the Turks, as ſhould be ſufficient to ſtay their paſſage to Tauris, if they had any purpoſe ſo to do. But leauing the Perſian King to his troubled cogitations for a while, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks General, the great Baſſa Muſtapha.

Muſtapha diſcharged of his Generalſhip, & called home to Conſtantinople.

He now lying at Erzirum, after many troubles abroad, was ſurpriſed and almoſt ouerwhelmed with vnexpected quarrels at home, many grieuous complaints being made of him to Amurath, wherby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalſhip, and to call him to the Court to giue account of his actions. Which ſeemed not to be done without cauſe, he hauing before raiſed a great diſcontentment in the minde of Amurath, by ſending ſuch a ſtrong power to the ſuccors of Teflis: whereby he coniectured, that the affaires of Georgia were not in ſuch ſecuritie as Muſtapha had already informed him they were, & alſo generally offended the minds of the ſoldiers of his armie, who all in an vprore, accuſed him of improuidencie and prodigality, for that now this ſecond yeare he had with ſo much ado gathered together ſuch a number of ſoldiers, to the trouble of the whole empire, and infinit charge of their lord, & yet performed nothing worthy the glory of Amurath, or anſwerable to ſo great a charge. Which complaints although they were of ſome moment, yet would the Turkiſh emperor for the great fauours he bare vnto him his antient Tutor, neuer haue conſtrued them ſo hardly againſt him, A as for the ſame to haue been induced to haue depriued him of his place, if the inueterate enuy of Sinan Baſſa had not miniſtred ſtrength and force to theſe hard accuſations, and ſet (as it were) an edge vpon Amurath to do what he afterwards did.

But foraſmuch as the courſe of time, and proceſſe of the preſent hiſtory, bringeth now forth theſe two mightie champions of the Turks together (the enuious competitors the one of the others honors, who liuing many yeares together, haue left the wofull remembrance of their greatneſſe and valour vnto the world, but eſpecially vnto the afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, the large wounds by them made, as it were yet bleeding) ſtay with me a while, and without griefe, if thou canſt, behold the liuely counterfeits of two ſo great enemies (who both liued within theſe few yeares, and the later of them died but the other day) as they are by the skilfull hand of the cunning workeman moſt perfectly deſcribed, and thus to be ſeene. B

A compariſon betwixt Sinan Baſſa and Muſtapha, two ancient enemies both to themſelues and the Chriſtian common weale.

This Sinan was a moſt antient enemie to Muſtapha, and in all things thought himſelfe his match. For if Muſtapha had ſubdued Cyprus, ſo had he conquered Tripolis, Guletta, with the kingdome of Tunes in Affricke: and if Muſtapha were a man of great courage, and reuerend for his yeares, Sinan would be his equall both in the one and the other, yea and did not ſticke to thinke himſelfe his better too, for that in the enterpriſe of Giamen in Arabia, hee performed ſuch an exploit as Muſtapha neither durſt nor yet knew how to put in execution, ſo carrying away the glorie of that famous conqueſt: for which euer after there was between them a continuall heart burning, one of them enuying at the others glorie, and both in word and deed, as occaſions fell out, in all things oppoſing themſelues one againſt the other. At laſt happens this opportunitie for Sinan: who taking the occaſion of the complaints of ſo many againſt Muſtapha, cauſed a great number of them to frame their ſupplications to Amurath, which he for his part did in moſt malignant manner inforce and exaggerat againſt his old aduerſary; accuſing him, that this ſecond yeare he had moſt manifeſtly ſhewed himſelfe to haue gone vnto the wars not as a worthy General deſirous of noble and honorable enterpriſes, but as a man that would make merchandiſe of bloud, and of his ſoldiers paies; employing the moſt liberal prouiſion of corne and mony, not as rewards of well deſeruing men, not to the erecting of ſuch fabriks as were needfull, and might haue bin built therewithall, but onely to his owne proper gaine, ſo to inrich himſelfe with his peoples loſſes, to the great ſhame of his lord, and conſuming of the publick treaſure: adding hereunto, that if the things done by Muſtapha were well ſearched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vaine, and not done any good either to the Emperor or his ſouldiers, but onely to himſelfe: whom rather than they would follow againe as their Generall, all his people in an vprore ſhewed themſelues ready and willing to aduenture themſelues in any other farre greater labour that by their Lord and Soueraigne ſhould be commanded them.

Sinan accuſeth Muſtapha to Amurath.

Theſe and ſuch like complaints, with the hard opinion alreadie conceiued againſt him by Amurath, were the occaſion why hee reſolued to put him from his place. Beſide that, hee thought it a thing dangerous to his ſtate, to ſuffer one & the ſelfe ſame General any long time to command ouer ſo great armies, deeming it not ſo much for his honour, ſtill to employ one man, as to ſhew that he had varietie and choice of ſubiects, worthy of ſo great a charge. And therfore being deſirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Muſtapha, he ſent the chiefe of his gentlemen porters, with fifteen others, to bring him to the court, with his Chancellor and Treaſurer, to ſhew the accounts of ſuch monies as he had receiued, and to giue vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this meſſenger had Amurath deliuered three diuers letters, which he ſhould warily ſhew as occaſion ſerued: one of them was ſo written of purpoſe, that Muſtapha in the receiuing thereof might by the ſame meſſengers be ſtrangled: in the ſecond was the emperors warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded; & in the third was contained, that Muſtapha ſhould forthwith ſend his Chancellor & Treaſurer to the court by thoſe meſſengers. Muſtapha in the meane time by diuers means, but eſpecially by the guilt of his owne conſcience, venting the diſpleaſure of the Emperor towards him, and ſuſpecting (as the truth was) his life to be by thoſe meſſengers ſought after, at ſuch time as the Captain Porter came to his camp, found many delaies to put him off, and would not in any caſe be ſpoken withall. But when the meſſenger would indure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his preſence, hauing a circle appointed for him, out of which hee and his companions might not ſtir or approch neerer vnto him, the Baſſaes guard ſtanding in arms round about him. The meſſenger perceiuing the Baſſa's warines, wilily pluckt forth the third letters, concerning the ſending of his Chancellor and Treaſurer to the court. Then began the craftie old Baſſa to find many excuſes to haue delayed the matter: but being hardly preſſed by the meſſenger, and ſeeing no other remedie, he with much difficultie deliuered them both, couenanting before with the meſſenger, to haue both their liues ſpared: who comming to Conſtantinople, where forthwith clapt faſt into the tower called Iadicula, as there to haue been ſeuerely examined of all the doings of the Baſſa. But Muſtapha after long delay comming at length to Conſtantinople, the ninth of Aprill in the Spring following, and vſing the mighty and potent mediation of diuers great ladies and other his gracious friends in court, preuailed ſo much in that corrupt gouernment, as that he was againe at length receiued into the fauour of Amurath, without any further proceeding againſt him, his Chancellor, or Treaſurer, who by his meanes were afterwards alſo inlarged and ſet at liberty: yet was he neuer after admitted to thoſe honors, which hee perſuaded himſelfe were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithfull ſeruice of long time done to the Othoman Emperours.

Io. Leuncla in ſupplement. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 79.

Muſtapha by the mediation of certain great ladies appeaſeth the diſpleaſure of Amurath.

In this time that Muſtapha was Generall at Erzirum, Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa was treacherouſly ſlaine at Conſtantinople : after whom ſhortly after died alſo Achmet Baſſa, who ſucceeded in his place : ſo that the ſaid ſoueraigne dignity, in honor next vnto the Turkiſh Emperour, was by rightfull ſucceſſion due to Muſtapha the next Baſſa ; but that he was not thought worthie of it by him that might, and of right ought, to haue gratified him therewith, as ſhall be a little hereafter declared, when we haue briefely ſet downe the ſudden and ſtrange death of the ſaid Mubamet the Viſier, worthie in all hiſtories to be regiſtred, as a mirrour for all ſuch as adminiſter iuſtice in ſo great place, to looke vpon. G

The ſtrange death of the great Viſier Baſſa Mubamet

This Baſſa, a man of as great fame as euer was any that had gouernment in the Othoman empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for ſome light cauſes depriued a certaine ſouldier of Conſtantinople, of his yearely penſion, which with many labours and dangers he had gotten to maintain himſelfe; which penſion, the Baſſa beſtowed vpon another ſouldier, ſo that the other poore ſoule remained in miſerie, altogether vnprouided for. Vnto which miſerable eſtate ſeeing himſelfe now brought, and not guilty to himſelfe of any fault worthy ſo great puniſhment, he determined with himſelfe to reuenge the iniury with the bloud of that great Baſſa, and to bereaue him of life, that had bereft him of liuing: which becauſe he could not by any fit means put in execution (by reaſon of the guard of ſlaues that keep the perſon of the Viſier, ſo that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except hee could by ſome means acquaint himſelfe in the Viſiers houſe, & ſo inſinuat himſelfe into his acquaintance; he reſolued to take vpon him the rude habit of thoſe religious which the Turks call Deruiſlars, and after their manner to preſent himſelfe euery morning before the Viſier to aske his almes: and ſo he did, counterfeiting withall a certaine kind of folly and lightneſſe of mind, as do thoſe Deruiſlars, to make the people beleeue, that they contemne all worldly things, as men rauiſhed only with heauenly cogitations; which yet was by ſome that knew him, thought to haue happened in him, through the griefe he had conceiued for the loſſe of his ſtipend. Mubamet not only the firſt time, but alſo at all other times that this counterfeit hypocrite came before him, cauſed him to be comforted with his almes, and as it were with a kind of priuat ſtipend, enioyned him euery morning to come vnto him into the Diuano, and there together with others appointed for the ſame purpoſe, to ſay his deuout praiers, and in ſinging praiſes to their wicked Prophet, to intreat God for his ſaluation : for it is a cuſtome of all the noblemen, that at ordinary houres of praiers, al their prieſts aſſemble themſelues in the Diuano, which is made ready for them, and there all together the Infidell wretches do with their vnclean mouthes mumble vp their ſuperſtitious praiers, or rather moſt abhominable blaſphemies. By this means did this diſſembling companion ſo inſinuat himſelfe into the Viſiers acquaintance, that the counterfet foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleaſure, no man gainſaying either his going in or comming out, but daily ſat in the preſence of the Viſier, and ſo hauing ſaid his praiers, & taken his almes, with all reuerence quietly departed. At laſt when the crafty hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might moſt fitly execute his purpoſe, hauing vtterly reſolued with himſelfe to die, ſo that he might ſatisfie the deſire he had of reuenge, ſo long couertly foſtered in his heart ; hauing conueied a very ſharpe dagger ſecretly into one of his ſleeues, he went according to his cuſtome, to require his almes, with an aſſured reſolution (when hee had ſaid his praiers, and reached out his hands to receiue his woonted almes) ſpeedily to charge vpon the Viſier, and with the dagger to ſtrike him to the heart. According to the accuſtomed manner was the counterfeit hypocrite (for who would euer haue ſuſpected ſo long & ſo traiterous a diſignement) admitted into the Diuano, where Mubamet the Viſier ſat in his houſe, to giue publick audience, & after the vſual manner, before any of the ſuters that attended for anſwers & diſpatch of their buſines ſuſpected any ſuch deceit, he was admitted neere to the Viſier, & ſitting right againſt him, according to his old woont poured out thoſe vaine deuotions which thoſe hypocritical Barbarians vſe to mumble vp in their praiers: which being finiſhed, whileſt the Viſier ſimply reacheth vnto him his woonted almes, the traiterous villain in receiuing it ſuddenly drew out his dagger, and once or twice ſtabbed it into the Viſiers breaſt, out of which ſo deadly wounds guſhed out his bloud and life together. Whereupon the ſtanders by aſtonied with the ſtrangeneſſe of the act, ran in, but lo the old hoary Viſier lay all foiled in his own bloud, deadly pale, and breathing forth his laſt gaſp. The miſchieuous murderer they preſently laid hands vpon, & bound him faſt: but the rumor of the ſtrange fact did by & by flie vnto the emperors ears: who ſuſpecting that ſome of the other great Baſſaes deſiring to mount into

A into that high dignitie, had prouoked the traitor to do this deteſtable act, would needs vnderſtand of the traiterous murderer, what occaſion had moued him ſo trecherouſly to kill his Viſier. Who reſolutely anſwered him, That he did it to deliuer the citie of Conſtantinople from the tyranny of him, by whom hee was vndeſeruedly depriued of his penſion. But when hee could get no other anſwer of him, hee deliuered him into the hands of the ſlaues of the dead Viſier, who with moſt exquiſit torments put him to death.

Mahamet thus dead, after him ſucceeded Achmetes the next Baſſa, who (as is before ſaid) ſhortly after died alſo, ſo that it was now Muſtapha his courſe to ſucceed in that chiefe roome, for that he was the third in the order of the Baſſaes. But when he had vſed all the meanes that he poſſibly could, to haue obtained that ſo honorable a place by order due vnto him, yet could he B not find ſo much grace in the ſight of Amurath his great Lord, as to haue it granted him vnder ſeale, although in effect hee made him ſit as Viſier, and all matters of ſtate were brought vnto him as chiefe Viſier: but in his ſtead the ſeale was ſent to Sinan Baſſa, who was now made Generall for the Perſian warres. Which diſgrace not a little diſcontented Muſtapha, fearing leſt ſome other ſtrange accident ſhould in ſhort time light vpon him.

Sinan Baſſa choſen Generall for the Perſian warre.

After that Muſtapha was thus diſplaced from his Generalſhip, Amurath nominated Sinan Baſſa to be Generall in his ſtead for this expedition againſt the Perſians, and for the preſeruation of Chars and Teflis, giuing him ſoueraigne authority to command, and to ſet in order all ſuch preparations as he ſhould thinke neceſſarie for ſuch enterpriſes as he ſhould thinke good to attempt in his firſt yere: who although by reaſon of his great fauor, he grew haughtie and glorious, yet did he not foreſlow to diſcourſe throughly with himſelfe vpon all his deſignements: and namely, beſide the ſuccouring of Teflis, he determined to build a fort at Tomanis, to aſſure the paſſage thither from Chars; and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Perſian king to ſend Embaſſadors for peace, with ſuch conditions as ſhould be acceptable to Amurath. With theſe and ſuch like diſcourſes did he buſie himſelfe whilſt he was yet making preparation to ſet forwards towards Erzirum.

Of all theſe changes and alterations was the Perſian king aduertiſed, as alſo that this new Turkiſh Generall Sinan was carefull, how this long war might by ſome means be appeaſed, and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occaſion, and by the perſuaſion of Leuent Ogli the Georgian, and of Mirize Salmas the Viſier, hee was induced to ſend embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to demand peace of Amurath. Vpon which reſolution he diſpatched Maxut Chan (of ſome called Maxudes) his embaſſador, with direction that he ſhould go to Sinan, and of him to receiue guides to conduct him to Conſtantinople with letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of all theſe troubles: and in any caſe to conclude vpon it, ſo that hee would be content with Chars and Teflis. With theſe inſtructions the embaſſador departed, & at length arriued at Chars, and ſo came to Erzirum, and was from thence conducted towards Amaſia. But when he came to Siuas, he found Sinan the Generall there encamped, gathering together his armie for the execution of his deſignements: for Sinan vpon the arriual of Muſtapha, departing from Conſtantinople the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, was now come ſo farre on his way. Of the comming of this Embaſſadour, The Turks receiued great ioy, and newes thereof was in poſt ſent by Cicala Baſſa to the court. The Perſian embaſſador enformed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalfe of King Mahamat; and laboured earneſtly to perſuade him, of the equitie of the cauſe, and of his requeſt: declaring vnto him, That foraſmuch as both the Nations were conioyned vnder the law of Mahomet their common Prophet (though there ſeemed ſome ſmall difference not worth thoſe troubles) it were a very inconuenient thing for them to contend among themſelues, and to ſeeke the ouerthrow or vtter deſtruction of one another: and that therefore he was in good hope to obtaine of Amurath this deſired peace, if he had no other cauſe wherwith he found himſelfe agrieued, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he beſought the Generall, that he would with ſafe conuoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were poſſible, theſe bloudie wars might take end; at the very report whereof, the reſt of the world reioiced, and ſtood attentiuely waiting to ſee what would be the iſſue thereof.

This embaſſador, Sinan entertained after the beſt manner the rudeneſſe of his nature would afoord: and thinking that the very fame of his valor, had wrought in the minds of his enemies this reſolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the Embaſſador a ſure conuoy to conduct him to Conſtantinople; and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, repreſenting vnto him what great and important matters (hee hoped) might G now be obtained. But before he diſmiſſed the ſaid embaſſadour, he aduiſed him not to goe to Amurath, without reſolution to offer vnto him ſome great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him all that country which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath verie well, that he was reſolued in himſelfe, not to yeeld ſo much as one hand breadth of that ground which hee had woon with the ſword. Which motion of the proud Baſſa ſo troubled the Embaſſador, that fearing he ſhould not be able to conclude any thing, he ſtood in doubt, whether to proceed on his iourney to Conſtantinople, or to returne backe againe into Perſia: but conſidering better what belonged to his dutie in ſo weightie a buſineſſe, and hoping to receiue more reaſonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himſelfe, H hee gaue large words to Sinan, and ſo with a ſafe conuoy departed from Siuas, and by long iournies came to Scutari, and ſo paſſing ouer that little ſtrait, the fourth of Auguſt arriued at Conſtantinople.

The preparations of the Perſian king againſt the Turks.

The Perſian king in the mean time, ſtirred vp with the report of the Turks preparations; to cauſe it to be noiſed, that hee likewiſe intended ſome important matters, commanded all the Chans and Gouernors of his kingdome, to meet together with all their forces at Tauris, where hee himſelfe with the Prince Emir Hamze his ſon met them. And after many conſultations there had for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh inuaſion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant tn attempt) he reſolued to ſend ſouldiers into Georgia towards Teflis, whether of neceſſitie ſuccours muſt be ſent by the Turks to them of the fort: and withall, determined alſo I to goe himſelfe with all his armie from Tauris to Caracach, a place very commodious and neere, to guard both Tauris and Siruan, being ſcituat euen in the middeſt betweene the one and the other; and there to expect the remouing of Sinan, whoſe ambitious nature the king knowing, doubted that he to ſurmount Muſtapha, would attempt ſome greater enterpriſe; yea peraduenture to run euen vpon Tauris. But when it came to the point that he ſhould ſend ſome of his captaines into Georgia, he made choice of ſuch as had beſt experience of thoſe countries, and were neereſt vnto them: with whom he ſent Tocomac alſo, and the reſt whoſe ſeruice hee had before vſed againſt the Turkes; commanding them to ioyne their forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes poſſible to annoy the enemie: whom if they ſhould perceiue to bend for Tauris, they ſhould not faile to follow him; to the end they might ioyne together K with him, and ſo incounter the enemies army. All thoſe captaines were reſolute men, and led with them ten thouſand ſouldiers; which being ioined with them of Georgia, amounted to the number of thirteene thouſand: who arriuing at Genge, gaue knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were ready to do great matters.

Now was the Perſian Embaſſadour with all due honour receiued at Conſtantinople, where he was honorably entertained by the great Baſſaes of the court; but eſpecially by Muſtapha, who within two daies after ſuddenly died, of a ſurfeit taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleaſant drinke which the Turks vſe made of water and ſugar:) but moſt men thought him to haue poiſoned himſelfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be againe inflamed by the new complaints of the Perſian Embaſſador L againſt him, for that he in the time of his Generalſhip, had diſhonourably ſuppreſſed certain embaſſages ſent from the Perſian king; which he now fearing to be called in queſtion for, the former ſtorms as yet ſcarce wel appeaſed, made himſelfe now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if hee had longer liued, he ſhould haue bin vndoubtedly ſtrangled: which to preuent, he became the worthy executioner of himſelfe, that had moſt vniuſtly cauſed others to be moſt ſhamefully murdered. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather beleeued, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time ſcraped together, was immediatly after his death taken into the kings treaſuries, ſome ſmall portion thereof being left vnto his nephews: a moſt certain token of Amuraths indignation againſt him. The Perſian Embaſſador hauing audience the 7 of Auguſt, with many liuely reaſons & much eloquence, perſuaded M the Turkiſh Emperor to deſiſt from the war begun, as contrary to the will & pleaſure of their common Prophet Mahomet: as alſo to the peace, which was ſo royally, & with ſo many capitulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his grandfather; and was not to haue bin broken and wars raiſed, but vpon ſome great quarrell or iniurie done; which the

A Perſians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wiſhed vnto him all happineſſe; as they had manifeſtly declared, by ſending vnto him an embaſſage to that purpoſe by Sultan Tocoman, whereby hee might plainly perceiue, the good mind and zeale the Perſian King had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the ſhort raigne of Iſmahel, there was ſome rumor raiſed, that he meant to go vnto Babylonia, and ſome ſuch like newes: yet that was but a youthfull part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to ſuch as beeing kept long in ſtrait priſon cannot vſe their liberty with moderation, and had therefore receiued due puniſhment for it, by ſudden and vnexpected death. But as for the king that now is, he did aboue all others imbrace amitie with his maieſtie, and therefore did moſt earneſtly deſire, that it would pleaſe him to temper his anger conceiued, which had incenſed him to take vp armes againſt a B king ſo much his friend, being of the ſame religion, and better affected towards him than all the reſt of the Nations in the World.

This Embaſſador the Turkiſh Emperour diſmiſſed without any reſolution at all, but onely gaue order, that whatſoeuer he had to ſay touching this peace, he ſhould communicate it with his Viſier. Many were the diſcourſes which hapned; for that the Turke required all thoſe cities & countries, which til that time he had conquered with the ſword, or (as their proud manner of phraſe is) whereon his Generals horſe had trod, to be yeelded again vnto him: and the Embaſſador on the other ſide, had no warrant from his king to yeeld any more than that part of Georgia, which is on this ſide the riuer of Araxis. Wherupon the ſaid embaſſador began to feare, leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected for a ſpie, and ſo be euil intreated: wherewithall he did finde himſelfe too manifeſtly charged by the hard ſpeech that the Viſier vſed towards him. Being thus doubtful wherupon to reſolue, perceiuing himſelf ſtrained to the grant of theſe demands, and receiuing alſo ſome threatnings withall, he determined with himſelfe to enlarge his ſpeeches with the Viſier in diuers and ſundrie particularities, and to giue him good hope that hee ſhould be able to perſuade with his king, the yeelding vp of ſo much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Maxut Chan the embaſſador in friendly manner and without any outrage ſent from Conſtantinople to Chars, and commiſſion giuen to Sinan (then at Chars) that without delay, & with all fidelity, he ſhould cauſe the embaſſador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Perſia, whereſoeuer he did deſire: all which was faithfully performed.

But to returne againe to Sinan the Generall, who from Siuas had ſent the ſaid embaſſadour to Conſtantinople (as is before declared:) & being departed thence, arriued at Erzirum, where he tooke a ſuruey of his army, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for this expedition: and ſo from thence was now come to Chars, from whence hee diſpatched the Perſian embaſſadour, much diſcontented that no other concluſion for peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan at laſt arriuing at the Perſian court, reported vnto the king all that had happened in this his embaſſage: the ſum whereof was, That Amurath would not condiſcend to any condition of peace, vnleſſe the whole countrey of Siruan might be yeelded vnto him, for that hee had once (as he ſaid) conquered the ſame. Neither did the ſame embaſſador forbeare to tell the king, the ſuſpition Amurath had conceiued of him, to haue been a ſpie rather than an embaſſador; and of the large promiſes he was fain to make to the Turke, to auoid the manifeſt danger of impriſonment or death: all which for all that, now lay in his Maieſties power to performe or not. The king for the preſent remained well ſatisfied with that Maxut had done, and in reward of his great trauell and expences, gaue him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlaine of that rich and great citie. Of which new office (though very honourable and of great importance) he tooke ſmall pleaſure, for that one Emir Chan his antient enemie was chiefe Gouernor of that city, from whom he feared ſome dangerous trecherie: wherfore he appointed his deputie for the execution of the office, & withdrew himſelfe from Tauris to Caſſangich, a place of his owne, there to paſſe away the time vntill it ſhould pleaſe the king otherwiſe to diſpoſe of him. But Emir Chan, who ſtill nouriſhed in his mind the antient hatred hee had conceiued againſt him, tooke this as a moſt fit occaſion to bring him into diſgrace with the king: certifying him, That Maxut not contented with the great preferment it had pleaſed him to beſtow vpon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned Tauris, and ſubſtituted in his place a moſt baſe perſon to repreſent the kings maieſty & to manage his treaſure: and that he abſented himſelfe far from that citie and the court there, hauing withdrawne himſelfe into the confines of Turkie, no doubt for ſome miſchieuous intent, either to yeeld himſelfe vnto them, or els to haue intelligence with them, and was like enough to be guilty to himſelfe of the great errour he had already committed, by offering Simah vnto the Turkiſh G king, and making promiſe of ſo large conditions, whereby he had obtained ſuch a ſure & ſafe conuoy to conduct him; when as hee had before diſcouered himſelfe to be a fauourer of the Turks, and a traitor to his owne king: and that therefore it were good to make triall of this inclination, and ſo peraduenture to decline ſome great miſchiefe, tending to the danger of the Perſian ſtate. This malicious accuſation ſlily contriued, ſo wrought in the mind of the ſuſpitious king, that he commanded Emir Chan ſecretly to apprehend Maxut, and to bring him to the court, and (if he could not by other meanes) but by torture to wreſt from him the truth of all thoſe matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemie thus put into his hands; and thought it long vntill he had brought this ſhame vpon Maxut: who hauing already heard ſome inckling thereof, reſolued with himſelfe to do any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his hatefull H enemie. And therefore at ſuch time as fifteen tall fellowes were for that purpoſe ſent vnto him from Emir Chan, who in the kings name ſummoned him to the court, he without making any ſhew that he took the matter otherwiſe than wel, entertained them courteouſly, & made them great cheere: but when he perceiued them to be ouercome with ſleep, which crept vpon them by reaſon of the exceſſe wherewith they had ouercharged themſelues, he cauſed them to be ſtraitly bound, and with long cords hanged them downe into a deep well, and there ſhut them vp, ſecretly couered. Then gathering together the moſt precious things he had in his houſe, and ſetting his wiues, his children, his brethren, and nephews on horſebacke, fled with all his familie in the euening, and the next day arriued at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained I by the Turkiſh Baſſa, & from thence conueied to Van, where he was alſo courteouſly welcommed by Cicala Baſſa, and honorably accompanied, ſent to Sinan the Generall, who very glad of his comming, ſent him with all diligence to Conſtantinople to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the firſt enterparlance of peace betwixt the Perſians and the Turks.

Sinan remained at Chars eight daies, and there againe ſurueyed his armie and proviſion; and afterwards ſet forward towards Tomanis, with reſolution there to build a fort. But being come thither, he could by no meanes put that his deſignement in execution, by reaſon of the immoderat rain, which continually by the ſpace of eight daies fell in ſuch abundance, as that neither did the Sun appeare, or the skie cleare. Beſide that, Sinan greatly feared leſt the enemie taking the opportunitie of this rain, of the ſtraight, and of the building, ſhould aſſault his armie, K and finding it in euill plight and out of order, greatly endamage it: wherefore caſting off his former determination for fortifying at Tomanis, he remoued thence, to carry ſuccours to Teflis. But as ſoon as he was riſen with his armie, and paſt the ſtrait, Tal-Ogli Captaine of the Ianizaries of Damaſco, and Homar Sanzacke of Saffeto, hauing receiued ſecret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good ſtore both of corne and cattell, reſolued with themſelues to go thither to ſetch in that booty: and ſo with two thouſand ſouldiers greedy of prey they ſet forward. Now Simon the Georgian and the Perſians, following the Turks armie a far off, had diuided his ſouldiers into all ſuch places as where there was either corne, or water, or any ſuch thing as might allure the Turks to ſcatter themſelues from the camp: and perceiuing theſe hungry Turkes careleſly to run headlong to lay hold on this deſired bootie, he ſuddenly L fell vpon them, and cut them in pieces, being diſordered; ſo that of thoſe two thouſand eſcaped but Tal-Ogli the Captaine of the Ianizaries only, Homar the Sanzacke and all the reſt being left dead vpon the ground.

Sinan commeth to Teflis.

Sinan holding on his way, in two daies came to Teflis; where preſently he called a counſell of all the chiefe men of his armie, taking order, That euery man vpon his oath, ſhould depoſe the truth touching the greatneſſe of Teflis: which he did onely in reproch of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, who moſt vntruly had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as Damaſco, whereas in truth it was not in any reſpect to be compared vnto that ſo famous a City. After that, he diuided the treaſure and ſuccors he had brought, among the ſouldiers of the fortreſſe, cheering them vp with good words, and promiſes of great matters. And becauſe the ſouldiers there in garriſon complained greatly againſt the Baſſa their Captaine, hee cauſed a bil of complaint to be framed againſt him, & finding him guilty, that he had conuerted the ſouldiers pay to his own vſe, he condemned him to the reſtitution thereof, and ſo immediatly diſcharging him of his office, placed in his roome Guiſuf Bey, a lord of Georgia; who for the antient

A tient enmitie betweene him and Simon, had yeelded himſelfe to the Turkes, and was by Sinan ſo welcommed, that Sinan truſted him with the cuſtodie of that fort, which with ſo many dangers had beene maintained and defended till that day.

Sinan departeth from Teflis

All things thus ſet in order at Teflis, Sinan with his army departed thence, and hauing againe paſſed the ſtrait of Tomanis, there came vnto him Muſtaffad Baſſa (afterward gouernour of Aleppo) declaring vnto him, That not far off was great ſtore of corne and cattell, and no bodie but onely a few Georgians to keepe the ſame, and therefore wiſhed him to ſend forth ſome to fetch it in, whereof, though it had bin much more, his armie then ſtood in great need. Sinan was well affected vnto this Muſtaffad, and therefore the eaſilier induced by him to ſend for the aforeſaid bootie: but moued with the freſh remembrance of that which had happened to *Tal-*B Ogli & Homar, he gaue order, That to fetch in this corne and cattel there ſhould go out 10000 horſemen and their ſeruants, among whom was alſo the ſame Muſtaffad as their Generall. Now ſtood Tocomac, Simon, and the other Perſian captains in ſecret ambuſh, waiting when any of the Turks ſhould come to fetch in this bootie. Whereupon the aforeſaid ſoldiers being now come, as they deſired, and hauing almoſt charged all their mules & horſes with that which beſt pleaſed them to make choice of; the hidden Perſians all on a ſudden iſſued out of their lurking places among them, and with great ſlaughter put them to flight, and with ſuch furie purſued the victorie, that they ſlew of them 7000, carried away many priſoners aliue, and the mules and horſes laden with the ſtolne bootie. Muſtaffad was the firſt that fled, and the firſt that brought the vnhappy news of that ouerthrow to Sinan: which was forthwith confirmed by the report C of ſuch as had by ſpeedie flight eſcaped the furie of the enemie. Whereupon Sinan diſpatched the Baſſa of Caramania with a great power, charging him whereſoeuer he ſhould find the enemie, to ſet vpon him; and preſently riſing himſelfe with his whole campe, followed the ſaid Baſſa: but all too late; for the Perſians after the aforeſaid victorie, without ſtaying had withdrawne themſelues into their ſtrong places, knowne only to ſuch as were wel acquainted with the difficult paſſages of Georgia: and hauing there diſpoſed of their prey, were now returning to await ſome freſh occaſion of new ſlaughter. But when they deſcried the whole armie of the Turks vpon the riſing of a certaine hill, they were affraid to meet them, yea and ſtood in ſome doubt alſo, leſt Sinan ſhould diſcend from the hill, and ſo aſſault them: for which cauſe they retired themſelues againe into the ſtrength of the mountaines; yet not with ſuch ſpeed D but that the Turks ouertooke ſome few of them, and ſlew about fiftie or threeſcore of them, whoſe heads in ſigne of triumph they carried a good part of the way vpon the points of their ſpeares: and tooke priſoners about threeſcore and ten moe.

Seuen thouſand Turks ſlaine by the Georgians and Perſians.

At laſt Sinan with all his armie hauing paſſed theſe dangerous places of Georgia, arriued at Triala, were it was told him, That the Perſian king in perſon himſelfe being already departed from Tauris, with an exceeding great armie was comming to bid him battell. At which news he cauſed proclamation to be preſently made thorow all his army, That euery man ſhould put himſelfe in readineſſe for the voyage to Tauris, whither he himſelfe meant to go to meet with the king his enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) he diſpatched certain poſts to the Perſian E king, then at Carachach, to entreat him to ſend another Embaſſador to Amurath for peace, thinking by that meanes (as ſome do coniecture) to remoue the king from the reſolution of comming to aſſaile him, if he had any ſuch meaning. After this proclamation made, he diſcended into the open and large plaines of Chielder; where preſently he muſtred his whole army, and gaue it out, That before he would ſet forward toward Tauris, he would make triall of the readineſſe and nimbleneſſe of his ſoldiers, in ſuch ſort as if they ſhould preſently joine battel with the enemie: which without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally ranging his whole armie in order of battell, and then ſending out ſome few others to ſhew themſelues vpon the top of certaine hils, as if they had been enemies that came to ſeiſe vpon his armie; he cauſed all his artillery to be diſcharged, and commanded euery man to skirmiſh & beſtir himſelfe altogether after the ſame manner as if the enemie had beene there preſent before them: where the thundring of the great and ſmall ſhot, the thicke ſtormes of arrows, with the brightneſſe of the armor and weapons, yeelding forth lightnings as if it had bin firy beames, and the noiſe of drummes and trumpets and other inſtruments of warre, with the enſignes of blew and yellow flying in the winde, made ſuch a medly of all things, as if it had been the turmoyle of a very battell indeed. In the end hee cauſed the retreat to be ſounded; and then Sinan derided of his ſoldiers.

ſetting all his armie in order againe, made the like ſhew the ſecond time, and ſo the third time G alſo : which was indeed performed with the great ſcorne and deriſion of his ſouldiers, who deemed it rather childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Baſſa. Theſe counterfeit ſhewes of war thus finiſhed, yet did he not ſet forward toward Tauris, as he had giuen it out, but loitered eight dayes in thoſe plaines of Chielder. At which time there arriued out of Perſia one Aider the Aga, as an Embaſſador from the King, who was by Sinan with great ioy entertained. Diuers were the things by this Embaſſador propounded, ſuch as had Maxut Chan before : but the concluſion of all was, that the Perſian King would be content voluntarily to relinquiſh Chars and Teflis, and ſo remaine as he did before, in amitie with Amurath; and ſo deſired Sinan to conclude a peace with his Maſter, if it might be : as for himſelfe, this meſſage done, he was preſently to returne into Perſia. For this peace Sinan promiſed to deale with H Amurath, ſo that the Perſian King would ſend another Embaſſador to Conſtantinople. Vpon which concluſion the ſaid Aider returned into Perſia, and at Tauris declared to the King, what he had ſeene, what promiſes he had receiued of Sinan, and withall exhorted him to ſend a new Embaſſador vnto the Turkiſh Court. After this, when the publique rumor of the comming of the Perſian King, was found to be falſe, Sinan in ſtead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idely ſtayed a whole moneth, to the generall maruelling and murmuring of all his armie, aſtoniſhed to ſee themſelues (to the great charges of their King, and the diſturbance of his whole Kingdome) brought forth not for any honorable conqueſt, but as it were onely of purpoſe to make a vaine ſhew of war.

Sinan commeth to Erzirum, & there breaketh vp his armie.

At laſt he departed from Chars, for that now Winter was come on, and the froſts & ſhowes I did his armie great harme; and ſo comming to Erzirum, there preſently diſmiſſed euery man to goe and winter in his owne countrey; but remained ſtill himſelfe in the ſame citie. From whence he by ſpeedie poſts diligently aduertiſed Amurath of the ſuccors he had left at Teflis, of the loſſes he had receiued from the enemie, of all that which was by Muſtapha miſreported, of the comming of the Perſian Embaſſador to him, of the promiſe made vnto him touching a new Embaſſador, & to be ſhort, of all his whole actions. Beſides all this, he aduertiſed Amurath, That the enterpriſe of Perſia was a very hard, long, & difficult matter, & ſuch a one as needed another manner of preparation than had bin as yet appointed for it : and that if he deſired to ſubdue Perſia, it was then very neceſſary that he ſhould ſpeak with him at large, & diſcourſe vpon many particularities, which could not ſo well without exceeding tediouſneſſe be declared K by writing. After that, he ſent other meſſengers alſo, to ſolicite Amurath for his returne to Conſtantinople; continually telling him, That it was not poſſible to ſignifie by writing, what he purpoſed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accompliſhing of the enterpriſe begun. Nothing in the world did Sinan abhor more than this war, hauing his mind altogether bent againſt the affaires of the Chriſtians in Europe, and therefore ſought by all means poſſible for the diuerting of thoſe wars from the Eaſt, into ſome other quarters. At laſt he wrought ſo much, he entreated ſo much, he writ ſo many letters, and ſolicited the matter ſo earneſtly, that Amurath was perſuaded to ſend for him to Conſtantinople, as ſoone as euer he was certified of the arriuall of the new Embaſſadour from Perſia, of whom Sinan had before aduertiſed him.
For he was reſolued either to grow to a peace with the ſaid Embaſſadour, if he came with honourable L conditions; or if he came not, or that after his comming they could not agree vpon the peace, then to put in execution thoſe his conceits whereof hee muſt needs in particular talke with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promiſed Embaſſador called Ebraim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in Perſia, came to Sinan; whereof Sinan gaue preſent intelligence to Amurath, beſeeching him again, to permit him to come to Conſtantinople.
Which his requeſt Amurath then granted. Wherupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the vniuerſall gouernment of the whole Empire. At his firſt comming to the preſence of Amurath, (wherein he diſcourſed not with him of any thing, but of the comming of the Perſian Embaſſadour) the conditions were ſet downe which they were to require for the reducing of the capitulations of this peace to a good end. After which M agreement the Embaſſadour being now come, and moſt magnificently receiued in Conſtantinople, had audience. At wich time he with much glorious ſpeech laboured to perſuade Amurath, That his King had a moſt ardent deſire to be reconciled vnto him, and to ioyne his forces with his againſt the Enemies of the Mahometane Religion; and that for that purpoſe

A poſe he was now eſpecially come thither: which his good purpoſe, if it were anſwered with like zeale on his part, there would thereof enſue the greateſt vnitie and friendſhip that euer was betweene any Mahometan Princes. Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other anſwer, but that he ſhould thereof talke with his Viſier, and with him entreat of all matters concerning the peace: and ſo he was by Amurath entertained and diſmiſſed both at one time.

Now had Amurath called to Conſtantinople his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet (who afterward ſucceeded him in the Empire) being then about ſixteene yeares old, to circumciſe him, according to the cuſtome of the Turkes; following therein the inueterate Law of the Hebrewes. Vnto which ſolemnitie many Chriſtian Princes were ſolemnly inuited; who accordingly ſent thither their Embaſſadors with great gifts and preſents, in token of peace and confederacie, namely B Rodulphus the Emperour, Henrie the third the French King, Stephen King of Polonia: the State of Venice, the King of Perſia, the Moore Kings of Morocco and Fez, the Princes of Moldauia, Valachia, and others. With all triumph and ioy was the circumciſion of this yong Prince ſolemniſed by the ſpace of fortie dayes and fortie nights, in the great market place of Conſtantinople; where all the Embaſſadours aforeſaid had their ſcaffolds prepared and furniſhed according to their degrees and States, and receiued ſuch entertainment as might be ſhewed at ſuch a kinde of barbarous ſpectacle: Only the Perſian Embaſſador, who had alſo his ſcaffold ſeueral to himſelfe, but not regarded as the reſt, reioyced not at theſe feaſts and triumphs: for among ſundrie other wrongs and ſcorne done by the commandement of Amurath vnto the Perſian nation, (as by hanging vp certaine counterfeit pictures of Perſians made of laths and C ſticks, and then burning them, and in many ſcornefull ſorts abuſing them) the Turke, for the great diſpleaſure he had conceiued for the harme done to Oſman Baſſa and the Turks in Siruan much about that time, and for the diſdaine he had taken againſt Ebraim Chan (as one not condiſcending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yeelding to any more than the other Embaſſador had done before, ſeemed to haue come as a Spie to marke the Turkiſh affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the mindes of the two mightie Princes) commanded the ſtanding before appointed for him, in diſgrace of him to be caſt downe, and himſelfe and all his followers to be ſhut vp as cloſe priſoners in the houſe of Mahamet Baſſa at Conſtantinople; where he was ſo ſtraightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which ſhortly after began to D wax hot in the citie, yet could he not obtaine ſo much fauor as to be remoued into ſome other place, but there was inforced to tarrie it out, vntill that afterward order was taken, he ſhould be carried thence as priſoner to Erzirum. To end theſe ſolemnities, Mahomet the yong prince was circumciſed, not publiquely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Baſſa's, ſometime the Emperour Solymans Barber.

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turc. pag. 82.

Now whileſt Sinan as great Viſier ſat commanding in Conſtantinople, the gariſons of Chars and Teflis (kept in by the enemie, and hauing receiued none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzirum, had by good hap cauſed to be ſecretly conueyed vnto them) were thought to be driuen to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, E and fearing leſt thoſe two places which had with ſo much ado beene both gained and maintained, ſhould for want of new ſuccors fall againe into the hand of the enemie: he both boldly and freely counſelled Amurath to ſend a new garriſon to Van, for the ſafetie of the countrey thereabouts, and then vnder the conduct of ſome valiant captaine, to ſend ſuccours to Teflis. Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himſelfe of ſome fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded diuers vnto him, but none of them pleaſed him; for why, he was before reſolued, in deſpight of Sinan and of his counſel, to beſtow this charge vpon Mahamet Baſſa nephew to Muſtapha the late Baſſa, and for his ſake hated of Sinan. This Baſſa Mahamet he ſent to Erzirum, with the title of the Baſſa of that prouince; honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the armie for Teflis. And preſently gaue commandement to Haſſan the Baſſa of Caraemit, to Muſtaffa ſometime called Manucchiar the Georgian, F to all the Sanzackes, the Curdi, and the ſouldiers of Erzirum, that they ſhould reſort to the ſtandard of Mahamet their Generall, and ſo to follow him to Teflis. Whereupon there aſſembled together out of all the ſayd places about fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiors, with all things neceſſarie for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed garriſon which was in Teflis. Commandement was alſo giuen to the Baſſa's of Aleppo and Maras, to repaire to Van with all their ſouldiers, and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did, not moleſted nor troubled by any enemie. G

In the end of Auguſt Mahamet Baſſa departed from Erzirum, with the Baſſa of Caraemit, and all his armie, carrying with him money, corne, and all other things needfull for the reliefe of Teflis, and in eight dayes came to Chars, and from thence to Archelec, not troubled by any. At Archelec he found Muſtaffa (otherwiſe called Manucchiar) the Georgian, with all his ſouldiers, whome the Generall moſt ioyfully entertained, and honoured him with gifts, and withall admoniſhed him to continue in his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his armie the ſhorteſt and ſafeſt way to Teflis: for that ſome were of opinion, that it were beſt to go by Tomanis, and ſome other, by the way of Muſtaffa his countrey: wherein Muſtaffa did readily reſolue him, that the eaſieſt and ſhorteſt way lay through his owne countrey, being H also in his opinion the ſafeſt. This counſell of Muſtaffa pleaſed Mahamet greatly, ſo that hee made choice of him to be the guide of his armie, repoſing himſelfe wholly vpon his good direction: and ſo departed thence towards Teflis, paſſing through Akunchala and Carachala, both belonging to the ſaid Georgian, abounding with all things neceſſarie for the ſuſtenance of man, neither were they euer diſturbed by any enemie. Hauing paſſed Muſtaffa his country, they came to a friendly caſtle called Gori, from whence they diſcouered in certaine fields a great armie of the Georgians mingled with Perſians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia: theſe were thoſe Captaines of Perſia, ſent from the Perſian King (as in other yeares before) to aid the Georgians, who ſecretly conioyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparell, becauſe the treatie of peace ſhould not be diſturbed, and their King accounted vniuſt of his word, who vnder a colour of a treatie of peace, whiles Amurath attended I nothing elſe but to ſuccour and defend his conquered Countries, without purpoſe to annoy any other places, went about to procure the deſtruction of the Turks. Theſe then as ſoone as they ſaw the Turkiſh armie, and perceiued that they alſo themſelues were by them deſcried, ſent Herauldes vnto them with haughtie words of defiance, and to offer them battell. With great griefe of minde did the Baſſa receiue this proud defiance: but hauing no other purpoſe but onely to bring his ſuccours ſafe to Teflis, he diſmiſſed the Herauldes, and ſtudied by all meanes he could to ſhun battell. That euening he was fauoured in his purpoſe by the great and continual raine which then fell, and ſerued for a reaſonable excuſe of his delay; but the next day prouing faire, and the Sun ſhining bright, both the armies marched in ſight the one K of the other all day, vntill about foure houres and an halfe before night; at which time the Turks arriued neere to a riuer that ſeperated the one armie from the other. There the Baſſa fell in conſultation with Muſtaffa, whether they ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer before night, or ſtay on that ſide they were vntil the next morning. In which caſe Muſtaffa aduiſed him to ſtay, as fearing leſt the enemie ſhould ſet vpon the armie diſordered in paſſing the riuer, and ſo annoy them. Notwithſtanding the General diſliked this aduice of Muſtaffa, hauing taken a ſtrong conceit euen vpon the firſt diſcouerie of the enemie, that there was ſome intelligence & compact betweene Muſtapha and the Perſians, and that to that end he had maliciouſly perſuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis: and therefore the Baſſa thinking, that if there were any ſuch plot laid betweene Muſtaffa and the enemie, to ſet it in ſome confuſion, L would not in any caſe follow the counſell of the ſuſpected Georgian, to ſtay that night; but commanded, that with the greateſt ſpeed that might be, all his ſoldiers with their treaſure & corn ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer, to the end that before night he might on the other ſide of the riuer incamp his army in ſome good place, to the ſcorne and deriſion of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold yong man & an hardy, was the firſt that ventured ouer, and after him the cariages of mony & of corne, and then the whole army, with ſuch ſpeed, that ſome of the confuſed multitude were drowned in the paſſage, being rather troden down with the horſes & camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the chanell, or ſwiftneſſe of the riuer.

Mahamet Baſſa refuſeth batell offered by the Georgians and Perſians.

As ſoone as the Georgians perceiued that the Turkes had paſſed the riuer, without ſtaying vntil they might ſettle themſelues in any good order, they in great haſt & fury ran vpon them, M and preſently aſſailed them, whiles they were yet all in confuſion and out of order: by reaſon whereof the Turkes, although they turned their faces vpon their enemie, and made ſome good reſiſtance, yet in ſhort time you might haue ſeene the banks of the riuer in many places ſtained with the Turkiſh bloud, and many carkaſes of the Turks here and there ſcattered, without any

apparant

A apparant loſſe among the Georgians and Perſians. Amongſt them that fell in this ſlaughter, were a number of Sanzackes, of the Curdi, and Meſopotamians: which the reſt perceiuing, and by the ouerthrow of their owne, coniecturing the loſſe of others, turned their backes and fled: the like did the remnant of the Meſopotamians, and after them at laſt the whole armie: whom the Georgians preſſed ſo ſore in their flight, that many of the Turkes ſeeing no other way to eſcape, caſt themſelues into the riuer, and ſo (though hardly) eſcaped with their liues. Great was the ſhame, great was the confuſion, but greateſt was the loſſe they receiued, for that in the heat of the battell the Kings mony and corne was taken by the Georgians and Perſians, euery man ſauing only ſo much for himſelfe as he could ſecretly hide vpon his owne bodie, or conuey by the meanes of ſome truſtie ſlaue, which by the helpe of their ſwift horſes B was preſerued rather by fortune than by valour.

The Turkes diſcomfited, & the treaſure and corne taken by the Georgians and Perſians.

The Turks thus diſcomfited and ſpoiled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themſelues together againe, one with another curſing the heauens, the King, and their aduerſe fortune: ſome of them alſo threatening the Georgian Renegate Muſtaffa, as though all this miſchiefe had hapned through his treacherie and ſecret intelligence with the enemie. Notwithſtanding, when they found that they had ſtill remaining ſo much money and other eaſements as might ſuffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the ſouldiers beſieged in the fort, they reſolued to hold on their way towards Teflis; and in their journy vſed ſuch ſpeed, that the day following they arriued there in the euening. But when they of the Fort ſaw their friends whom they had ſo long expected, arriued in ſuch bad ſort, and ſo euill furniſhed, they were C aſtonied & wonderfully grieued at this common loſſe, and all in a confuſion proteſted to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith neceſſary prouiſion made for them. But the Generall after he had with large promiſes mitigated their firſt furies & inſolencies, preſently in the morning cauſed a Diuano or counſel to be called in the caſtle, where hauing gathered together all the chiefe men in his armie, he ſpake vnto them in this manner:

For as much as it hath pleaſ:d God, that ſo great and important an occaſion of victorie which was offered vnto vs for the honour and glorie of euery one of vs, is now fallen out ſo vnfortunately, that it hath not onely not miniſtred vnto vs any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies, as we ſhould haue done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carrie away from vs both the triumph, and alſo our D armour, our horſes, our ſlaues, and our ſpoiles; yea and (the remembrance whereof doth moſt grieuouſly trouble and afflict me) our Sultans money, and our publique munition and forces ſolemnly deliuered to our conduct, is now became a bootie and a prey vnto them; that the honour which might haue made euerie one of vs famous among noble and valorous ſouldiers, is now fallen from our foreheads, and to our great detriment doth adorne the heads of ſtrangers, or rather of our enemies: and that notwithſtanding all this, we are now come to thoſe couragious ſouldiers, which with their great valour haue defended this Fort euen in the middeſt of their enemies weapons and treacheries; and to whom we ſhould yeeld that aid and reliefe which the vertue of euery one of their mindes doth deſerue, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither vnto them; there is now no remedie, but to reſolue vpon ſome good E meanes, that we fall not wholly into the vtter diſgrace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintaine theſe ſoldiers in the cuſtodie and defence of this fort: and though it be with all our wants, and all our own diſhonors, to comfort theſe that haue ſo long time looked for vs, and ſo well deſerued all manner of reliefe. We cannot excuſe our ſelues, that our enemies were better than wee either in number or inſtruments of war; for both in the one and the other we were far beyond them: neither yet can we ſay, that they ſet vpon vs by night, or at vnawares; for when we ſaw their number, their weapons, their horſes, and finally their approch, and their manner of aſſault, yet we would needs paſſe ouer the riuer and ioyne battell with them. Which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable vnto vs, becauſe wee were more readie to take our flight than to endure the fight; and to vſe our feet, than to occupie our hands. And therefore it is verie requiſit, as well to ſatisfie the rigor of iuſtice, as to performe the dutie of ſouldiers, that wee ſuffer not our lord & king to loſe his mony, which he truſted into our hands, & which we haue loſt, not by greater ſtrength F nor by any treacherous ſtratagem of our enemies, but by our owne too too important feare, and too baſe a regard of our liues, before which, it was the dutie of euery one of vs to haue preferred the care of honour. For if by fighting and couragious ſuſtaining the aſſaults of our enemies, though they had bin ſtronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned vnto vs, and that we could in any ſort haue repreſented to the king and the world an honorable and bloudie battell, wee ſhould not now haue had any need to ſeeke meanes how to repay this loſſe, and to reſtore the thing that violently was taken from vs by ſuch as were more mightie than our ſelues, and theſe honorable ſouldiers ſhould more eaſily haue digeſted with vs this lamentable calamitie. But we haue loſt that money, and in very deed hauing as it were willingly beſtowed it vpon the Georgians and Perſians, to redeeme our liues, and to ſaue vs from their fury, are bound to repay it, or els for euer hereafter to be challenged as lawfull debtors to the King for it. And therefore my good friends and companions, if you will take a good courſe, let euerie one of vs without further conſultation, put his hand into his priuate purſe (if he haue not fooliſhly caſt that alſo into the hands of the rauenous enemie) and with our owne money let vs ſuccour the neceſſitie of theſe men, and haue regard to the honour of our King. So ſhall we make our flight leſſe blame-worthie, we ſhall iuſtifie our actions more honeſtly, and that which is of greateſt importance, we ſhall better pacifie the wrath of Amurath, which he might moſt iuſtly conceiue againſt vs. I my ſelfe before you all am moſt read to diſburſe foure thouſand duckets towards it: if it ſhall pleaſe you all to follow me accordingly, we ſhall deliuer theſe ſouldiers from their great neceſſitie, and acquite our ſelues from the intricate bonds of moſt troubleſome diſpleaſures.

The oration of Mahamet Baſſa in the caſtle of Teflis.

The Turkes among theſelues make a purſe of 30000 duckets for the reliefe of the garriſon of Teflis.

There might a man haue ſeene a thouſand countenances changed a thouſand manner of wayes; for one ſoftly whiſpered many a curſe and ſhame vpon the King, vpon Mahamet, yea and vpon God himſelfe; another denied to diſburſe any thing; another determined priuily to ſteale away; and ſome ſaid one thing, and ſome another: but in the end euery man was induced to follow the example of Mahamet; and thereupon hauing made a purſe according to euery mans abilitie, there was collected thirtie thouſand duckets among them. And preſently after, word was ſent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to ſend thither graine, muttons, and other neceſſary prouiſions, that they might the better continue the defence of the Fort.

Mahamet deuiſeth how to betray Muſtaffa th. Georgian.

Two dayes onely ſtayed Mahamet in Teflis, and hauing changed ſuch ſouldiers as deſired to be diſmiſſed, and alſo appointed Homar Baſſa Gouernour of Teflis, in ſtead of Giuſuf that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure conſultation was had, Whether they ſhould keepe the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian: and in the end they reſolued to keepe the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they ſhould all paſſe the riuer. The Curdi were the firſt that went ouer, and had alreadie pitched their Tents vpon the farther ſide of the water; when the Generall began to reuoke his former order, and ſent them word, That they ſhould returne, becauſe he was now determined to goe backe the ſame way he came. At which meſſage the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plaine termes ſent him anſwer, That theſe mutabilities beſeemed not them, being men accuſtomed to warre, but to be rather childrens play, than manly reſolution, and that for their parts they were minded not to change their journy, but would go on the ſame way they had begun: and ſo forwards they went (ſay the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arriued at Chars long before Mahomet; who was much grieued at this their ſo great diſobedience: but ſeeing no other remedy, he with the Baſſa of Caraemit and Muſtapha the Georgian, put themſelues on their journey, euen by the ſame way they came to Teflis. At laſt Mahamet arriued at Altunchala, the chiefe Caſtle of Muſtaffa the Georgian, and burning with the deſire of reuenge of thoſe loſſes, (which he thought himſelfe to haue receiued by the treacherie of Muſtaffa) or, as ſome thought, ſeeking by this means to make Amurath beleeue, that in truth all the forepaſſed miſchiefes had happened not thorough their cowardiſe, but through the treacherous and malicious deuices of the Georgian, and ſo to make their receiued loſſes ſeeme more pardonable: he deuiſed with himſelfe how to finde out ſuch a plot, as that Muſtaffa might vpon the ſudden be taken away, as guiltie of ſo foule a treaſon. And that he had deuiſed, was in this ſort: To call a Councell into his owne Pauilion, as if hee had receiued ſome commandement from the Court; and hauing cauſed Muſtaffa to come into that roome, whileſt the ſaid counterfeit commandement ſhould be in reading, to cauſe his Lieutenant, with thoſe chiefe of his band that ſtood about him, to fall vpon him and preſently to cut off his head. This pretended Councell was accordingly called; wherein ſate the Baſſa himſelfe, and with him the Baſſa of Caraemit, certaine Sanzackes ſubiect to the Iuriſdiction of Erzirum, the Capagi Baſſa or chiefe Gentleman Vſher, and the Generals Lieutenant; with whome he had vpon their ſolemne oathes for ſecrecie, communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Muſtapha was alſo called accordingly: who

both

A both becauſe he was beloued of moe than one; and had alſo vſed all diligent circumſpection, but eſpecially hauing heard in the armie ſome priuie whiſperings of ſuch a matter, knew full well of all that was deuiſed againſt him, and therefore prouided alſo for his owne defence. But as touching his going to the counſell, he thought he might not denie ſo to do, leſt by his abſence he might ſeeme guiltie of the fault whereof he was (peraduenture not without cauſe) ſuſpected; and thereby to leaue his cities for a prey to their enemies, now in the heart of his countrie. And therfore reſoluing to go, he deuiſed how ſo to do with moſt ſafetie; and ſo, as if need ſhould be, he might be able to turne the miſchiefe intended againſt him, vpon the head of the Generall himſelfe. And therefore hauing choſen out fiftie of his moſt faithfull and reſolute ſouldiers, he commanded them to follow him to the counſell appointed in the Gene- B rals pauillion: and being come thither, to ſtay there ready and attentiue at his firſt and one only call, ſuddenly and forcibly to ruſh into the pauillion with their weapons; and rather than any wrong ſhould be done vnto him, to ſhew their valour againſt the Turks, without exception of any perſon whatſoeuer. Theſe men by nature enemies vnto the Turks, vnderſtanding well his meaning, ſetled themſelues vpon the execution: and taking vnto them ſome other alſo of their faithfull and truſtie friends, followed him euen to the pauillion of Mahamet: where Muſtaffa entring into the place of counſell, deſired of the Generall, to know what his pleaſure was; who preſently cauſed the counterfeit commandement to be read; whereunto Muſtaffa gaue an attentiue eare. But when the other Baſſa's and Sanzackes began to ſit downe (contrary to the maner C of the Turks, who whenſoeuer any commandement of the Emperors is in reading, vſe alwaies to ſtand vp, and not to ſit downe vntill it be full read) the Georgian tooke his leaue, promiſing to be euer readie to performe, not onely that order of the kings, but alſo whatſoeuer elſe hee ſhould command. And ſo being about to depart, the Capigi Baſſi (or great Vſher) of Mahamet came vnto him, and plucking him by the ſleeue, would haue forced him to ſit downe. Then Muſtaffa crying out aloud, drew his ſword, wherwith he ſtrucke Mahamets lieutenant, that was right againſt him; and with his left hand hauing raught the roll from his pate, with his right hand ſuddenly (to the great aſtoniſhment of all that were preſent) at one only blow parted his head, his necke, and his breaſt in twaine, euen to his very ſtomacke; ſo that he died (a ſtrange ſpectacle to behold) beeing thus cut in ſunder, with his cleft head and two ſhoulders hanging D downe vpon their ſeuerall ſides. After this firſt, he redoubled his ſecond ſtroke, aiming at the head of the Baſſa of Caraemit: but it being defended with the wrythen rols of the turbant, it ſlipped downe by his eare; yet ſo, that with a piece of the ſaid turbant it carried his eare quite away, with a little alſo of the fleſh of his cheeke: and all enraged, eagerly aſſailed Mahamet Baſſa the Generall (who now all in confuſion was riſen vp in the tumult) and wounded him with fiue mortall wounds; which were yet afterwards by cunning hand healed, when they had brought him euen to deaths doore. At the crie of this Georgian all his people ruſhed in together: vpon whoſe confuſed tumult, and the feare that Muſtaffa through his furie had ſtrucke into the Turks, the camp was preſently raiſed: and euery man with all ſpeed departing thence, put himſelf on his way towards Chars, whether alſo were brought the two wounded Baſſaes E and the reſt that were ill handled and greatly ſcared with theſe ſudden and vncouth ſtirres.

Muſtaffa notably reuengeth himſelfe of the trecherie intended againſt him by Mahamet the Generall.

Of all this trecherie intended againſt him, Muſtaffa ſent preſent information to the Turkiſh Emperor; finding himſelfe greatly grieued, at the falſe ſuſpition that Mahamet had wrongfully conceiued againſt him, to his great diſhonor: and wrought ſo cunningly, that Amurath in token of his good liking and contentment, ſent him both cloth of gold and a battleax al gilt. Mahamet on the other ſide entermeddling heere and there with all the art that poſſibly he could deuiſe, all hatefull and iniurious termes, ſent large aduertiſements of all the misfortunes that had hapned; and aggrauated to the king, both the treacheries of Muſtaffa, and alſo the ſlender ſecuritie of thoſe wayes and countries.

As ſoone as Amurath vnderſtood the calamities of his ſouldiers, the loſſe of his mony, the great diſhonour of his people, and the apparant danger wherein the fort of Teflis ſtood, when it was like to be abandoned: all inflamed with rage & anger, he called vnto him the Baſſaes of his court (among whom ſat as chiefe, the proud and haughty Sinan) and rated them all exceedingly; reprouing their lewd counſell, and recounting the loſſes that he had from time to time receiued, as if they had hapned through their defaults, and eſpecially Sinan, as the principall occaſion of all theſe miſchiefs: who like an improuident foole (as he ſaid) would needs relin-quiſh the charge of his armie and like a king ſit idle at Conſtantinople, ſtanding(as it were) at ſome publicke triumph to behold and heare the miſeries and misfortunes of others: hauing before G in the time that Muſtapha was Generall, moſt vainly boaſted, with the like power that he had, to fetch the Perſian king out of Caſbin, and to deliuer him in bonds to Amurath, but had in deed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could do no leſſe but make anſwer to the wrathfull king, yet not with ſuch mildneſſe and modeſtie as in ſuch a caſe hee ſhould peraduenture haue done; but in proud and peremptorie manner, without any reuerence or regard, told him plainly, That as the laſt yere a little before his returne to Conſtantinople, ſuccors had been conueyed to Teflis without any loſſe or trouble (as in truth they were) euen ſo had they been this yeare alſo, if he had put his aduiſe in execution as much as he deſpiſed and contemned it: for he did then giue him to vnderſtand, that Mahamet Baſſa could not be a fit man for ſo great a charge; & that it was neceſſary to haue choſen in his roome ſome other captaine H of valour and diſcretion; but ſeeing he would needs make choice of the ſame vnfit man, he was not now to blame any other for this errour, but onely himſelfe. As for his comming to Conſtantinople, it was a thing long before thought moſt needful; not only for his aduice, how the matter of peace might be brought to ſome good paſſe; but alſo becauſe if that treaty came not to the deſired iſſue, then hee had to talke with him how hee might compaſſe the ouerthrow of his enemy: which thing as yet he had no fit time to declare vnto him, but was now ready to reueale it, if it were ſo his pleaſure. Wonderfully was Amurath grieued with this ſullen anſwer, when he conſidered that a ſlaue of his own, ſhould ſo arrogantly and manifeſtly reproue him of folly and improuidence. Notwithſtanding being deſirous to know of him what that ſecret & important matter was, which he had to reueale vnto him for the eaſie compaſſing I of his commenced enterpriſe, he diſſembled his diſcontentment conceiued againſt him, and commanded him to diſcloſe thoſe his deuiſes which he had to vtter. Sinan in briefe, of all his aduiſes, propounded theſe two things: firſt, his counſell was, not to proceed in this war as they had hitherto done; by ſeeking with forts and fortreſſes to hold & keep the enemies countries; for that their treaſures were not able to yeeld ſuch ſtore of money, as was ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo many and ſo great garriſons: contrary to the opinion of Muſtapha (of late dead) who with great pertinacie had perſuaded that dangerous, chargeable, and difficult maner of war. His ſecond aduice was, that the true means to bring this war to wiſhed end, conſiſted eſpecially in the reſolution of Amurath himſelfe, who if he would go in perſon himſelf, & againſt K ſo mighty a king oppoſe the perſon of a king, then might he moſt aſſuredly promiſe vnto himſelfe all ſpeedy and honorable victory, for that at the only name of his comming, the Perſians would eaſily come to any agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his wars, & ſo obtain moſt glorious conqueſts. This his aduiſe ſo little pleaſed the effeminat king, that in ſtead of the great opinion he before held of him, he now conceiued an enuious affection againſt him: and a further ſuſpition (foſtred by the great Ladies of the court, eſpecially Amuraths mother) That Sinan had thus counſelled the King, himſelfe to goe in perſon, not for any good could come thereof, but only that ſo he might find means for the prince his ſon to make himſelfe king, and to driue out his father. Which ſuſpition was in ſuch ſort nouriſhed in the mind of Amurath, eſpecially being aſſured of the great affection which the Prince carried towards Sinan, and hee L likewiſe towards him, that he reſolued to rid him out of his ſight; and ſo depriuing him of all charge, preſently baniſhed him the court, and out of Conſtantinople to Demotica (a Citie of Thrace) from whence afterwards he by moſt humble ſupplication obtained to be remoued to Marmara a little beyond Selymbria. And into his place of Viſierſhip, was preferred Sciaus Baſſa (who had married Amuraths ſiſter) an Hungarian borne, a goodly perſonage, and of honourable iudgement: but aboue all men a ſeller of Iuſtice and preferments, and yet a great friend to the peace with the Chriſtian Princes, which Sinan had alwaies moſt wickedly maligned.

1582 The Perſian Captaines in the meane time, with their ſpoyles and diuers of their enemies enſignes, were with great ioy receiued at home in Perſia: but when the diſcord that fell out betweene Mahamet Baſſa and Muſtaffa the Georgian was alſo reported, the former M ioy was redoubled; euery man beeing of opinion, that theſe diſcords might bee great impediments vnto the Turks further attempts into Perſia; which it was feared they would the next yeare attempt, to the great danger of Naſſiuan and Tauris. Vpon which occaſions, the Perſian King perceiuing that hee could not haue a fitter opportunitie to imploy himſelfe againſt

Mahomet the Perſian king reſolueth to go to Heri againſt his ſonne Abas Mirize.

againſt Abas Mirize his ſonne (then with him in diſgrace) determined with himſelfe, to leaue the matters on this ſide of his kingdom in their preſent ſtate, and to march toward Heri: whereunto he was earneſtly ſolicited by his elder ſon Emir Hamze Mirize, but eſpecially by Mirize Salmas his Viſier. Vpon which reſolution, committing the defence of Reiuan, Naſſiuan, & that ſide of his kingdome, to Emir Chan Gouernor of Tauris, he ſet forward himſelfe with his armie towards Casbin, and ſo marching through diuers prouinces, arriued at length at Saſuar, being on that ſide the chiefe of all the cities ſubiect to the iuriſdiction of Heri: which citie he tooke by force, and without delay cauſed the Gouernor thereof to be beheaded, although he alledged a thouſand excuſes for himſelfe, and obiected a thouſand accuſations mos againſt the ſeditious Viſier. The king after this, departing thence, and hauing alſo put to death certain captains & Sultans, that were accuſed by the Viſier to be confederats in the rebellion of his ſonne, he arriued at laſt at the deſired city of Heri. Very ſtrong is this citie by ſcituation, compaſſed about with a good wall, and watered with deepe channels of running Springs, conueyed into it by Tamerlane their founder or reſtorer: beſide that, there was in it many valiant captains, enemies to Mirize Sulman, ready to lay down their liues in defence of themſelues and of Abas their Lord, ſo that the winning thereof, could not but proue both long and difficult. As ſoon as the king approched the city, he felt in himſelfe many troubled paſſions ariſing of griefe and pittie; it grieued him to thinke that he ſhould beget ſo graceleſſe a ſonne, who in ſtead of maintaining his ſtate and honour, ſhould ſeeke his ruine and deſtruction: it grieued him alſo to remember the bloud of his ſubiects, before ſpilt vpon ſo ſtrange an occaſion; & ſcarcely durſt he enter into the cogitation, thenceforth to ſhed any more of the bloud of his people. Neuertheleſſe, being ſtil more and more ſolicited by his Viſier, he attempted to vnderſtand the mind of his ſonne; and (if it might be poſſible) to get him into his hands. But whiles the king trauelling, with theſe thoughts lay with his army before Heri, Abas Mirize in the meane time, writ diuers letters to his father and to his brother; wherein he beſought them, That they would make knowne vnto him the occaſion of this their ſtir: for if deſire of rule had moued them to ſeeke the depriuation of him, being their ſonne and brother, from the honor he lawfully poſſeſſed, and which his father himſelfe procured for him of his grandfather Tamas, they ought to abandon their imagination, for that he was always ready to ſpend his wealth and his bloud, together with his eſtate, in their ſeruice, and acknowledged his father to be his good father & king: but if they were not induced hereunto for this cauſe, but by a deſire to reuenge ſome treſpaſſes that he had committed to the preiudice of the crown of Perſia, or his fathers honor, he was moſt ready to ſubmit himſelfe to any amends; and with all reaſon, to yeeld vnto them the kingdome, yea the whole world, and euen his owne life, the rather to ſatsfie their mindes with a more full contentation. With twice and thrice reading ouer, were theſe affectionate letters conſidered & digeſted: and at laſt, both the father and the brother perceiuing in them ſuch liberality of words, & ouercome with pitty, or if not with pitty, yet with great admiration & contentment, they determined to put the matter in practiſe; and moderating their deſire of reuenge, to attempt the reducing of the yong mans mind to ſome good paſſe. Whereupon they wrot backe vnto him, That no greedie deſire to vſurpe his gouernment, had induced them to make ſo great a voyage, to trouble ſo much people, and to ſhed ſuch abundance of bloud, but only his diſobedience and preſumption, in that he had cauſed himſelfe to be called the king of Perſia; and had not ſent ſo much as one captaine to aid them in the late wars againſt the Turks. Glad was Abas the young Prince, when he vnderſtood the accuſations that were laied againſt him, hoping to make it manifeſt before all men, how the king & his brother were miſinformed in theſe particularities: and therefore incontinently did write backe vnto them, That if they would faithfully promiſe him, honourably, & without any outrage to receiue his Embaſſadors, he would ſend vnto them ſuch euident matter, and ſo cleere information touching thoſe his accuſations, as that they ſhould not onely cleerely perceiue that there was neuer any ſuch kind of thought in him, but alſo that he had always deſired & labored the contrary: and would moreouer open vnto them ſuch matter, as in reſpect of other men, and not of himſelfe, might cauſe their comming to prooue profitable and commodious to all the Kingdome of Perſia. Which his requeſt they both ſolemnly promiſed faithfully to performe, being very deſirous to vnderſtand, what thoſe ſtrange nouelties ſhould be. Whereupon Abas Mirize ſent vnto them two of his chiefe counſellors, men of great account & reuerence both for their yeres & wiſedome, dome, with full inſtructions: who after many ſpeeches, in the end ſwearing (according to their cuſtome) by the Creator that ſpread out the aire, that founded the earth vpon the deeps, that adorned the heauen with ſtars, that poured abroad the water, that made the water; and briefly, of nothing, brought forth all things, ſwearing by the head of Ali, and by the religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that ſuch peruerſe thoughts neuer entred into the head of Abas Mirize: they alleadged many teſtimonies and manifeſt proofes, that moſt loyally in all due time, as well when he was aduanced to the kingdom of Perſia, as alſo in his battels againſt the Turks, his ſon had alwaies cauſed deuout prayers and ſupplications to be made to God for his proſperitie; neither euer deſired to heare any other, but happy and fortunat ſucceſſe of him. They brought with them a thouſand and a thouſand precepts & loyall letters, which the yong man had cauſed to be written, as occaſions required to the gouernors that were his ſubiects, for the gouernment of the State, wherein he neuer named himſelfe King of Perſia, but only, Your King and Gouernor of Heri. They prayed the king alſo, to cauſe a diligent proceſſe to be framed againſt his ſon; and if there ſhould be found in him any ſigne or ſhadow of ſo wicked a ſuſpition, then to take from him his eſtate and libertie; offering themſelues to remain as hoſtages for him. But when all this ſhould be done, and Abas found altogether free from theſe vniuſt accuſations, then (falling euen to the earth and kiſſing it) they beſought him, and as it were coniured him, not to leaue the matter thus imperfect, to the preiudice of his bloud; but returning to his counſellor, to take information likewiſe, vpon what mind & conſideration he had aduiſed the king, to take vpon him this vnorderly and dangerous voyage; where no doubt hee ſhould find nothing in him, but malignant, ambitious, and wicked affections; and ſuch as euen deſerued, that with his bloud there ſhould be reuenged all the bloud of thoſe, which till that houre had bin brought to their vnworthy & vndeſerued deaths. And foraſmuch as nothing remained, whereof the Viſier had informed the king againſt his ſon, but the commandment that was giuen by Abas Mirize to the Gouernors vnder him, That they ſhould not go to the wars againſt the Turkes: they confeſſed in truth, that ſuch an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traiterous end & purpoſe as was reported to the king by his great counſellor, but only in reſpect of an inuaſion iuſtly feared in thoſe quarters by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas; who by diuers inrodes had already done great harme in the countrie about Heri, and put young Abas and his counſellors in ſuch a feare, that they durſt not diſfurniſh their cities of their guards and forces: and therefore had commanded the ſaid Gouernors, not to go to war againſt the Turks, but to ſtay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing ſignified vnto the Viſier himſelfe: which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to trie, if in theſe common troubles he could bring to paſſe, that Abas Mirize and the king might be taken away, and Emir Hamze ſucceed in his place; and ſo he himſelfe remain the Superintendent of his ſon in law, & Moderator of that moſt famous kingdome. Of which ſo treacherous a purpoſe, they (for all that) thought Emir Hamze the young Prince altogether ignorant (knowing his honourable diſpoſition and loue towards his owne kindred) but imputed it onely to the immoderat and ambitious deſire of the wicked traitor Mirize Salmas.

The Embaſſadors of Abas accuſe Mirize Salmas the Viſier.

Of theſe graue ſpeeches of the Embaſſadors, Mahamet the father (by nature credulous) began to make great conſtruction; and deepely to conſider of their ſo earneſt and important requeſts; which ſeemed vnto him ſo vpright and equall, as that he could not chuſe but hearken vnto the ſame. And therefore calling vnto him the Gouernors, the Captaines, the Iudges, and Treaſurers of all the cities that were ſubiect to Heri: he demanded of them, how and in what ſort they eſteemed of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of honor he deſired to be eſteemed of them: and of them al receiued one anſwer, That they held him for their Lord & Lieutenant to the King of Casbin, and that he himſelfe had alwaies deſired to be ſo taken & thought of: for proofe whereof, euery one of them brought in diuers letters, precepts, and orders; wherein he neuer cauſed himſelfe to be honored with any other title, but only, Your King of Heri. He demanded further, Whether any ſuch warres were attempted by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas or not: whereof he receiued a large and ſolemne information, that ſo it was, to the great detriment of all thoſe territories. And thus the king was throughly perſuaded of the innocencie of his ſon; who before was noted vnto him by his Viſier, to be an obſtinat Rebell. Vpon which occaſion only, although he might iuſtly haue put him to death, as author of ſo great troubles & bloudſhed, yet becauſe he would be better enformed of the truth of the accuſations laid againſt him by

A by the Embaſſadors, he reſolued to make a curious and diligent inquiſition therof: & therefore firſt of al, in great ſecrecie he examined Emir Hamze his eldeſt ſonne, wherefore he had aduiſed this iourny againſt his brother Abas, whom he had found guiltleſſe of all thoſe crimes that were obiected againſt him: Whereunto the Prince anſwered, That he had no other certaintie of the pretended euill behauior of his brother, but only that which proceeded from the great credit that he alwaies gaue to his father in law Mirize Salmas, to whom as to a chiefe counſellor, his father in law, and Protector of the kingdom, he had alwaies yeelded aſſured credence: and ſo diſcharged the whole tempeſts of al thoſe miſchiefs vpon the Viſier. Touching whom the king made diligent inquiſition, as well among thoſe of the court, as of the armie; and therby found him guilty of al that the Embaſſadors of Heri had accuſed him: & that being always B acquainted with the true occaſions which reſtrained the Gouernors of Heri (ſubiect to Abas Mirize) from going to the war againſt the Turks, he had moſt maliciouſly concealed the ſame, of purpoſe to hatch ſuch a ſtrange and dangerous diſcontentment, as had wrought the vnworthie death of many great men, and almoſt defiled the hands of the father with the innocent bloud of his guiltleſſe ſonne. For which ſo foule a treaſon the falſe Viſier was worthily condemned to die; and his wily head by the commandement of the king, ſtrucke from his carkaſſe. Iuſtly rewarded, with the ſame puniſhment which he vniuſtly ſought to haue conuerted vpon others; and with his owne deſtruction pacified the diſſentions and battels that were riſen betweene the two Princes. And ſo the two brethren being reconciled together, and the ſonne to the father; after that Abas had againe promiſed his wiſhed obedience (which he afterwards C moſt dutifully performed) king Mahamet returned with the Prince towards Casbin: where by reaſon of new and vnexpected motions of the Turks, he had now been long looked for and deſired.

Mirize Salmas the Viſier found guilty of treaſon and beheaded.

Amurath through the rough ſpeeches of Sinan, was more and more ſetled in his purpoſe for the continuing of the Perſian warre; accounting it ſo much the more to his owne glorie, as it ſhould in happie ſucceſſe fall out contrarie to the opinion of many: and thereupon began to bethinke himſelfe, whom he might chuſe for his General, to whom he might commit ſo great a charge. Among the Baſſa's of the court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe yeres, but yet fierce of courage, tough in opinion, in counſell as hardie as might beſeeme his age, readie for al ſodden & ſtrange aduentures, but aboue all, a vaſſall moſt deuoted to the king: of this man, at laſt D he was reſolued to make choice to haue the leading of his armie: and therefore calling him apart, declared vnto him what he had in himſelf purpoſed; encouraging him to take the charge vpon him, with a firm reſolution to perform all things anſwerable to ſo worthy an enterpriſe, with the opinion he had conceiued of his valor. Very willing did Ferat accept of this new office, & thought himſelf (as indeed he was) highly fauored by the king: & therupon made him a large promiſe, to employ his ſtrength, his wit, and vttermoſt deuoire, to put in execution whatſoeuer ſhould be offered vnto him, either by occaſion, or by his royall commandement.

Ferat Baſſa choſen Generall of the armie in Sinans place.

At firſt Amurath had no other purpoſe to imploy him any further, but onely to aſſure the paſſage to Teflis, and ſo into all Georgia; and to haue deſtroyed the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian, who had ſo audaciouſly iniured the lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole army E in confuſion: but being certainly aduertiſed of the troubles in Perſia betweene the king & his ſonne, he changed his purpoſe, and commanded Ferat to employ all his forces to erect a fortreſſe at Reiuan, a place belonging vnto Tocomac, and to aſſure the paſſage from Chars to Reiuan; for ſo they ſhould be reuenged of many harmes they had receiued by him, and lay open the way to the citie of Tauris, to the great glorie of Amurath. As for Muſtaffa the Georgian, although he had well deſerued to be chaſtiſed for his raſh attempt againſt Mahamet Baſſa, being then his Generall, yet hee willed Ferat to diſſemble his euill opinion of him; and (if it were poſſible) ſo to worke, as to vſe him as an inſtrument to conuey treaſure and ſuccours to Teflis: for by this meanes the paſſage beeing made ſafe, all Georgia would without any moe fortreſſes bee ſubdued, and then the next yeare they might attempt the enterpriſe for F Tauris.

Highly did Ferat commend the deuices of Amurath his Lord, and ſhewed himſelfe readie for any attempt. And ſo the time being come wherein it behoued them to ſet on foot their important deſignements, in the beginning of the yeare 1583, commandements were ſent out to al the cities of the empire, which were wont to make their appearance at theſe wars, That vpon freſh ſummons, they ſhould be ready to returne againſt the Perſians, and to put in execution that ſhould be inioyned them by their new Generall. The fame whereof flew as farre as Soria, Iurie, Paleſtine, Meſopotamia, Babylonia, to Balſara, to Siuas, to Maras, to all Bythinia, Capadocia, Cilicia, Armenia; yea and beyond Conſtantinople to the borders of Hungarie and Græce, and in briefe, to all the Regions that were woont to come to this Warre: all which ſent their Captaines and ſouldiers accordingly. And ſo at laſt Generall Ferat departing from Conſtantinople, and paſſing ouer to Scutari by the way of Amaſia and of Siuas, came to Erzirum, where hee tooke a view of all his armie and prouiſion: and from thence in eight dayes arriued at Chars, conducted by the Perſian fugitiue Maxus Chan: and from Chars, ſet himſelfe on his way towards Reiuan. Three daies before hee came to Reiuan, of certaine ruines of an old Caſtle which the Turkes call Aggia Chalaſi (or the Caſtle of ſtrangers) he erected a new fortreſſe, and left in it a garriſon of foure hundred ſouldiers, with a Sanzacke, and certaine pieces of ordnance, and then went to Reiuan. This countrie is diſtant from Tauris eight or nine dayes iourney; betweene which two places are ſcituate Naſſiuan, Chiulfal, Marant, and Sofian, all enriched with goodly gardens and pleaſant greenes: but in the way are many craggie mountaines to be climed, and ſundrie hard paſſages either for armie or traueller.

Generall Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople.

He commeth to Reiuan.

Heere then did Ferat encampe himſelfe with his armie, and taking aduice of his chiefe captains, where he ſhould build the fort, they all with one conſent aduiſed him, to ſeiſe vpon the houſes and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, encloſing the gardens with ſtrong wals and deepe ditches round about, whereinto he conueighed water from a certaine riuer, that comming downe from the mountains, ran into Araxis. Which worke was performed with ſuch expedition, that within the ſpace of fifteene daies the fortreſſe was finiſhed, being in circuit ſeuen hundred & fiftie yards. It grieued Tocomac exceedingly, thus to loſe his country and dwelling, and ſo much the more, becauſe it hapned ſo ſuddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. He himſelfe, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Turkiſh armie was comming to that coaſt, hauing withdrawne himſelfe and his men of war out of the city he could not keep, ſought by all means to be reuenged, if not altogether, yet in ſome part, of this ſo great an iniurie. And therfore he wrot vnto the king at Gorazan, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia, he gathered ſouldiers out of the villages, and vſed all his poſſible indeuour to enable himſelfe to annoy the enemies army: but from none of theſe places could he receiue any help, the king being ſo far off in wars againſt his ſonne, the Georgian being buſied by hindering any reliefe to be brought to the beſieged in Teflis; as for Emir Chan (who by ſolemne promiſe vnto the king before his departure to Heri, had vndertaken the defence of that ſide of the kingdom againſt the Turks) he either would not, or could not ſtir; neither ſent ſo much as one ſouldier, hauing as ſome ſuppoſed, ſecret intelligence with Generall Ferat, not to diſturbe him in this his worke. So Tocomac deſtitute of all other helpe, and not able of himſelfe to do much againſt ſo mightie an enemie; yet ceaſed not to lay ſuch priuie ambuſhes for the Turkes as he could, killing of them ſometimes 100, ſometime 150, and ſometimes mo, as they fell into his danger. And to eaſe his ſtomacke againſt Emir Chan (who ſitting ſtill at Tauris as it were to behold his miſerie, would not ſo much as ſhake a ſword againſt theſe ſpoiling Turks) he ſpared not to diſpatch certaine horſemen in haſt to the king at Corazan, and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardiſe of Emir Chan; intermedling withall ſome cauſes of ſuſpition, that he had ſome intelligence with the Turkiſh Generall.

Ferat in the ſpace of fifteene daies buildeth a fort at Reiuan 750 yards about Ferat hauing thus built this new fort at Reiuan, as Amurath had commanded, and furniſhed it with artillerie, and all other things needfull for the defence thereof; appointed Sinan Baſſa (the ſonne of Cicala a renegat of Genoa, and by Selymus the late Emperor, in the flower of his youth created Aga or Captaine of the Ianizaries) with a garriſon of eight thouſand ſouldiers to keepe the ſame. And ſo departing thence, by the way of Aggia Chalaſi, in ten daies arriued with his armie at Chars.

Ferat had not long ſtaied at Chars, but ſtrange newes were brought thither, That Muſtaffa the Georgian (to whom Amurath had ſent thirtie thouſand duckats, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to haue by him been conueyed to Teflis for the reliefe of them in the fort) was reuolted from the Turkiſh obedience, and being now become a rebell, had left that fortreſſe in manifeſt danger to yeeld, if by ſome other means it were not relieued. Which ſtrange

A nouelties exceedingly troubled the General; who to know the certainty therof, called before him all ſuch as were the meſſengers of this misfortune: by whom he was certainly informed, That Muſtaffa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, hauing put themſelues vpon their way towards Teflis with the treaſure, guarded with a conuoy of fiue hundred of his ſouldiers, in the mid way had met with his couſen Simon the Georgian; by whom hee was perſuaded to returne againe to his antient faith and religion, which he had to the great perill of his ſoule ſo prophanely abandoned, and to ſhake off the ſeruice of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hard and infamous captiuitie, and in the end ſome fraudulent and treacherous death: and that his perſuaſion had ſo preuailed with Muſtaffa, that he cauſed the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and preſently beheaded; and diuiding the treaſure B with his ſaid couſen, had with him and his other kinſmen vowed a ſolemne and perpetual confederacie: and ſo hauing withdrawne themſelues to their woonted paſſages, lay there in wait for ſuch ſuccors as ſhould by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat vnderſtood theſe and ſuch other particularities, he all in a furie ſwore that hee would not returne to Erzirum vntill he had put all the countrey of Muſtaffa to fire and ſword: yet firſt he thought it needfull to relieue Teflis, which would otherwiſe be in danger to be yeelded to the enemy: and for that purpoſe made choice of Haſſan Baſſa, who in the laſt yeare of the Generalſhip of Muſtapha, had moſt couragiouſly conueyed the like ſuccours, and taken Aliculi Chan. Vnto him therefore did the General aſſigne fortie thouſand duckets, with other prouiſion neceſſarie for that ſeruice, and for the more ſecuritie, appointed him fifteene thou- C ſand of the moſt choice and valiant ſoldiers in all the armie, to conduct the ſame. In ten dayes ſpace Haſſan Baſſa went and came from Teflis, hauing in his journey to and fro had many skirmiſhes with the Georgians, wherein he loſt ſome few men, without any other loſſe worth the remembrance.

After this, the General ſent one Reſuan Baſſa with ſix thouſand ſouldiers to ſpoile the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian the late renegate, but now become a rebell to the Turke: which Reſuan, without any long ſtay ouerran all his territory, burnt his townes, and committed moſt vncouth outrages, which extended euen vnto the poore inſenſible trees, and carried away with him many captiue ſoules, with much corne and cattell, like a raging tempeſt deſtroying whatſoeuer came in his way. Now was the General alſo retired to Ardachan, whither came Reſuan D to meet him with his foreſaid bootie. But becauſe they had now performed what they had before intended, and the approch of Winter perſuaded their returne, they remoued from Ardachan, and by the way of Olti retyred to Erzirum, from whence all the ſoldiers were licenſed to depart to their ſeueral places of abode, and a memorial ſent to Amurath, of all the actions had beene performed, and eſpecially of the good ſeruice done by Haſſan Baſſa; who for the ſame was now once againe honoured by the King, with cloath of gold, a battleaxe and targuet all gilt.

Ferat commeth to Erzirum, & there breaketh vp his armie.

About this time one Podolonius a gentleman of Polonia, ſent by Stephen King of Polonia, to Conſtantinople, by the leaue of Amurath to buy certaine horſes in Anatolia, returning home- E wards with foure and twentie goodly horſes which he had bought, was notwithſtanding the Great Turks Paſſe, by his commandement ſtayed vpon the way, all his men (in number foure and thirtie) ſlaine, excepting one boy, who getting into a wood, eſcaped, and Podolonius his head ſtrucke off. The horſes brought backe to Conſtantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, ſome beſtowed into his owne ſtable, and the reſt giuen among the Baſſa's, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turks, in deriſion of the Polonian King. This Amurath commanded to be done in reuenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Coſſacks againſt the Turks, whereof newes was but euen then brought to the court.

The nine and twentieth day of Nouember of this preſent yeare 1583, died Hama Chadum the widow of the late Emperor Selymus the ſecond, and mother of this Amurath, and lieth buried by her husband Selymus, and his fiue ſonnes, ſtrangled by their brother Amurath.

The death of Hama Chadum Amurath his mother.

All the reſt of this yeare 1583 Ferat ſpent at Erzirum, and afterwards ſent out his ordinarie commandements to all the accuſtomed cities, to ſummon the ſouldiers againſt the next Spring in the yere 1584, gathering together a greater number of pioners and enginiers than euer had been gathered in theſe warres heretofore: and withall gaue it out, That he would go to Naſſiuan, and there do great matters. At which report the Perſians were much mooued, and began

gan to caſt many things in their heads about it: but aboue all others the king, who vnderſtanding at Casbin of all that had before happed at Reiuan, and of the new preparations of the Turks, began to feare that they would this yeare paſſe to Tauris, or at leaſt (as was reported) to Naſſiuan, and in thoſe places build new fortreſſes, to the great danger of the Perſian Empire: and therefore retaining ſtill ſuch forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many moe as he could out of all the cities that were ſubiect vnto him, to follow him to Tauris, he arriued there with his army not long after the arriual of Ferat Baſſa at Erzirum. This vnexpected comming of the Perſian king with ſo great an armie to Tauris, filled the world with expectation of great matters to haue bin done by him againſt the Turks: inſomuch that Ferat the Generall, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to aduertiſe Amurath of the matter: declaring vnto him, That his deſire was to go to Naſſiuan, and there to build a fortreſſe according to his commandement, ſo to lay open a paſſage to Tauris: but hauing receiued certaine intelligence, that the Perſian king was come to Tauris with an huge army, and full reſolution to encounter him; he thought it his dutie not to put in execution his aforeſaid determination, without his expreſſe commandement. Vnto whom Amurath preſently wrot backe, that the matter ſo ſtanding, he ſhould not go to Naſſiuan, but onely imploy his forces to aſſure the paſſage to Tomanis and Lori, that ſo the fort of Teflis might the yeare following be relieued by ſome ſmall band, without ſending of any great armie for the conueying of ſuccours thither. This new commandement of his Lord, Ferat kept ſecret to himſelfe; cauſing the rumor of his going to Naſſiuan to be more and more increaſed; of purpoſe to feed the opinion that the Perſians had before conceiued of his comming thither; and ſo deluding them, with leſſe danger to build the forts he had intended, for the quieting of thoſe moſt dangerous paſſages of Lori and Tomanis. G H I

Vpon this reſolution Ferat hauing gathered together his people, with all things neceſſarie for his purpoſe, remoued with his armie from Erzirum toward Chars, where hee ſtayed ten dayes to take a new ſuruey both of his ſouldiers and prouiſion. And ſo departing thence, ſet forward toward Lori; ſending before him Haſſan Baſſa with fiue thouſand light horſemen to ſcoure the country euen to Tomanis, and to learne what he poſſibly could of the enemies purpoſes, and the ſtate of Georgia. Which thing Haſſan dutifully performed, ſpeedily ſcouring ouer all the woods, and diſcloſing all the paſſages from thence to Lori, and ſo to Tomanis, without meeting with any vpon whom to aſſay his valour, more than certaine robbers vpon the high-way, whom he cauſed to be ſlaine (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Perſian affaires) and their heads to be ſet on the tops of their launces, and ſo returned againe to Lori: where hauing ſtayed one day, he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his excurſion. Ferat being come to Lori, there incamped his army. This place did ſometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well ſtrengthened with an high caſtle, compaſſed about with very deepe ditches, and a thicke wall almoſt a mile in circuit, but was then ſomewhat weakened with time: it is diſtant from Teflis about two dayes journy of a carriers pace. Vpon this caſtle Ferat ſeiſed; and hauing repaired the walls, and ſtrengthened the breaches, he placed therein Ali Baſſa of Græce, with ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers for the defence thereof, and planted vpon the walls two hundred ſmall pieces of ordnance. And ſo when he had ſet all things there in good order, departed thence with his armie towards Tomanis, hauing before commanded Ali Baſſa, at ſome conuenient time to fortifie Saitan Chalaſi, a caſtle about ten miles diſtant from Lori, and therein to place a conuenient garriſon of ſouldiers and artillerie. K L

Foure dayes were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one dayes worke from the one place to the other: but now the General would needs ſo make it, to take the ſpoile of thoſe rich fields, abounding with corne, cattel, & fruit, and to leaue vnto the country people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At laſt being come to Tomanis (in times paſt a caſtle of Simons, but by reaſon of theſe warres, by him then abandoned) he began to conſult with the other captaines, how and where the Fort ſhould be erected, for the aſſurance of that country. But after many diſcourſes, it was at laſt concluded not to fortifie in that caſtle, as being too far from the ſtrait, to make that dangerous paſſage ſafe and ſecure; but to go a little further, and to build a fortreſſe vpon the very mouth of the ſtrait. So the Armie marching forward a few miles, at the very enterance of the narrow paſſage found the ruines of another Caſtle, and M

A and neere thereunto ſtayed themſelues. This ſteepe headlong caſtle was ſo compaſſed round about with a thicke wood, which hindered all diſcouery a farre off, that it was not conuenient to found ſuch a caſtle there, from whence their ordnance could neither aſſaile thoſe to whom the defence thereof ſhould be committed, neither indamage thoſe that ſhould come to beſiege it. And therefore the Generall commaunded, that euery man without loſing one day more ſhould lay to his hand for the cutting downe of that thicke wood, and making way through thicke and thin, to lay it for an open champaigne, that was before the receptacle of a thouſand dangerous treacheries. In very ſhort ſpace were the trees laid along the ground, the place made lightſome and open, and a very commodious ſituation prepared for the foundation of a caſtle. The plot of the old ruined caſtle was compaſſed about with a wall of a thouſand & ſeuen hundred yards, and in the midſt thereof was erected a ſtrong Keepe, with lodgings and B chambers builded, and 200 pieces of ordnance diſtributed vpon the new walls. After that, the General ſent Reſuan Baſſa and the Baſſa of Ceraemit, with 20000 of his moſt choice ſoldiers, to conuey ſuccors to Teflis: who marching cloſely together in the direct way, in one day arriued at the ſayd fort, wherein they beſtowed their ſupplies, and changing the Gouernour thereof, ſubſtituted in his roome one Bagli, being then vpon this occaſion only called a Baſſa. Whileſt Reſuan yet lay thus incamped vnder Teflis, Daut Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of theſe wars, at the comming of Muſtapha the Turks General into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his familie, and offered himſelfe as a ſubiect and deuoted vaſſal to the Turkiſh Emperor: whom Reſuan entertained with great promiſes, and C large aſſurances of all good ſucceſſe, according to his deſire.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That General Ferat ſtaying at the ſtraits of Tomanis with his armie, had ſent Reſuan Baſſa with a far leſſe number than indeed he had, to ſuccor Teflis: Vpon which report he tooke courage to encounter Reſuan, and to giue him battell. Vpon which reſolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 2000 Georgians, partly ſubiects of his owne, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all ſpeed poſſible went againſt Reſuan. But whileſt Simon was going thitherwards, General Ferat fearing the worſt, had alreadie by chance diſpatched away the two Baſſa's of Caramania and Maras, with 10000 ſouldiers, to the end that joining themſelues with the ſoldiers of Reſuan, they ſhould at all aduentures be ſo much the ſtronger. Now Simon going reſolutely on, found Reſuan incamped D with 6000 ſoldiers only, at the foot of an hill, on the backe ſide whereof lay all the reſt of the armie, and preſently gaue a charge vpon him: when the ſoldiers behind the hill being aware of his comming, were readie all at once with their weapons to receiue him. Who now perceiuing his error, repented himſelfe to haue ſo raſhly aſſaulted his enemies, ſeeing now no other remedie but to be vtterly vndone. But ſeeing that he had now ſo far ingaged himſelfe, as that he could not by flight but increaſe his griefe, and make the iſſue more lamentable, with theſe few ſoldiers which he had, he endured the furie of the great armie of Reſuan, ſo that on both ſides there was joined a moſt cruell battell: wherein the ſtrange and vnuſuall valour of thoſe few Chriſtians was much to be wondred at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkiſh ſwords E and ſpeares ſo preuailed vpon that ſmall number of the Georgians, as that they were brought to great extremitie: yea Simon himſelfe hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, fell down headlong to the ground, and in his fall was very neere to haue bin taken priſoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not bin relieued by an vnexpected and maruellous chance: for whiles the battell was euen at the greateſt heat betweene them, Reſuan diſcouered the two Baſſa's of Caramania and Maras, who (as is before ſaid) were newly ſent by General Ferat to ſuccour him; but both by the ſaid Reſuan, and alſo by the reſt of his Armie, were indeed thought to be Perſians: whereupon they were incontinently ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, inſomuch that they now became very doubtful of the victory, whereof they thought themſelues before aſſured. In this ſuſpence and doubtfulneſſe of minde the battell was alſo intermitted, and the victorie by the ſight of thoſe their friends diſturbed: whereby the Georgians, and eſpecially Simon, whoſe eſtate was almoſt deſperat, tooke the opportunitie to eſcape and ſaue themſelues, leauing behinde them moſt ſure ſignes of their valour among the Turkes, of whom many remained there ſlaine, many wounded, and many filled with great meruaile and vnexpected feare. Thus eſcaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his knowne places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captiuitie of his ſubiects. But Reſuan after he had diſcouered the Baſſa's approching towards him, to be his knowne friends and welwillers, fretted in himſelfe exceedingly, that Simon had ſo eſcaped his hands: yet holding on his way to Tomanis, he arriued there in great triumph, drawing the ſtandards of Simon all along the ground, and cauſing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried vpon his ſouldiers launces, to the great ioy of Generall Ferat, to whom he deliuered all the priſoners taken in the battell, and wicked Daut Chan, who hauing in times paſt renounced his firſt faith, was become a Perſian; and now againe deſpiſing the vaine ſuperſtition of the Perſians, had yeelded himſelfe to the vanitie of the Turks, and made himſelfe a voluntarie ſlaue to Amurath.

Simon in danger to haue bin taken, eſcapeth by a ſtrange chance.

Now was the yeare ſo far ſpent, that euery man began to feare the Winters approch; and therefore the Generall determined to remooue thence, and to withdraw himſelfe into places of more ſafetie. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Haſſan to be the Baſſa of Tomanis, and left with him eight thouſand ſelect ſoldiers choſen out of all the armie, for the defence of that fort and the countrey thereabout. Deepely had Ferat laied vp the outrage committed by Muſtaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manucchiar) in taking away the kings treaſure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus: and therefore he reſolued with himſelfe, not to returne to Chars or Erzirum, vnleſſe he had firſt paſſed into the countrey of the ſaid Georgian, and in moſt cruell manner reuenged thoſe notable iniuries before receiued. In three dayes he arriued at Triala, and there incamped. But lying there, ſuch an vnwonted dearth and ſcarcitie of all things roſe in the armie, but eſpecially of victuals, that euery fiue buſhels and a halfe of wheat was ſould for fiue hundred duckets, to the vniuerſall calamitie of the whole armie.

From this place, the Generall was minded to go on forwards towards the countrey of Manucchiar; but whiles he was vpon the raiſing of his tents, one Veis Baſſa of Aleppo came vnto him and told him, That it was not good now to ſpend the time in wandering about thoſe countries, for that there were three very great enemies confederate together, to make this enterpriſe very difficult, and almoſt impoſſible and deſperat: one was the ſeaſon of the yeare, being now full of ſnowes, froſt, and tempeſt; another was, the want and ſcarcitie of all things neceſſarie, eſpecially of victual; the third was, the people of Georgia, who by a common vniting of themſelues together, and peraduenture aided by the Perſians, might worke ſome notable miſchiefe againſt the armie. This ſpeech of Veis ſo much offended the Generall, that he moſt ſharpely rebuked him, and with bitter termes reproued him, telling him flatly, That hee well perceiued that he was brought vp among mountaines and villages, and of a villaine (as he was) vpon ſome ſuperfluitie of grace, or fooliſh importunitie, aduanced to the honour of a Baſſa, and that therefore he ſhould not haue preſumed ſo much as to thinke it lawfull for him, ſo impudently and malapertly to come and giue him ſuch aduertiſements; whereas it had beene his dutie rather to haue held his peace, and to haue hearkened to the commandments of his betters and ſuperiors, yeelding himſelfe obedient and deuoted with all his power to performe the ſame. With this rebuke the Generall paſſed on to Archelech, burning and in a manner deſtroying the countrey before him, though indeed it was in amitie and confederacie with the Turks. But the inhabitants of Archelech vpon the comming of the Turkes had abandoned the Citie, and for feare withdrawne themſelues into the mountaines. In Archelech Ferat incamped, and ſtayed the ſpace of 4 daies among the rocky crags, and in a barren ſoile yeelding neceſſarie ſuſtenance neither for man nor beaſt; ſo that euery man there endured vnſpeakable miſeries: yet for the ſpace of foure dayes the ſouldiers with patience endured this ſo great a calamitie. But in the end, the fall of an huge ſnow being added to theſe extremities, did ſo greatly increaſe their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of Conſtantinople aroſe in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in deſpightfull and contemptuous manner with very haughty and reſolute termes ſaid vnto him:

And how long ſhall we endure this thy tedious and inſolent gouernment? Where is the due commiſeration that thou oughteſt to beare toward the Vaſſales of thy Soueraigne, thou ruſticall and vnreaſonable Captaine? Doeſt thou thinke happely, that wee keepe our Harlots as thou doeſt vnder thy ſumptuous pauilions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate viands, whileſt others liue in miſerie? Doeſt thou beleeue that we haue as thou haſt, our daintie ſugars, ſpices, and conſerues, whereby to reſtore vs, in the common calamitie of others? And that wee haue at command meat and pretious wines, which thou mingleſt with thy cleere and pleaſant water, partly prouided for thee by the art of the cunning

A Doctors, and partly brought to thee from far places? From this day forward it will be no longer endu- red, that ſo much people ſhould continue in this famine, afflicted with nakedneſſe and many other inconueniences: and therefore get thy ſelfe vp and returne toward Erzirum; otherwiſe we ſhall be enforced to do that which will breed more diſpleaſure vnto thee, than to any man liuing.

The Generall in a great agonie preſently called a Councel, wherein it was concluded, That they ſhould all ſend their ſtrong ſumpter horſes to Ardachan, and the reſt to follow him into Manucchiars countrey, whither he had appointed to go onely to make an inrode, and with the ſpoile and bootie of that countrey to refreſh the minds of his ſoldiers, afflicted with the miſeries both paſt and preſent. This commandement of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as B well becauſe he promiſed them a ſpeedie voyage, as alſo for that euery man deſired the ſacke of Altunchala and other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his journey tho-row certaine low vallies betweene the high and craggie mountaines, continually accompanied with great famine and ſcarcitie, at length brought his armie to Cliſca, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for feare of the Turkes quite abandoned and forſaken by the inhabitants; who with their wiues and children, and all the beſt ſtuffe they had, were fled into remote and ſafe places vntill the furie of the enemie was ouerpaſſed. In the fields neere vnto this place (bounding with corne and cattel, and plentie of fruit) the General refreſhed his whole armie; and hoping that all the ſoldiers would like it well to ſtay a while in that ſuch eaſe, determined with himſelfe to erect a fort in that place. And with this reſolution gaue commande-C ment to Reſuan Baſſa to go vp to the tower, and in the top thereof to ſet vp an enſigne, with a proclamation and publique report, That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, and fortifie it as he had done the other forts before. Reſuan accompanied with Amurath the Baſſa of Caramania, according to the commandement of the General, in the top of the tower ſet vp an enſigne or two: which as ſoone as the ſouldiers had eſpied, the forenamed Ianizaries and Spaoglans, thinking themſelues too much abuſed by the General, ariſing againe all in an vprore, repleniſhed with furie and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take downe the Enſignes that were ſet vp vpon the tower, and taking them in their hands, rapt the ſaid Reſuan once or twice about the pate, diſcharging withall a thouſand iniurious and deſpightfull words vpon him, and ſharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himſelfe D to countenance the action of Reſuan) with geſtures ful of deſpight, contempt, and diſdaine, reui-ling him with many ſhamefull and ſcornefull termes, they proteſted vnto him;

That they were not come to the wars, to exerciſe the occupation of maſons and dawbers, and to be employed in ſuch vile and diſhonourable offices; but only to manage their weapons, and thereby to demerit their ordinarie wages, and to purchaſe to themſelues glorie and renowne at the Kings hand. And therefore if he loued his head, and would not ſee thoſe armes turned againſt himſelfe, which hitherto had been the reuengers of the enemies iniuries, he ſhould reſolue with himſelfe, to leaue theſe new buildings and theſe vnſeaſonable deſignements, and giuing place to the contrarie ſeaſon of the yeare, to haue due care of their common deſires and neceſſitie.

The mutinous ſoldiers againe threaten their Generall.

Whiles they were yet thus expoſtulating the matter with him, one more bold than the reſt, and more forgetfull of his dutie, did not ſticke to aſſault the General, and to threaten him to wreake his fury vpon him: which in that tumult had haply beene done, had not the Baſſa of Caramania lent the General his owne horſe, and ſo conducted him to his pauilion. Yet was he neuertheleſſe ſtill purſued by the tumultuous ſoldiers, and againe ſharply accuſed for the ſtay that he made there, and for not reſoluing preſently to remoue thence: and at laſt after many reprochfull ſpeeches, told expreſly, That if he did not the next morning remooue out of thoſe quarters, without all faile he ſhould loſe his life for it. For all that, Ferat diſdaining to yeeld F to them that ſhould of dutie haue been readie and obedient at euery becke of his, and ſeeking by all meanes (notwithſtanding all this ſtirre) to ſtay there ſo long time as ſhould be ſufficient to build a fort, that would ſo much offend Manucchiar; anſwered them againe:

That he made no account of their threatening him with his life, which hee had alwaies offered to lay downe for any ſeruice of his King. But if they had no care to ſerue their Soueraigne in this new building, they might go their wayes: as for himſelfe hee was reſolutely minded to obey his Lord in whatſoeuer he had commanded him; for the honour of whom euery one of them ought to thinke their liues very G well beſtowed.

The ſtout anſwer of Ferat.

The ſouldiours ouerthrow the Generals tents, and threaten to kill him.

Vpon this anſwer there followed diuers railings and curſings againſt the King, againſt the General, and againſt them all; and in this confuſed tumult euery man betooke himſelfe to his weapons: in euery corner was heard grumlings and whiſperings full of wrath and indignation; ſo that there was a great feare of ſome dangerous euent, but greater was the ſuſpition of the Generals life. And now euery man had withdrawne himſelfe to the guarding of ſuch things as he eſteemed moſt; when ſuddenly and in a trice you might haue ſeene the pauilions of all the Baſſa's and Captaines fall downe flat to the ground, all the cords thereof being cut in H ſunder by the wrathfull ſoldiers; and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattel the Generall and Baſſa's led with them for their ordinarie vſe, were ſeiſed vpon by the ſame ſouldiers, and guarded with all diligence poſſible. And ſo far was it off that any man durſt challenge or reuenge this their inſolencie, that they themſelues turning afreſh vpon their General, being now in a maze and deadly feare, began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remoue from thoſe Countries, and turne his journy towards Erzirum, thoſe vallies and fields ſhould without all faile become the ſepulchres of the Baſſa's, and thoſe hills retaine the eternall memorie of ſo bloudie a day.

With a little liberalitie might the General haue done with this people whatſoeuer he had liſted, but being loth to gratifie them in any thing, he was inforced to performe their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great ſhame, to obey them, whom with right vſage he might I haue made obedient to himſelfe: and therefore to auoid their deſpightfull threats, to his exceeding great reproch, he was glad euen as they had commanded, to remooue out of thoſe quarters. The firſt day he arriued at Ardachan, with the great trouble of all his ſouldiers: for whereas the journey was wont to be two dayes worke ordinarily, as well in reſpect of the length of the way, as the difficultie of the paſſage; the General would now needs haue it done in one, the rather thereby to grieue his ſouldiers. But of this his wilfulneſſe he receiued euen the ſame day the iuſt reward; for that the Chariots wherein his women rid were conueyed away, together with the Eunuchs that were their keepers: ſome ſay by the Georgians that lay in wait for ſuch a prey; others ſay by the Ianizaries, who the more to diſhonor their General, K wrought him this iniurie.

Great was the reproch that Ferat receiued in the armie, but far greater at Conſtantinople, when theſe newes were there knowne; but there was no remedie, he muſt now perforce endure it, and diſcontented as he was, keepe on his way towards Erzirum. In Ardachan he tooke a ſuruey of his army, and there gaue his ſoldiers leaue to depart: himſelfe afterwards ariuing at Erzirum, hated of all his ſoldiers, enuied by his captaines, derided for the loſſe of his women, and fallen into the diſgrace of euery man. No leſſe than the reſt was the Turkiſh Emperor diſcontented with him alſo: firſt for that he had don nothing worth ſpeaking of, in reuenge of the ſhamefull iniurie done by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet ſo mightily diſcontented his ſoldiers: and ſecondly, for that without any care he had ſuffered Aliculi Chan the Perſian priſoner to L eſcape away, about whoſe flight it was thought he could not chuſe but haue ſome intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to diuert his journey from Naſſiuan, to the ſtraits and narrow paſſages of Georgia, being deſirous to be throughly informed of thoſe dangerous ways; in this ſecond yeare when he remoued from Erzirum, tooke Aliculi Chan out of priſon, of purpoſe to vſe him as his guid in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, and therefore caried him vnder a gard (whatſoeuer it was afterwards) of his moſt faithfull vaſſals, ſtill entreating him well, and taking ſuch order as that he wanted nothing: at laſt being come to the ſtraits of Towmanis in Georgia, where the Caſtle (as it was before ſaid) was erected, he from thence ſecretly eſcaped into Perſia. The manner of his eſcape is diuerſly reported: ſome ſay, That Ferat in diſcharge of his promiſe, for his good direction had gratified him with his libertie. Others M ſay, That Ferat corrupted with money, gaue him opportunitie to eſcape: ſome others (with more probabilitie) That his eſcape was made neither for money, nor diſcharge of promiſe; but by the onely vigilancie of Aliculi himſelfe, and the ſleepineſſe of his keepers; and that watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all eſcapes) he ſtarted away. Howſo-

A euer it was, in fine he was deliuered from his long captiuitie, to the diſcredit of Ferat, and returned into Perſia, to performe ſuch enterpriſes againſt the Turkes, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

General Ferat (before his departure out of Georgia) had commanded Aly the Baſſa of Græcia (whom he left, as is before declared, in the new caſtle of Lori) to fortifie a certaine caſtle called Saitan Chas (in our language, The caſtle of the Deuill) which he with great diligence performed, and left therein fiftie pieces of artillerie, and a thouſand ſouldiers vnder the charge of a Sanzacke: and ſo quieted the paſſages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from Reiuan to Chars, and from Chars to Teflis, were made eaſie and ſafe; and all the meanes taken away whereby the enemy might be able to plot any new treacherie vpon thoſe paſſages: which was B no ſmall piece of good ſeruice.

The dangerous paſſage from Reiuan to Teflis ſecured vnto the Turkes.

The Perſian king in the meane time lying at Tauris with his armie, vnderſtanding that the Turks had changed their purpoſe from Naſsiuan to Georgia, ſo that there was no further need to imploy his armie againſt them for the defence of Tauris or Naſsiuan; at laſt reſolued with himſelfe to licence his ſouldiers to depart, and to apply himſelfe to more priuat reuenges. For calling Emir Chan vnto him, whom hee had left Gouernour of Tauris, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occaſion, why he had not performed the great promiſes which he had made to him before his departure to Heri, nor done his indeuor to hinder the Turks Fabrick at Reiuan; and why he went not out with other ſouldiers appointed for that purpoſe, and namely with the Turcomans (as he had promiſed) to reuenge ſo great an iniu- C rie, and in beſt manner he could, to haue indamaged the Turkiſh forces? Sundrie excuſes did Emir Chan alledge for the colouring of his manifeſt default, but none ſufficient to cleare him of the crimes obiected againſt him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the king adiudged to haue his eies burnt out with an hot yron, & ſo depriued of his ſight, to be deſpoiled of all his goods and ſhut vp in cloſe priſon. Which heauie doome was without further delay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the ſpace of a few moneths, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous ſoldier) miſerably died in priſon. Whoſe death ſo highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great eſtimation) that they abſolutely denied their defences for the crowne of Perſia: and the more, when they heard that the king had beſtowed the roome of Emir Chan vpon Aliculi; who although he had in many reſpects deſerued all pre- D ferment, yet for that he was an antient enemie to certaine Turcoman captaines, they would not in any wiſe indure that he ſhould be exalted to ſo great an honour. And therefore they waxed more diſdainfull and ill affected towards the king, wherby the Perſian forces became the more weakened and diuided.

The Turks notwithſtanding the league yet in force betwixt Amurath and Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor that now is, did many times make incurſions into the vpper part of Hungarie, burning the country villages, and carrying away the people into captiuitie: but in their returne, they were oftentimes cut off by the Emperors ſouldiers and ſlaine. Which being reported at Conſtantinople, much moued the Turkiſh tyrant: but when he vnderſtood that his men had E without any cauſe made thoſe inrodes into the territorie of the Chriſtians, and ſo receiued the foreſaid loſſes, he was againe appeaſed, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the Emperor for eight yeares more.

Ferat from Erzirum aduertiſed Amurath of all that had happed in his late expedition, deſiring him to command what he would haue taken in hand the next Spring. But beſides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like alſo, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious ſort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the eſcape of Aliculi Chan, the ſhameful loſſe of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling out with Veis Baſſa, a man well regarded of Amurath himſelfe, the diſorders of his whole camp for his want of diſcretion, and to be ſhort, the particularities of all ſuch actions as had not altogether ſo honorably bin by him performed that yeare: cauſes of themſelues ſufficient to induce the king to remoue the ſaid Ferat from his Generalſhip. To which occaſions, were alſo added ſundrie other ſecret reſpects: for euer ſince the laſt departure of Ferat from Erzirum, Amurath had ſtill in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterpriſe of Tauris, and thereby to ſtirre vp through the World a famous report of his conqueſt correſpondent to his greatneſſe. Now among the captaines whom he eſteemed to be worthy men, to whom he might with truſt commit this ſo great an enterpriſe, hee bethought himſelfe of Oſman Baſſa, left at Sumachia in Siruan by Generall Mustapha in the firſt yere of this war: who G hauing in that prouince remained euer ſince, had without any helpe of the Tartarians, by his owne induſtrie and valor, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large country into a reaſonable obedience to the Turkiſh Empire: and that which moſt of all pleaſed the Turkiſh emperour, had in a countrie ſo far diſtant, maintained his armie, wherewith he had done all this without any expences at all to his king, hauing now a good while leuied his ſouldiers ſtipends vpon the lands and territories of that region, and ſtill exerciſed a kind of gouernment and ſoueraigntie ouer thoſe places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had cauſed intelligence from time to time to be ſent vnto the court: by which means, and other fauorers which hee had about the king, there was foſtred in the minde of Amurath a wonderfull good opinion of him, ſo that now without delay he reſolued to ſend for him to Conſtantinople: & for H that purpoſe, before Ferat was arriued at Erzirum, he had diſpatched certain Capigi & Chiaus to call this famous warriour vnto him: yet wanted there not ſome (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court, & alſo theſe deſignements of ſo great importance. For Sciaus the chiefe Viſier (who rather for the comelineſſe of his perſon and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high roome) did greatly feare, leſt Oſman, whoſe courſe it was to ſit next vnto him in the order of the greateſt Baſſaes, partly for his experience in matters of war, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, ſhould at his comming to Conſtantinople perſuade the king to what he liſted, and ſo peraduenture take from him the chiefeſt office, & get into his hands the whole I gouernment of the empire, whereby ſo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of theſe feares, he caſt about by all means to keepe him from comming to the court: but becauſe that to attempt the ſame openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and ſecret means. This Sciaus in conſideration of many gifts beſtowed vpon him by Mahamet the Cuman-Tartar king, had many times excuſed him to Amurath of diuers accuſations which Oſman by his letters had laid to his charge; For not aiding him in the ſubduing of Siruan, as he was both by promiſe and dutie bound: and for all his ouerſights alleadged ſuch reaſons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogether perſuade Amurath to be kind vnto him, yet at the leaſt not to carrie a mind of reuenge againſt him; and had ſo far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable amitie and mutuall confederacie. Him Sciaus imagi- K ned to find willing and ready by al means poſſible, to hinder the comming of Oſman his enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the certain reſolution of Amurath, to call Oſman to the court, ſecretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay incamped neere to the hauen of Caffa vpon the Fens of Meotis, certifying him, That Oſman was to come to the court; and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an enemie he had been to him, and how much he had endeuoured by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and diſpleaſure againſt him: and withall, That if he was able to doe ſo much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with verie reaſonable excuſes, the king had executed his wrathfull indignation vpon him to his great danger; hee L ſhould then imagine with himſelfe, what Oſman ſhould be able to do, when he ſhould come in perſon to the preſence of Amurath, and without any mediator, between themſelues determine of all matters what they ſhould thinke conuenient. Theſe, and peraduenture worſe Letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, miniſtred matter enough vnto him to reſolue to do what he might, not to ſuffer ſo pernitious an enemie of his to arriue at Conſtantinople: and eſpecially perceiuing that Sciaus, in whoſe breaſt hee repoſed all his hope and all his protection, did ſo greatly feare his comming. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he commanded twelue thouſand ſouldiers, that changing their weapons and apparell, they ſhould go and lie in wait for Oſman in the borders betweene Cholchis and Iberia, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way hee was to come; and ſo making an aſſault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. Hoping that ſuch an outrage once done, could not, or would not, be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Muſcouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to bee ſhort, rather to any body elſe, than to him. This commandement of the Tartar King, was accordingly by the ſouldi-

Amurath ſendeth for Oſman into Siruan.

The Tartar king ſendeth 12000 Tartars to lie in wait for to kill Oſman.

A ers put in practiſe: who without further ſtay ioyned themſelues together, and ſo rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the meſſengers ſent from Amurath, come to Oſman, who preſently put himſelfe on his way towards Conſtantinople, hauing left behind him at Derbent and Sumachia, two Baſſaes, thought to be the moſt ſufficient men in Seruania: hauing alſo appointed very good orders in the ſame, and an aſſured eſtabliſhment of all thoſe countries and places which Muſtapha firſt had ſubdued, and he himſelfe had afterwards maintained vnder the obedience of Amurath. He had alſo prouided for the ſafetie of his own perſon, in paſſing thoſe troubleſome and dangerous paſſages through which he was to trauell, by chuſing out foure thouſand ſouldiers which he had tried in diuers battels, and brought vp vnder his owne diſcipline; through B whoſe valor, he doubted not ſafely to paſſe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous ſquadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from Derbent, and coaſting along the rocks of Caucaſus (that at all times of the yeare are all white and hoarie with continuall ſnowes) leauing on his left hand Media, Iberia, and Cholchis; and on the right hand, the famous riuers of Tanais and Volga, euen at his firſt entrance vnto the ſhores of the Euxine ſea, hee was by the aboue named twelue thouſand Tartarians, being apparelled like theeues that lie vpon thoſe ways, ſuddenly aſſailed & fought withall. But like as an huge rocke lying open to tempeſt and waues, ſtanding faſt and vnmoueable in it ſelfe, reſiſteth the thunderings and ruſhings of the great and fearefull billowes: ſo ſtood Oſman faſt and firme, & couragiouſly ſuſtained this treacherous aſſault, turning the bold C countenances of his reſolute ſoldiers, againſt the rebellious multitude of thoſe traiterous ſquadrons: who, as is their manner in the beginning, vſed great force, but finding ſo ſtout reſiſtance in thoſe few, whom they had thought with their only lookes and ſhoutings to haue put to flight, they began at length to quaile. Which Oſman quickly perceiuing, couragiouſly forced vpon them, and in a very ſhort ſpace, and with a very ſmall loſſe of his own, put thoſe Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and alſo taking many of them priſoners: by whom Oſman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their king for feare that he had conceiceiued, leſt when he came to Conſtantinople he would procure his deſtruction from Amurath, had ſent this armie to ſeeke his death. Of which treaſon Oſman cauſed a perfect proceſſe to be made, together with the diſpoſitions of the Tartarian priſoners, which he ſent the ſhorteſt way D he could deuiſe to Amurath at Conſtantinople, with letters declaring all that had paſſed, inflaming him to reuenge ſo dangerous an iniurie & ſo wicked a practiſe. Amurath receiuing theſe aduertiſements from Oſman, according to the neceſſity of the matter, tooke order that Plazales his Admirall with certaine gallies well appointed, ſhould paſſe ouer to Caffa to fetch Oſman; and withall to carrie with him Iſlan, a brother of the Tartar kings, commanding Oſman by letters, that he ſhould (to the terror of others) put to death the trecherous king, and place his brother in his roome.

Oſman aſſaulted by twelue thouſand Tartars.

Oſman ouercommeth the Tartars.

This Tartar King was one of thoſe mightie Princes, who baſely yeelding to the Othoman power, led vnder them a moſt vile and troubleſome life, as their tributaries and vaſſals, alwaies E at command: whoſe yonger brother Iſlan (preſuming of the ſufficiencie of himſelfe & the fauor of the people) going to Conſtantinople, became a ſuter vnto the Turkiſh Emperor, to haue his eldſt brother thruſt out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill gouernment hated of his ſubiects, and to be placed himſelfe in his roome. Which his ſute was ſo croſſed by the Embaſſadors of the king his brother (who ſpared for no coſt in the behalfe of their maſter) that the ambitious youth was ſent from the Turks court to Iconium, and there clapt faſt vp in priſon: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogether conformable to his miſerie, with ſuch a kind of externall innocencie, as if he had been void of all hope or ambitious deſire of a kingdom, but rather like a forlorn and vnhappy wretch with vain affliction & impious deuotion to prepare himſelfe to a laudable and honorable death. But whileſt he thus liued, ſequeſtred from all worldly cogitations, vpon the diſcouerie of the king his brothers rebellion he was in more than poſt haſt ſent for to Conſtantinople, and put into the gallies bound for Caffa, with letters to Oſman of the terrour aforeſaid. Now in the meane time Oſman had by cunning means got into his hands this Tartar king; being as is reported betraied by his owne counſellours, corrupted by the Turkes gold: whome with his two ſonnes Oſman vpon the receit of the aforeſaid letters from Amurath, cauſed to be preſently ſtrangled with a bowſtring, and Iſlan his yonger brother to be ſaluted king in his place, yet as vaſſall to Amurath. This ſhameful death, G the vſuall reward of the Turkiſh friendſhip, was thought iuſtly to haue hapned vnto his Tartar king, for that hee long before, ſupported by Amurath, had moſt vnnaturally depoſed his aged father from that kingdome, iuſt reuenge now proſecuting his ſo great diſloyaltie.

Oſman embarked himſelfe at the forenamed gallies at the Port of Caffa, paſſing ouer the Euxine ſea, and entering into the Thracian Boſphorus, arriued at Conſtantinople; where hee was receiued with great pompe and ſingular ſignifications of good loue. But with moſt euident and expreſſe kinds of ioy was he ſaluted by Amurath himſelfe, when by his owne ſpeech and preſence he declared vnto him euery particularity of the matters that had hapned in his long and important voiage, and in liuely maner repreſented vnto him the perils & trauels that he had paſſed, & the conqueſts that he had made in Siruan. After al which diſcourſes, Amurath H who longed after nothing more, than to ſee the Perſian king ſomwhat bridled, and the famous citie of Tauris brought vnder his owne ſubiection, began to enter into conference with Oſman about that enterpriſe, and in the end would needs know throughly of him, what iſſue he could promiſe him of this his deſire; and in what ſort by his aduice and counſel the forces ſhould be imploied, and the armies diſpoſed for the ſubduing of that city, which ouer all the nations of the world was ſo famous and ſo great an honour to the Perſian kingdome. To all which demands his anſwer and reſolution was, That forſomuch as the matters of Georgia were now well ſetled, the trecherous paſſages by the new built forts aſſured, and the prouince of Siruan vnder his obedience eſtabliſhed, there was now no cauſe why hee ſhould any longer foreſlow ſo famous an enterpriſe, but by the conqueſt of Tauris, and erecting of a fort in that proud city, I to bring a terrour vpon all Perſia, and to raiſe a glorious renowne of ſo mighty a conqueſt among the Nations of Europe: for the accompliſhment whereof, he thought that either the ſame armie, or at the moſt a very little greater would ſuffice, ſo that it were raiſed of the beſt and choiſeſt ſouldiers.

Amurath demandeth Oſmans opinon concerning the enterpriſe of Tauris.

Oſmans reſolution.

By reaſon of one of the letters which Sciaus Baſſa had written to the late Tartar king, and by the inſtigation of the yong Sultan Mahomets mother (iealous of the neere alliance of the great Baſſa with her husband, as preiudiciall and dangerous to her ſonne) Amurath had in the open Diuano depriued the ſaid Sciaus from the office of the chiefe Viſier, and hardly pardoning him his life, at the interceſſion of his wife, being his ſiſter, had baniſhed him the court, ſo that hee liued afterwards about Calcedon, vpon the borders of Aſia, not far from Conſtantinople, K in a cloſe pallace he had there built for his own pleaſure: in whoſe room he appointed Oſman to be chiefe Viſier; & to honor him the more, nominated him the Generall of his army againſt the Perſians. Such power hath Vertue, that euen from the very ſcum of the raſcal ſort, and out of the ruſticall rout of mountaine peaſants (which notwithſtanding cannot be truly iuſtified of this Oſman, his father being Beglerbeg of Damaſco, and his mother, the daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the courſe of this variable world draw diuers men into Princes courts, and aduance them to the higheſt dignities. Truth it is, that from a priuate ſouldier, though wel born, he by ſundry degrees grew vp to the higheſt honor of that ſo great an Empire, and was at one inſtant created the chiefe Counſellor and Generall of the Othoman forces. Great was the ioy that Oſman conceiued hereat; & great was the deſire he had to make L himſelfe worthy of ſo honorable fauors; & the greater confidence he perceiued that Amurath had repoſed in him, the more eagerly was he ſpurred on to do any thing poſſible whereby he might ſhew himſelfe to haue deſerued the ſame. And therefore aduiſing with himſelfe, that foraſmuch as the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe required a greater armie than was leuied in former yeares, ſo it was neceſſarie alſo for him the ſooner to ſend out his aduertiſements into all his ſubiect prouinces, and by his own example to ſtir vp the other captains and ſouldiers euen in the Winter (though it were as yet ſomewhat troubleſome) to paſſe ouer to Scutari, and from thence to Angori, to Amaſia, to Siuas; and there in thoſe Territories to driue out the time, vntill his ſouldiers which were ſummoned, were all gathered together. And becauſe vpon this his great ſpeed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemie miſdoubting his purpoſe for Tauris, might prouide a greater armie than they would otherwiſe, he cauſed it to be giuen out, That he muſt goe for Naſſiuan, to the end, that the Perſians ſo beguiled, ſhould not regard the gathering of ſo mightie an Armie as they would haue done if they ſhould haue heard of the Turks comming to Tauris: and ſo the generall couſening rumor flew, not onely Oſman Baſſa made chiefe Viſier & Generall of the armie.

through

A through all the cities ſubiect to the Turkes, but into the countries of the Perſians alſo: who notwithſtanding being very iealous of the citie of Tauris, and fearing that the matter would fal out, as indeed afterward it did, ceaſed not to make moſt curious & diligent inquirie about it. And although the diſgrace offred to his Embaſſador at Conſtantinople, diſſuaded him from ſending any other for treatie of peace: yet to ſpie out the ſecrets of the Turkes, and to vnderſtand the certaintie of their purpoſe for Naſſiuan or Tauris, hee ſent diuers meſſengers to Oſman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace; but in verie deed for nothing els but to ſound his deſignements: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could vſe poſſibly diſcouer, but ſtill remained doubtfull as at the firſt, the Fame ſtil running for Naſſiuan.

B In the beginning of this yeare, now growing towards an end, Amurath ſent one Muſtapha, one of the meaneſt of his Chiaus, vnto Stephen king of Polonia, to excuſe the death of Podolonius (ſo ſhamefully murthered as is before declared) as if the ſame had happened by the inſolency of certain ſouldiers, and not by his commandement: who the better to color the matter, had brought with him two baſe fellowes, as authours of that outrage, for the king to take reuenge vpon; but were indeed no ſuch men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for ſome other fact worthie of death, and now ſent thither to ſerue that purpoſe: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatning maner in the name of his Maſter) required to haue preſent reſtitution made of all ſuch goods as the Polonian Coſſackes had not long before taken from the Turks, and the captain of the ſaid Coſſacks to be deliuered C alſo vnto him, to be carried to Amurath: and ſo hardly vrged the matter, that (notwithſtanding the vnworthie death of Podolonius and his followers, and the taking away of his horſes) al the goods taken by the Coſſackes, were forthwith reſtored: which the Chiaus almoſt in triumphant manner preſented vnto Amurath at Conſtantinople.

This Summer alſo, Amurath diſporting himſelfe with his Mutes, was almoſt dead. These Mutes are luſty ſtrong fellows, depriued of their ſpeech; who neuertheleſſe certaine by ſignes can both aptly expreſſe their own conceits, and vnderſtand the meaning of others: theſe men for their ſecrecie are the cruel miniſters of the Turkiſh tyrants moſt horrible commands; and therefore of them had in great regard. With theſe Mutes mounted vpon faire & fat, but heauy and vnready horſes, was Amurath, vpon a light and ready horſe, ſporting himſelfe (as the maner D of the Turkiſh Emperors is) riding ſometime about one, ſometime about another; & ſtriking now the horſe, now the man, at his pleaſure; when ſuddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling ſickneſſe, his old diſeaſe; and ſo falling from his horſe, was taken vp for dead: inſomuch, that the Ianizaries ſuppoſing him to haue bin indeed dead, after their wonted maner fel to the ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and Iews, & were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or captain to reſtraine their inſolency, to the terror of the reſt, hanged vp one of them taken in the manner, and certain others in the habit of Ianizaries. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath ſhortly after recouered againe, and to appeaſe that rumor of his death (openly vpon their Sabboth, which is the Friday) rid from his pallace to the Temple of Sophia; where I with many others ſaw him E (ſaith Leunclauius) his countenance yet all pale and diſcoloured.

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 91.

This yeare alſo happened ſuch a chance as had like to haue raiſed new warres betwixt the Turks and the Venetians: which, foraſmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in ſilence to paſſe ouer. The Widow of Ramadan Baſſa, late Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbarie, with her ſonne, her familie, and a great number of ſlaues of both ſorts, being about to depart from Tripolis to Conſtantinople, had rigged vp a faire gallie for the tranſporting of her ſelfe and her ſubſtance, reported to be worth eight hundred thouſand duckats: vpon which galley for her more ſafety, ſhe had ioyned two others, as conſorts. Thus embarked, ſhe came to the mouth of the Adriaticke; where ſailing by Corfu, ſhe was by force of tempeſt driuen into the gulfe of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, with certaine gallies, had the charge for the keeping of that ſea againſt pyrats, and all other enemies whatſoeuer. He hearing of the Turkes comming into the gulfe, without delay ſet vpon them, and being too ſtrong for them, tooke them all: and hauing them now in his power, exerciſed moſt barbarous cruelty, as well vpon the women as the men: for hauing ſlain the men, in number two hundred and fiftie, and the ſon of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he cauſed the women, being before rauiſhed, to haue their breaſts cut off, and afterwards to be caſt ouer boord

into the ſea, being in number about forty. The brother of Emus chancing vpon a beautiful virgin, was by her moſt earneſtly intreated to haue ſpared her honor; and the rather, for that (as ſhe ſaid) ſhe was a Chriſtian, taken priſoner about twelue yeares before in Cyprus, ſince which time ſhe had liued in moſt miſerable captiuitie among the Turks, & being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be ſet at liberty inuiolated: which ſhe moſt humbly beſought him for the loue of God to do, and not to imbrue his hands with her guiltleſſe bloud, or to diſhonor himſelfe by forcing of her. But all ſhe could ſay preuailed nothing with the cruel & vnbridled youth, who after he had at his pleaſure abuſed her, caſt her with the reſt into the ſea. It is thought that Emus ſuffered this ſo great an outrage (and ſo farre vnbeſeeming the honor of the Venetians) to be don, to the intent that none ſhould be left aliue to bewray the greatneſſe of the bootie, or of the villany there committed: which was neuertheleſſe (God ſo appointing it) reuealed by one of the Turks, who ſaued by a Surgion of Crete which knew him, & afterwards comming to Conſtantinople, openly declared the ſame. With the odious report whereof, the Turks were ſo enraged, that in euery corner of the citie a man might haue heard them threatning vnto the Venetians moſt cruel reuenge: yea they had much adoe to hold their hands from the Bilo or Gouernor of the Venetian Merchants in Conſtantinople, & to forbeare to ſpit in his face, as he went in the ſtreets. At that time was one Iohan. Franciſcus Maurocenus (or as they commonly call him, Moreſin) Bilo at Conſtantinople: who vnderſtanding that Amurath in his rage was about to ſend one of the great Gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turks call Zauſij (the great Turks vſuall Embaſſadors) to Venice about that matter, found means to haue him ſtaied at Conſtantinople, and another of leſſe authority ſent to expoſtulate the matter with the Senat, and in the name of Amurath, to require to haue the offendour puniſhed, and the gallies with the ſlaues and goods reſtored: ſo ſhould the league betwixt him and them continue firme, whereas otherwiſe he ſhould be conſtrained by force of armes to reuenge the wrongs done to his ſubiects. This meſſage being by the ſaid meſſenger deliuered at Venice, the Senators after diligent examination of the matter, returned this anſwer: That the widdow of Ramadan with her familie comming to Zacynthus, an Iſland of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and preſented with certaine courteous Preſents; but departing thence, and comming to Cephalenia, another of their Iſlands, her people running on land, contrary to the conditions of the league, made ſpoile of whatſoeuer they could light vpon, ſparing neither man nor beaſt: of which their inſolencie their Proueditor vnderſtanding, and making after them, found them in armes within the gulfe; and comming neere vnto them, was neither by them ſaluted, as the manner at ſea is, neither was any top ſaile ſtrucke, in token that the command of that ſea belonged vnto the Venetians, al which they ought by the league to haue done: for which their outrages and proud contempt, their Proueditor had taken ſo ſharpe a reuenge: neuertheleſſe, they promiſed in that caſe to do what beſeemed them in reaſon and Iuſtice to doe, for the ſatisfying of his deſire. With which ſo reaſonable an anſwer, Amurath ſeemed to be well contented; but being indeed loth to intangle himſelfe with warres againſt that mighty State at ſea, his wars againſt the Perſians beeing not yet finiſhed: yet ſhortly after, Emus was for his diſhonorable and cruell dealing with the Lady and her family, worthily condemned and beheaded, and the gallies with all the goods and ſlaues reſtored. This great woman had in thoſe gallies foure hundred Chriſtian ſlaues, all which vpon the taking of the gallies were (as the manner is) ſet at libertie, for whom the Venetians made reſtitution of as many others of the Turks.

The villanie diſcouered.

Amurath ſendeth a meſſenger to Venice, to expoſtulate the iniurie don vnto his ſubiects.

Petrus Emus beheaded.
Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 92.

Ramadan Baſſa, the husband of the aforeſaid great Ladie, was Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbarie, and of the countrie thereabouts: who hauing wars with one of the barbarous kings of the Moores, went out againſt him with all his forces, wherein were certaine companies of Ianizaries, ſent by Amurath from Conſtantinople. Now in this countrey, as in many other places of Affricke, are great and deſart ſands, ouer which whoſoeuer is to paſſe, muſt prouide himſelfe both of victualls and ſkilfull guides; without which they are not without danger to bee paſſed. Ramadan with his armie vnprouided both of the one and the other, hauing entred theſe deſarts, was at length brought to that caſe, that he could neither go forward, neither without loſſe of his men returne. Yet at length hee retired, and got home, but not without the loſſe of ſome of his people, and the manifeſt danger of his whole armie: for which his improuidence the Ianizaries fell into ſuch a rage, that not reſpecting the honour of the man, or regarding the diſplea-

Ramadan Baſſa ſlain by the inſolent Ianizaries.

A diſpleaſure of their ſoueraigne, they fell vpon him and ſlew him. At which their inſolencie if Amurath did winke, and paſſe it ouer vnpuniſhed, let no man maruell: for why, the antient obedience of thoſe martial men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more ſeuere diſcipline gouerned; but now growne proud and inſolent (as the manner of men is liuing in continual pay) with weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatſoeuer ſeemeth vnto themſelues beſt, be it neuer ſo foule or vnreaſonable. Which although it be in many places of this Hiſtorie to be ſeene; yet for the more manifeſtation thereof, I thought it not amiſſe here briefely to ſet downe an example or two of their notorious inſolencie.

Achmetes Baſſa Gouernour of Cyprus, ſlain by the Ianizaries.

Not many yeares before, the Ianizaries in Cyprus with like inſolencie ſlew Achmetes Baſſa gouernor of that Iſland: pretending for the colour of ſo foule a fact, that he had defrauded them B of their pay, and oppreſſed them of the country with intollerable exactions. Amurath highly offended with this their diſloyalty in killing their General, whom they had neuer before complained of; thought it much to concerne the majeſtie of himſelf, and the repreſſing of the like inſolency in others, not to ſuffer it to go vnpuniſhed: and for that purpoſe ſent another new gouernor into Cyprus, with ten gallies furniſhed as well with other neceſſarie prouiſion, as with ſuch a conuenient number of ſoldiers as might ſuffice to chaſtiſe the inſolencie of the chief offendors. This new gouernor arriued in Cyprus, diſſembling the ſecret commandement he had for the executing of the tranſgreſſors; by certaine truſtie men gaue it out among the Ianizaries, That Amurath was ſo far from being angry with the death of Achmetes, as that he thought him worthily ſlaine by the Ianizaries, for defrauding them of their wages, and oppreſſing of C his other ſubiects. Which report the new gouernour had of purpoſe giuen out, to put them in ſecuritie, and without further trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Ianizaries cheerefully and with all due reuerence receiued their new gouernour: but ſhortly after to be ſure, they by an vnexpected guile when as nothing was leſſe feared, compaſſed in all the new come ſoldiers, and ſlew them euery mothers ſonne; and not ſo contented, ſeiſed alſo vpon the gallies that brought them. Which ſecond outrage, though Amurath tooke in euill part, as ſeeing his majeſtie therein contemned, yet was he content to paſſe it ouer, being loth to add edomeſtical troubles to the great wars he had in hand with the Perſian.

Another inſolencie of the Ianizaries.

Busbeq Legationis Turcicæ, Epiſt. 3.

But to end this matter with the opinion of one of their owne greateſt Baſſa's, concerning theſe maſterfull men. It fortuned that whileſt Busbequius (Embaſſador for Ferdinand the Empe- D ror, vnto Solyman) lay in the Turks campe, at ſuch time as Solyman in perſon himſelfe was gon ouer the ſtrait in Aſia, to conntenance his eldeſt ſon Selymus againſt his younger brother Baiazet, That vpon a light quarrel (though heauily taken) betweene the followers of the ſaid Embaſſador, and certain Ianizaries waſhing themſelues at the ſea ſide, the Embaſſador for the quieting thereof was glad to vſe the helpe of Ruſtan the great Baſſa, Solyman his ſon in law: who vnderſtanding of the matter by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe, aduiſeth the Embaſſador to cut off all occaſion of contention with thoſe moſt naughtie fellowes: asking him further, if he knew not that it was now the time of war, in which time they ſo raigned, as that Solyman himſelf was not able to rule them, but ſtood in feare of them. Which ſpeech fell not raſhly from Ruſtan; a E man right well acquainted with his Lord and maſters griefe: for that moſt notable prince feared nothing more, than leſt ſome ſecret and dangerous treaſon ſhould lie hidden among the Ianizaries, which breaking out vpon the ſudden, might worke his final deſtruction: whereof hee needed not to ſeeke for any farther example, than to his grandfather Baiazet. For, as true it is, That great are the commodities of a perpetual armie of a Princes owne; ſo are the incommodities alſo not ſmall, if they be not carefully met withall: but eſpecially for that the prince is euer in doubt of rebellion; and that it is ſtill in the power of thoſe armed ſouldiers, at their pleaſure to tranſlate the kingdome to whom they liſt. Whereof there haue bin many great examples, although there are many wayes for the remedying of the ſame.

But now that we haue by occaſion of the occurrents of that time a little ſtept out of the way, F let vs returne again vnto the wars of Perſia, the chiefe obiect of Amuraths hautie deſignes. Now according to the commandements gon out thorow all the cities of the Empire, the ſouldiers of all ſorts began to flocke together: and all thoſe that were either deſirous to be eſtabliſhed in their former charges and gouernments, or ambitiouſly ſought to be now promoted, repaired to Oſman, as vnto a king, and the ſoueraigne moderator of the Turkiſh empire, preſenting him very large and liberal gifts, wherby he gathered together a huge heape of infinit treaſure: and ſo entertaining them with all affable curteſie, and promiſing both rewards and honours to ſuch as would follow him in his purpoſed expedition, he leuied a wonderfull great number both of G men and moneys. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards Erzirum, where he was greatly expected of his huge armie there aſſembled together. And notwithſtanding the great dearth of victual that commonly raigneth in thoſe quarters, yet thither he muſt, where he arriued about the latter end of the moneth of Iuly, in the yeare 1585: and there taking a view of his whole armie, and of all the prouiſion neceſſary for ſo important and famous an enterpriſe, he dayly labored to haſten his departure. In this citie of Erzirum were met together all the ſoldiers of the prouinces that were wont to ſend helpe, but yet in greater number than euer was gathered by any General before: for that euery man forſooke his owne priuate buſineſſe, and vpon aſſured hopes of new rewards and vnwonted honours, were all induced to H follow the fame of this their new Viſier and General: only the people of Ægypt & Damaſco were buſied with other more priuate quarrels at home, whereof becauſe they were both of great importance, and alſo fell out at this very inſtant (leauing Oſman with his armie for a while at Erzirum) I will in as few words as I may make a briefe rehearſal.

Haſſan Baſſa the Queenes Eunuch ſent to Caire to gouerne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haſſan Baſſa the Eunuch out of the Seraglio, from the charge he had there to ſerue in the Queenes Court, and at her inſtance ſent him as Baſſa to Caire the great citie of Ægypt. Which great office, beſide the honour belonging vnto it, is alſo beneficial to them whoſe good hap it is to be aduanced thereunto: the riches, the multitude of people inhabiting therein being ſo great, that it ſeemeth not to be one citie, but rather to containe within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding couetous, and therfore I deſirous to handle the matter in ſuch ſort, as that he ſhould little need to ſeeke for any more ſuch grants at the Kings hands; ſought by all manner of meanes to oppreſſe the whole nation, and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes, without regard of honeſtie or reaſon. By which his ſiniſter and corrupt dealing he had now made himſelfe ſo odious and intollerable to the people in generall, that they in great number, and many times, began to go to Conſtantinople, and with humble petitions to requeſt the King to take from them ſuch a cruel and vniuſt Gouernor: ſo that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and miſchiefes that were reported of the couetous Eunuch. At laſt Amurath ſeeing theſe publique exclamations went daily ſo far, as that he could not for ſhame let them go any farther without due puniſhment, he reſolued with himſelfe to call him to the Court: K and hauing ſent vnto him certaine meſſengers, admoniſhed him ſundry times to returne home. But the Eunuch loth to leaue ſo fit an occaſion to enrich himſelfe, did ſtill delay his returne, alledging diuers feigned excuſes for his longer ſtay. Which thing when Amurath vnderſtood, thinking himſelfe thereby deluded, he determined to prouide for ſo great a diſorder, and by puniſhing of the miſchieuous Eunuch, to ſatisfie in ſome part the diſcontented mindes of his oppreſſed ſubiects in Caire.

Ebrain Baſſa in ſpeech to marrie Amurath his daughter.

There ſat at that time among the chiefe Baſſa's of the Court, one Ebrain (or as moſt call him, Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian, a young man of the age of 32 yeares, or thereabouts, of verie faire conditions, and of a reaſonable judgement; vpon whom Amurath himſelfe had determined to beſtow his owne daughter to wife, and ſo to make him his ſon in law. And therefore L being now minded to remoue the Eunuch from his office, and to ſatisfie the citie; and being alſo willing withall to giue meanes to his ſaid ſonne in law to enrich himſelfe; he reſolued to ſend him as general Syndic & ſoueraigne Iudge into Ægypt, giuing him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predeceſſor had dealt before him. And ſo this new Baſſa took his journy towards Ægypt, although there ran before him a great rumor of his comming, and of the great authoritie wherewith he was ſent. At which report, as the Ægyptians reſted content and joyfull, ſo the Eunuch waxed very ſad and ſorrowfull: perſuading himſelfe, that this alteration could not but engender ſome ſtrange iſſue and effect againſt him. Whereupon aduiſing himſelfe to prouide better for his owne affaires and the ſafetie of his life; he reſolued M not to ſtay the comming of the new Gouernour; but departing out of Ægypt, hee with great care and circumſpection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, trauelled towards Conſtantinople in hope to appeaſe the Kings wrath, or at leaſt by mediation of bribes, and by the interceſſion of the Queene, to finde him more fauourable than hee ſhould finde Ebrain; who without doubt would not haue ſpared any extremitie or crueltie, to haue bereft him both of his goods

A goods and life together. Amurath aduertiſed from Ebrain, of the ſudden flight of the Eunuch Baſſa out of Ægypt, and hearing withall, that he kept not the highway from Caire to Conſtantinople, began to feare, leſt when he came into Soria, he ſhould flie into Perſia to the King, and ſo worke him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge treaſure, and hauing long liued in the Court, knew the moſt ſecret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priuie deuices and faſhions of the Seraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence diſpatched his Imbrahur Baſſi (whom we call Maſter of his horſe) with fortie of his Capigi (all gentlemen Vſhers, and officers of moſt ſecret and neereſt roomes about him) with charge and commandment, that if they met him they ſhould bring him to the Court; vſing all the aid and aſſiſtance of his people that might be requiſit: and for that purpoſe deliuered vnto him very effectuall B and large letters, after the beſt manner of the Court. This meſſenger with his appointed traine departed, and without any extraordinarie inquirie, found the Eunuch in Soria, incamped in the plaines neere vnto the citie now called Aman, but in times paſt Apamea, the principall city of that countrey. As ſoone as the Eunuch vnderſtood of the comming of the Imbrahur himſelfe, he gaue order to his guard of ſlaues, which in great number with ſpeares and arcubuſes did ordinarily keepe his pauilion, that they ſhould not grant entrance into his tent to any, but onely vnto the Imbrahur himſelfe, and if need were, by force to keepe the reſt of the Capigi from comming in. Which order was in very good time giuen; for as ſoone as the kings officer had diſcouered the tents of the fugitiue Baſſa, in all haſt he ran towards the ſame, & ſeeking out the greateſt among them, went preſently thither, to haue entred with all his followers: but the C ſlaues being in armor, oppoſed themſelues againſt them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the reſt of his traine without. The Imbrahur being come in, read vnto him the commandement which he had from the King to bring him to the court; and moſt inſtantly mooued him, that without any further reſiſtance, he would quietly go with him. To whom the warie Eunuch anſwered, Behold, how without any calling of the King, or conducting by you, I come of my ſelfe, well aſſured to finde not onely pardon and pittie, but alſo fauour and grace in the ſight of my Lord; whoſe vpright and milde nature the wicked treacheries of my falſe accuſers cannot abuſe, to the preiudice of me an Innocent. And ſo without more ado they went all to Conſtantinople: the Eunuch ſtill ſtanding vpon his guard.

The warineſſe of the craftie Eunuch.

The politique and craftie Eunuch had in this meane time diſpatched diuers poſts with letters D to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, & principally beſeeching the queen to protect him, and to appeaſe the kings wrathfull indignation that haply he might haue conceiued againſt him: and ſo at length they arriued at Scutari. As ſoone as Amurath vnderſtood of his comming thither, he cauſed all the treaſure which he had gathered, to be taken from him, with all the reſt of his priuat ſubſtance, and the wretch himſelfe to be clapt vp in priſon in the Iadicula or ſeuen towers. Where after he had languiſhed many dayes, ſtill fearing ſome deadly blow, he at length receiued from the Queene, an vnexpected, but moſt welcome aduertiſement, That he ſhould be of good cheere and quiet himſelfe, for that his wealth had alreadie ſaued his life, and that ſhe hoped in ſhort time to procure him alſo his libertie. Which E indeed ſhe brought to paſſe; for ſhe her ſelfe made earneſt petition to Amurath her husband, that forasmuch as he had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, he would yet at leaſt deliuer him out of priſon, and reſtore him vnto her againe. Which requeſt of the Queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged: but the treaſure that he had ſo vniuſtly ſcraped together in Ægypt, that remained ſtill among the gold and other Iewels of the Kings.

The Eunuch caſt in priſon at Conſtantinople, and his euill gotten goods confiſcated.

But Ebrain Baſſa with his new commiſſion now arriued in Ægypt, had in ſhort ſpace by far more ſiniſter means than had the Eunuch before him, ſcrapt together ſuch an infinit heap of riches, as was able only of it ſelfe to make him worthy of his promiſed wife, and therfore he was called home to the court, to accompliſh the intended mariage. With this commandment to returne to Conſtantinople, hee receiued alſo in charge, to make his journey through the people of Druſia, and ſuch as he ſhould find loyal, to confirme them in their due obedience, & to make them pay their antient duties, but ſuch as he ſhould find ſtubborne and diſobedient, he ſhould quite root them out and deſtroy them. This commandement Ebrain preſently put in execution, and hauing packed vp together all the riches hee had gathered in the time of his gouernment, and raiſed good ſtore of ſouldiers in that prouince, he tooke with him thirteen Sanzackes, that were ordinarily accuſtomed to ſit as aſſiſtants vnder the gouernment of the Baſſa in the ruling of the populous territories of Caire, and ſo ſet forwards towards Gaza, paſſing ouer thoſe vaſt and huge wilderneſſes of ſand that lie betweene Caire and Gaza. From Gaza, joyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to Ieruſalem; and from thence, cauſing the Sanzacke there alſo to follow his traine, he turned by Saffetto, by Lezium, by Naplos (called in times paſt Samaria) ſtill taking with him the Sanzacks of all thoſe places, and at laſt turned himſelfe towards Damaſco: ſo that before he joyned with the band of Damaſco, hee had gotten together eighteene Sanzackes, with all their ſquadrons of ſoldiers and ſlaues. Beſides theſe, he had alſo his owne priuat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and two hundred Ianizaries of Conſtantinople, whome Amurath would needs haue him to take with him at his departure from the Court, ſo that he had in his armie almoſt twelue thouſand horſmen. From Damaſco, Veis the Baſſa was come as far as Ieruſalem to meet him, with all the ſoldiers vnder his gouernment, in number about two thouſand perſons. Beſides that, there came vnto him by the way of Sidon, the Aga of the Ianizaries of Cyprus, with all the band of that deſolate and deſtroyed Iſland: which captaine with his ſouldiers was tranſported ouer into the maine, in thoſe gallies that by the Kings appointment were ſent to fetch Ebrain: who now ſtrengthned with all theſe ſouldiers, had purpoſed the vtter ruine of the diſobedient Druſians, and the raiſing of his owne glorie, by triumphing ouer them.

The Druſian people what they are.

Theſe Druſians, againſt whom theſe great preparations were now made by this new Captaine, and of whom the Turkiſh Emperor is ſo ſuſpicious and doubtfull, are ſuppoſed to be by diſcent Frenchmen, the reliques of thoſe that with great deuotion did in times paſt fight thoſe memerable and Chriſtian battels in Iurie, and recouered the holy citie: but being afterwards brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the fury of the Barbarians, mingled their ſeed with the circumciſed nation, and ſo together with their authoritie & command, loſt alſo their firſt faith and religion: yet ſo, that they grew into an hatred of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, & abhorring the circumciſion of the Iewes, betooke themſelues to a new Prophet of their own called Iſman, whoſe doctrin they follow. The right Druſians liue vncircumciſed, neither do they forbeare wine, as do the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (moſt vnlawfully) to marrie with their owne daughters: the Turkiſh gouernment they haue ſought by all means to eſchue, and notwithſtanding all the endeuors and attempts of the Turkiſh tyrants, but eſpecially of Solymus the ſecond, yet haue they alwaies bin ſubiect to their owne naturall princes, and would neuer admit any captaine or gouernor of the Turks within the countries which they poſſeſſed. They are a people very warlike, ſtout, reſolute, and religious obſeruers of their own ſuperſtition: in battel they vſe the arcubuſe & ſcimitar, yet ſome of them at this day do ſerue with lances and darts: they are apparelled after the manner of the Eaſterne people, with a turbant on their heads, & breeches they neuer weare, but in ſtead therof they couer thoſe parts with their coat, which reacheth down to their knees, buttoning it vp before: their feeding is groſſe, & of mountaine meats: they inhabit all the country that is inuironed within the confines of Ioppa, aboue Cæſarea and Paleſtina, and within the riuers of Orantes & Iordan, ſtretching it ſelf euen to the plaine of Damaſco, neere to the hils that compaſſe it about vpon the coaſt of mount Libanus. They were all in times paſt good friends & confederats, ſo that they were greatly eſteemed: but now being at variance through greedineſſe and couetouſneſſe, they were diuided among themſelues, one ſeeking the deſtruction of another. At this time they were gouerned by fiue chiefe captains or gouernors: one of them was called Ebne-Man, & of the Turks Man-Ogli; another Seraſadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-Manſur; the fourth Ebne-Free; and the fift Ali-Ebne-Carſus, by the Turks called Ali-Carſus-Ogli. Vnder theſe (who indeed carry the title & authoritie of an Emir, that is to ſay, King or Chiefe) there are diuers their lieutenants or deputies whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne-Man or Man-Ogli inhabited the mountaines and fields that are contained vnder the iuriſdictions of Cæſarea, of Ptolemaida, of Tyrus, and of Sidon, and had his reſidence for moſt part vpon the hil, in a towne called Andera, he was verie mightie in men and armour, and ſince the time that by treacherie his father was murthered by Muſtapha then Baſſa of Damaſco, alwayes a deadly enemie to the name of the Turkes. Ebne Free, Ebne Curſus, and Ebne Manſur were alwayes great friends; but now eſpecially at the comming of Ebrain Baſſa they ſhewed themſelues more ſtraightly confederated together. Seraſadin and Man-Ogli were euer oppoſite againſt them: ſo that the one ſide procuring the ouerthrow of the other, they loſt their ſtrength, and left no meanes to defend them ſelues

A ſelues againſt the Turks, who had long lien in wait for their libertie. Now as ſoone as the news came among them, That Ebrain being departed from Caire, was comming into Soria to ſubdue them, the three confederates aboue named reſolued among themſelues to go and meet this great Baſſa, and to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, of purpoſe to turne all the intended miſchiefe vpon Serafadin and Man-Ogli their enemies. And ſo hauing packed vp great ſtore of money, cloath of ſilke, cloath of woollen, and cloath of gold, with many loads of ſilkes, and other things of exceeding value, euery of the three being accompanied, one with ſome two thouſand, another with ſome three thouſand men, they put themſelues vpon their iourney towards Ebrain, and met him at Ieruſalem, where he was alreadie arriued. This their comming Ebrain tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteouſly accepted thoſe their rich and great preſents B which they brought him, and by the offers of their fidelitie, and the grieuous accuſations they made againſt the other two Druſian lords their enemies, began to conceiue great hope of his intended enterpriſe: for why, he ſaw that nothing could more eaſily compaſſe their ouerthrow, than this their diſcord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of Damaſco, to the champaigne of Bocce, and there incamped. This was in the month of Iuly this yere 1585. The whole armie that was with Ebrain, reckoning alſo the ſoldiers of the three Druſian lords, was about the number of twentie thouſand horſemen ſtrong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts, with preſents to honour the Baſſa; to whom he likewiſe yeelded ſuch ſmall fauors as his couetous nature could affoord them.

Three of the Druſian lords met Ebrain at Ieruſalem with rich preſents, & a great traine of men.

From this place alſo Ebrain preſently ſent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby hee in-C uited them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obedience vnto the Sultan: for that otherwiſe they might aſſure themſelues to be in ſhort time depriued both of their eſtates and liues. For all that, Man-Ogli would not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, reſolued to come, in hope by rich preſents to purchaſe his attonement with the great Baſſa. And therefore hauing packed vp together diuers loads of ſilke, great ſtore of money, and many cloathes of good value and beautie, and alſo attended vpon with diuers of his ſubiects, he arriued at laſt at the pauilion of Ebrain, with theſe his rich preſents, which were there readily receiued, and he himſelfe with great attention heard: whoſe ſpeech in effect tended to no other thing, but only to perſuade the Baſſa, That he had alwaies beene a deuoted vaſſal vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall deſire to be imployed in any D his ſeruice; and that now being led by the ſame affection, and aſſured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to ſhew himſelfe vnto him to be the ſame man, and ſo profered him whatſoeuer lay in his ſlender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no anſwer at all, but onely asked him the cauſe why he liued continually in diſcord and brawles with the three Emirs (who alſo ſat at that time in the ſame pauilion.) Whereunto Serafadin anſwered, That it was not long of him, who as one deſirous of peace, had not at any time taken vp armes, but in the juſt defence of himſelfe, againſt the iniuries of thoſe his enemies, who becauſe they were more mightie than he, ſought continually to oppreſſe him. Hereat the three conſpiratours aroſe, and with their grim lookes bewraying their inward hatred, falſely charged him to haue beene euer the authour of thoſe brawles: ad-E ding moreouer, That his inſolencie was at that time growne ſo great, as that no ſtrange veſſell durſt for feare of him arriue at the ports of Sidon, Tyrus, or Berito; nor any merchant or merchandiſe paſſe ouer the plaines, But that thoſe countries, as though they were a prey and ſpoile to the theeues of Arabia, were generally ſhunned of all trauellers both by ſea and land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans cuſtomes. Serafadin would hereunto haue gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and ſurcharged with many iniurious words, was commited to the cuſtodie of the two hundred Ianizaries of Conſtantinople. And ſo being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was euery night from thence forward put in the ſtocks faſt chained, and continually guarded with a truſtie guard of the ſame Ianizaries. In the mean time came the anſwere of Man-Ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Baſſa Ebrain as followeth:

Serafadin commeth with preſents to Ebrain.

To the Lord of Lords, Soueraigne aboue the Great Ones, the mightie, the noble Captaine couſin to the grand Lord, & the worthieſt among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble & famous lord Ebraim *Baſſa, God giue good ſucceſſe to his haughtie enterpriſes, and proſperitie in all his honour. as thou doſt louingly inuite and exhort me) that I might come before thee, and follow thee, and ſerue thee alwaies in any occaſion that it may happen thee to ſtand in need of my helpe. For I know that thou woul- G deſt reſt aſſured of the reuerence that I beare towards thy Lord, and of the moſt feruent deſire wherein I liue to ſerue him, and to imploy both my life and my ſubſtance in his ſeruice: whereof I haue alſo giuen ſome teſtimonie, though but ſmall, in the managing of his cuſtomes that I haue receiued: wherein I haue alwaies ſo carried my ſelfe, as that I am not his debtor of one aſpre: a thing I wis that Ebne Manſur (who is now with thee) hath not done. For although by his comming to meet thee euen as far as Ieruſalem, he would make a ſhew of his fidelitie, yet doth he vſurpe more than two hundred thouſand duckets of the kings, which he doth moſt vniuſtly detaine from him of his cuſtomes. But my hard fortune will not grant me the fauor that I may come vnto thee: for there are at this time preſent with thee three of mine enemies, who (I know wel) being not contented to haue alwaies diſquieted and troubled my eſtate, do now ſeeke to bring me into ſo great hatred with thy heart, that if thou haddeſt me in thy hands, thou wouldeſt H without any conſideration bereaue me of my life. And I am aſſured, that this ſending for me importeth no other thing, but only a deſire thou haſt to impriſon me, and ſo to kill me: for I know how much thou art giuen to great enterpriſes. Beſides this, my comming is alſo hindered by mine antient oath that I tooke: when being as yet but a childe, I ſaw mine owne father ſo villanouſly betrayed by the murthering ſword of Muſtapha, being at that time the Baſſa of Damaſco, who vnder the colour of vnfeigned friendſhip, got him into his hand, and traiterouſly ſtrucke off his head. For in truth I carry the image of my fathers reuerend head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my minde, which oftentimes preſenteth it ſelfe vnto me, as well ſleeping in the darkneſſe of the night, as alſo waking in the light of the day; and talking with me, calleth to my remembrance the infidelitie of the murthering Tyrant, and exhorteth me to keepe my ſelfe aloofe from the hands of the mightie. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy re- I queſts, and in that reſpect it grieueth me, that I ſhall ſeeme diſobedient vnto thee, being in any other action and in all my cogitations wholly addicted to do any ſeruice not only to thee, who art moſt worthie to be reuerenced of far greater perſons than I am, but alſo to euery the leaſt vaſſals of Amurath. Thou wilt pardon me I hope, and thou ſhalt well perceiue, that if there be any thing neere me that may be acceptable vnto thee, all that I haue whatſoeuer, though in reſpect of thy ſelfe it may ſeeme vile and baſe, yet is it thine, and is now reſerued wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell; and command me, and hold me excuſed vpon theſe iuſt cauſes which thou heareſt, for my being ſo backward in comming to honour thee, as my dutie requireth.

The poore and the leaſt among the ſlaues of the grand Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Ebrain burneth 24 Townes of Man-Oglies.

Veis Baſſa and his ſon diſcomfited by the Druſians.

Ebrain perceiuing by this letter the reſolution of Man-Ogli, reſolued alſo in himſelfe to go vpon him with all his army, and either by force or ſleight to get him into his hands, or at leaſt to draw from him ſo many arcubuſes, and as great gifts and tributes as poſſibly he might: and therefore riſing with his campe, and turning himſelfe toward the country of Man-Ogli, he burned and deſtroyed foure and twentie of his townes, and ſo mounting vp certaine rockes of Libanus, vpon the top of a large hill (that ſtandeth ouer Andara and other places belonging to L Man-Ogli) he incamped himſelfe. But whiles the armie was thus marching forward, Veis Baſſa of Damaſco with a great part of his people, and his ſonne the Sanzacke of Ieruſalem, with his ſoldiers likewiſe, to the number of fifteen hundred perſons, hauing ſeperated themſelues from the reſt of the army in manner of a rereward; as they were buſie in raiſing their tents, vpon the ſudden were furiouſly aſſaulted by a great band of Druſians of the faction of Man-Ogli, and diſcomfited. Which victory the Druſians ſo proſecuted, that they became lords of the pauilions, the wealth and armour of the Turks: and leading away with them their horſes and their carriages, put to the ſword fiue hundred perſons, and ſcarce gaue any leiſure of eſcape either to the Baſſa the father, or the Sanzacke his ſonne, who fled ſtraight to Ieruſalem, and neuer returned again to Ebrain; but Veis his father ſtill followed the army with thoſe few which he had left, and was thought worthie of all men to be pittied.

Vpon the hil aforeſaid, Ebrain continued twenty foure daies together, with aboundance of all things neceſſary for victual: during which time he attended nothing els, but to try all deuiſes how he might draw money and preſents from Man-Ogli, or how he might traine him into Ebrain ſendeth for arcubuſes to Man-Ogli.

The notable diſſimulation of Ebrain Baſſa.

A his hands. For the compaſſing whereof, he diſpatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manſurs Agent) to Man Ogli, being in Andrea, to tell him, That foraſmuch as he would not giue credit to the promiſe which was made him, nor to aduenture himſelf into the hand of his friend, he ſhould ſend vnto him all the arcubuſes he had: for that the Sultans pleaſure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his ſeruice, ſhould not be furniſhed with ſo great ſtore of weapons, to the danger of their neighbors, and of the ſubiects themſelues. With great griefe of mind did Man-Ogli behold the meſſenger, as the man whom he well knew to be the Agent of his deadly enemy; yet in regard of him that ſent him, he forbare to doe him iniurie, or to giue him any reproch; telling him, That all his people and weapons were diſperſed abroad ouer his territory, ſo that he could not tel what arcubuſes to ſend him: with which cold anſwer Gomeda returned. Which B thing when Ali Baſſa of Aleppo vnderſtood, he offered himſelfe to the Generall, that he would goe vnto him, and that to ſome better purpoſe. Many reaſons did Aly Baſſa vſe to perſuade the warie Druſian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrain, ſwearing that no harme ſhould be done vnto him: and withall promiſing him great and honourable fauors. But neuer could hee remoue the reſolute and prouident mind of Man.Ogli, or win him to yeeld himſelfe into the hands of a man, whom he thought to be ſo murderous: yet at laſt with much adoe, he preuailed ſo much with the Druſian Lord, that in ſigne of the reuerence he did beare towards the Generall, and of his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to ſend a Preſent to Ebrain.
And thereupon gaue him 320 arcubuſes, 20 packs of Andarine ſilkes, and fiftie thouſand duckats to carrie to the Baſſa for a gift, and to reconcile him vnto him. For the better effecting C whereof, he ſent his owne mother to the great Baſſa, who in the behalfe of her ſon performed a very worthie meſſage, excuſing him as well in reſpect of his enemies that ſat there ſo neere vnto him, as alſo in regard of his oath which he had ſolemnly ſworne, That for the trecherie of Muſtapha hee would neuer commit himſelfe into the hands of a Turke: and therefore beſought him to accept of the gifts that were ſent him, and withall a mind and heart moſt ready to ſerue and obey the king in all occaſions; and that hee would hold him excuſed, for that his excuſes were both iuſt and reaſonable. Whereunto the Turke replied, That although ſhe had found ſo foule a fault in Muſtapha, who vnder the aſſurance of his promiſe and fidelitie had betraied her husband: yet for all that ſhe ought not to feare any ſuch wicked or infamous act at his hands, who ſtood vpon his honor and the word of a ſouldier: and ſo by oath proteſting all D faithfull and conſtant friendſhip towards him; in token of his ſincere meaning, he caſt a white vaile about her necke, and put another vpon himſelfe, and the third he gaue her in her hands; willing her to report to her ſon the oaths he had made, and to carrie him that vaile, and bring him with her: proteſting no otherwiſe to intreat him, but as a friend & a brother: the peaceable old woman went her way accordingly; but ſhee neither could nor would go about to alter the purpoſe of her ſon, but returned to Ebrain ſuch anſwer as did not greatly pleaſe him. After which time, he ſought more than euer he did before, to get the wary Druſian into his hands, or at leaſt, without regard of ſhame to draw from him mo Preſents and weapons. And therefore once againe he ſent the craftie Gomeda, to exhort him vpon faith and promiſe giuen, to come E vnto him: but for all the craft & lying ſpeeches that the trecherous meſſenger could cunningly vſe, he could obtaine nothing of the Druſian Lord, but good words onely. Yet at laſt after much fineneſſe he preuailed ſo much, as that Man-Ogli was contented by him to ſend another Preſent to Ebrain, with an expreſſe condition notwithſtanding, that he ſhould cauſe Ebrain to depart out of thoſe quarters, & that hee ſhould not himſelfe returne any more to requeſt any thing farther of him. Which he very largely promiſed, only deſiring him to ſend a good number of arcubuſes, therby to content the Baſſa fully: ſo he gaue him fifty thouſand duckats more, and foure hundred and foureſcore arcubuſes, with a thouſand Goats, an hundred and fiftie Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffes, a thouſand Oxen, & two hundred Weathers. With this rich preſent came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring vnto him that this hee had got from him, vpon promiſe that hee ſhould not moleſt the Druſian any more. For which promiſe ſo made, Ebrain ſharpely reprooued Gomeda, and threatned to make him know what it was to take vpon him ſo dangerous a liberty: and for the greater deſpight both to the one & to the other, Ebrain would needs haue Gomeda himſelfe to returne again with like meſſage to trouble the Druſian. Whereunto although hee went in great feare of ſome miſchiefe by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy but needes hee muſt follow the command of him, in whoſe power it was to take from him both his honor and life; and therefore on he went. But as ſoone as Man-Ogli ſaw Gomeda (thinking as truth was, that he came againe about his wonted requeſts) he was with the G very ſight of him ſo far moued, as that he was euen at the point to haue throwne a dart at him, and ſo to haue diſpatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects ſtaid his fury: yet ſpared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to diſburden his choler. Notwithſtanding Gomeda could do no leſſe but accompliſh the effect of his fraudulent requeſts, and ſo wrought with him, that he drew from him foure burbens more of arcubuſes, ten ſwords and ten gilt daggers, certain ſiluer belts, ten packs of ſilke, and ſome few pence: cauſing him withall to proteſt vnto him, neuer to ſuffer himſelfe to be perſuaded to come againe vnto him, for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen after what might of it. With exceeding ioy and triumph did Ebrain receiue this preſent, and thinking now with himſelfe that he had gotten a ſufficient bootie from him, he determined to riſe with his armie, and to ſacke all the reſt of Man-Oglies H countrie. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-free, burnt Andrea the place of Man-Ogli his reſidence, and in two daies burned and deſtroied nineteen other of his townes, with vnſpeakeable crueltie committing all things to fire and ſword. After all this ſacking and raſing, Ebrain ſent diuers meſſengers to Man-Ogli, to trie whether he would yet be perſuaded to come vnto him; but nothing could moue the reſolute Druſian to commit himſelfe into his hands, but rather increaſed his conſtancie to auoid a moſt certain death. Now the great Baſſa ſtil thirſting after bloud and reuenge, vnderſtanding by a ſpie, that the captain of Andrea (being one of the factors of Man-Ogli) with three hundred and fifty ſouldiers was got vp to a certain hill, into a place of great ſecurity, he ſent Emir Ebne-free to intice I him, and to tell him, That ſeeing his Lord Man-Ogli would not come and yeeld himſelfe, hee ſhould come vnto him; which if he would do, he would aſſuredly in deſpight of Man-Ogli, make him a Sanzack of ſome of thoſe places which he moſt deſired. The ambitious & vnheedie Macademo ſuffered himſelfe to be eaſily perſuaded, & being accompanied with his three hundred and fiftie followers, went with the ſaid Ebne-free, and came at laſt to the pauillion of Ebrain, hauing firſt cauſed his aforeſaid men to ſtay behind in a valley two or three miles off. But Ebrain would not ſo much as ſee the Macademo, although both in reſpect of the nimbleneſ of his perſon, and alſo the fierceneſſe of his lookes, he was worhtie to be looked vpon: but commanded him to keep in a ſeuerall place from Serafadin, and in the mean time deuiſed how he might with leaſt loſſe of his own men, put to death thoſe three hundred and fiftie the Macademoes K followers: which was by training them, by means of the ſaid Ebne-free, into a certain vineyard, and ſo hauing brought them into a ſtrait, ſuddenly to ſet vpon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed: for being by the trecherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their ſlaughter, fearing nothing leſſe, they were ſuddenly incloſed by the Turks Sanzackes or Ianizaries, and ſlain euery mothers ſon. This maſſacre thus finiſhed, Ebrain commanded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to bee ſtripped and flaied quicke: who being come, ſtoutly vpbraided Ebrain with his promiſe and his oath; and amongſt other ſpeeches which he vttered whiles they ſtripped him, ſaid; Cut me off my members, and firſt putting them into the priuities of that infamous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of himſelfe: for ſo (I trow) he will be contented and ſatisfied with my fleſh. And to them L that were the executioners of his painfull death, he ſaid; It is your great good fortune indeed, that with ſuch violence and needleſſe deformitie, yee are now able to ſpill my bloud, and to take my life from me: whereas none of you all had bin able, or once durſt, man to man, to haue drawne one drop of it from me, nor to haue endured my countenance. But go too, proceed in your wicked and vnſatiable deſire of my bloud, and fulfil the cruell command of your Viſier: for in the end there will alſo light vpon you the iuſt reward of this ſo villanous a fact. With theſe and other ſuch like ſpeeches the miſerable wretch was ſtripped, and three great ſlaſhes made on his backe, where they began to flea him, he in the meane time not ceaſing to blaſpheme their religion, and to curſe their king, and their falſe Prophet alſo. But the barbarous ſouldiers proceeding in their cruell action, made other like gaſhes M vpon his breaſt and ſtomacke, and ſo drawing the skin downward, could not bring it to his nauell before he was with the extremity of the pain, dead. After this, Ebrain cauſed the followers of Serafadin (in number about a hundred and fifty) to be cruelly ſlaine, and all his countrie to be moſt miſerably waſted; he himſelfe ſtill remaining in cheines.

Whileſt the fire and ſword thus raged in the Druſian countrie, Ebrain by ſpeedie poſts ſent to Emir Ebne-free enticeth Man-Ogli his Macademo or lieutenant to come to Ebrain.

The Macademo by the commandement of Ebra in ſlain quicke.

A to Sidon, where his gallies lay at rode, commanded, That diſbarking foure thouſand ſouldiers, they ſhould ſacke all thoſe countries alongſt the ſea coaſt euen as far as Cæſarea in Paleſtine, ſparing neither age nor ſex, nor any perſon of condition whatſoeuer. Which his cruell command was preſently put in execution; and three thouſand ſoules brought away captiues, great booties made of much rich merchandiſe, many townes burnt, ſundrie caſtles raſed and laid euen with the ground; and to be ſhort, all the whole countrie of Serafadin and Man-Ogli laied vtterly waſte and deſolate.

Ebrain was now in readineſſe to depart for Conſtantinople, where he was by Amurath expected, as wel for his gold, as the accompliſhment of the mariage. But bethinking himſelfe, that whatſoeuer hitherto he had don, would be accounted either little or nothing, vnleſſe he prouided in ſome ſort for the quieting of thoſe people vnder the Turkiſh obedience, he determined to nominate one of the three Druſian Emirs that came to him to Ieruſalem, to be Baſſa of all thoſe Regions. And becauſe Emir Aly Ebne-Carfus was the richeſt and moſt obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honored him with that dignitie, yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thouſand duckats. Wherefore hee apparelled him in cloath of gold, gaue him a horſemans maſe, and a ſword all gilt, and deliuered vnto him the kings commiſſion, cauſing him withall, to ſweare faith and obedience to Amurath. And ſo hauing (at leaſt to ſhew) ſet in order the affaires of thoſe mountains, which an hundred of the Turks great captains had in former time vainly attempted, he returned to Damaſco, where he ſtaied twelue daies, by ſhamefull ſhifts extorting mony from diuers perſons. C At laſt hauing no more to do in thoſe parts, hee turned himſelfe towards Gazir and Baruto, places vnder the gouernment of of Ebne-Manſur, where he arriued with all his army, and found the gallies which he had left in the port of Sidon, now in the hauen of Baruto, as he had before commanded. Now vpon a certaine hill aboue Baruto neere vnto the Sea, Ebrain had pitched his owne tent only and none other; and hauing ſent all the reſt of his beſt and goodly things which he meant to carrie with him to Conſtantinople aboord the gallies, ſhrowded himſelfe only vnder that narrow and baſe tent. Thither he called Ebne-Manſur, and in pleaſant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make paiment of the debt of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand duckats which hee ought the King his Lord for the cuſtome of Tripoli and Baruto: for that he could not longer ſtay in thoſe quarters, but was to returne to D Conſtantinople, which he knew not how to do, vnleſſe he carried with him the diſcharge of that debt. Whereunto Ebne-Manſur made anſwer, That it would not be long before his Macadamoes would come with his monies, and that then he would without further delay make paiment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuſe, and therfore determined with himſelfe to thruſt him into the gallies, & becauſe he could not carrie the mony vnto the king, yet at the leaſt to bring him his debtor. But foraſmuch as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of ſome inſurrection amongſt the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the ſaid Ebne-Manſur, as for that he ſaw him greatly beloued and fauored of the other two Druſian Lords, Ebne-ſrec and Ebne-carfus, he therfore thought it better E policie by concealing this his purpoſe, to ſhew him in his outward actions al good countenance, and by ſecret and ſubtile meanes to take him priſoner. Whereupon he deceitfully told him, That foraſmuch as he was to ſtay there for his buſineſſe that night, and was reſolued the next day to make a road into the country of Man-Ogli, he therefore praied him to do him the fauour to be his guide; and for that purpoſe, when he ſhould ſend for him at midnight, that he would come vnto him very ſecretly, becauſe he was minded to depart without any ſtir, onely with fiue hundred men in his company. The Druſian Lord verily beleeued the matter that ſo it was, & and withall was in good hope by that means to find ſome way to eſcape his hands. Whereupon being called vp at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who preſently charging him (whom all men thought he had eſpecially affected) with many abhominable and foule termes, cauſed a chain to be caſt about his neck, & his arms; and ſo faſt bound to be caried into the gallies. And yet not ſo contented, tooke the ſpoile of all his country, wherby there was leuied ſuch a prey as was marruellous to behold: for beſides mony (whereof there was a very huge ſum) the ſtore of cloths of ſilke & gold, was ſuch, & ſo great, as might better beſeem ſome great Prince, than ſuch a mountain ruſticall Lord as he was. When the Baſſa had conueied all this into his gallies, hee ſayled to Tripoli, where he found Serafadin in the cuſtodie of

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 95.

But now foraſmuch as we haue before made mention of the Sanzacke of Ieruſalem, and his flight, it ſhall not be altogether impertinent to our hiſtorie (though ſomewhat out of time) in few words to declare what paſſed betweene him and the Arabians of Paleſtine, a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Baſſa into thoſe quarters: by which little, the deſirous reader may eaſily perceiue, the wofull and troubleſome ſtate of that ſometime moſt bleſſed and fruitfull, but now moſt miſerable and barren land of Iurie, and of thoſe places in Holy Writ ſo much renowned.

I

The land of Iurie much troubled with the Arabian theeues and robbers.

In the confines of Sodome, and in the places that lie not only betweene the lake Aſphaltites and Damaſco, but alſo in the Plaines and in the Vallies of Iericho, and of Samaria, and in other places about Bethlehem, Emaus, Bethanie, Bethfage, Capharnaum, Nazareth, Leuir, Bethſaida, Naplos, and other townes of name thereabouts, there doe haunt and liue certaine Arabian captaines; who ſpreading themſelues euen as far as Rama and Ioppa, ouerrun at their pleaſure all the countries there round about, and continually commit grieuous outrages as well againſt the ſaid Cities, as alſo vpon the goods and wealth, not onely of the inhabitants there, but alſo of ſtrangers: yea and their inſolency oftentimes groweth ſo great, that they dare to aſſault the fenced cities, beſide the ſpoiling of trauellers, that by reaſon of their buſineſſe haue occaſion to paſſe from one city to another. They are good horſemen, but vſe no armour: their horſes are very ſwift to run, and ſpare of diet, and are themſelues bold and aduenturous theeues. Theſe Arabians hauing had intelligence, that the aforeſaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzacke of Ieruſalem, was in mind to raiſe all the Sanzacks thereabout; and ioyning himſelfe with them, and his father the Baſſa of Damaſco, to reſtraine their inſolent libertie, and to worke their deſtruction; reſolued with themſelues not to ſtay, vntill hee and his confederates were readie; but rather by ſundrie inuaſions vpon him, euen vnto the gates of Ieruſalem, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him ſo to do, they compacted with a certain Subbaſſi of Bethlehem, their friend, to encourage and animat the Sanzacke thereunto, by promiſing vnto him good ſucceſſe and proſperous euents. The ambitious young man, ſeduced with the glorious perſuaſions of the falſe Subbaſſi, of whome hee made good reckoning, and prouoked by their inſolencies, reſolued (as they had wiſhed) to iſſue out of the citie into the open field: and thereupon hauing armed an hundred of his vaſſals, and raiſed all the horſemen that were vnder his gouernment, to the number of ſix hundred, he made a rode towards Iericho, ſending before defiance vnto them: againſt whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their arrows and Indian Canes ouerwhelming his arcubuſes, as if it had bin a raging floud, wrought him great wo: when in the very nicke, the battel yet being at the hoteſt, the traiterous Subbaſſi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the ſouldiers of Ieruſalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put moſt part of them to the edge of the ſword, and ſcarcely gaue liberty to the Sanzack to ſaue himſelfe by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed of this fraud of the diſſembling Subbaſſi, to be reuenged vpon him, began alſo in like manner to diſſemble with

A with him, feigning that he would once more trie his Forces againſt the ſame Arabians; and ſo vſed the matter, that the Subbaſſi arming himſelfe, came vnto him, without any ſuſpition of the miſchiefe intended againſt him. But as ſoon as he was come, the Sanzacke tooke him aliue, and preſently cauſed him in moſt cruell manner to be ſlaine quicke.

The Subbaſſi of Bethlehem ſlaine quicke.

Thus hauing paſſed ouer the troubles that ſtaied the people of Ægypt and Damaſco, and the countries thereabouts, from reſorting to Oſman the Turks great Generall at Erzirum: let vs againe returne thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations againſt the Perſian; and proſecute thoſe affaires, which of all others moſt exerciſed the forces of the two mightieſt Mahometan Monarchs; and with the expectation thereof, filled the world, from the Eaſt to the Weſt.

B The ſtraight commandement from Amurath, together with the fame and reputation of Oſman the Generall, had drawne together ſuch a world of people of all ſorts to Erzirum, as that it ſeemed not the power of one king alone, but rather the vnited forces of many kings. Wherfore Oſman perceiuing that hee had gathered together too great a number of people, and too huge an army, and that it might ſo fal out that he might want victuall for ſo great a multitude (neither ſo greatly fearing his enemies forces, as that he needed to lead ſo populous an armie againſt them) determined to diſcharge a great number of ſuch as he thought moſt weake, and leaſt able to endure trauell: ſo that out of this great multitude he drew out about fortie thouſand perſons, who liberally according to euery mans abilitie redeeming the ordinarie perils of the warres, returned home to their owne dwellings. And ſo in Oſmans armie remained the C number of an hundred and foureſcore thouſand perſons or thereabouts. With this multitude the Generall departed from Erzirum (about the eleuenth of Auguſt this yeare 1585) towards Tauris, continuing for all that, the ſpeech for Naſſiuan. But he had ſcarce marched two daies, when diuers ſouldiers of Græcia and Conſtantinople preſented themſelues before him, vpbraiding him with great improuidencie, and telling him, that they began alreadie to feele the want of victuall, by wanting the ſame day their ordinarie allowance of corne for their horſes: ſo that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of ſo long a iourney they felt ſuch want, they could not tell with what iudgement or diſcretion he meant to lead ſo great a companie ſo far as Naſſiuan; nor by what cunning conceit he had preſumed to ſuſtaine ſo great an armie in the ſeruice of their Lord. Oſman quietly heard their complaints, and preſently D prouided for them, by cauſing ſuch ſtore of barley to be diſtributed among them, as they deſired; and ſeuerely puniſhed the officers that had the charge for the allowance of corne, who moſt couetouſly began to make merchandiſe of the common prouiſion, by conuerting it to their own priuat vſes. And hauing thus quieted their troubled mindes, he proceeded on his iourny, and by the way of Haſſan Chalaſſi and of Chars, arriued vpon the Calderan plaines, famous for the memorable battels there fought betweene Selymus and Hyſmael. In theſe Plaines hee tooke a generall reuiew of his army, wherein there wanted a number, that by reaſon of ſickneſſe being not able to continue the iourney, were inforced to ſtay behind, ſome in one place ſome in another. Remoouing thence, he tooke the way not to Naſſiuan, as he had ſtill hitherto E giuen it out he would, but now directly to Tauris. Which ſo ſudden an alteration of the iourny as ſoone as the ſoldiers of Græce and Conſtantinople heard, they fel into a great rage, and comming againe before the Generall, reuelled with him in this ſort to his face:

The number of Oſmans armie.

And what are we, thou villaine, thou Turke, thou dolt, whom thou handleſt in this ſort? Wee are neither oxen nor ſheepe of the mountaines, for the leading of whom thou thinkeſt thou art come out: neither can we brooke theſe thy lies and deceits. If thou haſt publickly profeſſed to lead vs to Naſſiuan, and by that ſpeech haſt trained vs from the fartheſt bounds of Græcia, to what end now, after thou haſt wearied vs ſo much, doeſt thou deceiue vs with ſuch vanities, and prolong our iourney, and ſet before vs ſuch ſtrange and important dangers as our minds neuer once thought on? But if this was thy firſt purpoſe and intent, and that now, not fooliſhly or by chance, but vpon premeditation and good aduice thou changeſt thine opinion, why diddeſt thou diſmiſſe ſo many ſouldiers, as might haue made the armie more terrible F and ſtronger for the enterpriſe of Tauris? Doeſt thou thinke that by ſuffering others to redeeme their liberties, and ſo to increaſe thy riches, thou ſhalt ſet our liues to ſaile, and to make vs ſlaue to the Perſians?

The moſt inſolent ſpeech of the ſouldiers of Conſtantinople and Græce vnto Oſman their Generall.

At theſe arrogant ſpeeches, the General was exceedingly troubled; ſeeing his good meaning, and the earneſt deſire he had to aduance the maieſtie & glorie of his king, taken in ſo euil part, and thoſe his beſt ſouldiers ſo highly offended. And although he could indeed haue readily vſed the ſharpeſt and hardeſt prouiſions and remedies for it, that in ſuch occaſions are ordinarily applied: yet vpon good aduice he forbare ſo to do, and in ſtead of rigor and puniſhment, reſolued to worke by more eaſie meanes. Whereupon cauſing many of the Captaines and chiefe men amongſt thoſe ſeditious ſouldiers to come before him, hee firſt perſuaded them, That the former ſpeech for Naſsinan was not raiſed at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to goe for Tauris: but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the commandement of the Sultan, who had charged him ſo to doe, to the end to leſſen the Perſian preparations; which they would vndoubtedly haue made farre greater, if the ſpeech had beene giuen out at the firſt for Tauris. Which his princely care of their ſafetie they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in ſo doing they ſhould ſtill preſerue that great opinion which both the king and the world had conceiued of their valour and fidelitie. Neither needed they to feare, that the ſouldiers which were diſmiſſed might weaken the armie, for that they themſelues were not onely ſufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way vpon the enemies, but to daunt them euen with their lookes; and that thoſe which were diſcharged, had but purged the hoaſt of all cowardiſe, and left nothing in it but vertue and courage. By this milde anſwere of the Generall, the tumultuous ſouldiers were ſufficiently pacified, but much better apayed and contented they were, as ſoone as he put his hand to the common purſe, and beſtowed among them all a ſmall quantitie of monies: for by this his kinde vſage, all their ſtomackes were ouercome, and they themſelues became ſo willing and ſo couragious, that now they durſt venture not to Tauris onely, but to Caſbin, yea euen to the fartheſt parts of all the Perſian kingdome.

Oſman wiſely appeaſeth his mutinous ſouldiers.

The Turks reioice vpon the diſcouerie of Tauris.

The Perſian prince ouerrunneth the Vauward of the Turks armie.

Theſe important outrages thus appeaſed, the Generall turned himſelfe with all his armie towards Coy, a citie ſcituate beyond Van, in the middeſt betweene Tauris and the Martian Mere, where he refreſhed his armie with all things he could deſire. From Coy he paſſed to Marant, a citie ſubiect to the Perſians; plentifull alſo of all things needfull for man or beaſt. From thence he leaned downe towards Soffian; a fruitfull place, ſubiect alſo to the Perſians; from whence he began to diſcouer Tauris. Great was the ioy of the whole campe, and now the mutinous ſouldiers of Græce and Conſtantinople could highly commend the aduice of the Generall, or rather of Amurath himſelfe, in giuing out the rumor of Naſſiuan for Tauris, as the only means whereby they were in quiet come ſo far, the Perſians being wholly occupied (as they ſuppoſed) about Naſſiuan: inſomuch that euery man being waxen couragious, and repleniſhed with ioy, without any feare at all began proudly to plot vnto themſelues nothing but ſackings, pillings, taking of priſoners, rauiſhments, robberies, and all thoſe inſolent & outragious actions that vſe raſhly to proceed from the greedie affections of thoſe barbarous victors; eſpecially they of the Vauward, who being deſirous of bootie, and to diſcouer the enemies countrey, deſcended downe towards certaine pleaſant gardens full of all ſorts of trees, ſprings, & fruits: where hauing ſatisfied their appetites, they withdrew themſelues to a certain little riuer neere to a bridge called The bridge of ſalt water, and there ſtaid at pleaſure attending the comming of the army. But euen whiles they were thus inioying the water, the fruits, the ſhade, the greene graſſe, and other delights of the place, the Perſian Prince Emir Hamze, king Mahamets eldeſt ſonne, who with ten thouſand good ſouldiers had cloſely couched himſelfe, watching ſtil when ſome of the enemies bands ſhould come down to thoſe reſting places, ſuddenly ſet vpon them with ſuch ſpeed, courage, and fury, that as if it had bin a lightning and in a manner without any reſiſtance he ouerran all thoſe Turks, and diſperſed them, putting to the ſword about ſeuen thouſand of them. And ſo leading away with him many priſoners, horſes, ſlaues, with ſundrie enſignes and Turkiſh drums, he withdrew himſelfe back towards his blind father, who lay then encamped about 12 miles from Tauris with fiftie thouſand ſouldiers or thereabouts; Aliculi Chan Gouernour of Tauris beeing left in the citie with 4000 ſouldiers onely. A greater army than this, not exceeding the number of threeſcore and foure thouſand men, was not the Perſian king able to leuie; the principall occaſion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman nation being waxen rebellious and diſobedient, would not by any means be brought to defend that citie, whereof Aliculi Chan their capital enemie was now Gouernour: and from Gheilan and Heri there came not ſo much as one ſouldier to relieue the neceſſities of Perſia. So that with theſe ſmall forces in compariſon of the enemies, the Perſian King had no ſtomacke to meet the Turkiſh armie in plaine battell, but

A ſought how he might with as little loſſe to himſelfe as poſſibly he could, make trial of his forces, and by all politique meanes to weaken and annoy his ſtrong enemie.

Oſman ſendeth two Baſſas with 14000 ſoldiers to ouertake the Perſian Prince.

Oſman vnderſtanding of this diſcomfiture of his vauward, forthwith diſpatched Sinan Baſſa the ſonne of Cicala, and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with fourteene thouſand ſouldiers to purſue the victorious Prince: who in their purſuit vſed ſuch expedition, that at length they ouertooke him in the way towards his fathers campe. But as ſoone as the Prince ſaw the Turks ſo neere him, that without a dangerous and ſhameful flight he could not auoid the battel, couragiouſly he turned his face, and joined with them a moſt bloudy conflict: which being begun two houres before night, was moſt fiercely maintained vntill that the darkeneſſe of the night bereauing them of the vſe of their weapons, enforced both the one ſide and the other to retire. B Which was done with the notable loſſe of the Turkes, who in this ſecond conflict (as it was commonly reported) loſt ſix thouſand men; and had (as it was thought) ſuffered a generall ſlaughter, had not the night interrupted ſo vncouth an action, well worthie of a thouſand daylights. So that hitherto the Turks ſuſtained the loſſe of more than ten thouſand ſoldiers, and yet had ſcarce diſcouered or ſeene the citie which they ſo greedily longed after.

The next morning the Turks campe remoued and came within two miles of Tauris, where they incamped. But whileſt they were ſetting vp their tents, Aliculi Chan iſſuing out of the citie with all his garriſon and ſuch of the citiſens as were fit to beare armes, ſet vpon the face of the vauward, being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings ſo charged them, that with great loſſe he forced them to retire euen vnto the maine battell; where after C he had eſpied the great artillerie, he without hurt withdrew himſelfe againe to the citie. The confuſion of the Turks in this ſkirmiſh was notable, for in a very ſmall time the vauward was diſordered, and almoſt three thouſand ſlaine. But Aliculi not ſo contented, in the ſhutting in of the euening ſallied out of the citie the ſecond time, and ſwiftly running along that ſide of the armie that lay towards Tauris, ſlew the Baſſa of Maras, and did great harme in that quarter: which done, without any ſtaying he fled to the Kings campe, and forſooke the defence of that ſorrowfull citie which he could not hold. Neuertheleſſe the Tauriſians, as many of them as remained in the citie, gathered themſelues together to the gates of the citie, well armed, prepared to make a bloudie entrance for the Turkes whenſoeuer they ſhould come. All the night was ſpent in watching without reſt on either ſide, and yet nothing attempted: but vpon D the breake of the day, a great multitude of the ſeruile ſort of the Turkes, and of the common raſcal rout, without any order from their captaines, armed with corſelets, ſpeares, & ſwords, went to the city with reſolution to haue ſacked it, and ſo to haue enriched themſelues with the ſpoile and pillage of that wealthie citie. But when they came to the guarded gates of the Citie, they found there contrarie to their expectation, a terrible reſcue, and were inforced there to joine an hard and mortal battell; ſo that the walls, the entrance, yea all the ground thereabouts was bathed with bloud, and as it were couered with weapons and dead carkaſſes. And yet for all that, though the Perſians ſtood faſt and firme at the arriual of this ſeruile rout, at the laſt they were conſtrained to yeeld the entrance, being ouercome by the multitude of them that out of the campe flowed in vpon them like a floud; and retyring into the citie, now aſto- E nied and amaſed on euery ſide, they fortified themſelues in their houſes vnder the ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the ſtreets; from whence with their arrowes and ſome few arcubuſes, they did the Turks that entred, great harme. Yet were they not able to kil and deſtroy ſo many of their enemies, but that at the laſt they were too mightie for them, and wrought many grieuous miſchiefes in that wofull city. And ſo a great number of this raſcall people that remained aliue, returned to the Turkiſh campe, carrying away with them too manifeſt tokens of the poore oppreſſed citie: wherein the miſerable women and impotent ſoules ſtood embracing & ſtraining the doores & poſts of their houſes, and kiſſing their natiue ſoile, with prayers, mournings, and complaints, bewailing their preſent miſeries, and yet fearing worſe to come. Oſman the General now made acquainted with theſe calamities, cauſed pro- F clamation to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould be ſo hardie as to moleſt the Tauriſians, and in the meane time went himſelfe about the citie, viewing throughly the ſcituation of it, and ſurueying the place wherein he might both incampe himſelfe ſafely, and with better foundation and greater ſecuritie erect a caſtle or fort, for the more aſſurance of that conquered countrey.

A great ſlaughter in the Gates of Tauris.

The deſcription of Tauris.

The Citie of Tauris ſeated at the foot of the hill Orantes, about eight dayes journey from the Caſpian ſea, and is ſubiect to windes, cold, and ſnow; yet of a very wholeſome aire, G abounding with all things neceſſarie for mans life; and wonderfull rich, with perpetual concourſe of merchandiſe brought thither out of the Eaſt, to be conueyed vnto the Weſt, and alſo of others brought out of theſe Weſterne parts, to be diſperſed into the Eaſt. It is verie populous, ſo that it feedeth almoſt two hundred thouſand perſons: but yet open to the fury of euery armie, without walls, and vnfortified. The buildings (after the manner of thoſe of the Eaſt) are of burnt clay, rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the name, and was the place of the Perſian Kings reſidence, vntill ſuch time as that the late King Tamas remoued his ſeat from thence further into his kingdome to Casbin: neuertheleſſe both before & ſince, although it had been ſundrie times moleſted by the inrodes and furie of the Turkiſh Emperors, yet was it ſtil in great eſtimation and renowne. H

Of this citie Oſman Baſſa hauing taken diligent view, cauſed his tents to be pitched on the South ſide thereof, where was a ſpacious garden all flouriſhing and beautiful, repleniſhed with ſundrie kind of trees and ſweet ſmelling plants, and a thouſand fountaines and brooks deriued from a prettie riuer, which with his pleaſant ſtreame diuided the garden from the city of Tauris, and was of ſo great beautie, that for the delicacie thereof it was by the countrey inhabitants call Sechis Genet (that is to ſay) the eight Paradiſes; and was in times paſt the ſtanding houſe of their Kings, while they kept their reſidence in this citie, and after they had withdrawne their ſeat from thence to Casbin, became the habitation and place of aboad for the Gouernors of Tauris. Of theſe gardens and places Oſman made choice to build his caſtle in; whereof he gaue the modell himſelfe, and commanded that all the whole circuit of thoſe I pleaſant greenes ſhould be inuironed with walls, and trenches digged round about them to conuey the water from the aforeſaid riuer. Which was accordingly begun with the greateſt care that poſſibly might be, the foundation of the imbattelled walls laied, the ditches digged fourteene foot broad, and a mans height in depth; and in the ſpace of ſix and thirtie dayes the whole worke finiſhed and brought to an end, great ſtore of artillery mounted vpon the wals, and diuers baths, lodgings, and ſuch other houſes neceſſarie for the Turkiſh vſes, built within the caſtle. The firſt day of this building Oſman fell ſicke of a feauer with a bloudie flix, which haply was the cauſe both of the ſlowneſſe of the building, and of many other loſſes that afterwards happened, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

The caſtle of Tauris built in 36 dayes.

Eight Ianizaries with certain Spaoglans found ſtrangled in a Bath at Tauris.

Fiue dayes after the building of the caſtle was begun, newes was brought into the Turkiſh K campe, That eight Ianizaries and diuers Spaoglans were ſeene ſtrangled in a bath within the citie of Tauris. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Ianizaries came preſently vnto the Generall, declaring vnto him, That although he had with too much clemencie giuen order, That no man ſhould hurt or moleſt the Tauriſians, and that according to his pleaſure, euery man had vſed modeſtie towards them, and obedience to him; yet the Tauriſians themſelues had moſt audaciouſly ſtrangled in one of their baths eight Ianizaries and certaine Spaoglans, which iniurie and inſolencie (they ſaid) in their iudgement was not to be ſuffered. This outrage ſo moued the General, that without any further delay he commanded the citie to be ſacked, leauing it wholly to the pleaſure of his ſouldiers: who forthwith ſo vſed the matter, not as if they would haue reuenged an iniurie, but rather at once haue brought an vtter deſtruction vpon the L whole citie. Euery place was filled with ſlaughter, rauiſhment, rapine, and murther; virgines were defloured, men children defiled with horrible and vnſpeakeable ſinnes; yonglings ſnatched out of their parents armes, houſes layed euen with the ground and burnt, riches and money carried away, and in briefe, all things ruinated and waſted. Neither were theſe miſchiefs committed once onely, but the ſecond followed worſe than the firſt, and the third vpon that worſe than the ſecond: ſo that it was a miſerie almoſt inexplicable, to behold that citie ſo populous, ſo rich, ſometimes the court and palace of the Perſian Kings, and honour of that Empire, now ſubiect to the furie of the Turks, plunged in calamitie and vtter deſtruction.

The miſerie of the Tauriſians.

The woful aduertiſement hereof ſore troubled the Perſian King, but the young Prince his ſonne much more: who moued with the paſſions of moſt inward griefe, diſdaine, and diſpaire, M and deſiring nothing more than reuenge, reſolued to attempt any thing whereby to requite ſo great a wrong. In which reſolution hauing confirmed his army, he commanded 5000 of his horſemen to preſent themſelues euen to the very ſight of the enemies tents, and as it were to dare them to battell. Which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant ſhew of

A of themſelues. At the diſcouerie whereof, the Turks imagining that the Perſians were come in great number to aſſaile the armie, order was giuen by the ſicke General, That Cicala Baſſa and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with the people of Grecia, and all their own forces ſhould go vp encounter the enemy: who preſently with their enſignes diſplaid, vnder wich there ſtood about foure and thirtie thouſand ſtrong, beſides a number of ſeruile people, yet men exerciſed in labors and perils, in all well neere fortie thouſand, ſet forward. Now the fiue hundred Perſians with a maruellous cunning kinde of skirmiſhing dallied with the Turkiſh ſouldiers, and drew them forward for the ſpace of eight miles & more: and being brought ſo far on, and now forewearied with the skirmiſh, were luſtily aſſailed by the Perſian prince, who with part of his armie (to the number of about twentie thouſand perſons) couragiouſly ſet vpon the two B Baſſa's, and joined with them the deadlieſt and cruelleſt battel that euer was written of. Wherein the Perſians hauing giuen a moſt perillous onſet, and done great harme, it was thought that they would haue contented themſelues with ſo luckie an incounter, and ſo retyred: which the Turks minding to preuent, and not to returne without a notable victorie, hardly preſſed vpon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and ſo to giue them a bloudie and deadly ouerthrow.
But the Perſians hauing quietly and with great aſſurance for a reaſonable ſpace endured their charge, at laſt as if they had been freſh men, made head vpon them afreſh, and began a moſt terrible battel anew, wherein the Baſſa of Caraemit (aboue named) was put to flight, and being wholly diſmaied and diſcomfited, fled backe againe to the campe, carrying with him the moſt manifeſt tokens of the vnhappie iſſue of the battell. Cicala the other Baſſa notwithſtanding C valiantly and with great cunning ſtill ſuſtained the furie of the Perſians, labouring by all means to encourage his ſouldiers, and to haue reſtored the battell: but when he had done what he could, ouercome at laſt by greater valour, he was inforced to betake himſelfe to flight alſo, and ſo altogether diſcomfited, came to the campe without any enſigne, hauing left behinde him eight thouſand of his ſouldiers dead vpon the ground.

Eight thouſand Turks ſlaine.

The Perſian prince encouraged with this ſo fortunate a victorie, by ſpeedie heraulds ſent to the ſicke Viſier (whom he thought notwithſtanding to haue bin in health) and gaue him to vnderſtand, that if he were willing to fight, he was readie for him, & in what ſort ſoeuer it pleaſed him to accept of battell, to make him good account of his valour; and to cauſe him to know, not onely that Amurath his Maſter had moſt vniuſtly raiſed this war, but alſo that it had D been good for himſelfe not to haue taken the ſame in hand. Of this offer Oſman accepted: but being not able himſelfe to go and anſwer the prince in perſon hand to hand, by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe, which euery houre mortally increaſed, he ſent out all his captaines with his armie to dare him battell.

The prince lay ten miles or thereabouts diſtant from the campe of Oſman, towards whome the Turks ſet forward in this manner: The maine battell was guided by the Baſſa of Caraemit and Sinan Cicala, with all the ſouldiers of Aſſiria and Babylon; the left wing was led by the Baſſa of Natolia, with the band of Grecia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baſſa of Caramania, with the people of Soria; to the number of threeſcore thouſand: beſide ſuch as E were left behind at Tauris, with the truſty guard of the Ianizaries, and the artillery, for the ſafegard of the ſicke Viſier. In this order they confronted the Perſian prince, who was himſelfe in the midſt of his armie, with all his people in very good order; hauing on the one ſide the ſoldiers of Perſia and Hircania, and on the other them of Parthia & Antropatia, in all to the number of fortie thouſand. The Turks feared nothing more, than that the Perſians fetching a great compaſſe about, ſhould with all celeritie and furie ſet vpon their tents, and the riches they had laied vp together in their pauilions; and therefore at euery motion of theirs they continually feared this ſudden outroad; whereof they had ſuch eſpeciall care, that retyring themſelues as much as they might, and feigning as if they had giuen place to the Perſians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them euen within the iuſt leuell and marke of their Artillerie.
Which the Perſians perceiuing, without any further dallying hardly began to aſſaile the maine bodie of the battell. The Prince himſelfe being entred amongſt the ſouldiers of the Baſſa of Caraemit (who as General ſuſtained the place of Oſman) and preſſing into the middeſt of the battell, diſpatched euery man that came in his way; and hauing ſingled out the Baſſa from the reſt, ſmote off his head, and gaue it to one of his Followers to carrie vpon the top of his Launce. Which beeing openly deſcried, brought a great terrour vpon the Turks, and exceedingly encouraged the Perſians; who embrued with the bloud of their enemies, and entermingling themſelues more and more among them, made of them a moſt confuſed and general ſlaughter; wherein beſide the Baſſa before named, there died alſo the Baſſa of Trabſzonda, the Sanzacke of Bruſia, with fiue other Sanzackes, and as it was commonly reported, twentie thouſand Turks moe. It fell alſo to the lot of Amurath Baſſa of Caramania to be there taken priſoner, with diuers other common ſouldiers. But night comming now on, and the Perſians being come ſomewhat too nigh the Turkiſh artillerie, they gaue ouer the fight, and withdrew themſelues backe to the place where the King lay incamped with the reſt of his armie.

But now were diuers dayes ſpent, wherein the new fortreſſe at Tauris (as we haue before ſaid) was fully finiſhed, when the ſouldiers of Grecia and Conſtantinople, wearied to ſee their friends and fellowes thus ſlaine before their faces, and hauing alſo ſafely laid vp in their owne cuſtodie ſuch preyes and booties as they had gotten in the ſacke of the citie, reſolued with themſelues to procure their owne departure, and ſo much the rather, for that the Winter was now faſt comming on. And foraſmuch as the General was through the immoderate flux of bloud brought weake and in deſpaire of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his phyſitions, and therefore not to be ſpoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of ſuch as were their truſtie friends about him, to repreſent vnto him the neceſſitie of their returne, and withall after many reuerend intreaties, cauſed it alſo to be ſignified vnto him, That if he ſtood obſtinate, and would needs ſtay dallying out the time in thoſe dangerous places where no ſuch need was, they ſhould be inforced to withdraw themſelues and to forſake him. Oſman, who had now nothing els to doe in thoſe countries, but onely to leaue ſome conuenient gariſon in the new fortreſſe at Tauris, liberally promiſed to ſatisfie their requeſts, by departing thence the next morning. So calling vnto him Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa of Tripolis, a man of a craftie and cruell nature, made him gouernour and keeper of the new built fortreſſe at Tauris. And the more to incourage him to take that charge vpon him, he gaue him freely for the ſpace of three whole yeres, not only the office and authoritie, but alſo the rents and reuenues of the Baſſa of Caraemit, lately ſlaine by the Perſian Prince, and withall honored him with the title of a Baſſa of the Court; ſo that hauing finiſhed his three yeres office of Caraemit, he was then to go and ſit among the ſoueraigne ſeats of the Baſſa's of the Porta. The Baſſa ſeeing ſo faire & ſo high a way for him to mount to thoſe high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkiſh Empire) readily accepted the offer, and diſpatching his lieutenant to Caraemit, to the gouernment of thoſe countries in his abſence, with an hundred of his owne followers, ſetled himſelf in the ſaid fort with a garriſon of twelue thouſand ſoldiers, furniſhed with all neceſſary prouiſion vntil the next Spring. The General hauing thus ſet all things in order, and carefully prouided for the ſafetie of the fortreſſe, departed according to his promiſe, and the ſame morning (which was the fourescore and ſeuenth day after his departure from Erzirum) came to a place called Sancazan, ſeuen miles diſtant from Tauris.

Giaffer Baſſa of Tripolis an Eunuch made Gouernour of Tauris.

Oſman the General departeth from Tauris, & cõmeth to Sancazan.

The Turks were now vpon the point of their incamping, in a confuſed diſorder and hurly-burly, when thoſe that were hindermoſt in the army heard the neying of horſes, and the noiſe of drums & trumpets, as if it had bin the comming of an armie. Which when the whole camp vnderſtood, they ran all headlong & diſordered as they were, to the reſcue, on that ſide where the noiſe of the horſes and warlike inſtruments was heard. But whileſt the Turks were thus intentiuely buſied on that ſide to expect the comming of the enemie, the Perſian Prince without any ſigne or token of battell, with 28000 horſemen was readie vpon them on the other ſide; who hauing diſcouered the Camels and other carriages whereupon their bootie, their ſpoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken in Tauris, beſide much of their prouiſion of victuals for the ſuſtenance of the armie, he turned vpon them, and with a prouident and ſafe conuoy had taken for a prey eighteene thouſand of the Camels and Mules well loden with the ſame booties and victuals; which the Prince ſent preſently away with ſix thouſand of his ſoldiers, and he himſelfe with his two and twentie thouſand Perſians entred into the Turks armie, who now to withſtand his aſſault, had on that ſide alſo made head againſt him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to ſee what a mortall battell was made, what ſingular proweſſe ſhewed euen preſently in the fore front of the battell; for in a moment you might haue ſeene the Tents and Pauilions turned vpſide downe, and their incamping Lodgings reple-

A replenished with dead carkaſſes and bloud, victorious death ranging and raigning in euery corner. The Turks themſelues were aſtoniſhed and maruelled to ſee their enemies (ſo few in number, and intermingled among ſo populous an army of warlike people) more like fatal miniſters of death, than mortal men, to brandiſh their ſwords ouer them, as if it had lightned, & to make ſo general a ſlaughter; and do to this day with great admiration recount the valor & proweſſe of the Perſians. But they all now doubting leſt the enemie in this fury ſhould forcibly haue entred the very lodgings of the ſicke Viſier, it was commanded (not by himſelfe, for he lay now at the laſt gaſpe; but by him who at that time commanded in his name) That without delay the artillerie ſhould be vnbarred and diſcharged: which in that medley and confuſion of both armies, without any exception or diſtinction of perſons, ouerthrew both friends and foes, and B did more harme perhaps among the Turks themſelues, than among the Perſians: for at the firſt thundring noiſe thereof the Prince with all ſpeed retired, after whom preſently followed all the reſt: ſo that the Turks which remained behinde, were more annoyed with the deadly ſhot than were the Perſians, who flying away, could not feele the damage, but that the Turkes muſt firſt be well payed for their labor. The Turkes purſuing the flying Perſians, made ſhew as if they would gladly haue ouertaken them: but night comming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without danger returne. In this battell of Sancazan were ſlaine twentie thouſand Turks, without any notable loſſe of the Perſians.

Among the reſt, in the ſame place died the Viſier Oſman, General of the late dreadfull, but now deſolat army; not by the hand of the enemy, but conſumed with the vehemency of an C ague, and flux of bloud. Whoſe death notwithſtanding was kept ſecret from the whole army, euery man verily thinking, that it was but only the continuance of his ſicknes, becauſe the chaters wherin he lay, were ſtil kept cloſe: and in his name Cicala Baſſa (for ſo he had appointed in his wil) gaue out anſwers & commandments to the whole army. Neuertheleſſe it was diſcloſed to the Perſians by means of three yong men, who in the life of Oſman hauing charge of his jewels and treaſure, were with the beſt thereof and the faireſt of his horſes fled to the Perſian king, to whom they reuealed the death of the General. The Perſians, who before had thought it not poſſible for ſo great cowardiſe and diſhonorable kind of fighting & ordering of an army to haue proceeded from the vertue and valor of Oſman, of whoſe worth they had too manifeſt a trial and experience in times paſt; now vnderſtanding of his death, were thereby incouraged to attempt the vtter ouerthrow of the Turkiſh remnant, and ſo to giue them an honorable farewel. Wherupon the Perſian prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now raiſed their campe, and were remoued to a certaine riuer of ſalt water, not far from Sancazan, where the Prince cauſed a few tents to be pitched, about foure or fiue miles diſtant from the Turkiſh campe, the aforeſaid brooke running in the midſt betweene the two armies. Now the Prince had purpoſed to haue aſſailed the Turks in the morning, whiles they were loding their carriages, hoping in that confuſion to haue wrought them ſome notable miſchiefe; which his deſignement was reuealed vnto the Turks by one of his ſpies whom they had caught. And therfore they did neither riſe ſo early in the morning as their manner was, nor load their ſtuffe, vntil ſuch time as they were all armed, & on horſeback ready to receiue their enemies. By which their wary and vnuſual maner of riſing, the Perſians perceiued that their purpoſe was by ſome means diſcouered. And yet conſidering that if they ſhould loſe this occaſion, they ſhould find no other good opportunitie to annoy them before the next Spring, they vtterly reſolued to aduenture the aſſault: and hauing obſerued that the enemies artillery was on the right ſide of the armie, they in the ſight of euery man began to enter on the left. But the Turks preſently ſo vncouered and vnbarred their artillerie againſt the aſſailants, as was to their great loſſe & danger. Howbeit they were ſo nimble and ſo quicke to ſhroud themſelues vnder the enemies armie, and to auoid the miſchieuous tempeſt, that being come now very neere the Turks ſquadrons, they muſt needs ioine battel with them. The Perſians had purpoſed before, as ſoone as they ſaw the Turks begin to ſtir, to retire, and ſo to draw them on into a very filthie and deepe mariſh, which being then drie, was not feared or doubted of any, but only by thoſe that were acquainted withall or borne thereabouts. Which their policie the rebel Maxut Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being wel acquainted with thoſe places) perceiuing, gaue notice thereof to Cicala Baſſa: who preſently cauſed a great compaſſing wing to be made, commanding them to ſet vpon the Perſians, and to charge them home: which was forthwith put in execution, ſo that their fore front opened it ſelfe with very large and ſpacious corners vpon the Prince: who G no ſooner ſaw this their vnwonted order of comming on, but by and by he perceiued that his purpoſe was diſcouered: and thereupon without any ſtay he began to retire, calling his people after him; which could not ſo ſuddenly be done, but that three thouſand of them remained behinde, all miſerably ſtifled, ouertrodden in the mire; with very little loſſe to the Turkes. And this only battell of fiue that were fought vnder Tauris, and in thoſe quarters, was leſſe hurtfull to the Turks than to the Perſians.

The Prince returned to the King his fathers campe, recounting vnto him the whole action, together with the departure of the enemie. And ſo the Turks came to Salmas, where the death of the General was publiſhed: from Salmas they went afterwards to Van, where they tooke a ſuruey of their armie, and found wanting therein about foure ſcore and fiue thouſand perſons, H or as ſome ſay more. At Van all the ſouldiers were diſmiſſed; and Cicala from thence gaue notice to Amurath at Conſtantinople, of all that had hapned. Where firſt was publiſhed the death of Oſman the General, (for whom were made many ſignes of great ſorrow) and together with his death, were blazed the bloudie and mortal actions that were in that expedition performed: ſo that the whole citie ſeemed to be greatly diſcomforted; and in many places were heard much ſecret railing vpon the king, many curſes of this war, & inſolent maledictions of theſe manifold miſchiefs. After that, was diſperſed the great fame of the new fortreſſe erected at Tauris, of the ſacking of the citie, and of all the loſſe that had hapned therein; and a general Edict publiſhed in the Kings name, That through all the cities of his Empire they ſhould make ſolemne feaſts, with other expreſſe tokens of joy & reioycing: which was accor- I dingly done both in Conſtantinople and other places. There was alſo word ſent to the Embaſſadors of Hungarie, of France, of Venice, and of other countries, That they ſhould do the like: but they all with one accord anſwered, That it was neuer the cuſtome of Embaſſadours to make any ſuch ſignes of rejoicing, but only when the King himſelfe in perſon returned from any the like victories.

The Turks armie diſcharged at Van.

In the meane time conſultation was held at Van, for the ſending of ſuccours to Teflis in Georgia: vnto which important ſeruice, Daut Chan to deſerue ſome reward at Amuraths hand, offred himſelfe: vnto whom Cicala Baſſa deliuered thirtie thouſand Cecchini to be conueyed to the fort at Teflis. Which piece of ſeruice the Renegate performed, and without trouble relieued the ſoldiers in the fort: which was ſo well accepted of Amurath, that he for K the ſame good ſeruice honored him with the dignitie of the Baſſa of Maras. Maxut Chan alſo the other Perſian rebell, that guided the Turkiſh armie to Reiuan, and afterwards to Tauris, was in like manner by the ſame Amurath honoured with the great rich office of the Baſſa of Aleppo.

The miſeries the Turks army endured at Tauris.

The miſeries the Turkiſh armie endured in this expedition for Tauris, beſide the loſſes before rehearſed, were wonderfull: for as the Sanzacke of Aman (a citie of Soria, called in antient time Apamea) preſent in all this action, reporteth in a letter which he wrot to Ali Baſſa of Aleppo, there was ſuch a dearth in the Turks armie, that they were inforced to giue their camels bisket and rice, and when that failed, they gaue them their pack-ſaddles to eat, and after that pieces of wood beaten into pouder, and at laſt the very earth: which dearth endured vntil L they arriued at Van. And at Tauris whileſt the fortreſſe was in building, they were of neceſſitie conſtrained to giue their horſes their dung in very drie pouder. By reaſon whereof there followed a grieuous mortalitie of horſes, camels, mules, and men; and the ſtinke which grew of this mortalitie was ſo great, that euery man was faine to carrie a piece of a ſtrong ſmelling onyon vnder his noſe, to auoid the heauineſſe thereof.

The fort ſo lately built in the royall citie of Tauris exceedingly grieued the Perſians in general, but eſpecially the king and the prince his ſon: to let it alone, they reckoned it too great a ſhame, and how to demoliſh it they well knew not, finding themſelues not onely deſtitute of artillery, but alſo of ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as was requiſite for performance of ſo great an enterpriſe: yet prickt on with deſire of glory, & the neceſſity of the cauſe, they determined euen in the depth of Winter to gather new forces, and with trenches of earth to approch the ditch, and to trie if they could aduance a countermure as high as their walls, and ſo to attaine to the conqueſt thereof. But in the gathering of their men they diſcouered new difficulties; for, to hire any ſouldiours either from Heri or Gheilan, was denied them by Abas and Amat Chan, and their Turcoman nation, which might haue bin the readieſt and the neereſt at ſuch a need, for the late death of Emir Chan and for the ſucceſſion of Aliculi, were growne very contumatious: ſo that neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the Preſidents and Gouernours of that kingdome, could tel which way to turne themſelues. At laſt for the common ſafety, they determined to draw the Turcomans to a reconciliation, hoping that by promiſing them any honeſt ſatisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themſelues grieued for the death of their captain, they would become more tractable to do them ſeruice in their common neceſſities. Whereupon the king ſent kind letters to the heads and captains of thoſe nations, & principally to Mahamet Chan and to Caliſe the Sultan, declaring plainly vnto them the perils of his ſtate, and of the libertie of the whole kingdom, with the confidence he had in their valor; and that therefore forgetting all that was paſt, as done not in ſhame or ſcorne of their nation, but onely for zeale and loue to the kingdome, they would demand ſuch ſatisfaction as they deſired, and that he would be ready to agree to any iuſt requeſt they ſhould make. To which letters they readily anſwered, that they would come vnto him, to put in execution whatſoeuer he ſhould for the common neceſſity or honour of his State command. Now they had craftily amongſt themſelues already concluded not to ſuffer any other to ſit in the room of Emir Chan their late Gouernor, but onely young Tamas the kings third ſon. Which concluſion they had plotted to themſelues, with a reſolution in the end, to cauſe him to be accepted for king at Casbin, in deſpight of the king himſelfe and of the prince Hamze: nothing regarding, that by this action far greater troubles would ariſe in Perſia than euer were yet heard of, but only being wholly bent to reuenge the death of one only Emir Chan. With this malicious & fraudulent reſolution, they to the number of ten thouſand (vnder the conduct of two captains, Mahamet and Caliſe) went to the king, in all reuerence offering themſelues with all readineſſe to be emploied in the enterpriſe whereunto they were called. The old credulous king, not ſuſpecting any miſchiefe plotted by theſe ſecret rebels, was greatly comforted at their comming: and although by ſome of his Sultans that had felt ſome inckling of this conſpiracie, he was aduiſed to deale circumſpectly and warily with them, and not commit any matter of importance to their truſt; yet did he thinke euery houre a thouſand vntill he had offered them ſatisfaction: promiſing them, that what captain ſoeuer they would deſire in the room of Emir Chan, if it were poſſible, they ſhould haue him. Wherunto the diſſembling Mahamet Chan made anſwer, That their deſire aboue all things, was to do him pleaſure and ſeruice; not doubting but he would appoint them ſuch a chieftaine, as ſhould be valorous, noble, and acceptable vnto them. The king could ſtay no longer, but franckly declared vnto them, That to aſſure them of his good will, and to giue them an hoſtage in pawn therof, he had made choice of yong Tamas his ſon, to ſucceed in the roome of Emir Chan their late Gouernor. As ſoone as Mahamet Chan heard this reſolution of the king, who beſide al expectation, voluntarily of himſelfe yeelded them the means to put in execution what they had maliciouſly before contriued againſt the peace and libertie of the kingdome: he became more iocond than he was wont to be, and outwardly ſhewed himſelfe ready for whatſoeuer the king would command him; and in the names of the reſt, yeelded alſo large promiſes of fidelitie and obedience, ſo that the matter might be performed for which he had now giuen his word.

Ten thouſand Turcomans offer their ſeruice vnto the Perſian king.

The king, who deſired nothing more than to ſee the fort of Tauris raſed (which could hardly be done without the help of thoſe Turcomans) contrary to the aduice of the wiſeſt of the Sultans, and of the prince, ſecretly, and as it were by ſtealth, gaue his yong ſon Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chiefe of all the Turcomans. Who to nouriſh the good opinion and credulitie of the king, and to ſecure the prince and the Sultans, gaue a luſtie beginning by the help of his followers, with trenches and rampiers to approch the fort. Neither was there any great time ſpent therein; for they had now almoſt made their trenches and mounts euen with the enemies wal, and the ditch it ſelfe was almoſt filled vp with earth, ſo that there wanted but little more labor to begin the deſired aſſault: when contrarie to all mens expectation, the falſe and wicked traitor Mahamet Chan with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the childe Tamas, departed in the night time, and vpon a ſudden, from ſo noble and honorable an enterpriſe: and blinded with deſire to put in execution his ill hatched purpoſe, couertly & without any noiſe remoued from the beſieged wals, and put himſelfe on his way towards Caſbin: ſtill tearming Tamas by the name of the King of Perſia, and ſundrie wayes abuſing and mocking the poore old king and the prince. This ſo ſudden and ſo dangerous a rebellion, whereby not only ſo honorable and ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe was to be abandoned, but the whole ſtate of the kingdome like to be indangered, exceedingly grieued al good men, but moſt of all the old king and the prince his ſon: who no leſſe carefull of his rightfull ſucceſſion, than was the aged king of his preſent eſtate, both now hazarded by this rebellion, wholly incenſed with griefe & anguiſh of mind, began to caſt a thouſand deuices in his troubled head, what courſe to take, and what to reſolue vpon. To abandon the ſiege it grieued him aboue meaſure, and to ſuffer ſo pernicious a rebellion to go forward, ſeemed too dangerous for the ſtate of Perſia, and to prouide for both theſe miſchiefes at once, was altogether impoſſible. In theſe huge waues of contrarie thoughts, he reſolued at laſt to turne himſelfe againſt the Turcomans, and to ſuppreſſe that rebellion, as moſt dangerous to the State. And ſo with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, and a part alſo of the kings ordinarie guard, all couragious and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans, and marching directly toward Casbin, he ouertooke them at a place called Caliſteza, a daies iourney on this ſide Casbin, and there ioyned battell with them. Wherein many of them being ſorie for that they had done, would not ſo much as draw their ſwords againſt the Prince: many others fled alſo away for feare, ſo that he eaſily obtained a wiſhed victorie ouer them. The ſeditious Mahomet Chan was taken priſoner, and by the Princes commandement preſently beheaded: ſo was alſo Caliſe the Sultan, and diuers other captains of this peſtilent conſpiracy. Yong Tamas was alſo taken, & by the direction of the Prince ſent to the caſtle of Cahaca. Fiue thouſand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebell Mahomet, fled out of the battell towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yeelded themſelues to Solyman Baſſa of that citie, who afterwards repenting themſelues of their folly, ſought to returne againe into the fauor of their king, but all in vaine: ſo that being become rebels to the one, and ſuſpected to the other, they did at one time loſe their countrie, their libertie, their honor, & the fauor of all men as well friends as foes. The Prince after this victorie held on his way to Casbin, and there ſtaying, laboured to gather the diſperſed Turcomans, eſpecially thoſe that (mooued with the honeſtie of the cauſe) would not beare arms in ſo vniuſt an action, intending afterwards to returne to Tauris, to attend the beſieging and conqueſt of the fort. This was the end of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cauſe that Tauris was not againe recouered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakening of the Perſian kingdome.

The Turcomans forſake the ſiege and fall into rebellion.

The Turcomans diſcomfited, & Mahamet Chan and Caliſe the Sultan beheaded.

Giaffer Baſſa ſendeth to Cicala Baſſa for aid.

Now Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa Gouernour of the Caſtle of Tauris, fearing leſt the Perſian Prince would with a greater army again return to the ſiege: perceiuing himſelfe to wax euery day weaker and weaker, by reaſon that many of his men ſecretly fled from him, beſide them that periſhed with ſickneſſe, and others ſlain in aduenturing too boldly to goe abroad to ſeeke for victuals; ſent aduertiſement thereof to Cicala Baſſa at Van: ſignifying further vnto him by writing, That if the prince ſhould again returne to aſſault the fort, he ſhould of neceſſitie be enforced to yeeld it: and that therefore as he tendered the honor of his Sultan, he would be carefull to ſend him ſuccour, whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort: adding moreouer, That now it was moſt eaſily to be done, becauſe there was no forces of the enemies in thoſe quarters, ſauing onely a few which remained about the king, lying 12 miles off from Tauris. Cicala moued with the importance of the enterpriſe propounded, and withall deſirous to gain ſome credit of glorie and renowne with his king, entertained the aduices of Giaffer, and getting him to horſe with a train of three thouſand harquebuſiers and good ſtore of munition, ſet forward toward Tauris. The Perſian king aduertiſed therof, ſent out ſpies to learn what way they held, meaning to meet them and to ſet vpon them: but theſe ſpies comming neere to Salmas, were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicala, and beeing put to torture, reuealed at laſt, how that their king was in armes, & on his way towards Sancazan. At which news Cicala was greatly aſtonied, as well for the danger whereinto the forces and munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as alſo for that by any loſſe which his troups ſhould ſuſtain in this expedition, the city of Van (being indeed the greater and moſt noble frontier towne in all thoſe countries) muſt needs be in hazard to be loſt, hauing left in it but his lieutenant with a verie few ſoldiers. Whereupon hee determined to relinquiſh this dangerous enterpriſe, and to withdraw himſelfe backe to the defence and preſeruation of the citie committed to his truſt and gouernment. But although theſe expected and deſired ſuccours were not conueyed to Tauris as was intended, yet had Giaffer as good fortune as hee could wiſh: for the preparations of the

A prince were ſo long and troubleſome, and his returne ſo much prolonged, that there was time enough yeelded vnto the Turks great Generall now newly choſen (as by and by ſhal be declared) to go with a ſtrong army into thoſe quarters, and ſo to preſerue all that which the only expedition and celeritie of the enemie might haue put in great hazard, and almoſt haue brought to a deſperat caſe.

In the mean time, Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor was greatly troubled at Conſtantinople in making choice of a new Generall: on the one ſide, Oſman Baſſa hauing by his laſt will left Sinan Cicala to be his ſucceſſor, as a man of approued valor, and the many dangers he had run thorow in the late ſeruice about Tauris, with the great fauours he had in the court, did not a little encline the king to his election: on the other ſide, he heard of a publicke rumor ſpread amongſt B the ſouldiers, that they could by no means endure to be commanded by ſo young a captaine; and that ſome in plaine termes ſhould ſay, That they would not obey him: Which cauſed Amurath to doubt, that ſome dangerous diſcord might thereof enſue in the armie, if he ſhould proceed to make choice of him. Then there was alſo Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man which had alreadie ſuſtained that charge before Oſman, who now very ambitiouſly ſought againe for this honour, hauing of late performed ſome good ſeruice to the good liking of the King. Of any other to make better choice he had none, ſo that he ſtood in great doubt what to do. In the end, becauſe hee was in good time to prouide for his affaires, he made choice of Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man whom he had before made proofe of: a man of great fidelitie, of an honorable carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of ſuch an armie: to whome he C granted the ordinarie authoritie, to mannage at his pleaſure ſuch affaires of the empire as concerned his iourney. Vpon this reſolution, generall precepts were ſent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Baſſaes and other Gouernours, with ſpeciall commandement, That all their ſoldiers, together with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armor, artificers, and to be ſhort, all their neceſſary furniture & prouiſion ſhould be ready and in order, vpon the firſt warning ſhould be ſent them the next Spring. Great prouiſion of money was made, and in Soria (beſides the ordinarie ſumme that is beſtowed vpon the yearely pay of ſouldiers in Reiuan, Erzirum, Lori, Tomanis, Teflis, and Chars, which ſwallow vp all the reuenue of that countrie, and of the citie of Tripoli, amounting to the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand duckats) there was taken vp in preſt of priuat merchants in the citie of Aleppo onely, the ſumme of threeſcore D thouſand Cecchini, to be repaied vnto them with the firſt monies that ſhould be receiued by the officers of his cuſtome houſes. A matter that moued an extraordinary grudging among the people, for that it ſeemed to euery man a very ſtrange and intollerable exaction, beſide ſo many grieuances laied vpon them, for corne, for carriages, for pioners, and for workmen, to endure this burden alſo of lending their money, without hope of reſtitution thereof: yea and indeed euery man did greatly wonder how they were thus il aduiſed, to make it knowne to the Chriſtian Princes what ſcarcitie and want of money they had. The Generall had alſo with him foure hundred pieces of artillerie, & did beſide ſo worke the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Baſſa of Aleppo) was granted vnto him to be the guide of his armie, as he had E been of Oſmans; and that Cicala Baſſa of Van (ſcarce his good friend) was remoued from thence and ſent farther off out of his way as Baſſa to Babylon.

The returne of Soria ſix hundred thouſand duckats.

Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople, and commeth to Siuas.

And thus hauing put all things in readineſſe, he departed from Conſtantinople in the month of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and paſſing ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, came to Siuas ſomething later than he ſhould haue done, beeing hindered partly by the Plague which then raged exceedingly in Conſtantinople, and partly by other occaſions incident to ſuch actions. At Siuas he ſtaied ſo long for the comming together of his army, and in muſtering men, that it was the latter end of Iuly before he departed thence; ſtaying indeed the longer at Siuas, by reaſon of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at Erzirum: which dearth was alſo ſo great in Aleppo, that a Venice buſhell of wheat was ſold for twelue Cecchini.

Ferat yet making his aboad at Siuas, but readie to depart, was aduertiſed by certaine Poſts ſent from Giaffer the Baſſa of Tauris, how that the Perſian prince was hourely expected with a great armie, and that if he did foreſlow to ſend ſuccours, and to preuent the comming of the prince, and ſo giue him time & leiſure to aſſault the caſtle, he doubted greatly how he ſhould be able to hold the ſame. Vpon which aduertiſement Ferat preſently remoued, and ſo haſted his iourney, that about the beginning of Auguſt he was at Erzirum: and ſtill hearing more and more of the princes comming, ſtaied not there, but haſted to Van: where hauing gathered together all his ſouldiers, and taken a new ſuruey of his army, he departed thence; and being preſently G come into the open and large champaines, to make proofe of the readineſſe of his ſouldiers, he marſhalled them in ſuch ſort as if he ſhould forthwith haue ioyned battell with the enemie, and ſo in ſeemely order marched on.

The Turkiſh Generall continually feared, leſt the Perſians ſhould come vpon him with ſome ſudden aſſault: beſides that, the conſtant report of the Princes comming to Tauris with his armie, much increaſed his troubled thoughts. But on the other ſide, he repoſed great confidence in the conſpiracie that was now plotted againſt the life of the Prince, with the priuity of Aliculi Chan the protector and champion of Abas Mirize of Heri: who vnder colour of accompanying the Prince to aſſiſt his forces, had reſolutely concluded with himſelfe, and abſolutely H promiſed Abas (hauing alſo giuen intelligence thereof to the Turkiſh General) to rid the Prince Hamze of his life; or at leaſt (which he thought might more eaſily be brought to paſſe) in the ſundry reuolutions & variable chances of the battel, at ſome time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and ſo to ſettle his lord and maſter Abas in his eſtate. Vpon theſe trecheries Ferat grounding himſelf, began with greater confidence to diſpoſe his deſignemẽts and ſomewat leſſe to feare the fame of the huge preparations of Perſia againſt him. Which preparations in truth, as by moſt wicked deuices and malicious conſpiracies they were turned quite contrarie from that end whereunto the Prince Hamze had continually appointed them; ſo if they had bin emploied with ſuch faith & fidelitie as ſo righteous a cauſe required, without all doubt the writers of our time ſhould haue had matter enough in this 86 yeare to ſhew and repreſent vnto the world ſuch accidents as ſhould be nothing inferior to thoſe of the yere I before going. But foraſmuch as rebellion and diſcord, the two infernall miniſters of the diuel, haue for the vtter vndoing & ouerthrow of the glorie of Perſia, continually fauored the Turks armie, no maruell it is that the Perſian nation cannot vant of any reuenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our writers cannot chuſe but write of the true and vndoubted victories of the Turkes, and the bare ſhadowes of the Perſian exploits, which notwithſtanding many Chriſtians vainly beleeue, becauſe they moſt earneſtly deſire them to be true, although they do ſee to the contrary, the manifeſt proſpering & euident conqueſts which the Turks haue in diuers their States and Countries.

The glorie of the Perſian kingdom ouerthrowne by rebellion and diſcord.

The Perſian Prince about the latter end of Iuly arriued at Tauris with the greateſt part of K his armie, where he (contrarie to the opinion of all men) ſtaid not, for what cauſe is vncertaine. But vnderſtanding that Zeinel Baſſa of Salmas, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the citie, who of a Perſian was become a Turke, and had done great harme againſt the State of Perſia, he determined ſuddenly to ſet vpon him, and to chaſtiſe him for his rebellion. According to which reſolution, being accompanied with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his people encamped as he had been before enformed, he gaue him the aſſault. Zeinel more readie to flie than to fight, & his ſoldiers as readie as he, fled preſently, and fel before the Perſians, ſo that the Baſſa himſelfe with a few others had much adoe to eſcape and ſaue themſelues in the cloſeſt corners thereabouts, leauing the citie committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angrie enemy: who entering into the ſame, ſacked and ſpoi- L led it, exerciſing thereon all ſuch cruelties, as partly the natural deſires of ſouldiers vſe to practiſe, and partly ſuch as the Turks themſelues ſhewed vnto them in that miſerable and moſt lamentable ſacking of Tauris the laſt yere. The like ſpoils did the Perſian army in al thoſe quarters round about, and ſo would haue peraduenture returned to Tauris, but that certaine ſpies arriued vpon them, with aduertiſement, That the Baſſa of Reiuan being iſſued out of his fortreſſe with fifteen hundred harquebuſiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the Prince had done about Salmas. With which newes the prince was greatly moued; and immediatly riſing with his armie, and marching towards Reiuan, not far from the citie encountered the Baſſa: who diſcouering the enemies forces afar off, began in great diſorder to flie and retire into his fort, leauing the greateſt part of his ſoldiers (making M not ſo much ſpeed in flight as himſelfe) to the fury of the prince, who put them al to the ſword, and did what harme he poſſibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very ſame time great troubles aroſe in the Druſian country: for Man-Ogli the valiant Druſian (of whom we haue before ſpoken) in reuenge of the iniuries don vnto him & his people

A ple by Ebrain Baſſa, and by a valiant kinde of reſtitution to recompence himſelfe of all thoſe bribes and Preſents which by ſo many ſhifts and ſubtilties were by the couetous Baſſa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken vp armes, and hauing waſted and ſacked all the territory of Ebne-Manſur and of his other enemies who had yeelded their obedience vnto the Turks, withoutlet forced all that country with ſudden inuaſions and inrodes, euen very neere vnto the cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did there exceeding harme. For redreſſe whereof, Amurath was glad to diſpatch away from the court Ali Baſſa borne at Aleppo, with the title of the Baſſa of Damaſco, and with authority to muſter freſh ſouldiers, and ſo wholly to attend the vtter ſubuerſion of Mam-Ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, ſo that his preſence in that countrey ſerued rather for a reconciliation and peace making amongſt them, B than for the proſecuting of any further warre, which at that time was moſt neceſſarie for the Turks to be auoided, as well for want of mony in the common treaſurie, as for the exceeding ſcarcitie of victuals.

Now the Perſian prince hauing made an end of the outrodes and ſpoiles before mentioned, retired himſelfe to Tauris, and ſo towards his fathers campe, where the reſt of his army was now arriued, to the number of about fortie thouſand: of whom the Prince diſpatched away the ſoldiers of Heri to the number of eight thouſand, vnder the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their Generall: and part alſo of the Turcomans, vnder the leading of Emanguli Chan; with ſpeciall charge, That they ſhould by the way in places of moſt aduantage, meet & receiue the enemies army, and in thoſe narrow & troubleſome paſſages to do them what miſchiefe C they poſſible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this meanes to weaken the enemies forces, and ſo at their arriuall at Tauris, to come vpon them with all his power, and ſo vtterly to deſtroy them.

Both theſe captains departed accordingly, making ſhew that they would with all affection accompliſh the commandement of their Prince: yet neuer was there heard any ſeruice of moment put in execution by them: for Aliculi ful of treaſon, after their departure began to alledge many forced reaſons and excuſes, Why they ſhould ſurceaſe from meeting with the Turks: & Emanguli as yet vtterly ignorant of the wicked purpoſes and miſchieuous trecherie of Aliculi, ſuffered himſelf to be miſſe-led by him alſo. By the delaies and negligence of theſe two Perſian captains, the Turkiſh General tooke leiſure without any loſſe or hinderance at all, to arriue D at Tauris, and to put the deſired ſuccors into the fort: at what time the Perſian prince by good hap had got knowledge of the trecherie of Aliculi, and of the deſignements which many of the Sultans had lately contriued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkiſh General. Of which ſuſpition he being greatly afraid, durſt not only not truſt himſelfe to perform thoſe battels that he had before determined to haue performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honorable enterpriſe, wholly emploied all his care and ſtudy for the ſafety of his own perſon, and ſo left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turks. And thus thoſe great hopes and expectations which the Perſians had conceiued of great exploits to haue bin done againſt the enemie, did not onely proue vaine and come to no good iſſue, but contrariwiſe by this diſcouerie were conuerted into moſt ſtrange diſturbances, and all Perſia thereby endured E ſundrie alterations and reuolutions of moſt important conſequencies. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were purſued by the prince, as rebels and traitors: and alſo Abas Mirize of Heri was manifeſtly diſcouered for a wicked and trecherous contriuer of his brothers death: whereby the common miſchiefes were encreaſed more than euer they were before, and the publike calamities yeelded greater hopes vnto the Turks than they had euer before conceiued in all the courſe of theſe warres.

Aliculi and EmanguliChan performe nothing againſt the Turks, as was by the prince expected.

Ferat putteth ſuccours into the fort at Tauris.

When Ferat had thus relieued them in the caſtle of Tauris, leauing for the cuſtodie thereof Giaffer the Baſſa with his former companies, hee returned towards Erzirum: hauing firſt cauſed a fort to be erected at Ourchiue Tauris, a place neere vnto Tauris; another at Coy; and the third at Cum: in euery one of which forts hee left a conuenient number of ſouldiers, F with all things neceſſarie and ſufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the places they were to keep. He ſent alſo ſuccors to the fort at Teflis in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now moſt ioyfully receiued. But the Perſian Prince hauing hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris, thought himſelf now wholly deliuered from the great feare of treaſon and rebellion, wherein he of late liued: and therefore in as great haſt as he could, put himſelfe on his iourney towards Genge: in which place hauing gathered together a good number G of ſouldiers, he determined to remoue thence, to intercept the ſuccors that were by the Turks to be brought to Teflis. Now hee had alwaies found Emanguli Chan to be both faithfull and wiſe, and in him he repoſed an aſſured confidence for performing any enterpriſe that he had in hand, and communicated with him euery deuice that he had conceiued in theſe wars. And therefore he made head and ioined with him, and lodging moſt familiarly in his city, he ſtaid there for the ſetting in order and diſpoſing of his aforeſaid deſignement, beeing very deſirous not to let ſuch an opportunitie to ouerſlip, without ſignification vnto the world of ſome notable noueltie, which might be correſpondent to the fame that of matters paſſed and performed the yere before, was now ſpred & publiſhed abroad ouer all the world. But when he was euen at the very faireſt to haue put this his deſire in execution, and leaſt of all feared any treacherie H or treaſon, vpon a ſudden in the night time as he ſlept vpon a pallet he was miſerably ſtrucken through the body, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him: and ſo the moſt reſplendent and bright luſtre that euer ſhined in Perſia, was vtterly extinguiſhed. What was the occaſion therof, and who procured his death, diuers and ſundry are the opinions of men. Some thinke, that his brother Abas Mirize of Heri, who had before conſpired to haue had him betraied into the hands of the Turkiſh Generall, had now by force of mony and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to haue bin done without the priuitie of his father, as more deſirous to prefer Abas Mirize his other ſonne vnto the kingdome. Diuers others do diuerſly reaſon of the matter: ſo that to affirme of a certaintie, that thus or thus the death of ſo worthie a Prince was procured, were great raſhneſſe: and therefore we leaue it, with the I further proceſſe of the Perſian State, vnto the further diſcouerie of Time, the antient mother of Truth.

The Perſian prince ſlain by one of his Eunuchs.

Notwithſtanding the league betwixt the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph the ſecond and Amurath the great Turke, many ſharp skirmiſhes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks vpon the frontiers of their territories and dominions, eſpecially in Hungarie, Croatia, and Stiria: as now in the latter end of this yere 1586 in the moneth of December, the Turks, after their inſolent manner making an inrode into the borders of Croatia, receiued a notable ouerthrow by the Chriſtians, being in number much fewer: where amongſt others, the Baſſa of Boſna with his brother was ſlaine; whoſe head with certaine priſoners was ſent to Vienna to Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, the Emperors brother. This Baſſa of Boſna and his brother, K ſlaine in this conflict (as we haue ſaid) are reported to haue been the ſonnes of Mahomet the late great Viſier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the ſecond, Amurath his ſiſter. For diuers yeres following, Amurath did no great matter worth the remembrance, contenting himſelfe (as it ſhould ſeeme) with that he had already got from the Perſians: and holding his league in ſome reaſonable ſort with the Chriſtians: yet not ſo, but that many a bloudie broile, tending at laſt euen to the breach of the league, paſſed betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians; which for the continuation of the Hiſtorie we will briefely ſet downe, as they are vnto vs by the Writers of our time reported.

The Caſtle of Koppan in Hungarie ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

In Februarie the yere following, which was the yere 1587, the Chriſtians prouoked by the often outrages of the Turks, ſetting vpon the caſtle of Koppan, not far from the lake of Balaton, L being then frozen, by good fortune ſurpriſed it. There was at that time in the caſtle 3 of the Turks Sanzacks, and about a thouſand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninetie of the better ſort, with ſeuenty women, beſides diuers of the meaner ſort, fell into the hands of the Chriſtians; the reſt ſauing themſelues by flight, or by creeping into ſecret corners: an hundred horſes for ſeruice were there taken alſo, and ſo much bootie as was eſteemed to be worth fortie thouſand duckats. Of the three Sanzacks that were there preſent, Alis Sanzacke of Koppan was taken, and brought firſt to Vienna, and afterward preſented to the Emperor: Another of them ſtanding vpon his defence in a vault vnder ground, was there ſmothered: the third eſcaped by flight, but was afterwards the ſame yeare taken with diuers others, as ſhall be forthwith declared. M

The eight of Auguſt following, foure of the Turks great Commanders in Hungarie, viz. the Baſſa of Ziget, the Sanzackes of Mohas, of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and the new Sanzacke of Koppan, with fiue thouſand ſouldiers brake into the borders of the Chriſtians, and in moſt cruell manner deſtroyed ſeuenteene countrey villages about Limbach: carrying away with them

A them all the miſerable countrey people, with the ſpoile of the countrey. Whereof George Countie Serinus (ſonne to that moſt valiant Countie Nicholas Serinus ſlaine at Ziget) commander of the garriſon of Caniſia, vnderſtanding, with as much ſpeed as was poſſible raiſed ſuch forces as he was able out of his territorie betwixt the riuers of Drauus and Mura, and calling vnto his aid the Countie Nadaſti, the Lord Bathianius, and ſome other valiant Captaines that had the charge of thoſe frontiers; with ſuch diligence tooke the ſtraits and paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs returne among the mariſhes, that the Turks comming backe againe that way with a very rich prey and many priſoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by thoſe moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiers, in thoſe ſtrait and troubleſome paſſages about a mile from Caniſia, were at length diſcomfited and put to flight with ſuch a miſerable ſlaugh-B ter, that many of them yeelded vp their ſcimiters, pittifully crying for mercie; other ſome fled backe into the woods and forreſts; and many running headlong into the mariſhes, there periſhed, or ſticking faſt in the deepe mud, cried together for mercie and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Muhamet the Sanzacke of Quinque Eccleſiæ (ſonne to Haly Baſſa ſlaine in the battell of Lepanto) was taken priſoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of Mohaz, thinking to eſcape through the mariſh, ſtucke faſt with his horſe, and was ſhot through the head with a ſmall ſhot, and there died. The Baſſa of Ziget, with Chaſan the new Sanzacke of Koppan, ſeeing all deſperate and loſt, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of Koppan wandering vp and downe in the woods, was the next night after the battell with others taken: the Baſſa of Ziget almoſt ſpent with hunger and griefe of minde, eſcaped on foot ſeuen dayes after to Breſenza. There C were taken of the Turks a thouſand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there was ſlaine of the Turks, with them that periſhed in the mariſhes and woods, about 2000, and of the Turks horſes were taken aboue 1500. All the prey before taken by the Turks, with the miſerable captiues, was againe recouered. The number of them that performed this notable ſeruice, was in all but fifteen hundred foot and fiue hundred horſe, of whom there was but eleuen ſlaine, but moſt of the reſt wounded. Foure hundred heads of the ſlaine Turks were (after the manner of thoſe bordering ſouldiers) carried for ſhew to Ca-niſia, with fiue hundred priſoners. The Chriſtian ſouldiers with the helpe of the countrey people, ceaſed not for certaine dayes to hunt after the Turks that were fled into the woods, as after wilde beaſts, of whom they found a great number: diuers others alſo ſeeing no meanes D to eſcape, came forth of their lurking places and yeelded themſelues.

Amurath vnderſtanding of all theſe troubles that had ſo happened, commanded Aly the Baſſa of Buda to be ſtrangled, for that he had broken the league, and not reſtrained the inſolencie of his Sanzackes, whom he might haue commanded: and in his ſtead placed Sinan Baſſa, whome before in diſgrace, hee had now at the requeſt of his wife againe receiued into fauour, and reſtored to his former dignitie. About this time alſo Sigiſmund (the King of Sweden his ſonne) now after the death of King Stephen choſen King of Polonia, and Maximilian the Emperours brother rejected; euen in the beginning of his raigne ſought to renew the league which Stephen his predeceſſor and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his predeceſſors the Turkiſh Sultans. And to that purpoſe writ vnto him as fol-E loweth:

Aly Baſſa of Buda ſtrangled by the commandement of Amurath.

Sinan Baſſa againe receiued into fauour.

Sigiſmund the third, King of Polonia, vnto Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turkes, ſendeth greeting.

The Almightie long keepe and preſerue your Maieſtie in health and honour. Moſt Mightie Prince, our beſt beloued friend and neighbour, after that we by the grace and goodneſſe of God were choſen to gouerne the kingdome of Polonia, and the Embaſſadors of that kingdome had ſignified ſo much vnto vs; we prouiding vs of neceſſaries, came to Danske the eighteenth of October, from whence we ſend Iohn Zamogil our Secretarie, to giue your Maieſtie to vnderſtand of this our comming. For beeing told by the Polonian Embaſſadors, That wee were choſen vnto the gouernment of that Kingdome, vpon condition, That according vnto the cuſtome of our predeceſſors the Polonian Kings, we ſhould keepe loue and friendſhip with the moſt Excellent * Muſſulman Emperours; wee promiſe vnto your Soueraigne Maieſtie, that we are willing with the like or greater zeale and deuotion, to continue that amitie and friendſhip with your moſt excellent Maieſtie and the Othoman Emperors your Succeſſors. For confir- mation whereof ſo ſoone as we ſhall come vnto Craconia the regal citie of Polonia, and there be crowned, we will forthwith ſend our great Embaſſador vnto your Maieſtie. In the meane time we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Maieſtie, that our kingdome may on your Maieſties behalfe reſt in ſafetie and peace: which we perſuade our ſelues you will eaſily grant. So wiſhing vnto you all health and happineſſe, we bid you farewell. From Danske the 18 of October, in the yeare 1587, and of our raigne the firſt.

Vnto which the Kings requeſt and letters, Amurath not long after returned this anſwer in writing:

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turks, vnto Sigiſmund King of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his anſwer vnto the letters of Sigiſmund.

I take it well, and as a token of your loue, that your Embaſſador Iohn Zamogil came with your letters vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, the refuge of diſtreſſed Princes: wherein you haue giuen vs to underſtand, how that inſtead of the moſt excellent and famous King Stepen, of worthie memory, late King of Polonia, you, diſcended of the ſame noble ſtocke and race of the Polonian Kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous Kingdome of Polonia and the great Kingdome of Lithuania, choſen King of Polonia: and being ſent for by lawfull Embaſſadors, by the fauour and goodneſſe of God, to be come vnto the citie of Danske, and from thence to be about to go vnto Craconia, the chiefe citie of the kingdome of Polonia. And when you are there arriued, to ſend your Embaſſadour vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, to confirme, preſerue, and eſtabliſh the league and amitie commodious and neceſſarie for both our Kingdomes, honored and kept by your antient predeceſſours, with our grandfathers and great grandfathers; yea and that with greater zeale and deuotion than any your noble Anceſtors. And therefore your Embaſſador in your name requeſteth, That no inuaſion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the kingdome of Polonia, or any harme there done: and that the moſt noble Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whome God bleſſe) ſhould be warned, that he neither make nor ſuffer any incurſion to be made into the confines of the Kingdome of Polonia. All which things in your letters contained, with the reſt which your Embaſſadour hath by word of mouth deliuered, are with ſpeed orderly by vs conceiued. Know you therefore our moſt ſtately and magnificent Court to be alwaies open vnto ſuch as reſort thereunto, and that from thence neuer man had repulſe, neither ſhall hereafter haue: wherefore it beſeemeth you, as ſoone as theſe our letters ſhall be brought vnto you, to open your eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done againſt the Maieſtie of our Court, and the league; and that our peace and amitie be neither in much or little diſturbed, but as beſt beſeemeth, well and ſincerely kept: and ſo perſuade your ſelfe it ſhall on our part alſo be moſt inuiolately obſerued. Our letters are alſo directed vnto the moſt excellent Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whom God bleſſe) ſtraitly charging and commanding him, not to make or ſuffer any incurſion to be made into the borders of Polonia. In briefe, the league and amity ſhall on our part be religiouſly kept: and whoſoeuer ſhall preſume to do any harme vnto the kingdome or confines of Polonia, ſhall therefore without faile receiue from vs due puniſhment. So on your part alſo it is requiſite that the ſame be done, and that in declaration of your loue, you forget not oftentimes to intimate vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, ſuch certaine occurrents and newes as ſhal happen in thoſe parts, which ſhall be vnto vs a ſigne of your ſincere loue and friendſhip. So know you and giue credit vnto this our ſeale from Conſtantinople.

Neither was King Sigiſmund vnmindefull of this his promiſe before made for the ſending of his Embaſſador; but being poſſeſſed of the Polonian kingdome, ſent Chriſtopher Dziercius (his Secretarie) Embaſſador vnto Amurath for the confirming of the league: which hee hath euer ſince ſo firmely kept with the Turke, that he could neuer by any entreatie of the Emperor, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in reſpect of the common danger, be drawne into the fellowſhip of this long and religious war, ſo hardly maintained by the Emperor and ſome few other Chriſtian Princes his confederats; firſt againſt Amurath whileſt he liued, and euer ſince againſt Mahomet his ſonne, which now raigneth; the iſſue whereof, God grant it proue not as well vnto the Polonians as others farther off, in fine lamentable.

Genge taken by Ferat.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turks General in Perſia) tooke the citie of Genge, being before for feare of the Turks quite abandoned & forſaken by the Inhabitants, who yet vpon his faith giuen for their ſafetie, returned again, yeelding to pay vnto the Turke a yerely tribute

A but of fiue thouſand duckets. But when he would haue gon farther into the enemies country, hauing part of his armie cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous ſouldiers foulely entreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Cicala Baſſa alſo paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, had in thoſe quarters diuers bloudie skirmiſhes with the Perſians, ſomtime carrying away the better, and ſometime the worſe, as the fortune of the field ſerued. Vntill at length, Amurath himſelfe no leſſe wearie than his people of that long and chargeable war, and the Perſian king alſo inclining to peace; he by the perſuaſion of Sinan Baſſa (but lately before receiued into fauour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the ſame: mooued thereunto as well by reaſon of new troubles then in other places ariſing, as for the great famine and plague then raging in Conſtantinople. And conſidering withall what a great Territorie he had woon B from the Perſians, and how neceſſarie it was for him by peace to confirme himſelfe in thoſe his new conqueſts, and by the building of certaine ſtrong forts for the ſuccour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein, to aſſure the ſame vnto him: all which without peace he could not poſſibly do, as the old Baſſa right wiſely told him. For which reaſons he yeelded to peace; and ſo Embaſſadors paſſing to and fro, a peace was at length agreed vpon betwixt theſe two great Mahometan Princes: the Turke couenanting to keepe vnto himſelfe the places he had alreadie gained; namely Tauris, Genge, Siruan, and Chars, with all the profits thereof ariſing, for the maintenance of his garriſons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new ſtirres would eftſoones ariſe, the Turks growne inſolent of their late victories, being not able to content themſelues with the conditions of the league; and the Perſians C not willing to liue in continual feare of the Turkes, eſpecially ſeeing themſelues to be daily by them more and more oppreſſed; and withall doubting leſt the Turkes after they had taken faſt footing in thoſe new conquered Countries, and ſo growne ſtrong, and gotten better knowledge of the paſſages, ſhould (after their ambitious manner) ſeeke to poſſeſſe themſelues of the reſt, not keeping the couenants agreed vpon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neuertheleſſe (as we ſaid) on both ſides for the ſpace of ten yeares orderly confirmed with all due circumſtances and ceremonis, in like occurrents by the great Potentats of the world vſed: and for the more aſſurance thereof, one of the Perſian Kings ſonnes, or as ſome others ſay, one of his nephews, giuen vnto the Turks in hoſtage, as Amurath required.

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Conſtantinople.

D Theſe long wars thus ended, ſhortly after a great ſedition was raiſed at Conſtantinople by the ſoldiers of the court, which returning out of Perſia, with great inſolencie demanded their pay. For the ſatisfying of whom, by the conſent of the great Sultan himſelfe, the value of the coine was inhaunſed, and a new kind of ſubſidie for leuying of money impoſed vpon the subiects in general, none excepted; who ſtanding vpon their antient liberties and priuiledges, refuſed to pay it, eſpecially the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court. Wherefore their Aga or captaine was commanded to appeaſe them, and to perſuade them to pay the demanded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to haue been ſlaine by the inſolent Ianizaries; and yet neuertheleſſe for preuailing no more with them, was in diſpleaſure thruſt out of his office, E and another placed in his roome that ſhould haue married Amuraths daughter; of whom for all that, the Ianizaries would not accept in any caſe, but threw ſtones at him, and threatned to kill him. The next night a great fire aroſe in the citie; for the quenching whereof, the Ianizaries were commanded (as their dutie was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only moſt obſtinatly refuſed to do, but alſo kept backe others that brought water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other ſoldiers of the court, did what they might to make it burne the faſter. With the rage of this fire were conſumed ſeuen of their Temples, 25 great Innes, fifteene thouſand houſes, with many warehouſes and ſhops. To appeaſe this dangerous ſtirre, and to preuent further miſchiefe, commandement was giuen to the Beglerbeg of Grecia and Dauid Paſſy a Iew (the firſt authors of this new impoſition) that they ſhould either gather the aforeſaid tribute by them deuiſed, and pay the ſouldiers, or by ſome other meanes to giue them contentment. But here began the Prieſts publiquely to perſuade the people from paiment of this new tribute, or any other ſuch like; perſuading them in any caſe to defend their antient liberties and cuſtomes: whereupon the churches were by the Prieſts ſhut vp, publique prayers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Baſſa's houſes aſſaulted, and all the citie on a new hurley burley. For the appeaſing whereof Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Great harme done by fire in Conſtantinople.

Ianizaries, to pay the ſouldiers out of his owne treaſurie, to reuoke his mandates giuen out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliuer the two perſuaders thereof to the pleaſure of the Ianizaries; who drew them vp and downe the ſtreets at horſes tailes, and afterwards cutting off their heads, in ſcorne toſſed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had bin tenniſe balls. Sinan Baſſa of Buda inuadeth the vpper part of Hungarie.

About the latter end of September, Sinan Baſſa of Buda, hauing with the aſſiſtance of the Sanzackes about Fille, raiſed an armie of eleuen thouſand ſoldiers, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled all the vpper part of Hungarie, came the ſixt of October before the caſtle of Putnoc, and gaue thereunto ſummons: but finding them in the Caſtle better prouided and more reſolute than he had before ſuppoſed, he departed thence, and paſſing the riuer Schayo, came to Sixo, a towne of about fiue hundred houſes, which after a ſore batterie he tooke, and burnt it down to the ground. H In the meane while Claudius Ruſſel General for the wars in that part of Hungarie, hauing aſſembled his forces, came vpon him, and after a hard fight put him to the worſe, when he had ſlaine of his Turks about two thouſand fiue hundred, beſides three hundred other drowned in the riuer Schayo. Shortly after, the Chriſtians in like manner breaking into the frontiers of the Turks, tooke from them the caſtles of Blauenſtein, Geſtes, with ſome other ſmall forts thereabouts in the vpper part of Hungarie.

Sinan for that he had contrarie to the league, and without the commandement of Amurath, ſo vnfortunatly attempted war in Hungarie, was the next yeare in great diſpleaſure ſent for to Conſtantinople, and Ferat Baſſa of Boſna (late General of the Turks army againſt the Perſians, and now but newly come home) placed in his roome at Buda.

I Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the King of Spaine had made, and of the inuincible Armado (as it was termed) by him ſet forth for the inuaſion of England (the fame whereof had long before filled a great part of the world) as alſo of the euil ſucceſſe thereof the laſt yeare, viz. 1588; and of the purpoſe her Majeſtie of England had for the troubling of his rich trade, eſpecially into the Weſt Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driuen out of Portugal: wrot vnto her about this time concerning thoſe and ſuch like matters as had been moued by her Agent, as followeth:

Nicholaus Reuſnerius Epiſt. Turcic. lib. 12. pag. 42.

Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, France, and Ireland, greeting K Amuraths Letters vnto the Queen of England.

Moſt honorable Matrone of the Chriſtian Religion, Mirror of chaſtitie, adorned with the brightneſſe of ſoueraigntie and power amongſt the moſt chaſte women of the people which ſerue Ieſu, Miſtris of great kingdomes, reputed of greateſt majeſtie and praiſe among the Nazarites, Elizabeth Queene of England, to whom we wiſh a moſt happie and proſperous raigne. You ſhall underſtand by our high and Imperiall letters directed vnto you, how that your Orator reſiant in our ſtately and magnificent Court, hath preſented vnto the throne of our Maieſtie a certaine writing, wherein he hath certified vs, how that about foure yeares ago you haue made war vpon the King of Spaine, for the abating and breaking of his forces, wherewith he threatneth all other Chriſtian Princes, and purpoſeth to make himſelfe the ſole Monarch both of them and all the world beſide. As alſo how that the ſame King of Spaine hath by force taken from L Don Anthonio (lawfully created King of Portugal) his kingdome: and that your intention is, that his ſhips which go and come into the Indies, may from henceforth be embarred and ſtayed from that nauigation: wherein are yerely brought into Spaine, precious ſtones, ſpices, gold, and ſiluer, eſteemed worth manie millions, wherewith the aforeſaid King as with a great treaſure enriched, hath meanes to moleſt and trouble all other Chriſtian Princes: which if he ſhall ſtill proceed to do, he will make himſelfe daily ſtronger and ſtronger, and ſuch an one as may not eaſily be weakened. After that, your aforeſaid Orator requeſted our Highneſſe, in the beginning of the next Spring to ſend out our Imperial fleet againſt him, being aſſured that the King of Spaine could not be able eaſily to withſtand it, for that he had now already receiued a great ouerthrow by your fleet: and being ſcarce able to withſtand you alone, if he ſhould be on diuers parts inuaded, muſt needs be ouercome, to the great benefit of all the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of our M Imperial ſtate. Beſides this, that whereas the aforeſaid Don Anthonio is by force driuen out and depriued of his kingdome, that we (to the imitation of our noble Progenitours of happy memory, whoſe graues the Almightie lighten) ſhould alſo giue the aid and ſuccor of our magnificent ſtate, as did they vnto all ſuch as had recourſe vnto their high Courts and palaces for reliefe. In briefe, all theſe things, with many others which your aforeſaid Orator hath at large declared vnto our Imperiall throne, we haue well vnderſtood, and laid them vp in our deepe remembrance. But foraſmuch as we for many yeares paſt haue made wars in Perſia, with a full reſolution and intent vtterly to conquer and ſubdue the kingdome of that accurſed Perſian heretike, and to ioyne the ſame vnto our antient dominions; and now by the grace of God, and helpe of our great Prophet, are now vpon the point for the ſatisfying of our deſire: that once done, due prouiſion ſhall be aſſigned vnto all ſuch things as you haue of vs requeſted or deſired. Wherefore if you ſhall ſincerely and purely continue the bond of amitie and friendſhip with our high Court, you ſhall finde no more ſecure refuge or ſafer harbor of good wil or loue. So at length all things ſhall go wel and according to your hearts deſire in your wars with Spaine, vnder the ſhadow of our happy throne. And foraſmuch as the King of Spaine hath by fraud and deceit got whatſoeuer he holdeth, without doubt theſe de- B ceitfull deceiuers ſhall by the power of God in ſhort time be diſpatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time we exhort you not to loſe any opportunitie or time, but to be alwaies vigilant, and according to the conuentions betwixt vs, fauourable vnto our friends, and vnto our enemies a foe. And giue notice here to our high Court, of all the new wars which you ſhall vnderſtand of concerning the ſaid King of Spaine, for the behoofe both of your ſelfe and vs. To be briefe, your embaſſador after he had with all care and diligence diſpatched his embaſſage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardon *his Deputie and Agent, now by our leaue maketh his returne towards your kingdome, being for the good and faithfull ſeruice he here did, worthy to be of you eſteemed, honored, and before others promoted: who when he hath obtained of you all thoſe his deſerued honours and preferments, let him or ſome other principal Embaſſador without delay be appointed to our Imperial Court, to continue this office of legation. This we thought C good to haue you certified of vnder our moſt honorable Seale, wherunto you may giue vndoubted credence. From our Imperial palace at Conſtantinople, the 15 of this bleſſed moneth * Ramazan 1589.*

* September.

Yet for all theſe faire ſhewes, it may ſeeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the ſtate of the Turkiſh affaires at thoſe times, and that which hath enſued ſince, that Amurath glad of the diſcord of theſe two ſo great Chriſtian Princes, and not well aſſured of his new conqueſts in Perſia, had no great minde to the inuaſion of Spaine, as too far from the ſtrength of his Empire, an enterpriſe not to be ſo eaſily managed by ſea, as were the wars he ſhortly after vndertooke againſt the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph by land: wherewith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his life, as hath his ſonne Mahomet that now raig- D neth after him, euen vnto this day.

The Polonian Coſſacks inuade the Tartarians and Turks.

About this time alſo the Polonian borderers (whom they call Coſſackes) a rough and warlike kinde of people, after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turks and Tartarians, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Koſlaw a port towne within a dayes journey of Caffa, where they had the ſpoile of many rich warehouſes of the Turks merchants, and the rifling of certain ſhips lying there in harbor, and hauing taken their pleaſure, burnt the reſt, and ſo with a great bootie returned to their lurking places. With which iniurie the Tartars prouoked, and ſet on by the Turks, to the number of fortie thouſand brake into Podolia and the prouinces neere vnto Polonia, and reſting in no place, but burning the countrey before them, ſlew the poore countrey people without mercie, and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, beſides the E ſpoile, carried away with them many thouſands of moſt miſerable captiues: the greateſt part whereof for all that, the Polonians reſcued, with the notable ſlaughter of the enemie, ſurpriſed in their returne. Whereupon ſuch vnkindneſſe riſe betweene the Turkiſh Emperor and Sigiſmund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would haue broken out into open warres, had not the Polonian by his Embaſſadors and the mediation of the Queene of England, wiſely appeaſed the angrie Turke, and ſo againe renewed his league.

The reaſons wherewith the Viſier Baſſa's perſuade Amurath to make war.

Amurath now at peace with the world, from which he by nature abhorred not, and ſitting idle and melancholy at home, was perſuaded by the Baſſa's his Counſellors, to take ſome new war in hand: for that great empires (as they ſaid) could not without the continual vſe of armes long ſtand or continue: as appeared by the Roman ſtate, which ſo long as it was at wars with Carthage, or their great Captaines and Commanders occupied in armes againſt their neighbour Princes, ſtill remained triumphant, and commanded ouer a great part of the world; but giuing it ſelfe to eaſe and pleaſure, and the martial men not after their wonted manner imployed, it in ſhort time by ciuile diſcord fell, and of the miſtreſſe of the world, became it ſelfe a prey euen vnto the baſeſt nations. Which old Cato in his great wiſdom foreſeeing, cried out in the Senat, That the ſouldiers and men of warre were to be kept ſtill buſied in armes far from home, for that in ſo doing, all ſhould go well with the State, and the glorie thereof increaſe. Whereunto the Othoman Emperours, his noble progenitors, hauing reſpect, propounded not peace as the end of their wars (as do other weake Princes hauing their owne forces in diſtruſt) but as inuincible conquerors, ſtill ſowed wars vpon wars, making one victorie the beginning of another: whereby they not only brought that their Empire vnto that greatneſſe it was now of, but by ſuch continual imployment made their ſouldiers more couragious and readie, and alſo kept them from rebellions and tumults; whereunto in time of peace, and liuing at eaſe, theſe martial men are moſt commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing to do that is euill and naught. Euery thing (as they ſaid) was by the ſame meanes to be maintained, whereby it was at the firſt increaſed; and that therefore great Empires, as they were by wars begun and augmented, ſo were they by continual wars alſo to be from time to time eſtabliſhed; whereas otherwiſe the ſouldiers liuing in peace, and forgetting their martial prowesse, would for moſt part grow cowardly, as giuing themſelues ouer to the loue of their owne dwellings, of their wiues, and of their children, and other pleaſures; or els conuerting their ſtudies to merchandiſe, or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vſe of armes, and be thereunto againe hardly drawne: vnto the great weakening of his ſtrength both by ſea and land, and the diminiſhing of the number of his great commanders and expert captaines, not to be had without the continunal vſe of war. With theſe and ſuch like reaſons, the great Baſſa's of the Court perſuaded Amurath, That he muſt of neceſſitie take ſome new expedition in hand, and not to ſuffer his valiant ſouldiers, but now lately returned out of Perſia, to grow lazie or inſolent for lacke of imployment. Which they did not ſo much for the loue of their Prince, or zeale vnto the State, as for their owne particular profit; eſpecially the two old Baſſa's Sinan and Ferat, the enuious competitors the one of the others honour: who although they both, much and almoſt all commanded both in peace and war, yet was their honours greater, and their profit far more, in commanding of the Turkes great armies abroad, than in ſitting in the Diuano at home: vnto which no leſſe honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aſpired, accompanied with the hot deſires of their great and many fauorits both at home and elſewhere. Theſe perſuaſions well pleaſed Amurath; who although he were himſelfe no ſouldier, yet was he deſirons of new conqueſts, and to increaſe his name: accounting it no leſſe honour vnto himſelfe, by his ſeruants at his appointment to performe great things, than it was vnto his Anceſtors to do that they did themſelues in perſon. But in this ſo ſerious a matter, and of ſo great conſequence, Amurath at the firſt could not tell what beſt to reſolue vpon; not for that he was not deſirous of wars, but becauſe as yet he certainely knew not againſt whom he might with greateſt profit and leaſt difficultie and danger conuert his forces: vpon which point his Counſellors agreed not, but for diuers reaſons were of diuers opinions. Which foraſmuch as they containe matters of greateſt importance of all things then in the world done, but eſpecially concerning the profit of the Chriſtian commonweale, I ſhall not thinke it vnworth my labour, to ſet them downe in ſuch order as I finde them credibly reported; hauing moreouer in them many letters and moſt weightie matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as alſo opening the deuices of the Turkiſh Tyrant againſt the Chriſtian Princes; a motiue not onely for them to ioyne in counſell together how to withſtand him, but for the common Chriſtian Commonweales ſake to forget and forgiue all their priuat diſpleaſures, and with their vnited forces and power honorably and couragiouſly to make war vpon him, and ſo at length by the mercie of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall Empire, the greateſt terror of our time.

The cauſes why Amurath would not ſuddenly reſolue vpon war.

Eight ſeuerall opinions of the Viſier Baſſa's, concerning the war to be taken in hand.

The great Baſſa's concerning the intended war were of eight ſundry opinions: whereof the firſt was, That the wars againſt the Perſian ſhould be renewed: the ſecond, for the inuaſion of the King of Morocco and Fes: the third, for war to be taken in hand againſt the king of Spain: the fourth, for the beſieging againe of Malta: the fift was, to ſet vpon the Venetians: the ſixt, for the inuading of ſome part of Italie: the ſeuenth, for the King of Polonia: the eighth and laſt was, for war to be made vpon the Emperour and the Kingdome of Hungary. With all the which aforeſaid Princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turke were then in league, and could not with all or any of them make warre, without the notable breach of his faith and honour: yet was that neuer made queſtion or ſcruple of, but onely, Which might beſt ſtand

A ſtand with the profit of his State for him to ſet vpon: his barbarous law allowing him that libertie, for the more aſſuring of his State, or inlarging of his empire, to breake all faith and promiſe eſpecially with the Chriſtians; not more in any thing to be pittied, than in repoſing any credit or confidence in the faith of ſuch a miſcreant.

The firſt opinion and reaſons of them that would haue the wars renewed in Perſia.

The reaſons the great Baſſaes alleadged for the renuing of the Perſian war, were; For that the Perſian King was of himſelfe like to breake the league ſo lately with him concluded, ſo ſoone as hee ſhould know the Turks entangled in any other war, moued thereunto, as well for the recouerie of his countrey, to his great diſhonour loſt, as alſo in reuenge of ſo many and ſo great iniuries to him of late done by the Turkiſh Emperours. Beſide that, the Chriſtian Princes would perſuade him and pricke him forward thereunto; eſpecially the Spaniard, who for B the neereneſſe of India might without his great charge procure him ſo to do, & alſo conueniently furniſh him with great ordnance and canoniers, which it was wel knowne he of late did. The countries alſo but lately conquered, were not yet (as they ſaid) in quietneſſe or ſafety, and the fortreſſes therein but of late built, together with the garriſons therein, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way, and difficultie of the paſſage, not to be ſtill ſpeedily relieued: inſomuch, that if the Perſians did them no other harme, but onely to forrage and waſt the countrey about them, they ſhould bring the inhabitants into ſuch diſtreſſe, as that thoſe new conquered countries were again by the defendants to be forſaken, or els they muſt themſelues with hunger periſh. True glory (they ſaid) conſiſted not ſo much in conquering, as in the vſe of the conqueſt, and the proſecution of the happie victorie: and that therefore Amurath ſhould C take heed, that hee prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the great Prophet Mahomet againſt him; who hauing by his good fauor and guide obtained mo victories than any of his predeceſſors againſt the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious & deuout prince ſeuerely to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious war Vsbeg Han the Tartar king, as alſo the prince of Geilan offred their ready help: as for the euent of the victorie, now as good as in his hand, he was to iudge by the ſucceſſe of his former wars. Neither that he need to feare the Perſian horſemen, although they vſed Arabian horſes, being by his men many times ſhamefully put to flight: or yet to doubt leſt the Georgians in fauour of the Perſians ſhould take vp armes, for that many of them were already vnder his obeiſance, and ſubiect vnto the Baſſa of Teflis and other his commanders; the reſt were his vaſſals, or els ſuch D as following the fortune of their princes Simon and Alexander, ſought after no greater matter, but contenting themſelues with their owne countrey, although but ſmall, thought themſelues well if they might keepe and defend the ſame, by nature and ſcituation ſo ſtrong, as that there is ſcarce any way vnto it, by reaſon of the high and broken mountaines, the thicke woods, and ſtrait paſſages.

The ſecond opinion, for making of war vpon the king of Fez and Morocco, & the reaſon thereof.

The ſecond opinion which was deliuered, was for the tranſportation of his wars into Affricke againſt the king of Morocco, commonly called the Seriphe: and that for theſe cauſes moſt, It would be a great ſhame and reproch (as they ſaid) vnto the Othoman empire, that it was not yet able to ſubdue theſe Moores and people of Affricke, in number but few: neither was it leſſe ſhame or diſhonor vnto the Othoman Emperors, to haue ſo ſmall a territorie in Affrica, E being the third part of the world, which by reaſon of the neereneſſe vnto Italie, had long time held wars with the Romans. Beſide that, Algiers and Tunes could neuer be ſafely kept by the Turks; neither that the ſubiects and pirats which inhabited thoſe cities would euer be content or at quiet, vntill they had againe got that kingdome into their hands. The promontorie of Aguero, and port of Larace (two ports without the ſtraits) were (as they ſaid) to be taken, as places very commodious for the Turkes friends, ſeeking in thoſe ſeas after bootie; and for the ſecuring of their trade. And although the Seriphe were himſelfe a Mahometan, and held his kingdom as a tributarie vnto the Othoman Empire; yet had he ſecret intelligence with the Spaniard and the Knights of Malta, whereby they not long ſince had vpon the ſudden almoſt ſurpriſed Tripolis, he in the meane time as it were winking thereat. And that although the Spa- F niard poſſeſſed in Affricke, Maraſchebir, Oran, Pegnon, Tanger, Arzilia, Mazaga, Ceute or Septa, places whereby he might helpe and aſſiſt the Moores; yet might his force and attempts by a ſtrong fleete bee eaſily hindered, and Spaine it ſelfe infeſted. Beſide that, the Spaniards had yet in ſuch freſh remembrance the loſſe of Tunes and Guletta (places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Baſſa to his immortall praiſe taken) as that they would not for the Moores ſake eaſily ſeeme to attempt any great thing againſt the victorious Turks. G

The third opinion, concerning the conqueſt of Malta.

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made againſt them of Malta, which was by a ſtrong fleet to be performed: for that the gallies of Malta did daily great hurt, as well vnto the Turks merchants, as vnto ſuch as for deuotion ſake trauelled by ſea vnto Mecha. And that therefore the war was thither to be transferred, not only for religions ſake and to aſſecure the paſſage thither from the incurſions of the Malteſes, but in reuenge of the old and late iniuries by them done; and eſpecially to blot out the infamie and diſgrace which the great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at ſuch time as he had in vaine beſieged that Iſland; & to requite the loſſe by him there ſuſtained. Beſide that, they alſo alleadged the common complaints of the ſubiects; for that there were many which pittiouſly lamented the miſery & calamity, ſome of their friends, ſome their kinsfolke, whome they knew to liue in moſt wofull ſeruitude with thoſe H knights, and whom they moſt earneſtly deſired to haue now ſet at libertie: complaining his ſubiects to haue bin ſo far from ſuffering of any ſuch things from thoſe knights in the time of his anceſtors, as that contrariwiſe they themſelues were by them driuen out of the Iſland of the Rhodes, the ſtrongeſt bulwarke of the Chriſtian common-weale toward the Eaſt. Being moreouer worthy alſo to be chaſtiſed, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moores with all kind of munition, and had themſelues attempted to haue ſurpriſed Modon.

The fourth opinion, for war to be made againſt the K. of Spain, & the reaſons thereof.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, that it were beſt for him to make war vpon the king of Spaine. Theſe men alledged it to be impoſſible for the Turkiſh empire to aſpire vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto al the Turks actions & deuiſes were alwaies as at a certain marke directed) except the Spaniard his great ſtrength and power were I firſt weakened, wherein he ſeemed to ſurpaſſe all other the Chriſtians kings and princes: and that there was no feare leſt he ſhould beſiege Algiers, which he knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the Emperor Charles the fifth. And that although the Spaniards without ceaſing beſought their king for the vndertaking of that expedition, by reaſon of the new loſſes & harms which they daily receiued from the pyrats of Africa; yet would he not hearken vnto their requeſt, for feare of the danger imminent both to himſelfe & his ſubiects from the enemies fleet, which he ſhould in ſo doing draw into the Spaniſh ſeas: neither would the Spaniſh gallies eaſily come into the Turks countries in the Eaſt, for being too farre from their own country, which for the moſt part ſtood in need of their help. And that the king K of Spain was with the multitude of his buſineſſe, or other his vrgent affaires ſtil ſo hindred, as that he could not ſuddenly put in execution what his counſell for the wars ſhould decree. As alſo how much it was to be gathered by that which hapned not long ſince at Preueza and Nauarinum, That the Spaniards ſhunned the Othoman forces: as alſo how warily the king delt in al his affaires, leſt at length againſt his will hee ſhould be enforced to enter into wars with the Turke, was moſt manifeſt; as was to be ſeene when as of late about the end of the Perſian war, he refuſed to giue aid vnto the Perſian king whome he might haue holpen, and was ſo before wont to do. And in caſe that he would ſtand vpon his guard, and by force ſeek to repell force, yet ſhould he ſcarce haue ſo much ſtrength as (beſide thoſe wars which he now maketh in diuers places) to be able to vndertake alſo a new war, and to find ſo many ſoldiers, with ſo much L coine and other things neceſſarie for ſo great a war. It ſtood him in hand (as they ſaid) to defend the Low-countries, and to recouer againe the Prouinces there loſt, which of themſelues wonderful ſtrong, both by reaſon of the ſea & the multitude of the riuers, were alſo with wonderful courage and pertinacy defended by the inhabitants, for their liberty and religions ſake. Whereunto the Engliſh (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many waies giue great help, if they ſhould inuade Portingall, or with their ſhips lie in wait for his Indian fleet, or make incurſions into other his kingdomes, as they did not long ſince at the Groine and Cadez, places moſt fit to trouble Spaine, and to hinder his traffique into the Indies or other places. Beſide that, hee was at that time ſo intangled with his warres in France, as that he could ſcarce finde how to diſpatch himſelfe therof, without the loſſe of his honor & credit. And admit he ſhould make peace with the aforeſaid Princes, in ſuch ſort as that he ſhould not from thenceforth from them receiue any harme; yet were other means to be ſought & taken in hand for his farther diſturbance, as by troubling his rich trade for ſpices & other merchandiſe, wherof he reapeth great profit; as alſo if need were, by driuiug his ſhips out of the Perſian gulfe, by the help of A of thoſe gallies which ſtill lie at rode at Poſſidium, which we now call Suez. And that the fortreſſes and ſtrong holds he there poſſeſſeth, were to be ſet vpon, & if it might be, taken from him, as was once attempted againſt the Portingals at Diu and Ormuz: the like whereof Alphonſus Albuquercius (the king of Portingall his Viceroy in India) attempted, when as with his light horſemen running through that countrie, he thought vpon a ſudden to haue ſpoiled Me-cha, and to haue robbed the Sepulchre of Mahomet (as had hapned vnder the Empire of the Sultans) and as Traian the Emperor had long ſince in like maner attempted to rage and ſpoyle.

Thoſe places which he poſſeſſed in Affricke were (as they ſaid) to be ſet vpon, and the coaſt of Spaine towards the Mediterranean to be infeſted: ſo at length to gratifie the Moores his ſub-iects, who ſtill inſtantly requeſted the ſame, that ſo they might more ſafely traffique and tra-B uel, and that ſo the Moores might at length be deliuered from the imperious command of the Spaniards: of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in his life time well perſuaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiouſly done, for that the Mooriſh nation was now greatly increaſed, and much oppreſſed by the Spaniards; and hauing got great wealth by the trade of Merchandiſe, euen by nature or religion had conceiued a mortall hatred againſt the Spaniards: whereunto might not a little auaile the ports in Affricke, wherinto the Turks fleet might at all times in ſafety retire. And in briefe, that which was of greateſt importance to the better ſucceſſe of this war, the French King and the Queene of England, had of their own accord promiſed the continuation of their wars, and that the French king ſhould inuade Nauarre, and by force of armes recouer the right he pretended vnto that kingdome; C whileſt in the meane time the Queene of England ſhould not onely trouble him in the Weſt Indies, and other places of the Ocean toward the North and Weſt, but might alſo ſtir vp new broiles in the kingdome of Portingall, where moſt part of the people with great impatiencie beare the proud command of the Spaniard: as perſuaded (and that truly) all their proſperitie and quietneſſe to haue bin loſt, together with their laſt king their true and lawfull ſoueraigne.
For he at peace with the kings of France and England, exceedingly therby enriched his ſub-iects by traffique: whereas ſince they fell into the hands of the Spaniard, they dayly complaine of their new loſſes and dangers by reaſon of his perpetual warres. Moreouer, that there was to be found great ſtore of exiled Spaniards diſperſed here and there, which being male-content and wearie of the Spaniſh gouernment, were fled not only out of Portingall, but euen D out of Aragon and other parts of his kingdome: which now liuing in France, England, and Conſtantinople, both ſecretly and openly liberally offered great helps: the like whereof many of the Moores alſo promiſed. All which together ſeemed to promiſe a moſt eaſie expedition and certaine victorie, if any ſhould vpon the ſudden inuade Spaine; for that there was almoſt no vſe of armes, the inhabitants at home ſeldome times exerciſing themſelues therein: neither in places needful hauing any ordinarie garriſons, and but few horſes fit for ſeruice. And that in fine it was to be conſidered, Spaine to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and couragiouſly to mannage armes, for the often choice they make of them, which almoſt moſt daily tranſported into the Indies, Italy, and the Low-countries, wherby the ſtrength of his countrie muſt needs be exceedingly empaired: ſo that if they ſhould be inuaded with E any ſtrong and mighty army, they might ſeeme hardly able to be holpen or defended by their own people, but ſhould need of the aid and help of the other neere prouinces ſubiect vnto this kingdome: which if they ſhould be either letted, or ſtay to come in good time, they ſhould leaue ſo much the more eaſie victorie vnto their enemies.

The ſift opinion for the inuaſion of the Venetians, and the reaſons why.

In the ſift place were they which went about to perſuade Amurath to breake his league with the Venetians; vſing reaſons rather probable than true, although they might ſeeme vnto the Turks leſſe doubtful, for that men eaſily and willingly beleeue ſuch things as they themſelues deſire. Theſe men went about to proue no expedition to be leſſe difficult than this, as iud-ging of things preſent, by the euent of former wars paſſed; wherein the Turks had alwaies taken ſomething from the Venetians: who to redeeme their peace, were diuers waies enforced to ſatisfie the Turks. That the Venetian common-weale was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred war, was manifeſt (they ſaid) in that, that in all actions it had propounded vnto it ſelfe peace, as the end thereof, and after the manner of their anceſtors, neuer entered into wars, but enforced thereunto: and would happily vpon the firſt denouncing of warres, willingly depart with certain places, for feare of greater harme, or to be vtterly ouercome, as it appeared they did in the yeelding vp of Cyprus. The power and force whereof was not ſo great, as that it could alone ſtand againſt the great Sultan: and to confederate it ſelfe with others, would require no ſmall delay, for the great and many difficulties which commonly vſed to ariſe in making of leagues; G not being now ſo conioyned with the Spaniard as in times paſt, of whoſe aid it being of late deſtitute, was conſtrained to make an hard peace with Selymus. And if ſo be the Spaniard would needs ioyne himſelfe vnto the Venetians againſt the Turkes, yet that he could by no means affoord vnto them ſuch aid & ſupplies as were of neceſſity to be required vnto ſo great a war, he himſelfe being in his wars otherwiſe ſo intangled: as for al other confederation they could make without him, to be but weake and to no purpoſe. That which the Pope could do herein, to be but little: for albeit he ſhould according to his duty exhort other Chriſtian Princes to giue aid, & to ſtir them vp vnto this war, yet that beſide ſome little ſupply of mony hardly drawne out of his own coffers and the Eccleſiaſticall reuenues; he could ſcarcely performe H any thing more; or when he had done his vttermoſt deuoire, could but ioyn fiue gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet: which with the gallies of the Duke of Sauoy, of the knights of Malta, and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of ſome twentie gallies, which was but a ſmall matter. Beſides that, the Turks were perſuaded, that betwixt the Venetian State and the other Chriſtian Princes was no ſuch friendſhip and good agreement, as the greatneſſe of the imminent danger of that war, and as the neceſſitie of the cauſe would require: and that hitherto their treaſures had bin ſo exhauſted in paying the debt they were run into in the laſt war, and in building of fortreſſes, that happily they were not now ſo furniſhed with coine, as was requiſit for the defraying of ſo great a war. And vnto this war againſt the Venetians, conſented I almoſt all the Viſier Baſſaes; differing only in this, Where or againſt what place of the Venetian territorie this war were to be firſt begun: ſome naming one place, and ſome another (for diuers reaſons them thereunto leading) which for breuitie we paſſe ouer.

The ſixt opinion, for the attempting of Italie, and the reaſons thereof.

Otherſome of the Baſſaes in the ſixth place, reiecting all the former opinions concerning the war to be taken in hand, would haue had all the forces of the Othoman empire, as well by land as ſea, to haue beene conuerted againſt Italie: for that otherwiſe the Turkes ſhould neuer come vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto as at a marke they had directed all their actions) except they did firſt ſubdue Italie. For that this Countrie, as the centre of the whole world, was wont to giue both counſell and aid vnto the reſt of the limbes, wherby the deuices of others were croſſed: and that the Romanes had at length commanded ouer all the K world, eſpecially for that they held in poſſeſſion this country. Hereat did the Hunnes, the Alani and Gothes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Saraſins, direct all their thoughts and cogitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this: for that Italie was a Queene amongſt other Prouinces, for commodious ſcituation, the wholeſomneſſe of the aire, the plentie of all things neceſſarie for mans life, for great, faire, and moſt rich cities, for the antient glory and maieſtie of the Romane Empire, and many other cauſes alſo. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that Italie was vnder the rule of diuers Princes, vnto whoſe command moſt of their ſubiects vnwillingly obeyed: as alſo for that the inhabitants of that countrie had now for many yeares liued in continuall peace, and were therfore the more effeminat and fearful, L and ſo vnfit for the wars: and that if that expedition were in one or diuers places taken in hand before the corne were full ripe, the Turks in that ſo fruitfull a countrie could neuer want neceſſaries for them to liue vpon; wheras the inhabitants in great number wanting the ſame, and ſhut vp within the wals and fortifications of their cities and ſtrong towns, ſhould be brought into extreame wants: which was the more euidently to be ſeene, for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corne ſufficient in the countrie for ſuch a multitude of people to liue vpon, but were glad to haue it brought vnto them from other places, eſpecially from Peloponeſus, Conſtantinople, and the cities vpon the coaſt of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be conſidered, that moſt part of the Italians liued by no other meanes than by their handie labour, or the trade of merchandiſe; of which meanes if they were depriued, M they ſhould in ſhort time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of ſuch conditions as the victor ſhould propound vnto them, or as tributaries to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Othoman gouernment. Neither that the ſouldiers would vnwillingly be drawne vnto that war, for that they were not to paſſe through barren regions of the enemie, frozen with yce, or deſolat,

A either by rough woods or inacceſſible mountaines ; but were all the way thither to trauell through their owne countrie, and as it were in the ſight of their owne houſes: and if the Turks could oftentimes enter ſo far, when as they had their confines more remote, and their paſſages more difficult, that the ſame might now much more eaſily be effected, when as they had a farre greater opportunitie, and their enemies ſo neere at hand.

The ſeuenth opinion for war to be made againſt the Polonian, and the reaſons thereof.

The ſeuenth opinion was theirs, which thought it beſt to haue the war transferred into Polonia, and from thence into Hungarie and Germanie: for which they alleadged theſe reaſons: Firſt, for that they thought it a diſgrace vnto the maieſtie and reputation of the Othoman Empire, That the king of Polonia had ſometime refuſed to pay his tribute due (for ſo the Turkes account of al ſuch Preſents as are vnto their Sultan vſually ſent by their neighbor princes ; of B courteſie) & that therefore he was by force of armes to be compelled thereunto. Which they thought would the more eaſily be obtained, for that there was much ſecret hatred and heartburning amongſt the Polonian nobilitie. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous war to be taken in hand: foraſmuch as Polonia was confined with Moldauia, the Tartars, and the Sanzacks of Acherman, Bendera, and Voſia: and moreouer, for that the Turks could neuer haue any aſſured or full poſſeſſion of Moldauia or Valachia, except the inſolencie of the Polonians were repreſſed ; the Vayuods of which countries, when they had enriched themſelues with much wealth, vſed ſtill to flie into the kingdome of Polonia. Beſides that, they ſhould thereby reuenge themſelues for the iniuries done them by the Coſſackes, and haue more free and ſafe trafficke into Muſcouie, and bring a terrour vpon the Duke of Muſcouie, by reaſon C of the nighneſſe of the country: which great Duke was an impediment vnto the Othoman Emperour, that he conquered not the whole kingdome of Perſia. And when they had by this means by little and little drawne vnto Germany, happily it might ſo come to paſſe, as that the Chriſtian Emperor ſhould thereby receiue ſome notable loſſe, his empire being ſtil more and more expoſed and enuironed with the Turks forces and garriſons. Polonia they ſaid to be a plaine and open country, neither to haue any ſtrong places for to withſtand them, and the inhabitants to haue ſmall skil in martiall affaires, for that they had now long liued in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of Auſtria, it continued not long: and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muſcouite, vſed for moſt part the Hungarian ſouldiers, and ended thoſe wars rather by beſieging than fighting.

The eighth opinion for war to be made againſt the Emperour, and the reaſons thereof.

D They which in the eight & laſt place deliuered their opinions concerning the intented war, perſuaded to haue it conuerted vpon the Chriſtian Emperor, whom the Turks call the king of Vienna. The cauſes they alleadged for the beginning of this war was, For that the Vſcocchi were grown ſo inſolent as to make good priſe of the Turks both by ſea and land, in ſuch ſort, as that not onely for the harmes which they did, but euen for the maieſtie and honour of the Othoman empire, their inſolencie was not longer to be ſuffered. By whoſe iniuries it was eſpecially brought to paſſe, that the merchants to their great hinderance in priuat, & the Sultans great loſſe in common, hauing left the towne of Narenta or Narona in the Turks dominion, had remoued their mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a town of the Venetians: & that yet for all that was not ſo ſufficiently prouided for the ſecurity of the ſaid merchants, although there E were peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians: for that theſe vnruly men for moſt part liuing vpon the ſpoile, troubled all both by ſea and land with their robberies, driuing away mens cattell, burning the villages, and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. Whereby it was eaſily to be ſeene, what mind they were of: and that it was not to be doubted, but that if occaſion ſhould ſerue for them to ſurpriſe any of the Turks ſtrong holds vpon the frontiers, they would with all their power attempt the ſame: which what a diſhonor and infamie (not to ſpeake of the loſſe) it would be vnto the whole Othoman empire, euery man might eaſily gheſſe. Neither that it was vnknown, how little the Chriſtian Emperor had eſteemed of the Turke, at ſuch time as he was in warre with the Perſian, paying his tribute too late at his pleaſure ; an euident ſigne rather of violating than of eſtabliſhing the league. And that the good ſucceſſe of this warre was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtfull: for that the attempt might be giuen both by Croatia, Hungarie, & Auſtria, countries abounding with all things neceſſarie for the maintenance of a great armie ; as alſo for that they were almoſt to trauell all the way in the Turks owne territorie. Beſide that, the chiefe fortreſſes of Hungarie, namely Belgrade, Buda, and Alba Regalis, with many other ſtrong places, were alreadie holden by the Turks garriſons, whither their armies might in all caſes of extremitie in ſafetie retire, or out of the ſame garriſons repaire their loſſes, if any ſhould be. The Roman Empire (as G they ſaid) was more deſirous of peace than war; and the princes, of nothing more carefull, than how to heape vp and preſerue their treaſures: and the people of Germanie for that of long they had had no wars, to be leſſe fit now to beare armes, and worſe to be commanded by their captaines; alwaies hauing in diſtruſt the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that thoſe nations are not beloued, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at vnity among themſelues, but diuided, eſpecially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to be feared, leſt forraine Princes ſhould giue aid vnto the Emperour in this warre: The Polonian and Tranſyluanian to liue now in peace with the Turke, and therefore would by no meanes turne the heat of this war into their owne boſomes: as alſo for that the Polonians were afraid, leſt in ſo doing, they ſhould be driuen out of their countrie, and enforced to remoue themſelues toward the frozen H ſea: and the Tranſyluanian hauing receiued his ſoueraigntie from the Turke, no leſſe in feare (if he ſhould ſo do) to be of him again ſtript and ſpoiled of the ſame: as for the king of Spaine, although he were of ſuch power, as might affoord vnto the houſe of Auſtria great aid, yet that he was in other places now too much buſied: and that the Biſhop of Rome could not in all places be readie to ſerue his turne: the Princes of Italie would not ſpend their ſubiects and treaſures to pleaſure another man: and that the Venetian State would not raſhly ſtir vp the Turks armes againſt themſelues, but rather at eaſe expect the euent of the war, than to entangle themſelues with other mens dangers. Theſe were the chiefe opinions of the great Baſſaes concerning the war to be taken in hand, not ſo much proceeding from any ripe or ſound aduice (as I commonly they do) but rather from a certaine barbarous inſolencie and contempt of others; wherewith they moued, doe oftentimes vainly perſuade them of the eaſie performance of diuers expeditions: which in proofe they finde to be not onely moſt difficult, but vnto themſelues alſo moſt pernicious.

Amurath reſolueth to make war vpon the Emperor, with the reaſons mouing him thervnto.

In this ſo great diuerſitie of opinions ſtood Amurath, of long in doubt what to reſolue vpon: deſirous he was in all places to ſhew his power, and (if it were poſſible) to exced the glorie of his predeceſſors, as he thought himſelfe to haue alreadie done in Perſia; hauing as he boaſted, by his ſeruants there performed more than they could themſelues in perſon with their mightie armies. Wherfore contenting himſelfe with that he had alreadie done in the Eaſt, he reſolued now to turne his forces againſt the Chriſtian emperor towards the Weſt, & that for K diuers reſpects. Firſt, it grieued him to ſee the honour of the houſe of Auſtria, and that it durſt to make head againſt him: beſides that, to make war vpon a country confining vpon his owne, would be a thing of far leſſe difficultie than was the Perſian war, where his armies were now ſtill to be led through his owne peaceable countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieued with victuals and whatſoeuer elſe they needed. In which opinion he was alſo confirmed by Sinan Baſſa; who hauing in vaine perſuaded him to haue made warre againſt the Venetians, furthered now this war; in hope thereby to recouer his credit and reputation (before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Perſia; as alſo at Conſtantinople by the diſcord betwixt him and Ferat Baſſa, commonly called the Black Serpent) as alſo to encreaſe his wealth and riches: which ſhortly after ſorted to his deſire, being by the great Sultan L Amurath appointed Generall for thoſe wars. But aboue all others, Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna furthered this matter, in hope thereby to haue gained great riches (as the Turkes manner is) together with the greateſt honours of the field, as he was moſt vainly perſuaded by his cold Prophets, to whom he gaue no ſmall credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harmes which the Vſcocchi and other the Archduke his ſeruants & ſubiects did vpon the frontiers of his territories: telling him of their burnings, ſpoilings, and robbings, inciting him to begin his war in Croatia, and ſo to continue the ſame either againſt the Emperour, or the Venetians, or els vpon the ſudden that way to breake into Italie, as had ſometime the like beene done in the time of Mahomet, Baiazet, and Solyman his noble progenitors: whereby to bring a great terror M vpon all the Princes of Italie, and to enrich his ſouldiers with rich ſpoiles. By which his importunitie he (as a moſt mortall enemy not onely vnto the houſe of Auſtria, but vnto all Chriſtendome) got leaue to begin thoſe ſtirs in the frontiers of the Empire, which were firſt fatall vnto himſelfe, and haue euer ſince euen vntill this day notably exerciſed the armes of theſe two laſt Othoman Emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as alſo the Chriſtian Emperour, with others

A others his friends and confederates. Yet vnto this leaue granted vnto the Baſſa, was this condition at the firſt annexed, That he ſhould not ſeeme to do it by the commandement of Amurath, but of himſelfe, vnder colour to reſtraine the Vſcochi; who as well by land as by ſea (as he pretended) ſpoiled both the Chriſtians and Turks, by the great libertie of the Princes of Auſtria, hauing ſmall care to chaſten them.

Now was it no great matter for Haſſan Baſſa to do what Amurath his great Lord and maſter had commanded, for the diſturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Chriſtian Emperor: the Turks leagues with their neighbour Princes being ſeldome ſo religiouſly kept, but that as wel their ſouldiers in garriſon vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by ſea, might to keepe themſelues doing, vpon a militarie inſolencie (as the Turks terme it) now and then at B their pleaſures make incurſions for bootie both by ſea and land: which anſwered with the like from their neighbors ſo moleſted, there neuer wanted new grieuances and iuſt cauſes of complaint, to the ſtirring vp of greater troubles euen amongſt the greateſt Princes. The Venetians thus wronged at ſea, and their merchants robbed, by their Embaſſadors complained at Conſtantinople, of the iniuries done them by the Turkes pyrats, requiring to haue them called home and iuſtice done vpon them. In like manner the Emperor alſo, ſeeing many things both this yeare and the next attempted by Haſſan Baſſa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungarie, contrarie to the league, to the great diſturbance of his ſubiects in both thoſe countries, by his Embaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople complained of theſe outrages, deſiring to know whether they were done by the conſent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to C require that order might be taken for the reſtraining thereof: which was accordingly done, and thoſe incurſions for a while ſtayed, and the former peace continued. Amurath ſtil making ſhew as if he were willing that the league agreed vpon for eight yeares, ſhould not be in any wiſe on his part infringed. At which time the Perſian Kings ſonne (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks Court, where he lay in hoſtage: whoſe dead bodie Amurath cauſed to be honourably ſent home to his father into Perſia, with an apologie in defence of himſelfe, againſt the ſuſpicion conceiued by ſome, That he ſhould haue been the cauſe of the vntimely death of that young Prince; ſtill vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the Prince was like enough to haue beene broken. Whereof Amurath was the more deſirous, for that perſuaded by his Baſſa's (as is aforeſaid) to make wars with the D Emperour (although he notably diſſembled the ſame) he was in hope thereby to adde vnto his Empire the reliques of Hungarie, with ſome good part of the Territorie of the houſe of Auſtria alſo, and ſo to open himſelf a way into the heart of Germanie. For which purpoſes he now cauſed very great preparation to be made, and a ſtrong Armie to be raiſed; and at the ſame time put a great Fleet of Galleys into the Archipelago, for the ſafetie of his Iſlands in that ſea.

The Perſian hoſtage dieth in the Turkes Court.

According to theſe deſignements, the Baſſa of Boſna by the commandment of Amurath, with an armie of fiftie thouſand entred into Croatia, and without reſiſtance burnt and deſtroyed the country before him, ſparing nothing that came in his way. And not ſo contented, laid E ſiege to the citie of Wihitz, being the metropolitical citie of that countrey, ſtrongly ſcituate as it were in an Iſland, compaſſed about with the riuer Vna. Which citie, after he had ſore battered and twice aſſaulted, was by the diſtreſſed defendants (now deſpairing of reliefe, and vnable longer to hold it out) yeelded vnto the Baſſa, vpon compoſition, That the German ſouldiers there in garriſon, might in ſafetie with bag and baggage depart; and that ſuch of the Chriſtian citiſens as would, might there ſtill remaine without hurt from the Turks, either in bodie or goods. Which conditions the Baſſa faithfully performed to the garriſon ſouldiers, whom in number but foure hundred, he ſent with ſafe conuoy into their owne territorie: but afterwards contrarie to his faith and promiſe, exerciſed all manner of Turkiſh tyrannie vpon the poore citiſens. The Emperour troubled with this vnexpected inuaſion of the Turks, ſent the Lord Petzen (whom he had many times employed in embaſſages to the Turke) to pray aid of the German Princes againſt the common Enemie. Who according to the greatneſſe of the danger, in large termes promiſed their helpe. The firſt that made head was Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria the Emperours brother, who with fiue thouſand ſouldiers came from Vienna to Sauaria, commonly called Greis, the Metropolis of Stiria: to whom repaired daliy more ſtrength out of Carinthia.

In

The Christians ouerthrowne.

In the meane time the Turks armie daily increasing in Croatia, inclosed six thousand footmen and fiue hundred horsemen of the Christians; who had taken the mountaines, woods, G and strait passages, and so hardly beset them, that of all that number few escaped with life: amongst whom many valiant souldiers and expert captaines were slaine, namely Iames Prani, George Plesbach, and Iohn Weluerdurff. The Bassa after the barbarous manner of the Turks, to make his victorie seeme more famous, laded six waggons with the heads of the slaine Christians. The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general feare vpon all Hungarie, Bosnia, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Silesia, and the rest of the Prouinces thereabouts. Whereupon the Emperor calling together the States of Silesia and Moldauia, declared vnto them the imminent danger; persuading them to ioine their forces with the rest, for the repulsing of so dangerous an enemie, and so imminent a danger.

After long delay, Ernestus the Archduke the tenth of August came to the Emperor his brother, with the Embassadors of Hungarie; and the seuenth day after were called together the Embassadors of the kingdomes and prouinces of the Empire: where it was throughly debated, how the Turks were to be resisted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence forces, money, and other warrelike prouision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seene, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous: and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg or great Commander of Grecia, with threescore thousand select souldiers both horse and foot, of long time exercised in the Persian war, was ere long expected; who ioyning with the rest of the Turks armie, might do great matters both in Hungary and the places adioyning. For preuenting of which so great and manifest dangers, they sate dayly in counsell in Prague, yea oftentimes euen from morning vntill night: for the Hungarians, and especially the Lord Nadasti a most noble and valiant gentleman amongst them, instantly vrged to haue succours sent into Hungarie; forasmuch as the Turkish Emperour, if he should get into his hands the rest of the townes and castles yet holden by the Christians in Hungarie, it was to be feared lest he should in short time after endanger the whole state of Germanie: the strength whereof the Turke feared not so much, as he did those poore reliques of Hungarie. Others were no lesse careful of the dangers of Croatia and Stiria, as more proper to themselues, the enemy now there raging. In these so great dangers, the Hungarians with the rest of the distressed, cried vpon the Emperour for helpe; and he likewise called vpon the Princes of the Empire. Diuers assemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungarie, Morauia Silesia, and the other prouinces of the Emperors, and Embassadors sent from almost all the German Princes to the Emperour: all was full of consultation, but as for helpe that came in very slowly; yet such as was to be had, was forthwith sent into Croatia, to defend the fortresses there against the further attempts & proceedings of the furious enemie.

Certaine vaine attempts of the Turks.

The eighteenth of September, the Turkes with all warlike prouision vpon the sudden by night assaulted the strong castle of Toccay in the vpper Hungarie, in hope to haue surprised it: but finding it a matter of more difficultie than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the lesser Comara, which standing in a marish ground, was also easily defended. At which time also the Bassa of Buda with his power entred into the frontiers of the Christians, but hauing well viewed the cities, townes, castles, and forts vpon those borders, L and finding nothing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned againe to Buda.

Turopolis spoyled by the Turks

The six and twentieth day of September, Hassan the Bassa of Bosna incamped with his Armie betwixt the riuers of Kulp and Sauus, and in the darkenesse of the night passing ouer part of his armie into Turopolis, with fire and sword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile Island; the lord of Bonny, to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vaine to defend the same.

About the end of this moneth, the Bassa of Ziget, with the Sanzackes of Mohas, Koppan, and Quinque Ecclesiæ, and other Turkes of great name, came with a strong Armie, and encamped betweene Ziget and Rodesto. And shortly after newes was brought to the Emperours Court, that Kanysia a Citie of Stiria (not farre from the riuer Zala) was hardly besieged by the enemie, and that the Turks in comming thither had taken many Christians Captiues, whom they had sent to be sould at Constantinople; and that there was in the Turkes armie about an hundred and sixtie thousand men. But forasmuch as the Christian army daily increased also, and was now growne to the number of threescore thousand, men began to hope well, A well, that the enemies rage would be ſtayed from any further proceeding. About the ſame time, Erneſtus the Archduke appointed Generall of the armie, with the Marquis (ſon to Ferdinand the Archduke) his lieutenant, came both vnto the armie.

In theſe preparations, about the beginning of October heauie newes was brought vnto the Emperors court, how that 7000 men, whom he but a little before had ſent into Croatia vnder the conduct of Thomas Artelius Beane, George Gleichſpacher, and Dionyſius Denke, to hinder the courſe of the Turks proceedings, being incamped betwixt Wihitz and Caroliſtat, and hauing the twelfth of September diſcouered from an high hill certaine companies of the Turkes (which wore indeed of purpoſe come thither to view the armie of the Chriſtians) ſent out fiftie horſemen to diſcouer the Turks armie where it lay, and what it attempted. Who finding no B moe of the Turks than thoſe whome they had before ſeene from the mountaine, returned againe vnto the armie with ſuch ſimple intelligence: whereunto the Chriſtians giuing credit, became ſecure in their tents, as men out of feare of the enemie, and ſo kept but negligent watch. But in this ſo great ſecuritie, the enemie on a ſudden came vpon them, and with an hundred thouſand men brake into their trenches: where the Chriſtian footmen for all that, for the ſpace of foure houres maintained a notable fight, wherein many were on both ſides ſlaine. But the poore Chriſtians being beſet round, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, were ſlaine almoſt all: yet the Captaines ſeeing the danger, by ſpeedie flight ſaued their liues: for which their cowardiſe and careleſſe negligence, they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almoſt all the common ſouldiers were there ſlaine: yea ſuch as fell aliue into C the hand of the enemie, were moſt cruelly cut in pieces. The ſpoile alſo of the tents of the Chriſtians fell vnto the enemie; wherein beſide the aboundance of other things, they found ſixtie thouſand dollars, brought but two dayes before from Lintz for the ſoldiers pay. The Turks after their barbarous manner, in oſtentation of their victorie, laded fourteene waggons with the heads of the ſlain Chriſtians, which they ſent vnto diuers of their places thereabouts. This was indeed a great victorie, but gained by the Turks with much bloud: for the Chriſtians fighting as men deſperate, ſlew of their enemies aboue twelue thouſand, and died themſelues as men rather with number oppreſſed, than with true valour vanquiſhed.

The night following, the Turks vpon the ſudden in the dead time of the night ſurpriſed the caſtle of S. George, and without reſpect of age or ſex, cruelly put to the ſword all them that D were therein, except an hundred and fiftie perſons, whom they carried away captiues; and ſo ſetting the caſtle on fire, departed. At the ſame time diuers companies of the Turkes were ſeene about Siſeg, who led away with them about ſix hundred Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the calamities of this ſo miſerable a waſted countrey, three hundred waggons charged with all manner of prouiſion ſent out of the prouinces there by for the reliefe of the garriſon ſoldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turks, and ſo carried away.

The caſtle of S. George ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The Emperor conſidering theſe proceedings of the Turks, and that their ſtrength daily increaſed, gaue notice by writing, to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what incurſions E the Turks had of late made into Croatia and the frontiers of Hungary, with other places neere vnto them: and that the Beglerbeg of Grecia, with the Baſſa's of Boſna, Buda, and Temeſwar, without regard of the league yet in force, had taken diuers cities, townes, caſtles, and ſtrong places, and ſo extended the bounds of their dominion aboue fortie German miles, hauing ſlain or carried away into captiuity the poore inhabitants of thoſe countries; and now to be grown to that height of pride, that except their farther proceedings were with like forces repreſſed, they would in ſhort time ſet foot into Germany it ſelfe, and poſſeſſing themſelues of Stiria and Carinthia, would from thence daily more and more incroach vpon the Empire: which to hinder, was not in his power only, but required their helpe in general. Wherefore he requeſted them now at length, in ſo publique a danger to open their coffers, and to ſend out their Forces againſt the common enemie. Which requeſt of the Emperor, with the due conſideration of ſo great a danger, moued not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others alſo farther off, to yeeld liberal contribution vnto ſo neceſſarie and general a cauſe.

The Emperour prayeth aid again of the German Princes.

The Turks now hearing of the great preparation of the Chriſtian Princes, beſide the armie which was alreadie in the field, and that they had made a ſtrong bridge ouer the riuer of Dratus, which they had alſo fortified; thereby in ſafetie at their pleaſure to tranſport their army:

without further delay furniſhed ſuch places as they had gotten, with ſtrong garriſons, and ſo G withdrew themſelues into their owne territory: which they did the rather, for that the plague then raged ſore in Conſtantinople, inſomuch that there died a thouſand a day. Which contagion had alſo taken hold of the Turkiſh armie; ſo that the Chriſtians for feare of infection, forthwith ſlew what Turke ſoeuer fell into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this yeare, being as it were an introduction for greater to enſue the yeare following.

Diuers incurſions of the Turks into the frontiers of the Chriſtians in Croatia and Hungarie.

The Turks together with the beginning of the new yeare began alſo their wonted incurſions into the frontiers of the Chriſtians. They of the garriſon of Petrinia (a ſtrong fort but lately and contrarie to the league built by the Turks vpon the Riuer of Colapis or Kulp, for the further inuaſion of Croatia) made dayly incurſions out of that new fort, and entring into the Iſland Turopolis, ſpoiled and burnt the Towne and Caſtle of Beck-Vochobinam, and ha- H uing made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them 400 priſoners. And in Hungarie the Turkiſh garriſons to ſupplie their wants made diuers inrodes vpon the Chiſtians, and did exceeding much harme: of which aduenturers ſix hundred in paſſing ouer the frozen lake, were all drowned in the middeſt thereof. In another place three thouſand of them neere vnto Nuhuſe diuided themſelues into two companies, whereof the one ſhewed it ſelfe in the ſight of the Towneſmen, the other ſtill lying cloſe in ambuſh. They of the towne vpon the ſight of theſe Turks, ſallied out, and cauſing them to retire, followed them ſo farre, that they were paſt the place where the reſt of the Turks lay: who preſently ſtarting vp, ran with all ſpeed toward the towne, in hope to haue ſurpriſed it: and wanted not much of that they deſired; for there was ſcarce an hundred of the Germans there in garriſon left in the towne, who had ſcarce ſo I much time as to draw vp the bridges: which done, they with the great ordnance from the wals enforced the Turks to retyre and forſake the towne. About the ſame time alſo the Turks in garriſon at Petrinia ſallying out vpon the ſudden, tooke the towne of Martenize, which they ſpoiled, and hauing ſlaine and taken about ſeuen hundred perſons, ſet fire on the towne, and ſo returned, hauing loſt in this exploit not paſt an hundred and fiftie of their owne men. Not long after, the ſame garriſon ſoldiers of Petrinia tooke another caſtle three miles diſtant from the riuer of Kulp, whereinto the Chriſtians dwelling round about had for feare of the enemy conueyed all their wealth, with great ſtore of victuals: all which the Turks tooke, and hauing ſlaine ſix hundred men in the caſtle, returned with an exceeding rich bootie to Petrinia: which they bought with the liues of fine hundred of their fellowes, ſlaine in taking of the Caſtle. K With like inſolencie did alſo the other Garriſons of the Turkes rage in all the other parts of Hungarie. About Saſſouia in the vpper Hungarie they carried away about three hundred Chriſtian captiues. And in the nether part of Hungarie they tooke the ſtrong caſtle of S. Hedwig vpon the lake of Balaton, which they ſpoiled and burnt; and ſo likewiſe the caſtle of Iſna: but attempting the leſſer Comara, they were by the garriſon ſouldiers valiantly repulſed. They alſo fortified the caſtle of Stocke, which they had but a little before taken, that ſo it might ſerue for a ſafe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages, contrarie to the league, euidently declared the deſire they had to begin that bloudie war which preſently after enſued: and was indeed the more ſuſpected, for that at the ſame time the Emperours Embaſſador Fredericke Corcowitts was by the commandement of Amurath ſhut vp cloſe L in his houſe at Conſtantinople, and not ſuffered to ſpeake with any man, neither to write or to ſend any meſſenger to the Emperor: which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect ſome great matter to be by the Turke intended, and therefore began to raiſe new forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians alſo ſeeing their Townes and Caſtles thus taken, their Prouinces ſpoiled, infinite number of people led away into captiuitie, and the enemie dayly encreaſing in ſtrength, at length agreed vpon their owne charges to maintaine a certaine number both of horſe and foot for the repreſſing of theſe the Turkiſh incurſions.

Now although the Emperor knew right well, all theſe outrages of the Turks, contrary vnto the league, could not be done without the knowledge and good liking alſo of Amurath (as before enformed thereof by his Embaſſador from Conſtantinople) yet to ſhew himſelfe wil- M ling to haue the league on his behalfe kept, as alſo to make a further proofe of Amurath his reſolution for peace or war, he wrot vnto him as followeth:

Rodolph

Rodolph the ſecond, Emperour of the Romans, vnto Amurath the third, King of the Turkes.

The Emperors Letters vnto Amurath.

Whereas nothing is hitherto on our behalfe omitted for the preſeruation and continuance of the league and amitie betwixt your moſt excellent Maieſtie and vs, by the renewed capitulations of peace; and that we haue with all ſinceritie and loue performed, and are hereafter readie to performe whatſoeuer is on our part to be performed and done; and as we haue hitherto, ſo for euer hereafter alſo make offer of the ſame: we moſt aſſuredly promiſe vnto our ſelues on your Maieſties behalfe, that you in like manner will not ſuffer any thing on your part to be wanting; but gladly and willingly to do all things which ſhall be meete and needfull for the preſeruation and keeping of this our mutual loue and friendſhip. Vpon which good hope grounding our ſelues, to declare our plaine meaning and ſinceritie indeed, we will cauſe our honorable Preſent (which is now readie) to be brought vnto your moſt royall Maieſtie, at ſuch time as ſhall be agreed vpon betwixt our Embaſſador and you: vnto whom in all ſuch matters as he by our commandement ſhall haue to deale with your moſt excellent Maieſtie, your Viſiers, or ſeruants, we requeſt you to giue full credence. In the meane time your Excellencie ſhall doe well to prouide, that as we haue now ſeuerely commanded our ſubiects to keepe the peace vpon our frontiers, ſo that your ſouldiers alſo make no incurſions as enemies into our territories, nor do in them any harme, but to endeauour themſelues alſo to peace and quietnes: and eſpecially that all ſuch things as contrarie to the capitulations of the league haue been there of late taken from our people, or otherwiſe vniuſtly poſſeſſed, may be againe reſtored, the loſſes recompenced, the new fort of Petrinia demoliſhed, and the Baſſa of Boſna and others the authours of breaking of the league, puniſhed and diſplaced: whereby we ſhall gather your royal Maieſties moſt noble and kinde affection towards vs and our State; which as it ſhall be a thing moſt iuſt, ſo ſhall it be a ſingular confirmation of our league. But concerning theſe matters, and others to the ſame belonging, our Embaſſador is to declare our minde more at large, that ſo our preſt deſire for the continuance of our league and friendſhip with your Maieſtie, may more plainely be knowne. So wiſh we all health and proſperitie vnto your moſt royal Maieſtie. From Prague the eighth of March 1593.

The Emperor alſo at the ſame time and to the ſame purpoſe writ to Sinan Baſſa in this ſort; Rodolph the ſecond, Emperour of the Romans, to Sinan Baſſa the chiefe Viſier, greeting.

The Emperors Letters vnto Sinan Baſſa.

We write at this preſent vnto your moſt Excellent Emperor our moſt honored friend and neighbour, concerning ſuch matters as we thought fit for the preſeruation of the peace and league betwixt vs, leſt haply otherwiſe we might ſeeme to haue forgotten our dutie. Now it ſhall well beſeeme your vprightnes and good will, which we haue at other times proued, for the high place and authoritie which you hold (and which we reioice to be againe reſtored vnto you) to giue vnto theſe things ſuch eaſie paſſage before his Maieſtie, as that we may acknowledge your kindeneſſe and fauor, and haue occaſion therefore to ſhew our ſelues vnto you thankefull. Firſt, we offer our ſelues moſt readie to continue the peace, and to performe whatſoeuer is according to the conuentions of the renued peace on our part to be performed: as alſo to ſend the honorable Preſent (which is not as yet by vs ſent) when as our Embaſſador ſhall haue with you appointed any certaine time wherein it may be ſent. And we alſo aſſuredly hope ſo to preuaile with your Emperor, that on your part the places within our territories, by your people forcibly poſſeſſed, together with all ſuch things as haue been wrongfully taken away, may be againe reſtored, and the fort of Petrinia raſed. The Baſſa of Boſna alſo (who we thinke would haue been kept within the compaſſe of dutie, if you had at that time held the place of the chiefe Viſier) and whoſoeuer els, guilty of the wicked breach of the league, to be worthily according to their deſerts puniſhed and diſplaced, and your ſouldiers ſeuerely charged not to make any further incurſions, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breach of the league: as we likewiſe ſhall with new and ſtrait commands moſt carefully reſtraine our garriſon ſouldiers vpon our frontiers, from all ſuch incurſions and enemies actions. But of theſe things our Embaſſador is more fully and at large to entreat with you: vnto whoſe ſpeech we deſire ſuch credence to be giuen as vnto our owne; and we will ſo prouide, that you ſhall haue good proofe of our great good will towards you. From Prague the eighth of March 1593.

Vnto which the Emperors letters, Sinan returned anſwer as followeth; Sinan Baſſa chiefe Viſier to Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks; vnto Rodolph the ſecond, Emperour of the Romans, greeting.

Sinan Baſſa his Letters to the Emperour.

By theſe we giue your Maieſtie to vnderſtand, That two of your Maieſties Letters were brought hither before we were choſen and confirmed chiefe Viſier in this moſt royal Court; wherein your Maieſtie excuſe your ſelfe, and ſhew the cauſes why the ſending of the wonted Preſents hath been ſo long deferred, by laying the fault vpon the inſolencie of our garriſon ſouldiers in Boſna, and the breach of the publique peace. Which your Letters being by vs read before our moſt mightie Emperour, his Highneſſe in great choler burſt out into theſe words, And thy ſonne the Beglerbeg of Buda hath ſtil hitherto writ and giuen vs to vnderſtand, that the vſual preſents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any caſe conſent vnto the breach of the league, or of the amitie betwixt vs and him: and yet for all that, the Preſents are not hitherto come; wherefore thy ſonnes writings and relations are not true. *But now the Baſſa of Boſna hath ſent word vnto the Court, That your Maieſtie will not ſend them, and all your doings to be but meere deceit and fraud. For which cauſe our moſt mightie Emperour hath remoued my ſonne from his place in Buda, and rewarded the Baſſa of Boſna with honorable garments, whereas my ſonne is for your Maieſties ſake diſplaced. Now on our behalfe nothing is done againſt the peace, but our ſouldiers as with a bridle kept in: whereas on your Maieſties part excurſions and harmes into the territories of our Emperour neuer ceaſe, eſpecially into Boſna, whereinto your ſouldiers haue of late in warlike manner broken, although they were by our gariſons ouercome, their great ordnance taken, and brought hither vnto the Court. Wherefore ſeeing the caſe ſo ſtandeth, your Maieſtie is to reſolue vs vpon two points; whereof the firſt is, Whether you be minded to keepe friendſhip with vs as beſeemeth, and to ſend hither the two laſt yeares Preſents or not? And the ſecond, Whether you will ſet at libertie our captiue Sanzackes, or no? Now if your Maieſtie ſhall be content to keepe the league, and within theſe two moneths next, to ſend the two yeares preſents, as alſo to diſmiſſe our Sanzackes; the league ſhall on our part be likewiſe vndoubtedly kept, your Territories ſhall be in no caſe moleſted, ſuch Chriſtian captiues as your Maieſtie ſhall require, be enlarged, and a moſt firme and ſure friendſhip by vs continued. Whereas if you ſhall vpon any cauſe or excuſe longer delay the ſending of thoſe honorable Preſents, and vnto theſe our demands ſend vs nothing but certaine vaine and windie anſwers; let God on high be therefore for euer praiſed; for now our moſt mightie and victorious Emperour, who wanteth neither abilitie nor power, hath commanded, That we our ſelfe ſhould in perſon go in this war; and putting our confidence in the Higheſt, with the Armie of the right beleeuing Turkes to come into thoſe parts. And therefore aſſure your Maieſtie, that we will not faile there to encounter you: at which time ſhall appeare vnto the world, what is by God our Creator (whoſe holy name be for euer bleſſed) in his deepe wiſedome preordained and ſet downe for vs. Wherefore ſeeing that all which concerneth the league, together with the ſafetie and quiet of our people on both ſides, is vnto your Maieſtie thus declared; you are to conſider the end, and to follow our good aduice: whereas if otherwiſe you ſhall be the cauſe of the breach of this ſo wholeſome a peace and vnitie (which we hitherto haue ſo ſincerely and firmly kept) the excuſe thereof both in this world and in the world to come, ſhall lie vpon your ſelfe. Now we requeſt of you no more, but forthwith to ſend vs anſwer of theſe our letters. As for the reſt, well may he ſpeed that taketh the right way. From Conſtantinople the laſt of the moneth * Giuma Zuleuel, in the yeare of our holy Prophet* Mahomet 10001.

Yet for all theſe faire offers of peace thus made by Sinan Baſſa in his letters, was his purpoſe nothing leſſe than to haue performed the ſame; ſeeking onely to haue drawne the two yeares preſents from the Emperour, amounting to a great ſumme of money, and ſo neuertheleſſe to haue proſecuted the intended war; the Emperour being the onely man of whom Amurath his great Maſter had amongſt all the Chriſtian Princes made choice of to exerciſe his force vpon. Of all which things the Emperour was not ignorant, being thereof (as we ſaid) fully before by his Embaſſador aduertiſed from Conſtantinople.

Theſe troubles of the Spring thus paſt, enſued the Sommer much more troubleſome, for Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, chiefe author and deuiſer of theſe broiles, ceaſed not for the increaſe of his credit, to worke what miſchiefe he could againſt the Chriſtians that bordered vpon him.

This great Baſſa mortally hated the Gouernour, or as ſome call him the Abbot of Siſeg, a ſtrong caſtle ſcituate vpon the borders of that part of Croatia, yet holden by the Chriſtians, where the riuer Kulp falleth into the famous riuer of Sauus or Saw (and was indeed the verie bulwarke of that countrey) the cauſe of which his hatred is reported to haue been this. The yeare before, the Baſſa had ſent a meſſenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliuer the caſtle or monaſterie vnto him: which meſſenger for certaine daies the Abbot entertained with many honourable ſpeeches, learning in the mean time of him ſo much as he poſſibly could of the Baſſaes intention, with what power, in what place, and with what engines he had determined to beſiege the caſtle. In the meane time it was diſcouered, that his Steward had long before plotted with the Turke to haue betraied the caſtle, and had for certaine yeres paſt receiued of him a yerely penſion. Vpon which occaſion, the Abbot cauſed both the meſſenger & his own ſteward to be apprehended, and ſo faſt bound hand and foot, to be caſt out at a window of the caſtle into the riuer of Saw. The Baſſa ſeeing his meſſenger not to returne, ſent another to the Abbot, grieuouſly threatning him, if he did not ſend him back again his meſſenger: wherunto the Abbot anſwered, That he had diſmiſſed him certaine daies before, and therfore maruelled if he were not as yet returned: neuertheleſſe concerning his demand, that he was reſolued to yeeld the monaſterie vnto the Baſſa, againſt whoſe forces he ſaw himſelfe vnable to hold it: requeſting only, that it would pleaſe him to ſend ſome men of account to receiue it at his hand for that it would be no ſmall diſhonot vnto him to deliuer it vp vnto common ſouldiers. The Baſſa glad of this meſſage, ſent forthwith certaine principall men of great account, hoping now without any loſſe to haue that ſtrong place yeelded vnto him, which had ſo long time ſtood in his way. Three daies after, certaine troups of horſemen ſent from the Baſſa, came to the monaſterie as was appointed, and finding the gates open, entred, firſt the noblemen, and after them fiue hundred others or thereabouts: who were no ſooner within the gates, but that the portculleis was let fall, and certain murthering pieces (ſecretly placed in the court for that purpoſe) diſcharged; with the violence whereof, the Turks that were alreadie entred, were moſt miſerably rent in pieces, their heads, arms, and legs, flying in the aire; when preſently the garriſon ſouldiers ſtarting out of their lurking places, made a quick diſpatch of all them that had eſcaped the fury of the great artillerie. The reſt of the Turks ſhut out, hearing the noiſe and crie of them within, turning their horſes, betooke themſelues to ſpeedie flight. The great Baſſa hearing of this ſlaughter of his men, and how he had beene deceiued, ſwore in great rage by his Mahomet, to raſe this monaſterie downe to the ground, and to pluck the Abbots skin ouer his eares: and ſo by threatning letters gaue him to vnderſtand, as followeth.

Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

The threatning letter of Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

It is not to thee vnknowne, how often wee haue ſent vnto thee our meſſengers with letters, declaring vnto thee our loue and good will; requeſting thee in friendly ſort, and without further reſiſtance to yeeld vp vnto vs thy fortreſſe of Siſeg, not longer to be by thee holden. Vnto which our requeſt thou haſt hitherto moſt wilfully at thy pleaſure oppoſed thy ſelfe, not without the ſlaughter of our men; and in ſo doing, haſt giuen cauſe vnto the great Sultan to ouerthrow and raſe that thy fortreſſe, whereof thou for the Emperour wilt needs be the chiefe. Thinkeſt thou it will be for thy good, or yet well taken, that thou haſt ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly circumuented and ſlaine our Embaſſadors and ſeruants ſent vnto thee? Nay aſſure thy ſelfe, that if Mahomet grant vs life, we will neuer giue ouer the ſiege of that thy fort wherein thou ſo much truſteſt, vntill I haue before thy face ouerthrowne it, and (if thy God ſhall giue thee aliue into my hands) haue pluckt thy skin ouer thine eares, to the great reproch and ſhame of the Chriſtians: for I am fully reſolued, not to depart from this place, but to continue the ſiege thereof vntill I haue it. Let a little time yet paſſe, and thou ſhalt ſee thy ſelfe on euery ſide beſieged, thy fort with moe and greater pieces of artillerie than euer, battered, and our power ſtrong enough to conſtraine thee. Thou haſt hitherto put thy greateſt hope and comfort in the Banne* Erodius, for whom by the help of Mahomet we are too much ſtrong. In briefe, we are of nothing more carefull than how to get thee into our power: which if we do looke not for any mercie at our hands.

 The Hungarian Bannes are noblemen, in power much like vnto the Turks Baſſaes.*

Neither was the Baſſa vnmindfull of his promiſe, or of the loſſe he had receiued, but now in the beginning of Iune with an army of thirtie thouſand horſe and foot, came and beſieged the Haſſan Baſſa inuadeth Croatia.

Siſeg beſieged by Haſſan Baſſa fortreſſe of Trenſchijn, which with continuall batterie and often aſſaults hee at length tooke, ſacked the towne, ſlew moſt part of the inhabitants, except 800 or thereabouts of the yonger ſort, which he carried away with him into captiuitie. And being proud of this victorie, remoued thence by a bridge which he had made, paſſed ouer the riuer, and ſo the twelfth of Iune came and incamped before the monaſterie of Siſeg: and after vain ſummons giuen to the ſame, the next day cauſed his great ordnance to be planted, and with great fury thundering againſt the wals, in ſhort time ouerthrew the new tower, in the fall whereof two of the Chriſtian canoniers periſhed. This furious batterie he maintained by the ſpace of ten daies without intermiſſion, giuing no time of reſt vnto the beſieged, ſo that it ſeemed not poſſible for the monaſterie to be any long time defended, if it were not with ſpeed relieued. The Biſhop of Zagrabia, and Rupertus Eggenberg Generall of the Emperours forces that then were at Zagrabia, gaue knowledge thereof to Andrew lord Auersberg Gouernor of Carolſtat, crauing his aid & counſell: who calling together his owne forces, raiſed a good number of good horſe and foot, and called alſo vnto him the bordering horſemen of Karnia and Carainia; who the ſeuenteenth day of Iune met altogether not far from Inſtawitz, and there tarried that night. The next day paſſing ouer the riuer Sauus neere vnto Zagrabia, they ioyned themſelues with the Emperors forces, and marched the nineteenth day in good order to Sceline, where they expected the comming of Countie Serinus. Thr twentieth day Peter Herdelius with his Huſſars, and the lord Stephen Graſwein came into the campe, with many of thoſe light horſemen whome the Hungarians called Vſcocchi. The one and twentieth day they lodged at Gradium, ſtill expecting the comming of the countie Serinus, who otherwiſe buſied, could not come. The next day after, a ſouldier ſent out from the beſieged, came into the camp, who gaue the captains to vnderſtand, that except they made haſte that day to relieue the diſtreſſed monaſterie, it would vndoubtedly be loſt, for that the enemie had made it ſaultable, and would that night giue the aſſault, and the defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to maintaine the place, began before his departure thence to think of compoſition with the enemie. Vpon which news the captains forthwith began to conſult among themſelues, what courſe to take in ſo doubtful & dangerous a caſe: where Auersberg was of opinion, that it were beſt to march on, and to giue the enemie battel; with whom alſo agreed the lord Rederen: the reſt of the captains being of a contrary mind, for that the ſtrength of the Chriſtians compared to the Turks, was too weak; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whiles they yet might, than to hazard vnto moſt manifeſt perill the liues of ſo many valiant men, at ſo great ods. At which counſell Auerſberg was at the firſt much moued, but afterwards (as he was a man of great eloquence) plainely ſet before them the neceſſity of the cauſe, & with liuely reaſons cheered vp the fearful Croatians; notably perſuading them all in generall, to put their whole truſt & confidence in God, to whom it was as eaſie to giue victory by few, as by many: and to fight like valiant men, for their religion, their country, their liues, their wiues, their children and friends, and whatſoeuer elſe they held deare; againſt that cowardly enemy, whoſe valor neuer brought him into the field, but onely the vaine truſt he had in his multitude; & would therfore no doubt eaſily be put to flight, if he ſhould contrary to his expectation find himſelfe but a little hardly laid vnto. With theſe and other like reaſons he preuailed ſo much, that they all yeelded to his opinion, & with one conſent reſolued to go againſt the enemie, and to do what they might to relieue their beſieged friends. So vpon a ſigne giuen, the whole army (in number not aboue 4000) forthwith remooued, and with great ſpeed haſted towards the enemie, and being come within a mile of the camp, put themſelues in order of battell. The Turks by their eſpials vnderſtanding of the approch of the Chriſtians, brought all their horſemen ouer the riuer of Kulp, by a bridge which they had made, and hauing put themſelues in order, came on to ioyne battell with the Chriſtians: who had in their vauntgard placed the Croatians & Huſſars; in the left wing them of Carolſtat, and the hasquebuſiers of Karnia; in the right wing the borderers of Carainia, all horſemen; in the maine battell the reſt of the ſoldiers, with the horſemen of Sileſia, vnder the conduct of Sigiſmund Paradiſe; the rereward was encloſed with three companies of the Emperors ſouldiers. The Croatians and Huſſars in the vantgard gaue the firſt charge vpon the enemie: but hauing for a good ſpace made a great fight, they were about to haue retired, and diſcouraged with the multitude of the enemies, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when Auersberg (Generall of the Chriſtian armie) came on with his ſquadron, and not onely reſtored

the

A great battell betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians.

A the battel, but ſo reſolutely charged the maine battell of the Turks, that the Baſſa was conſtrained at the firſt to retire, and afterwards to flie, after whom all the reſt of the armie followed. The Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, purſued them with great ſpeed, and comming to the new made bridge before them, tooke from them that paſſage, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turkes; who ſeeing the miſerable ſlaughter of themſelues, and no way to eſcape, ran headlong ſome into the riuer Odera, ſome into Kulp, and were there for moſt part drowned; the reſt were all ſlaine by the Chriſtians, before determined not to take any priſoners. In the meane time, the Turks that remained at the ſiege, vnderſtanding of the ouerthrow of their fellows, ſet fire on their pouder and other prouiſion, and ſo in great feare betooke themſelues to flight. Whoſe tents the Chriſtians immediatly after tooke, and in them nine great pieces of artille-B rie, and good ſtore of great ſhot of 44 and 45 pound weight a piece, with the ſumptuous pauillion of the Baſſa, and much other rich ſpoile, which was all carried into the monaſterie of Siſeg. The number of the Turkes ſlaine in this battell, and drowned in the riuers, is of diuers diuerſly reported, but moſt agree vpon eighteene thouſand. And amongſt them was Haſſan Baſſa himſelfe, found in the riuer neere vnto the bridge, known by his moſt rich and ſumptuous apparell; and neere vnto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmet-Beg. In other places were alſo found the dead bodies of Saffer-Beg, the Baſſaes brother, of Meuibeg, Haramatan-Beg, Curti-Beg, Operd Beg, and Goſchu, the Baſſaes chiefe counſellor, and maſter of his houſhold. But of all others, the vntimely death of Sinan-Beg Amurath his nephew, his ſiſters onely ſonne, ſent thither to haue learned the feats of armes vnder Haſſan the great Baſſa, was of the Turks moſt lamented. Of C twenty thouſand Turkes that came ouer the riuer Kulp, ſcarcely two thouſand eſcaped. This ſo great a victorie obtained, all the armie of the Chriſtians went thrice about the monaſterie, and euery time falling all downe vpon their knees, gaue vnto God moſt heartie thanks for the ſame, as by him miraculouſly giuen, and not by themſelues woon; and afterwards made all the ſhew of ioy and gladneſſe they could poſſibly deuiſe.

Siſeg relieued.

Eighteen thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

Siſeg thus deliuered, and the Turks army ouerthrown, the Chriſtians with all ſpeed laied ſiege to Petrinia the ſtrong new fort of the Turks, which they for the ſpace of fiue daies moſt furiouſly battered: but hearing that the great Gouernor of Græcia (whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of Romania) was with a great power comming to the reliefe of the fort, they raiſed their ſiege, brake vp their armie, and returned euery man to his woonted charge.

D Whileſt theſe things were in doing at Petrinia, a Poſt came from Conſtantinople to Buda, who brought thither the firſt newes of the ouerthrow of Siſeg; for the report thereof was not as yet come to Buda; wherfore the Baſſa called vnto him the meſſenger, author of ſo bad news, and diligently examined him of the truth thereof: who told him, That at his departure from Conſtantinople, nothing was there knowne of that loſſe, but that vpon the way as he came, he met with diuers horſmen but lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter, who told him of a certainty, that the Baſſa was ſlain, and his army deſtroied. Wherunto the Baſſa of Buda replied, That he was happy in his death, for that if he had by chance eſcaped, he ſhould for his indiſcretion vndoubtedly haue ſuffered ſome other more ſhamefull death at the court.

Newes of the ouerthrow of the Turks at Siſeg, brought to Buda.

When newes of the aforeſaid victorie was brought to the Emperor at Prage, he comman-E ded publicke prayers, with thankſgiuing to almighty God to be made in all churches: and ſent a meſſenger with letters to Amurath, to know of him how he vnderſtood theſe inſolent proceedings of his ſouldiers, & eſpecially this late expedition of the Baſſa of Boſna and his complices, contrary to the league yet in force betwixt them. After which meſſenger he ſent alſo the lord Popelius, with the yerely Preſent (or rather tribute) he vſed to ſend vnto the Turkiſh Emperor at Conſtantinople; yet with this charge, that when he was come as far as Comara in the borders of Hungarie, he ſhould there ſtay vntill the returne of the aforeſaid meſſenger: who if he brought tidings of peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his iourney to the Turkes Court; otherwiſe, to returne againe with his Preſent: as he afterwards did. For Amurath enraged with the notable loſſe receiued at Siſeg, and prickt forward with the teares and F praiers of his ſiſter (deſirous of nothing more than to be reuenged for the death of her ſonne) the ſeuenth of Auguſt cauſed open war to be proclaimed againſt the Chriſtian Emperor, both at Conſtantinople and Buda. The mannaging whereof he committed to Sinan Baſſa the old enemie of the Chriſtians, his Lieutenant Generall, and perſuader of this war: who departing from Conſtantinople with an armie of fortie thouſand, wherein were 5600 Ianizaries, was by

Amurath himſelfe and the great men of the court brought a mile on his way: hauing in charge from the great Sultan, by the aſſiſtance of the Beglerbeg of Græce, the Baſſaes of Buda and G Temeſware, and other his Sanzacks and commanders in that part of his empire, to reuenge the death of his nephew, and the diſhonor receiued at Siſeg.

This war Amurath with great pride denounced vnto the Chriſtian Emperour and the reſt of the Princes his confederats in this ſort.

Amurath the third, by the grace of the great God in Heauen, the onely Monarch of the World, a great and mightie God on earth, an inuincible Cæſar, King of all Kings, from the Eaſt vnto the Weſt, Sultan of Babylon, Soueraigne of the moſt noble Families of Perſia and Armenia, triumphant Victor of Hieruſalem, Lord poſſeſ- H ſor of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, ſubuerter and ſworne enemie of the Chriſtians, and of all them that call vpon the name of Chriſt.

The proud and blaſphemous denuntiation of war giuen out by Amurath againſt Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour

Wee denounce vnto thee Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the Germane Nation taking part with thee, vnto the great Biſhop alſo, all the Cardinals and Biſhops, to all your ſonnes and ſubiects: wee earneſtly (I ſay) by our crowne and Empire denounce vnto you open warre. And giue you to vnderſtand, that our purpoſe is, with the power of thirteene Kingdomes, and certaine hundred thouſands of men, horſe and foot, with our Turkes and Turkiſh armes, yea with all our ſtrength and power (ſuch as neither thou nor any of thine hath euer yet ſeene or heard of, much leſſe had any proofe of) to beſiege you in your chiefe and metropoliticall cities, and with fire and ſword to perſecute you and all yours, and whoſoeuer ſhall giue you helpe, to burne, deſtroy, and kill, and with moſt exquiſite torments we can deuiſe, to torture vnto death and ſlay ſuch Chriſtian captiues as ſhall fall into our hands, or elſe to keepe them as dogs, captiues in perpetuall miſerie; to empaile vpon ſtakes your faireſt ſonnes and daughters: and to the farther ſhame and reproch of you and yours, to kill like dogs your women great with childe, and the children in their bellies: for now wee are fully reſolued to bring into our ſubiection, you which rule but in a ſmall countrie, and by ſtrong hand and force af armes to keepe from you your Kingdome, as alſo to oppreſſe, root vp, and deſtroy, the keyes and See of Rome, together with the golden ſcepter thereof: and we will proue whither your crucified Ieſus will helpe you and do for you as yours perſuade you. Beleeue him ſtill and truſt in him, and ſee how he hath holpen his meſſengers which haue put their confidence in him: for we neither beleeue, neither can we endure to heare ſuch incomprehenſible things, that hee can helpe, which is dead ſo many worlds of yeares agoe, which could not helpe himſelfe, nor deliuer his owne countrie and inheritance from our power, ouer which we haue ſo long time raigned. Theſe things O yee poore and miſerable of the world, wee thought good to ſignifie vnto you, that you with your princes and confederats may know what you haue to doe and to looke for. Giuen in our moſt mightie and Imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, which our anceſtors by force of armes tooke from yours, end hauing ſlaine or taken priſoners all their citiſens, reſerued ſuch of their wiues and children as they pleaſed, vnto their luſt, to your perpetuall infamie and ſhame. I K

Siſeg taken by the Turkes, Sinan with his armie thus ſetting forward, kept ſtill on his way towards Buda; but the Beglerbeg of Græcia with a farre greater power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieue the L forts diſtreſſed by the Chriſtians, as againe to beſiege the ſtrong caſtle or monaſterie of Siſeg: which he with his huge armie at his firſt arriuall compaſſed about without reſiſtance, & with continuall batterie ouerthrew the walls thereof, giuing no time of reſt vnto the defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, & with reſtleſſe labour notably repaired the very fearful women bringing tables, ſtooles, and whatſoeuer els came to hand, that might any wiſe help to keep the enemie out, of whom a great number was in the breaches ſlain: but what was that handfull againſt ſuch a multitude? At length the 3 day of September the Turks by maine force entered the Monaſterie, & put to ſword all the ſoldiers therein: among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut ſome in pieces, and the reſt they threw into the M riuer Kulp. One religious man there found among the reſt, they did flea quicke in deteſtation of his profeſſion, and afterward cutting him in ſmall pieces, burnt them to aſhes. So taking the ſpoyle of all that was there to be had; and leauing a ſtrong garriſon for the keeping of the place, they paſſed ouer Sauus, burning the countrie before him, and carried away with them

A about a thouſand poore Chriſtians into perpetual captiuitie. Theſe inuaſions of the Turks cauſed the Emperor to craue aid both of the States of the Empire, and other forreine Princes farther off, which was by ſome eaſily granted, but not ſo ſpeedily performed.

About this time Peter ſyrnamed le Huſſar (for that hee commanded ouer thoſe horſemen whom the Hungarians call Huſſars) captaine of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand countie Hardeck Gouernour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turkes Treaſurer in Hungarie, who had the command of 5000 Turkes: him this Hungarian tooke at aduantage, as he was muſtering and paying certain companies of his ſoldiers, miſtruſting no ſuch danger, and deſperatly charging him, ſlew him with diuers of his men, and put the reſt to flight, and ſo with the ſpoile and ſome few priſoners he returned againe to his caſtle, carrying with him the Treaſurer.

Sinan Baſſa beſiegeth Veſprinium.

B Now Sinan the Generall being come with his armie to Buda, reſolued with himſelfe to begin his wars in that part of Hungarie, with the ſiege of Veſprinium. This Epiſcopall citie was by Solyman the great Turke taken from the Chriſtians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recouered about foureteene yeares after, about the yeare 1566; ſince which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Chriſtians. Sinan without delay marching with his armie to Veſprinium, compaſſed the city round, and encamping as he ſaw good, planted his batterie, wherewith he continually thundered againſt the city. The Chriſtians there in garriſon eaſily perceiuing that the city was not long to bee holden againſt ſo great a power, placed diuers barrels of gunpouder in certain mines they had made vnder the wals & bulwarks of the town, with traines that ſhould at a certaine time take fire. Which done, they departed ſecretly out C of the city in the dead time of the night, hoping ſo in the darke to haue eſcaped the hand of the enemy: which they did not ſo ſecretly, but that they were by the Turks deſcried, and moſt of them ſlaine. Ferdinand Samaria Gouernor of the citie, after he had for a ſpace valiantly defended himſelfe, fell at laſt into the enemies hand, and ſo was taken aliue, together with one Hofkirke a German captain. The Turks entered the citie the ſixth of October, ſtriuing who ſhould get firſt in, for greedineſſe of the prey, when ſuddenly the pouder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing vp the very foundations of the wals and bulwarkes, ſlew a number of the Turks that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the citie.

Palotta yeelded vnto the Turke.

From Veſprinium the Baſſa remoued with his armie to Palotia, and gaue ſummons to the caſtle: but receiuing ſuch anſwer as pleaſed him not, he laied ſiege vnto it with all his power. D Which at the firſt Peter Ornand captaine of the caſtle cheerfully receiued: but being afterward without any great cauſe diſcouraged (the caſtle as yet being but little ſhaken, & but one man ſlaine, and the reſt of the ſoldiers ready to ſpend their liues in defence therof) he ſent vnto the Baſſa, offering to yeeld the caſtle vnto him, ſo that he with his ſouldiers might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart. Of which his offer the Baſſa accepted, and granted his requeſt. But hee was no ſooner come out of the caſtle with his ſouldiers, and ready to depart, but the faithleſſe Turke contrarie to his oath and promiſe cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlaine, except only the captaine and two other. After that, the Baſſa without any great labor tooke in al the countrey thereabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Now at laſt, though long firſt, about the middle of October the Chriſtians began to muſter E their armie, in number about 18000, all good and expert ſouldiers: with which power they ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius, at the firſt encounter with the Turkes, put them to the worſe, ſlew a great number of them, and reſcued a number of poore Chriſtian captiues.

Alba Regalis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

In the latter end of this month, countie Hardeck Gouernor of Rab, and General of the Chriſtian armie in that part of Hungarie, departing from Comara with all his power, came and laid ſiege to the ſtrong citie of Alba Regalis, which by the force of his artillerie he in ſhort time made ſaultable; but in aſſaulting the breaches, was by the Turks there in garriſon notably repulſed. So hauing made ſufficient proofe both of the ſtrength and courage of the defendants, & perceiuing no good could be done without a long ſiege, for which he was not as then prouided; after conſultation had with the reſt of the captaines, he reſolued to raiſe his ſiege: which he did the ſecond of Nouember; remouing that day but halfe a mile from the citie, becauſe he would be ſure of all his armie. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his eſpials, that the enemies power was at hand, and euen now almoſt in ſight: which proued to be ſo indeed. For the Baſſa of Buda by the commandement of Sinan Baſſa the Generall, was come forth with thirteene Sanzacks, and twentie thouſand ſouldiers, thirtie field pieces, and fiue hundred waggons laded with victuall and other warlike prouiſion, to raiſe the ſiege, and to relieue the citie; and was now euen at hand, comming directly vpon the Chriſtians: whereupon the county, aſſiſted by the countie Serinus, the lord Palſi, the lord Nadaſti, Peter le Huſſar, and other valiant captains of great experience, with wonderful celeritie put his army in order of battell, and ſo couragiouſly ſet forward to encounter the enemie. The Baſſa ſeeing the Chriſtians marching towards him, tooke the aduantage of the higher ground, and from thence diſcharged his field pieces vpon them; which mounted too hie, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Chriſtians for all that deſirous of battel, and nothing regarding the diſaduantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almighty, mounted the hill, and ioyning battell with the Turks, by plaine force conſtrained them to flie. In this armie of the Turkes, being for moſt part horſemen, were about fiue thouſand foot, and many of them Ianizaries, who in flying, oftentimes made ſtands, and wounded many, and yet neuertheleſſe were almoſt all there ſlaine, with many others: amongſt whom were three great men, the Sanzacks of Strigonium, Setchine, and Nouigrade; ſeuen Chiaus, and many other men of mark, the moſt valiant captains of the Turks borderers. The lord Nadaſti with ſome others taking view of the Turks that were ſlaine and loſt in this battel, deemed them to haue been at the leaſt in number eight thouſand: few priſoners were ſaued, all beeing put to the ſword, which cauſed Sinan to ſweare by his Mahomet, neuer more to ſpare any Chriſtian. All the Turks artillerie, wagons, and prouiſion became a prey vnto the Chriſtians: many enſignes were there found, and weapons of great value. It is hard to be beleeued, how much this victorie encouraged the Chriſtians, & danted the Turks. Whereupon the countie with great ioy brought backe his armie to Alba Regalis, and encamped neere the bulwarke called Stopaſch, where the Turkes moſt feared to be aſſaulted, Palſi, Nadaſti, and ſome others, earneſtly perſuaded with the county, not to depart from the city before he had woon it: but he conſidering the hard time of the yere, the ſtrength of the citie (which was now full of ſouldiers, by reaſon of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things neceſſary in his army to maintaine a longer ſiege; and fearing alſo after long lying to be enforced with diſhonor to forſake it, would not hearken to their perſuaſions, but calling a counſell, reſolued to raiſe his ſiege, and to content himſelfe with the victory he had already gotten; which was afterward imputed vnto him for more than an ouerſight. So ſetting fire vpon the ſuburbs of the citie, he riſe with his army, and departed thence the fifth of Nouember, and returned to Rab.

Sabatzka taken by the lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Chriſtopher lord Teuffenbach, the Emperours Lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungarie, who lay encamped at Caſſouia, with his armie of foureteene thouſand ſouldiers remoued thence, & marching along the country two daies, came & laid ſiege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks ſtrongeſt caſtles in thoſe quarters, out of which they vſually did much harm among the Chriſtians. This Caſtle Teuffenbach battered in three places; and hauing at length made it ſaultable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of Nouember, and put to the ſword all the Turkes there in garriſon, in number about two hundred and fiftie, and in ſtead of them left a ſtrong garriſon of his owne: whereby all the countrie thereabouts was reſtored to great quietneſſe.

Filek beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Chriſtian Generall remoued with all ſpeed to Filek a ſtrong citie of the higher Hungarie, which Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor tooke from the Chriſtians in the yere 1560, and placed therein a Sanzacke, vnder the command of the Baſſa of Buda. The Generall encamping before this citie, the next day after planted his batterie, and in moſt terrible manner without intermiſſion thundered againſt the wals and gates of the citie. The Sanzacke Gouernour thereof, conſidering the power of the Chriſtians, got out ſecretly by night with a few ſouldiers, to acquaint the other Turkiſh Sanzackes his neighbours with the comming of the Chriſtians, and the number of their armie; and further to conſult with them, how the city might be relieued. The Baſſa of Temeſware, with the Sanzacks of Giula, Hadwan, Scantzag, and Scirme, vndertooke the matter: and thereupon the Baſſa ſent for eight hundred Ianizaries, of late left by Sinan Baſſa in garriſon at Buda and Alba Regalis; who all flatly refuſed to goe to this ſeruice; ſaying, That they would not bee led as beaſts to the ſlaughter, as were their fellowes but a little before at Alba Regalis: Neuertheleſſe they enforced the Armenians, whome Sinan and his ſonne had brought thither, to goe; but of Buda, Alba Regalis, and Scamboth, were ſent onely fifteene hundred common ſouldiers. For all that, the Baſſa with the Sanzackes his followers, firme in their former reſolution for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed citie, hauing made great preparation, and raiſed an armie of 18000 ſtrong, with manie field pieces, by night drew neere vnto Filek, and ſtayed within two miles of the citie. But the General of the Chriſtians, with Stephen Bathor and the other captaines, vnderſtanding of their comming, with 7000 good ſouldiers choſen out of the whole armie, went out preſently againſt them, and the one and twentieth of Nouember ſuddenly aſſailing them in their tents, ouerthrew them and put them all to flight, whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued with a moſt terrible execution. In this fight and flight there was ſlaine 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Baſſa himſelfe, with the Sanzacke of Filek, and many others of great name, were found amongſt the bodies of the ſlaine Turks. This victory gained with little or no loſſe, yeelded vnto the Chriſtians a rich prey, many gorgeous tents and faire enſignes, much cattell, and 29 field pieces, with 200 waggons laded with victual and other prouiſion; all which they carried into the campe at Filek, and ſo more ſtraitly beſieged the citie than before. The ſame day the Lo. Palfi and Martin Laſla came to the camp with ſix thouſand ſoldiers, and forthwith three Trumpeters were ſent to them of the citie, That if without further reſiſtance they would forthwith yeeld the citie, they ſhould haue leaue in ſafetie to depart with life and goods, although the Turks had of late in like caſe broken their faith with the Chriſtians at Palotta: but if they refuſed his grace, and would needs hold it out to the vttermoſt, then to denounce vnto them all extremities. For all this, the Turks nothing diſmaied, refuſed to yeeld: whereupon the batterie began afreſh, and in more terrible manner than before; ſo that though the Citie was moſt ſtrongly fortified both with walls and rampiers, yet had the Chriſtians in three daies ſpace with continual batterie made a faire breach into it, whereby they in deſpight of the enemie entred without any notable loſſe the foure and twentieth of Nouember, ranſacked the citie, and burnt a great part thereof. The ſame day they alſo tooke the vttermoſt caſtle, wherein the Sanzacks palace ſtood. This caſtle ſtandeth vpon a very high hill, ſtrengthened both by art and nature, and had in it a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſouldiers, who ſpared not luſtily to beſtow their ſhot amongſt their enemies, of whom they ſlew a great number. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians after they had for the ſpace of two dayes and two nights with a moſt furious batterie ſhaken the walls, by plaine force entred the caſtle the ſix and twentieth of Nouember, and put to ſword all the gariſon ſouldiers, except ſuch as had in good time forſaken this caſtle, and retired themſelues into another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred, with their wiues and children, without hope of reliefe, and ſeeing the cannon now bent vpon them, ſet out a white enſigne in token of parley: which granted, it was agreed that they ſhould depart with life, and ſo much of their goods as euery one of them could carrie. Vpon which agreement the caſtle was yeelded the eight and twentieth day of Nouember, and the Turkes with a ſafe conuoy brought vnto the place they deſired. In this caſtle was found a great bootie, many pieces of artillerie, and much other warlike prouiſion, but of victuals ſmall ſtore. The Generall with the reſt of the captaines entring the caſtle, fell downe vpon their knees, and with their hearts and hands caſt vp to heauen, thanked God for their victorie, and for the recouerie of that ſtrong citie; but eſpecially for the deliuery of ſo many Chriſtians out of the Turkiſh thraldome: for it is reported, that there were aboue eight hundred countrey villages ſubiect to the juriſdiction of Filek, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkiſh ſeruitude, by the taking of this onely citie. The Chriſtians forthwith repaired the walls, bulwarkes, and trenches, and ſtrongly fortified euerie place againſt the enemie: and ſo leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the citie and caſtles, departed with their armie, now in number about twentie thouſand, towards Sodoch, ſix miles from Filek. But as they were vpon the way, newes was brought vnto the General, how that the Turks had for feare abandoned the caſtles of Dijwin and Somoſke: whereupon he ſent out certaine companies of ſoldiers to take in both thoſe places: who comming thither, found them indeed forſaken by the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillerie and other warlike prouiſion there ſtill left.

Filek taken by the Chriſtians.

In the latter end of Nouember the General marched with his armie towards Setſchine, a ſtrong towne in the dioceſſe of Agria; but the Turkes in that place had two or three daies before prepared themſelues to flie, and ſent their wiues, their children, and the beſt of their ſubſtance, ſome to Hatwan, ſome to Buda; and now hearing of the approch of the Chriſtian Armie, ſet fire on the towne and fled. The Chriſtians immediately entring, did what they could to quench the fire, and ſaued a great part of the Towne: ſo leauing there a conuenient garriſon, he haſted with ſpeed to Blauenſtein, which the Turkes did alſo ſet on fire, and betooke themſelues to flight. The Chriſtians comming thither the next day after, namely the fourth of December, found a great part of the towne yet vnburnt, wherein they left a ſtrong garriſon: and from thence marched to Sallek, which towne they alſo tooke, being forſaken by the enemy, and put thereinto a good garriſon. The General was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue proſecuted this ſo happie a courſe of victorie: but ſuch was the foulneſſe of the winter weather, that he could not trauell with his great artillerie, without which no great matter was to be done againſt the enemie, ſtill keeping himſelfe in his ſtrong hold. And his Armie in that waſted and forſaken countrie began now to feele the want of victuals; ſo that manie had withdrawne themſelues out of the armie, vnto their dwelling places.

At the ſame time alſo the Lord Palſi going to Dregel and Palanka, and finding them forſaken by the enemie, furniſhed both places with garriſons of his owne men. Certaine other ſtrong places were alſo this moneth recouered from the Turks, as Ainacke, Sollocke, Weſtke, and others, and ſo much territorie gained by the Chriſtians, as was in circuit thought equall with the lower Auſtria. The joyfull newes of the aforeſaid victories, with the recouerie of ſo much of the countrey, and ſo many ſtrong townes and caſtles, made great reioycing both at Vienna and Prague: for which cauſe publique prayers with thankeſgiuing to Almightie God were made in both places, with many other tokens of joy and triumph both there and in diuers other places of the Empire. Yet were not the dead bodies of the Turkes ſlaine at Alba-Regalis buried; whereof roſe ſuch a loathſome and noiſome ſmell thereabout, that no man could abide to come nigh the place, to the great trouble of the inhabitants thereabout. At length certaine Turks out of Buda and Alba-Regalis, to the number of three hundred and fiftie, met together, to haue buried thoſe loathſome carkaſſes. Vpon whom it chanced a captaine of the Huſſars to light with his horſemen, who fiercely aſſailing them, left moſt of them there dead for others to burie, and carried away the reſt priſoners.

The Turks in burying their dead, ſlain by the Chriſtians

The Baſſa of Buda had cauſed Murat Sanzacke of Palotta to be ſtrangled, for that hee ſuſpected him to haue had intelligence with the Chriſtians: in whoſe roome he placed another, who comming with 600 Turks to take poſſeſſion of the preferment, was by the way ſet vpon by Peter le Huſſar with the garriſon ſoldiers of Pappa and Thurne, and ſlaine with moſt part of his followers: 35 of them were taken aliue, with all the Sanzackes rich furniture. To end this yere withall, the Turks in garriſon at Petrinia, Siſeg, Caſtrowitz, and other places therabouts, met together in number about 3000: who the 19 of December paſſing ouer the riuer Sauus, began to ſpoile the frontiers of thoſe countries. But before they were gon far, they were ſo incountred by the Lord Graſwin and the borderers thereabout, that fiue hundred of them were left dead vpon the ground, diuers of good account taken priſoners, & almoſt all the reſt drowned in the riuer: ſo that of all them that came ouer, few eſcaped with life. In the latter end of this moneth great numbers of ſouldiers were taken vp in Saxonie and other places of Germanie; whereof ſome were ſent to Prague, and ſome to Vienna in Auſtria: and in Hungarie the Chriſtians encreaſed their ſtrength with new ſupplies. In Auſtria alſo a new armie was raiſed, and two and twentie great pieces of artillerie ſent downe the riuer of Danubius to Comara, and new preparation made in euery place for the next yeares wars.

A great tempeſt at Conſtantinople.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor going out of the city of Conſtantinople the 11 of Ianuarie, to muſter the army he had prepared againſt the Chriſtians for this yere, was ſuddenly ouertaken with ſuch a tempeſt of wind and raine, that it ouerthrew his tents, his chariots, yea his horſes and men had much ado to withſtand it. Wherewith he being (as with an ominous prodigie) exceedingly troubled, returned with his armie into the citie, and oppreſſed with melancholie, caſt himſelfe downe vpon his bed as a man halfe ſicke. Where falling aſleepe, he dreamed he ſaw a man of an exceeding ſtature, ſtanding with one of his feet vpon the tower of Conſtantinople, and the other ouer the ſtrait in Aſia; who ſtretching out his armes, held the Sun in one of his armes, and the Moone in the other: whom whiles he wondered at, the Monſter with his foot ſtrucke the tower, which forthwith fell downe, and in falling ouerthrew the great Temple, with the Imperial Palace. Amurath awaked (as he thought) with the noiſe, and much troubled with the dreame (for the Turks are in ſuch vanities very ſuperſtitious) ſent for all his Wiſards and Interpreters of dreames, to know the meaning of this his ſo ſtrange or rather ſo Amurath dreameth.

A melancholy a dreame, Who hypocritically anſwered him, That foraſmuch as he had with all his force as a tempeſt impugned the Chriſtians, their great Prophet Mahomet threatned by that dreame, to ouerthrow the tower, the temple, and the Imperial palace, that is to ſay, the religion and Empire of the Turks. Which vaine and feigned interpretation ſo much moued the ſuperſtitious Tyrant, that he ſwore from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and not to giue ouer war vntill he had done what he might to ſubdue them. This the Turks dreame, with the interpretation thereof, and the ſolemne vow he had made for the de-ſtruction of the Chriſtians, was publiquely read in the Churches of Tranſyluania, and many godly exhortations made vnto the people, to moue them, by prayer and all other good meanes to auert that ſo threatened thraldome.

A faire preſent of the ſpoile of the Turkes ſent vnto the Emperour.

B Of the rich ſpoile taken from the Turkes in the late victorie neere vnto Alba-Regalis, the Chriſtian Captaines made a preſent for the Emperor and the Archduke Mathias his brother, which they ſent by the Lords Gall and Brun, and was by them preſented vnto the Emperour and his brother the eleuenth of Ianuarie at Vienna, in order as followeth: Firſt went the Maſter of the ordnance of Rab, on both ſides attended vpon with the other officers of the artille-rie: after them were drawne thirtie great pieces of ordnance taken in the battell. After theſe Pieces followed three Turkiſh horſes with rich ſaddles and furniture ſtudded with gold, the ſtirrups and bridles being of ſiluer, gilt and moſt curiouſly wrought: after them were carried 22 of the Turks enſignes, three of them were verie rich, and the other right faire. Then followed the two Embaſſadors aforeſaid, with each of them a gilt maſe in his hand, ſuch as the C Turks Baſſa's vſe to carrie: after them were brought many inſtruments of war, gilt ſcimiters, gleaues, bowes and arrowes, targuets, and ten of the Ianizaries drums. Two of the aforeſaid horſes were preſented to the Emperor, and the third to the Archduke. The field piecs brought to the caſtle gate, and orderly placed vpon the plaine, were all, at ſuch time as the reſt of the Preſent entred the caſtle, forthwith by the canoniers diſcharged; and there for certain daies left vpon the plaine for the people to feed their eyes vpon. The Embaſſadours diſcharged of their Preſent, and rewarded by the Emperour with chaines of gold and other gifts, returned to the campe. Notwithſtanding that it was now deepe Winter, yet many ſharp skirmiſhes daily paſſed vpon the borders, betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. The fifteenth of this preſent month, 2000 of the Turks aſſembled together, were making an inrode into the country about D Filek: whereof the Lord Teuffenbach hauing intelligence, lay in wait for them, and ſetting vp-on them fearing no ſuch danger, ſlew and tooke of them fifteene hundred.

Mathias Archduke of Auſtria, now gouernor of Stiria, Carinthia, and the countries there-about, by the departure of Erneſtus his brother (but a little before by Philip King of Spaine made Gouernor of the Low-countries) was now alſo by the Emperor appointed Generall of the Chriſtian armie againſt the Turks: who to be neerer vnto the enemie, and to further the new war, departed the ſix and twentieth day of Februarie from Vienna to Rab; after whome dayly followed the forces newly raiſed in Sileſia, Morauia, and Hungarie, with others alſo ſent from Prague and Vienna. He conſidering to what ſmall purpoſe it would be to haue the laſt yeare taken ſo many ſtrong townes and caſtles, except the ſame alſo were well manned and Schlike with a thouſand horſe to Filek, for the more ſafetie of that place and the country there-about ſo lately gained from the Turks.

It fortuned that about this time, a ſoldier of the Turks taken not far from Dregel, & brought into the campe; among other things whereof he was examined, confeſſed that in Nouigrade (a ſtrong towne and of great importance, but one mile diſtant from Vacia, and three from Buda) was left but a weake garriſon of about eight hundred ſouldiers, who there liued in great feare to be beſieged; and that the Turks doubting ſuch a matter, had brought thither much prouiſion for the better fortifying of the towne. Vpon which intelligence the Chriſtians began to remoue with their armie, and being come betwixt Dregel and Nouigrade, vnderſtood M by the country people, that it was true that the Turke had reported: wherefore they reſolued that night to lay ſiege vnto the towne. So forthwith ſome were ſent to Dregel, to fetch thence certaine pieces of artillerie, whom certaine troupes of German horſemen went to meet: who vſed ſuch diligence, that the eight of March a little before the riſing of the Sun, the whole armie with the great ordnance was come before Nouigrade. That day the Chriſtians ſpent in pitching their Tents, and incamping themſelues: yet before night they had planted certaine great pieces vpon an high hill, from whence them might ſee into the caſtle: whereof the maſter of the ordnance cauſed three of the greateſt about the going downe of the Sun to be diſcharged againſt the caſtle, to giue the Turkes to vnderſtand that they wanted nothing for the ſiege. The ſame night alſo the Chriſtians caſt vp a great mount in the vally, from whence they preſently ſent ſix great ſhot into the caſtle: but early in the morning, the Sun being yet ſcarce vp, and all things now in readineſſe, they began to batter the caſtle, and that day out of ten great pieces diſcharged 300 great ſhot againſt the Caſtle: but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Caſtle was built vpon a moſt ſtrong rocke, fortified with high and thicke walls, and a deepe ditch hewen out of the maine rocke, which compaſſed the caſtle round; and for the more ſtrength thereof was ſo fortified with palliſado's made of ſtrong timber, as that there was no acceſſe vnto the walls: yet by the commandement of the General, certaine companies of the Chriſtians prepared themſelues to aſſault the breach, ſuch as it was: who beſides their weapons, carying with them drie faggots, and ſetting them on fire, burnt the palliſado in diuers places, and ſo opened the way vnto the walls: and encouraged with the ſucceſſe, approched neerer, and ſlew diuers of the Turks vpon their rampiers. Who diſcouraged with their owne weakeneſſe, and the forwardneſ of the enemy, faintly defended themſelues, and yet ſlew diuers of them, beating them downe from the walls with ſtones, timber, fire-works, and ſuch like. This aſſault giuen in the night, was continued vntill foure a clocke in the morning, and ſo giuen ouer. Shortly after came the Archduke with 1000 horſe into the campe, and cauſed the batterie to be againe renued; whereby it chanced that the chiefe canonier in the caſtle (being a renegat German) was taken with a great ſhot and ſlaine, whoſe death ſo diſmaied the reſt of the defendants, that they preſently ſet forth three white flags in ſigne of parley: which for all that, the Chriſtians ſeemed not to regard, but ſtill continued their batterie. The Turks then pittifully crying out, named two captaines, whom they deſired to haue ſent vnto them, with whom they might fall to ſome reaſonable compoſition. So for a while the batterie ceaſed, and thoſe Captaines being ſent vnto the Towne, brought nine of the beſt of the Turkes in the Citie with them vnto the Archduke: who by their Interpreter declared, That they well conſidered the force of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing no reliefe to come from the Baſſa of Buda, as he had promiſed, thought themſelues to haue alreadie diſcharged the parts of good ſoldiers, and ſeeing no other remedie, were contented to yeeld the caſtle, yet ſo, as that with bag and baggage they might in ſafetie depart. Whereunto the Lord Palſi (taking vpon him the perſon of the Archduke, for that he himſelfe would not be knowne) anſwered, That foraſmuch as they had not yeelded at the firſt ſummons, but holden it out to the loſſe of many of his mens liues, and his great charge, they were vnworthie any fauor; yet of his owne clemencie he would receiue them, if they would abſolutely without any further condition yeeld themſelues to his mercie. This anſwer being reported to the Sanzacke Gouernour of the Towne, pleaſed him not, and therefore ſaid hee would ſtill ſtand vpon his defence. Whereupon the Chriſtians were about to haue begun a freſh aſſault. But after a new parley, it was at laſt agreed, That the Turkes yeelding the towne vnto the Archduke, ſhould in ſafetie depart with their apparel and ſcimiters only. With which agreement two of the Turks were ſent backe into the caſtle, & the reſt detained. Foure houres the Turks in the caſtle delaied the time, as men doubtful what to do: but being earneſtly called vpon for a reſolute anſwer, and ſeeing the Chriſtians readie againe to aſſault them, they for feare yeelded: and ſo 450 of them came forth, amongſt whom was the Sanzacke gouernour of the towne, with his wife and daughter, the Sanzacke of Selendre (ſent thither to haue aided him) and one Chiaus lately come from the Court. Theſe great men brauely mounted, were commanded to alight from their gallant horſes, and had in their ſteads other bad jades giuen them to ride vpon: and as they paſſed by, as well the women as the men were ſearched, that they carried with them nothing more than their cloathes: if any thing els were found, it fell vnto the ſoldiers ſhare for good bootie. This ſtrong towne of Nouigrade had continued in the poſſeſſion of the Turks about 60 yeares, and ſerued as it were for a bulwarke to Peſth and Buda; which now recouered out of their hands, opened a way vnto their further harmes. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the Lord Rebei a nobleman of Hungarie and kinſman to Palſi, with a ſtrong garriſon and certaine troupes of Huſſars.

Nouigrade yeelded vnto the archduke.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrade, after he had loſt the towne, comming to Buda, was preſently appreben-Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the Emperors ſent his Embaſſadors to the great Duke of Muſcouia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Tranſyluania, to proue how they ſtood affected towards thoſe his wars againſt the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them. Into Muſcouie was ſent one Warkotſch a gentleman of Sileſia, who comming to Muſco, found B in that Court the Embaſſadors of the Tartar, the Turke, the Perſian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all theſe, the Embaſſadors of the Tartar and the Turke could haue no audience, but were with contumelious words reiected as miſcreants. The Emperours Embaſſador was honorably entertained, and after the manner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, meede, aquavitæ, fleſh, fiſh, and fowle of ſundrie ſorts allowed him dayly all the time of his abode. At length hauing audience, he declared vnto the great Duke the cauſe of his comming, and in the name of his Maſter requeſted his aid againſt the Turke. Whereunto the Duke anſwered, That he would giue the Emperor towards the maintenance of his wars againſt the common enemy, 500000 duckets, and allow him yerely 400000 during the time of that war; requeſting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promiſing to ſend him aid alſo of men in this war, C if he ſhould ſo need. The Perſian Embaſſador alſo honorably feaſted the Emperors Embaſſador, and had with him great conference concerning the wars of the Chriſtians with the Turks, and in his maſters name promiſed the continuation of his warres againſt the Turke, ſo that the Emperor would likewiſe a promiſe not to haue any league with him, ſo to giue him leiſure to turne all his forces againe into Perſia. This Embaſſador after he had almoſt foure months tarried in Muſcouia, returned to the Emperor. At which time Doctor Wacker the Emperors Embaſſadour into Polonia, returned alſo with ioyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an armie of eight and twentie thouſand had ſtopped the paſſage of an hundred thouſand Tartars whom the Turke had ſent for againſt the Emperor; and that if he needed, he ſhould be aided with the Polonian Coſſackes: but vnto the reſt of his requeſts he could haue no anſwere of the States of that Kingdome, for that the King was then abſent in Sweden; and was therefore referred to be further anſwered at his returne.

At the ſame time, Countie Serinus with three hundred harquebuſiers and certaine troups of horſemen, and the footmen of Stiria and the countries thereabouts, aſſembled to the number of ten thouſand, departed from Caniſia, to beſiege Breſena a caſtle of the Turks. But they vnderſtanding before of his comming, conueyed away the beſt of their ſubſtance, and ſetting the caſtle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earle comming thither, tooke the forſaken caſtle, and put thereinto a garriſon of his owne ſouldiers. In like manner he tooke alſo Sigeſta, forſaken of the Turks, where he alſo placed a garriſon of the Chriſtians. And ſo going on to Baboſtcha, beſieged it; which caſtle although it was ſtrongly ſcituated in a mariſh, and could not eaſily haue beene woon, was for all that, for feare abandoned by the Turks, and ſo taken by the Countie: by recouerie of which places, there was a ſafe and eaſie way layd open euen to Ziget, the Baſſa whereof ſtood in no ſmall doubt to haue been euen then beſieged.

Which the better to effect, hee ſent one of his Chiaus Embaſſador to the Venetians, to requeſt them, That his fleet might by their leaue paſſe alongſt the Adriaticke, and haue the vſe of their ports and harbours, as need ſhould require. Which his requeſt the Venetians hearing, refuſed in any caſe to yeeld thereunto: fearing (and not without caſe) the vnfaithfulneſſe and treacherie of the Turkes, whoſe oathes and promiſes are no longer ſtrong, or by them regarded, than ſtandeth with their owne good and profit: neuertheleſſe they moſt honourably vſed the Embaſſadour, and ſo ſent him away without obtaining of that he was eſpecially ſent for.

uing gathered an armie of twentie thouſand ſoldiers, the ſixteenth of Aprill laied ſiege to Hatwan a ſtrong towne ſix miles from Buda, fortified with a triple ditch and bulwarkes of exceeding ſtrength. Againſt which although the Chriſtians could not do much either by mines or mounts, (by reaſon it was ſo enuironed with water) yet they ſo ſhut vp all the paſſages thereunto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the towne. They of the town ſeeing themſelues thus blockt vp, by ſecret meſſengers certified the Baſſa of Buda in what caſe they ſtood, praying of him aid: who with ten thouſand choſen ſouldiers, which he had then in readineſſe, and the Sanzacks of Sirnah, Giula, Lippa, Lerwoge, and Tſchangrad, with fiue thouſand moe, forthwith ſet forward toward Hatwan to raiſe the ſiege: and the laſt of Aprill being come within ſight of the Chriſtian armie, about one of the clocke in the afternoone encamped on the ſide of the riuer Sagijwa: but when he could not or els durſt not, for the deepeneſſe of the way, the aboundance of the water, and neereneſſe of the enemie, aduenture to paſſe the riuer, he retyred backe againe to paſſe ouer at Iaſperin (otherwiſe called Iasbrin) where the riuer was joined with a bridge, and not far off a good foord alſo to paſſe ouer at; thinking ſo to haue come vpon the backes of the Chriſtians, and with more ſafetie to haue relieued the beſieged towne. But Teuffenbach perceiuing his purpoſe, forthwith after his departure paſſed the riuer with much difficultie, and ouertaking him with his armie the next day, being the firſt of May, about one of the clocke in the afternoone, betweene Zarcha and Fuſcaſalua, with his great ordnance diſordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and comming on couragiouſly with his whole armie, began a moſt cruell fight: which the Turkes a great while endured with wonderfull reſolution; but now deſtitute of their woonted multitude (their greateſt confidence) and hardly layed vnto by the Chriſtians, they in the end turned their backes and fled; whom ſix thouſand Hungarians and Germanes fiercely purſued, and had the killing of them almoſt to Buda. In this battell the Chriſtians tooke all the enemies great Ordnance, with ſeuenteene enſignes, and alſo the Caſtle of Iaſperin, which the Turks had for feare abandoned; wherein was found good ſtore of victuals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike prouiſion. Of this ſo notable a victorie Teuffenbach by Letters preſently aduertiſed the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the ſiege of of Hatwan. Which letters becauſe they containe many particularities and circumſtances of this battell, I haue thought it not amiſſe here to inſert.

The copie of the letters of the L. Teuffenbach, to Matthias th Archduke, General of the emperours armie againſt the Turks.

Although (ſaid he) I haue by a ſpeedie meſſenger vpon the very Kalends of May certified your Excellencie of the notable victorie which God of his great goodneſſe gaue vnto vs the ſame day ouer our hereditarie enemie: yet afterward vpon diligent inquiſition we vnderſtood many particularities, as well of the Captiues themſelues, as of the Inhabitants about Zolnocke, Peſth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to aduertiſe you. The Captiues themſelues confeſſe, That the Baſſa of Buda, with the Sanzackes of Zolnocke, Zarwacke, Giula, and Tſchangrad, Cippaio, Genne, and others, had with great celeritie raiſed an armie of thirteene thouſand ſouldiers, amongſt whom were many Tartars, with purpoſe to haue relieued the beſieged Towne of Hatwan, and open the ſudden to haue oppreſſed vs in our tents. Filled with which hope, they in great haſte came with all their power the laſt of Aprill towards Hatwan: but forſomuch as they could not paſſe ouer the riuer Zagijwa by reaſon of the height of the water, they were the next day, being the firſt of May, conducted by the Captaine of Iaſparin to a more commodious paſſage, ſo to come the neerer vnto vs, and the next day in the morning to haue ſurpriſed vs in our Tents. But our moſt mercifull God hath auerted this ſo great a miſchiefe from vs, and turned it vpon their own heads. For as it moſt conſtantly reported from Zolnocke, Peſth, and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the ſame places, there are two thouſand fiue hundred of the Turks ſlaine, and as many wounded, of whom many periſhed, and are found dead vpon the high-wayes leading to Peſth and Zolnocke: of theſe we haue ſent a thouſand heads to Caſſouia, and cauſed many of the Turkes to be buried for feare of infection in this ſo great heate. Verily it was a bloudie battell; ſo that the old Souldiours ſay, they haue not remembred or ſeene the Turkes (no moe in number) to haue ſtood ſo long in battell, and to haue ſo fought it out without flying. Many men of great name and place there periſhed and fell, amongſt whom are redeemed the Sanzackes of Peſth, Nouigrade, and Temeske; Genne Aleuu, Bogſte, Aluſtafa, Marielaus, and certaine Chiaus lately ſent from the Court, with the Baſſa his guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant ſoldiers, of whom few eſcaped with life. Many fell that would haue yeelded great ranſome; but it was agreed vpon betweene the Germanes and the Hungarians, no

A to ſpare any of the enemies, but to put them all to ſword; and that whoſoeuer did otherwiſe, it ſhould be imputed vnto him for diſhonour. So that more than ſixteene common ſouldiers, none were taken priſoners, of whome wee might learne how things went amongſt the Turkes, with other circumſtances of the battell. Wee tooke thirteene field pieces, whereof foure were greater than the reſt; which they called organes, and foure and twentie of the enemies enſignes. The Baſſa of Buda (beſide other three wounds by him receiued) was grieuouſly wounded in the ſide. Of our men were loſt about an hundred, and many of them moſt expert ſouldiers: and about ſix hundred others grieuouſly wounded, of whom there is ſmall hope, many of them beeing alreadie dead. Neither is the loſſe ſmall wee haue receiued in our horſes and armour, for there be few amongſt the Germane horſemen, which haue not loſt one, two, or three, of their horſes or ſeruants, whereby our horſemen are wonderfully weakened: yet was B the victorie great, to God be the praiſe, to him be the glorie and thankes therefore. Let vs in the mean time proſecute the ſiege begun. The laſt night I commanded the water to bee drawne another way, ſo that now our trenches may be aduanced many paces, and bulwarkes raiſed within two hundred paces of the wall. Wee haue alreadie planted fiue great pieces of artillerie in one bulwarke, and hope the next night to place fiue moe vpon a mount faſt by, and will doe what ſhall be needfull for a ſtraight ſiege: and when time ſhall ſerue, vndertake the towne with all our power, God grant vs therein good ſucceſſe and victorie.

The Turks in garriſon at Zabola, a fort there by, diſcouraged with the ouerthrow of their friends, forſooke the fort; which for ſtrength and greatneſſe was comparable with Tocay or Erla. Which ſtrong place the Christians without any loſſe now recouered.

Strigonium beſieged by the Chriſtians.

C Whileſt this valiant captaine the lord Teuffenbach thus lay at the ſiege of Hatwan, Matthias the Archduke General of the Chriſtian army in Hungarie, incouraged with the good ſucceſſe he had at Nouigrad, came with his armie (being 44000 ſtrong) before Strigonium (ſometime the Metropoliticall citie of Hungarie, but now of long a ſure receptacle of the Turks) and the ſixth of May encamped his armie about a quarter of a mile from the caſtle in a moſt pleaſant medow, from whence both the citie and the caſtle were plainely to be ſeene. Vpon whom the Turks out of the caſtle, and three gallies that lay vpon the riuer, diſcharged certain great pieces without any great harme doing: but after the Chriſtian fleet was a little before night come downe the riuer, and with their great ordnance began to anſwer them againe, the enemy D ceaſed ſhooting, and lay ſtill that night. In the meane time it fortuned, that a Turkiſh youth taken in a garden there by, and brought into the camp and examined, confeſſed that there was no garriſon in the citie, more than foure hundred Ianizaries, and that a new ſupply was dayly expected from Buda. The Chriſtians laboring that night, were by the breaking of the day, come with their trenches to a hil ouer againſt the caſtle, where they placed their batterie, and forthwith began to batter the citie. The ſame day (being the ſeuenth of May) two and twenty Turks heads were preſented to the Archduke, and foure men taken aliue, newly ſent out of the citie to haue viewed the Chriſtian campe. About night certaine bals of wilde fire were ſhot into the citie, whereof one fell vpon the tower called S. Adelbert, and ſet it on fire; wherewith firſt the Church, and afterward a great part of the towne fell on fire. The Sanzacks houſe, with all his horſes and armor, and a great quantitie of pouder was then burnt, and ineſtimable hurt don in the citie. The next day the Chriſtians had with continuall batterie made a breach in the caſtle wall: but adioyning vnto the wall was an high and broad ſandie rampier, which could hardly be battered: for all that the Germans gaue a fierce aſſault to the breach, hoping to haue entred by the ruins of the wall, but not being able to get ouer the ſandie rampier, were inforced with loſſe to retire. The day following they bagan again the batterie with eighteen great pieces; when about eight a clocke in the morning, the Raſcians that were in the old citie gaue the Generall to vnderſtand, That if he would at a place by them appointed, aſſault the greater citie, to draw the Turks thither, they would in the mean time deliuer vnto the Chriſtians certaine little poſternes, and receiue them into the old citie; vpon condition, that no violence ſhould be done vnto them or theirs. Which being ſo agreed vpon, the Chriſtians accordingly gaue the aſſault the eleuenth of May in the euening, and by the help of the Raſcians tooke the citie; who according to promiſe, were all taken to mercie, and the Turks ſlaine, except ſuch as by their good hap recouered the new towne. The keeping of this citie was committed to the charge of two companies of Germane footmen, and ſix hundred Hungarians, with three hundred hundred Raſcians and other towneſmen. Thus was the old citie of Strigonium gained by the Chriſtians, the ſuburbs whereof they preſently burnt, neuertheleſſe the new towne with the caſtle was ſtill holden by the Turks. Wherefore the Chriſtians hauing caſt vp certaine trenches and mounts, and placed their artillerie as they thought moſt conuenient, began again to batter the caſtle, and after they had by the fury of the cannon made it ſaultable, with great courage aſſailed the breach, which the Turks valiantly defended: ſo that the Chriſtians were glad to retire, leauing behind them about an hundred & thirty of their fellowes ſlain in the breach. The Turks a little before the comming of the Chriſtians, had fortified an hill, whereunto the caſtle was ſomething ſubiect, called of the Chriſtians S. Nicholas his hill, this hill ſo fortified, the Chriſtians with continuall batterie and aſſault gained the 17 of May, and put all the Turks left aliue therein to the ſword; and turning the ordnance, from thence alſo battered the caſtle. The two and twentieth of May a little before the going downe of the Sun, certaine enſignes of footmen were drawne out of the campe, to haue the next day aſſaulted the lower towne; who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to haue entred the town in the dead time of the night, were notably encountered by the Turkes, ſallying out of the towne vpon them. The Chriſtians for all that hauing enforced them to retire, proſecuted their former reſolution, and with much adoe got ouer the vttermoſt wall: but finding there contrarie to their expectation, ſuch a deepe and broad countermure as was not poſſible to be paſſed, they ſtood as men diſmaid: neither could they in the darkeneſſe of the night, well ſee how to get backe againe ouer the towne ditch, but diſorderly retiring, ſtucke faſt many of them in the deepe mud, and there periſhed. In this aſſault there were about a thouſand of the Chriſtians wounded and ſlaine: and albeit that they twice or thrice renewed the aſſault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were ſtill repulſed with loſſe. Many alſo of the the Turkiſh garriſon were likewiſe ſlaine; yea the Sanzacke himſelfe hurt with a great ſhot, with many other wounded men ſent downe the riuer to Buda, brought thither true newes of the aforeſaid aſſaults, and of the ſtate of the beſieged.

The Raſcians riſe vp againſt the Turks.

In the mean time news was brought to the campe, That Sinan Baſſa the old enemie of the Chriſtians, and the Turkes great Lieutenant, comming towards Hungarie with a great armie, and hauing by boates coueied ouer part thereof, was ſet vpon by the Raſcians (theſe are poore oppreſſed Chriſtians dwelling on both ſides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkiſh thraldom and deſirous of their antient libertie, haue oftentimes taken vp armes againſt the Turks as they now did, encouraged by the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians on the other ſide of Hungarie) and that after diuers skirmiſhes, they had taken thirteene of the Turkes veſſels, wherein beſides victuals and certaine great pieces of artillerie, they found about 2400 weight of pouder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundels of match, 1200 great ſhot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound weight, and of ſmall ſhot for harquebuſiers 48500, with much other warlike prouiſion: a great part whereof was brought into the campe at Strigonium, and the reſt reſerued to future vſes. This loſſe ſo troubled the great Baſſa, that hee altered his purpoſe before entended for Caſſouia.

The fourth of Iune, about fiue hundred Turks ſent vp the riuer from Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks vnder two red and white enſignes, landed neere to Gokara on the further ſide of Danubius, ouer againſt Strigonium: where after they had a while refreſhed themſelues, and left ſome few for the more aſſurance of the place, all the reſt were conueied ouer the riuer into Strigonium: where they had been long looked for, the old garriſon being now ſore weakened by the former aſſaults. Foure daies after, the Turks encouraged with this ſupplie, ſallied out vpon a ſudden, and had entred one of the forts of the Chriſtians; but were forthwith again repulſed, hauing loſt ſix and twentie of their men, and two of their enſignes: not far off lay a troupe of horſemen, who if they had in time come in, not one of the Turks had eſcaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Chriſtians aſſaulted this citie, but were by the Turks ſo receiued, that in fiue aſſaults they loſt fiue thouſand of their men, amongſt whom were diuers captaines, lieutenants, antients, and others of good account: three and twentie cannoniers were alſo ſlaine, and ten great pieces of artillerie ſo ſpoiled, as that they were no more ſeruiceable. The garriſon of this citie conſiſted for moſt part of the Ianizaries (the Turks beſt ſouldiers) whoſe notable valor in holding out of this ſiege, was both of their owne people and their enemies much commended: whatſoeuer was beaten downe by day, that they againe repaired by night, and ſtill relieued with victuall and things neceſſarie from Buda, did what was poſſible

A poſſible to be done for defence of the city. About the ſame time certain Turks chancing vpon a troupe of Germane horſemen, in fight ſlew about fiftie of them, and put the reſt to flight: whereupon an alarme being raiſed in the campe, many ran out to the reſcue of their fellowes, taking with them certaine ſmall field pieces. Which the Turks perceiuing, began to flie: whom the Chriſtians eagerly purſuing, were ſuddenly aſſailed by other Turks, ſallying out of a fort faſt by, and enforced ſhamefully to retire, and to leaue their field pieces behind them. Which the Turks ſeazing vpon, cloyed them, brake their carriages, and made them altogether vnſeruiceable.

The Archduke ſendeth aid to the ſiege of Hatwan.

All this while the Lord Teuffenbach lying at the ſiege of Hatwan, about this time requeſted aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other difficulties B alwaies attending long ſieges, ſo much weakened, as that hee had ſcarcely ſix thouſand ſound men in his camp: to whom the Archduke forthwith ſent twelue hundred footmen, being loth to ſpare any moe, for too much weakening of his owne armie.

Amurath diſdaining to ſee the frontiers of his Empire in ſo many places impugned by the Chriſtians, and daily to receiue from them ſo great harmes, ſought by all means to be reuenged: wherefore beſide the great power of his owne, which he was now about to ſend with Sinan Baſſa into Hungarie, he had alſo procured from the great Tartar a wonderfull number of thoſe rough and ſauage people, to be ſent into Hungarie, there to ioine with his armie. Theſe wild people, to the number of ſeuentie thouſand, according to direction giuen, breaking into Podolia, Walachia, and Moldauia, gathered together an incredible number of oxen and kine; C to this end and purpoſe, that driuing them before them, they might both be aſſured of victuals, and the ſafer trauell through a part of Polonia. But when they were come vnto the borders of that countrie, and there found the power of Samoſchie the great Chancellor and the Polonian Coſſacks in armes, they eaſily perceiued that they could not that way paſſe without great loſſe. Wherefore they placed the aforeſaid heards of cattell, ſome before, ſome behind, and ſome on each ſide of the army, and ſo incloſed round about with thoſe cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neere vnto the Polonians, this rude deuice ſerued them to no other purpoſe than the ouerthrow of themſelues; for the Polonians diſcharging their great ordnance, ſo terrified the cattell, that they turned vpon the Tartars, and ouerthrowing D whomſoeuer came in their way, did exceeding much harm: whom the Polonians immediatly following, and hardly charging the confuſed armie, armed only with bow and arrowes, after ſome ſmall fight put them at laſt to flight, and obtained of them a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich prey. Of the Polonians were loſt about eighteene hundred, but of the Tartars were ſlaine thirtie thouſand. The reſt retiring into Podolia, and paſſing the riuer Neſter by the way of Tranſyluania, where they did exceeding much harme, came to Temeſware, and ſo afterwards further into Hungarie: vnto whom the Turks ſent ſeuen hundred horſemen, to conduct them to the armie.

Strigonium aſſaulted.

But to returne againe to the ſiege of Strigonium. The fouretenth day of Iune the Chriſtians betweene eight and nine of the clocke in the morning, with great fury aſſaulted the towne in three places: which aſſault they moſt notably maintained, vntill it was almoſt three a clock in the afternoone. Neuertheleſſe, the Turks ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that at laſt the Chriſtians were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the aſſault, had one of his footmen ſlaine faſt by him with a ſmall ſhot. Many of the Turks were alſo ſlain in this aſſault, and amongſt them one of the three Sanzacks that defended the city. The night following there aroſe a moſt horrible tempeſt, with ſuch raging wind, and abundance of raine, that many thought they ſhould neuer haue ſeene day: with the violence whereof the Archdukes tent was ouerthrowne, and diuers others blown downe or rent in ſunder, were in the aire carried from place to place. About the ſame time the Lord Palſi within the ſight of the caſtle caſt vp a notable fort, with high mounts and ſtrong trenches euen in the ſelfeſame place where Solyman lay about fiftie yeares before, when he beſieged & woon Strigonium (by which fort ſo built, the enemie was embarred to conuey any thing vp the riuer for reliefe of the citie, to the great diſcomfiture of the beſieged: for to haue hindred the which worke, the enemy oftentimes ſallied out, but to no purpoſe. This fort being brought to perfection, the Chriſtians tooke alſo another fort in an Iſland on the further ſide of the riuer, which the Turks had but few daies before taken from the Chriſtians, & cloyed the great pieces therein: which fort the Chriſtians now againe repaired, furniſhed it with a ſufficient garriſon and other great ordnance.

Strigonium ſore battered.

Theſe things thus done, the caſtle and the lower town were in fiue diuers places out of the new built fort, the old towne, and the Iſland, ſo battered with continual ſhot, that a man ſhould haue ſaid, that one ſtone would not haue been left vpon another, but that all ſhould haue been beaten downe and laied euen with the ground. The ſeuenteenth of Iune one of the Chriſtian canoniers ſo diſmounted one of the great pieces in the caſtle, that the piece together with the Turkiſh canonier that had charge thereof fell downe out of the caſtle into the ditch. And the ſame day a maſon that fled out of the caſtle into the camp, among other things reported, That many of the Turks were ſlaine with this continuall batterie and often aſſaults, and that not paſt an houre before, forty of them were ſlaine in one chamber, and now acknowledged themſelues to be indeed beſieged: and to haue reſolued, that when they were brought to the laſt caſt, then deſperatly to ſallie out vpon the Chriſtians, and ſo either to returne with victorie, or to make ſhift euery man for himſelfe as he might. Which his report ſeemed not altogether feigned: for about midnight a thouſand of the Turks ſallying out of the caſtle vpon the fort newly built vpon the riuer, in hope to haue ſurpriſed it, were by the Chriſtians therein notably repulſed and inforced to retire; in which conflict fiftie of the Turks were ſlaine, and many mo wounded and taken priſoners. And the ſame day toward euening eight Turks of good ſort being taken and brought into the camp, confeſſed, That but ſix daies before, they had ſeene ſeuen boats full of wounded and dead men ſent downe the riuer from Strigonium to Buda. Whereby it was eaſily to be gathered, how bloudie a ſiege this was vnto the Turks, foraſmuch as all thoſe bodies were the bodies of men of good account and place; for the bodies of ſuch common ſouldiers as were ſlaine, they ſtill threw into the riuer running by.

The new built fort hardly aſſaulted by the Turks.

The fort newly built vpon the banke of Danubius, much troubled the beſieged Turkes in Strigonium, becauſe nothing could without danger of it be ſent vp the riuer for their reliefe, Wherfore they by fit meſſengers ſent word out of the caſtle to the Admirall of the Turks gallies lying below in the riuer, That he ſhould at an appointed time come vp the riuer with his gallies as high as the fort, and on that ſide at leaſtwiſe to make ſhew as if he would aſſault it: at which time they of the towne would be likewiſe ready to ſally out, and to aſſaile it indeed on the other ſide by land. The Admirall accordingly came vp the riuer with his gallies, and by diſcharging of certaine great pieces, made ſhew as if he would on that ſide haue battered the fort: but was ſo welcommed thereout of, that he was glad with his rent gallies quickly to fall downe the riuer againe further off out of danger. But whiles the thundering ſhot was thus flying too and fro towards the riuer, they of the towne ſallying out, aſſaulted the fort on the other ſide toward the land, and that with ſuch deſperat reſolution, that ſome of them were got vp to the top of the rampiers, & there for the ſpace of two houres maintained a moſt cruell fight: wherein many of them were ſlaine, and wounded, and the reſt enforced with ſhame to retire.

The Chriſtians thus ſtill lying at the ſiege, & intentiue to all occaſions; partly by their eſpials, and partly by ſuch as they had taken priſoners, vnderſtood, that a new ſupply both of men and victuals was ſhortly to be put into Strigonium: and therefore ſent out certaine companies of ſouldiers, who lying in two conuenient places, the one vpon the riuer, the other by land, might intercept the ſaid ſupply. Both which places were before by the prouident enemy poſſeſſed: who ſuddenly aſſailing the Chriſtians comming thither, & fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew ſome of them, & put the reſt to flight: who neuertheles in their retreat, brake the bridge which the Turks had made of boats vnder the caſtle of Strigonium ouer Danubius. Of which boats ſome were carried away with the violence of the ſtreame, and of the reſt 30 fel into the hands of the Chriſtians, without loſſe of any man more than fiue, who making too much haſte, out of a little boat, fell into the riuer, and ſo periſhed. In this time, Fame the forerunner of all great attempts had brought newes into the Chriſtian camp, That Sinan Baſſa the Turks great Generall was comming to the reliefe of Strigonium: of whoſe power diuers diuerſly reported. But the greater part doubting the worſt, and wearie of the long ſiege and of the calamities incident thereunto, added ſtill ſomething to the laſt report, to make the danger of longer ſtay to ſeeme the greater: certaine it is, that the newes of the comming of ſo great and puiſſant an enemie, raiſed many a troubled thought in the mindes of ſo great a multitude. Now were the beſieged Turkes in great wants in Strigonium, as appeared by Letters intercepted from the Sanzacke

backe to the Baſſa of Buda, declaring vnto him the hard eſtate of the beſieged, and humbly crauing his promiſed help, without which the citie could not for want of victuals poſſibly be defended by the fainting ſoldiers aboue three daies. Which letters being read in the camp, cauſed great preparation to be made for the continuing of the ſiege and the withſtanding of the enemie, whoſe comming was euery houre expected. All this while the great ordnance neuer ceaſed on either ſide: whereby many were ſlaine, as well of the Chriſtians as of the Turks; and amongſt others many of the cannoniers.

But foraſmuch as the rife fame of Sinan Baſſa's comming encreaſed daily, and the Chriſtian camp poſſeſſed with a general feare, gaue vnto the wiſe, iuſt ſuſpition of ſome great miſchiefe likely to enſue: Matthias the Generall entered into counſell with countie Ferdinand Hardeck, the Lord Palfi, the lord Vngenade Preſident of the counſell for the warres, and Eraſmus Eraun Gouernour of Comora, What were beſt to be done in ſo dangerous a time. Who with generall conſent agreed betimes, before the comming of Sinan, to raiſe the ſiege, and to remooue with the armie into ſome place of more ſafetie. Which their determinat reſolution, the day following, beeing the ſix and twentieth of Iune, they made knowne to the other Princes and great commanders in the army: who wonderfully diſcontented therwith, eſpecially the Germans, both openly by word, and ſolemnly by writing, proteſted againſt the ſame, as moſt diſhonorable, and altogether made without their knowledge or good liking. To whom the Preſident of the counſell for their further ſatisfaction, declared, That the enemie was comming with a very great army, and euen now at hand, whoſe ſtrength encreaſed daily, and with what power he had purpoſed to aſſaile them in their tents, was vncertain: beſides that, it was maniſeſtly knowne vnto the world, how that in the former aſſaults they had loſt many of their beſt ſouldiers, beſide others that died in the camp: and that the place wherein they lay encamped, was ſubiect to many dangers: for which ſo vrgent cauſes the Generall had reſolued to raiſe his ſiege, and before the comming of ſo ſtrong an enemy, to remoue his army into a place of more ſafety. Which reaſons for al that did not ſo well ſatisfie the German princes and commanders, but that they ſtill vrged their former proteſtation, requeſting his excellencie to haue them excuſed before God and the World, if they yeelding to his command, as to their Generall, did that which they thought not altogether beſt, and which they would not otherwiſe haue done. For the more euidence whereof, the ſaid German princes and great commanders cauſed their ſaid proteſtation to be ſolemnly conceiued in writing, which they firmed with their ſeales, and ſubſcribed with their owne hands in order as followeth: Francis Duke of Saxonie, Auguſtus Duke of Brunſwick, Sebaſtian Schlick, county Wigand Maltzan, Erneſtus of Alſtan, Henry Phlugk, Iohn Nicholas Ruſwormb, Henry Curwigger Heerrath, Iohn Oberhauſen, Henry Rottcirch, Melchior of Nothwith.

But the Archduke with the reſt conſtant in their former reſolution, firſt ſent away the great ordnance, and raiſing the ſiege the 28 of Iune, followed after with the whole army, paſſing ouer Danubius not far from Kokara, doubtfully expecting what courſe Sinan the great Baſſa (who was then reported to be euen at hand) would take. Yet before their departure they ſet the old towne on fire, and raſed the fort S. Nicholas, before taken from the enemie, which they had once purpoſed to haue kept. This vnexpected departure of the Chriſtians much gladded the beſieged Turks: who for want of victuals had not been able long to haue holden out. Yet lay the lord Teuffenbach ſtill at the ſiege of Hatwan, labouring by all means to take from the beſieged Turks their water, and with earth and faggots to fil vp their ditches; which worke he had now happily brought to ſome good perfection. Whereof they in the towne by letters aduertiſed the Baſſa of Buda, and that except they were within the ſpace of three daies relieued, they ſhould bee enforced to yeeld the towne. Which their diſtreſſe the Baſſa conſidering, with ſpeed aſſembled all his forces, and ſo ſet forward to relieue them, hoping to haue come vpon the Chriſtians before they were aware of his comming. But Teuffenbach vnderſtanding therof, with fiue thouſand choſen horſmen went out of the camp to meet him, & ſuddenly comming vpon him, fearing no ſuch thing, ſlew fiue thouſand of the Turkes, put the Baſſa to flight, and together with the victory obtained an exceeding rich prey.

Fiue thouſand Turks ſlaine.

Hatwan in vain aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

Now was there no leſſe expectation and hope of the winning or yeelding vp of Hatwan, than was before of Strigonium: but according to the chance of war it fell out otherwiſe. For Teuffenbach hauing with continuall batterie laied the breaches faire open, and made choice of of ſuch ſouldiers as he thought meeteſt for the aſſault, was in the performing thereof ſo notably repulſed by the Turkes, that he was glad to retire with the loſſe of his beſt and moſt reſolute G ſoldiers: which put him out of all hope of taking the towne by force. For beſide the loſſe of theſe good men, he had ſcarce ſo many ſound men left, as might ſuffiſe to furniſh his gariſons for defence of thoſe frontiers: by reaſon that the Hungarians were almoſt al ſhrunk home, and of the Germans were left ſcarce two thouſand. Beſides that, he had oftentimes craued new ſupplies of the Archduke, but all in vain: for which cauſes he was glad to abandon two ſtrong forts hee had built before Hatwan, and to leaue the towne, now brought to great extremitie. Thus two notable cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Chriſtians, & by the recouerie whereof, the broken ſtate of the afflicted Chriſtians in Hungarie had beene much ſtrenthened, were as it were againe reſtored vnto the barbarous and cruell enemie. H

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Strigonium and Hatwan, the Raſcians (of whom we haue before ſpoken) ſtriuing ſtill more and more to rid themſelues from the Turkiſh thraldome, gathered themſelues together to the number of fifteene thouſand, betweene Buda and Belgrade, vnder a Generall of their owne chuſing. For feare of whom, the Baſſa of Temeſwar with an armie of fourteene thouſand went to fortifie and victuall Lippa, doubting leſt it ſhould by them be ſurpriſed: but hauing done that he went for, in his returne hee was met with by the ſame Raſcians, and twice fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worſe, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his armie. After which victorie the Raſcians tooke Beczkerek a ſtrong towne ſtanding in a mariſh foure miles from Belgrade, & ſlew al the Turks they found therein. After that, they tooke a caſtle called Ottadt, and dealt with the Turkes in I like manner. From thence they went and beſieged Beche, a Caſtle ſtanding vpon the riuer Tibiſcus or Teiſe, where the towne adioyning vnto it yeelded preſently; but they in the caſtle ſtanding a while vpon their guard, offered at laſt to yeeld alſo vpon certaine conditions. But the Raſcians knowing that the Turkes thereabouts had conueied into the caſtle the beſt part of their wealth, and withall that it was but weakely manned, would accept of no conditions, but needs haue it abſolutely deliuered vp to their pleaſure. In the mean time the old Baſſa of Temeſwar and his ſonne, knowing it to tend to their diſhonour to ſuffer this baſe people ſo to rage at their pleaſure about them, gathered together 11000 Turkes, and ſo in great haſte came to relieue the beſieged caſtle. Vpon whom the Raſcians turned themſelues, and in plaine battell ouerthrew the Baſſa, and ſo purſued the victorie, that of thoſe 11000 Turkes ſcarcely K eſcaped 1000: the Baſſa himſelfe being there ſlaine, and with him three Sanzacks, his ſonne eſcaped by flight. In this battell the Raſcians tooke 18 great pieces of artillerie: and not long after tooke alſo Werſetza and Lutz, two ſtrong places. After which ſo happie ſucceſſe, they ſent vnto the Archduke Matthias for aid, but eſpecially for canoniers, profeſſing themſelues now vtter enemies vnto the Turkes. The Raſcians alſo about Temeſwar ſent word vnto the other in the campe, that they would come and ioyne with them. And they which inhabit the countrey betweene the riuer Danubius and Tibiſcus, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe vnto the Lord Teuffenbach (the Archdukes Lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungarie) offered in ſhort time to ſend him ten or twelue thouſand men, ſo that hee would receiue them and their countrie into the Emperors protection; which he eaſily granted them, and thereof aſſured them by L writing. And to the Archduke himſelfe they ſent alſo their truſtie meſſengers, requeſting him to ſend them a Generall to lead them, promiſing vnto him all obedience: which meſſengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, ſhortly after returned with ſuch anſwer as was thought moſt conuenient for their preſent ſtate. Thus againſt the comming of Sinan, was Hungarie almoſt all on a broile.

A diet of the empire holden at Ratisbone for the withſtanding of the Turkes.

The Emperor long before diſtruſting the Turks purpoſe for war, and wel conſidering what a difficultie it would be for him with his owne forces onely to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy as was Amurath, had by his Embaſſadors praied aid of diuers Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of them of the Empire, as thoſe whom this war concerned moſt. Wherefore he after the anti- M ent and woonted manner of his State in ſo common and imminent a danger, appointed a generall aſſembly of the Princes and States of the Empire, to be holden at Ratisbone, in the latter end of Februarie: which for ſundrie vrgent cauſes was put off vntill March, and againe vntill Aprill, and ſo afterward vntill May. At which time the Emperour in perſon himſelfe, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the Empire, being met together with great pompe

The Emperour grieuouſly complaineth vnto the Princes Electors & ſtates of the Empire, of the infidelity of the Turke, & craueth their aid.

A pompe at Ratisbone,and ſolemnely aſſembled in the Biſhops palace,began there to ſit in counſell the ſecond of Iune. Vnto which Princes and States ſo aſſembled, after that the Emperour had firſt by the mouth of Philip Countie Palatine of the Rhine, giuen great thanks for their ſo readie apparance, & briefly declared the cauſe of their aſſembly; he himſelfe after ſome complaint made of the Turkiſh infidelitie,in expreſſe words declared vnto them, how that he by his embaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople, had in the yeare 1591 made a league for eight yeares,with the preſent Turkiſh Sultan Amurath: which league Amurath himſelfe had approued and confirmed,and thereof ſent him publike and ſolemne inſtruments: wherein it was prouided,That no hoſtility ſhould be on either ſide during that time attempted. And yet notwithſtanding that,he,contrary to his faith giuen,as an hereditarie enemie of the Chriſtians,had vio-B lated this league,and by ſundrie incurſions barbarouſly ſpoiled and waſted,not Hungary only, but other of his Imperial prouinces alſo:but eſpecially by Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna,who firſt with a ſtrong armie beſieged,battered,and tooke Repitz an antient frontier caſtle, & after that, Wi-hitz,Drenik, Craſſowitz,with other places of name; and had in his dominion and territorie built Pettinia,a moſt ſtrong fort,hurtfull to all that country, out of which he had done incredible miſchiefe in Croatia, Windiſmarch,and the moſt fruitfull Iſland Turopolis; and had out of thoſe places carried away aboue 35000 Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuity. Of which ſhameful iniuries and breach of faith he had many times by his Embaſſadors complained vnto the Turkiſh Sultan at Conſtantinople; and requeſted,that all hoſtility ſet apart,due reſtitution might haue bin made: but to haue therein preuailed nothing: and that the ſame Baſſa in ſtead of C condigne puniſhment,had bin for the doing thereof honored by the great Sultan his lord with honorable gifts,the ſure tokens of his fauor. Whereby he was ſo confirmed in his barbarous proceedings,that he began to make open war,and hauing raiſed a full armie, and ſtrengthened alſo with certaine companies of Ianizaries ſent from the Court, had paſſed ouer the riuer of Kulp,and beſieged the caſtle of Siſeg: but by the iuſt iudgement of God the reuenger of wrongs, had there receiued the reward of his faithleſſe and cruell dealing, being there ſlaine, and almoſt all his armie vtterly deſtroyed by his ſmall forces, raiſed in haſte for his owne law-full defence. Neuertheleſſe the faithleſſe Turke (as if he had bin highly wronged himſelfe) to haue made this his breach both of league and faith forthwith knowne to all the world, by D commanding open war to be ſolemnly proclaimed againſt the kingdome of Hungarie, both in Conſtantinople and Buda: and by the Beglerbeg of Græce to haue againe beſieged and taken the ſtrong Fortreſſe of Siſeg. Whereas on the other ſide, becauſe nothing ſhould on his part be wanting, which might make his deſire of peace more knowne, he had againe, and oftentimes by his Embaſſador put the Turke in remembrance of his league made,and confirmed by his Faith. Who for all that had changed nothing of his purpoſe, but ſent his great Viſier Si-nan Baſſa, with the Beglerbeg of Grecia and many inferiour Baſſa's and Sanzackes into Hungarie, who with fire and ſword enforced the Inhabitants and countrey people (ſuch as they left aliue) to ſweare to the Turke obedience, and to become his ſubiects: and at the ſame time tooke Veſprinium and Palotta two famous fortreſſes of that Kingdome. And that the ſame Baſſa by commaundement from his Lord and Maſter, had contrarie to the Law of Nations, imprisoned Fredericke Kreckowitz his Embaſſadour, firſt at Conſtantinople, and cauſed the E greater part of his Followers to be thruſt into the gallies; and afterwards to haue ſent him with a few of his ſeruants to Belgrade, and there to haue kept him ſo long in priſon, that he there miſerably died. In reuenge of which ſo great and open wrong, and for the defence and comfort of his afflicted ſubiects ſo neere the Enemie, he had raiſed a good ſtrength both of horſe and foot; by whoſe helpe and the aſſiſtance of Almightie God, the Baſſa of Boſna had reaped the fruit of his perfideous dealing: as had alſo the Baſſa of Buda, with many thou-ſands of their great ſouldiers,ouerthrowne neere vnto Alba-Regalis, beſides many of their Caſtles and Townes taken or raſed. Yet for all that, was it eaſie to be ſeene, theſe ſo great victories by the goodneſſe of God had and obtained againſt ſo mightie and cruell an enemie, not to ſuffice; but that there was ſtill need of a perſeuerant and continuall ſupplie for the maintenance of a perpetuall warre; and that it was dayly to be expected, or rather euen now preſently to be deſcried, That the Turke in his quarrell (which hee deemeth alwaies iuſt againſt the Chriſtians) and in reuenge of theſe ouerthrowes,would draw forth all his forces, and aduenture his whole ſtrength. For which cauſes hee had by the knowledge and con-ſent of the Princes Electors of the ſacred Empire, appointed that preſent Diet of the Empire; G and not for the aforeſaid cauſes only, but for diuers others both neceſſarie and weightie, alſo: as the general peace of the empire, the pacification of the Low-countries, the reformation of juſtice, and amendment of the coine: but eſpecially & aboue all other things, to make it known vnto the world, how much it concerned to haue the Turks pride betime abated, and ſome effectual defence for Hungarie (now in danger) at length prouided; being the moſt ſure defence and ſtrongeſt bulwarke of that part of Chriſtendome. And that whereas his owne hereditarie prouinces were not of themſelues alone ſufficient to maintaine ſo chargeable a war, he therfore requeſted the Electors, Princes, and States both preſent and abſent, not to grudge to be preſent with their helpe, their counſell, and whatſoeuer els ſhould be needfull againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an enemie. So ending his ſpeech, he cauſed all his demands before conceiued into writing, to be read, and ſo deliuered vnto them. For anſwer whereunto the Princes Electors H and others there preſent required time. Which granted, after many ſittings and long conſultations they at laſt with one conſent anſwered, That it was a hard matter, by reaſon of the late dearth and other like occaſions, for them to grant ſuch helpe and aid as the Emperour had in writing required: yet hauing before their eyes the great and imminent danger wherin the Chriſtian commonweale then ſtood, they not regarding their owne proper and neere difficulties, had in regard of his ſacred and Imperial Majeſtie, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Chriſtians, and for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh furie, of their owne free will and meere compaſſion, granted beſide their accuſtomed contribution, ſuch further reliefe for the ſpace of ſix yeares, as they thought ſufficient for the maintenance of a defenſiue war, both for the preſent and for the time to come. What was by them further decreed concerning the Emperors I other demands, as not pertinent to our purpoſe, we willingly paſſe ouer.

Sinan Baſſa with an army of 150000 betweene Buda & Alba-Regalis.

Of all theſe things, as alſo whatſoeuer els had hapned at Strigonium, Hatwan, or other places of Hungarie, was not Sinan Baſſa ignorant: who now euen vpon the departure of the Chriſtians from Strigonium, was come with an huge armie betweene Buda and Alba-Regalis: vnto whom fortie thouſand Tartars, that by force had made themſelues way thorow Podolia and the vpper part of Hungarie, had joined themſelues: ſo that in his armie were reckoned aboue 150000 fighting men; to the great terror not only of Hungarie, Auſtria, Stiria, Croatia, Bohemia, and the prouinces thereabout, but alſo of the whole State of Germanie. With this great armie the old Baſſa had purpoſed to haue ouerwhelmed the Chriſtians in their campe at K Strigonium: but now that they were before his comming departed ouer the riuer towards Comara, he reſolued to keepe on his way, and to beſiege the ſtrong citie Iaurinum, now called Rab. And to make all ſure before him, he thought it beſt to take in his way Dotis, a ſtrong towne of the Chriſtians in the mid way betweene Strigonium and Rab, about fiue Hungarian miles ſhort of Rab. The Chriſtian armie but newly paſſed ouer Danubius, in marching toward Comara, might ſee the mountaines and fields on the other ſide of the riuer all couered with the multitude of the Turks armie: who though they were indeed many, yet marching diſperſedly, made ſhew of more than in truth they were. So both armies marching in ſight the one of the other, and ſeperated only with the riuer, held on their way, the Chriſtians to Comara, where they encamped vnder the very walls of the citie, yet in ſuch ſort as that they might afar L off well deſcrie one another: and the Turks towards Dotis, where the Baſſa with all his armie encamped the 21 day of Iuly. The night following, hauing planted his batterie, he began in furious manner to batter the caſtle, the chiefe ſtrength of the towne, the Chriſtian armie looking on, but not daring at ſo great odds to releeue their diſtreſſed friends. So whileſt the Baſſa granteth no breathing while vnto the beſieged, but tyring them out with continuall batterie and alarmes, they of the towne diſpairing of their owne ſtrength, and to be able for any long time to hold out againſt ſo mightie an enemie, within three dayes after yeelded vp the towne, being in that ſhort time ſore battered, and in diuers places vndermined: yet with this condition, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſouldiers and towneſmen with their wiues and children, in ſafetie to depart. Which was vnto them by the Baſſa franckly granted, but not ſo faithfully performed: for at their departure many of their wiues and children were ſtayed by the Turks, and the Lord Baxi gouernor of the towne foulely entreated. Immediatly after, the Baſſa without much ado tooke the caſtle of S. Martins alſo, not far from Dotis, being by the Captaine yeelded vnto him.

Dotis and S. Martins yeelded vnto the Turkes.

A In the meane time the country villages round about forſaken of the poore Chriſtians, were by the Turks moſt miſerably burnt, and all the countrey layd waſte. Yea ſome of the forerunners of the Turks armie paſſing ouer the riuer Rabnitz, ran into the country as far as Altenburg within fiue miles of Vienna, burning the country villages as they went, and killing the poore people, or that worſe was, carrying them away into perpetual captiuitie: yet not without ſome loſſe, foure hundred of theſe roaming foreiners being cut off by the Lord Naduſti. Palſi alſo, and Brun gouernor of Comara, following in the taile of the Turkes armie, ſet vpon them that had the charge of the victuals, of whom they ſlew a great number, tooke 120 of them priſoners, and 150 camels, and thirtie mules laded with meale and rice; which they carried away with them to Comara.

B Dotis and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Baſſa conſtant in his former determination, ſet forward againe towards Rab, and being come within a mile of the citie, there encamped; the Chriſtian armie then lying not far off on the other ſide of the riuer. The citie of Rab is a ſtrong & populous citie, honored with a Biſhops See, and was worthily accounted the ſtrongeſt bulwarke of Vienna, from whence it is diſtant about twelue Germane miles; ſtanding vpon the South ſide of Danubius, whence the riuer diuiding it ſelfe, maketh a moſt fertile Iſland called Schut; in the Eaſt point whereof ſtandeth the ſtrong citie of Comara. The defence of this citie of Rab was committed to Countie Hardeck, a man of greater courage than fidelitie, with a garriſon of twelue hundred choice ſoldiers; vnto whom a little before the comming of the Baſſa were certaine companies of Italians joined, who together with the citiſens, made vp the number of fiue thouſand able men: a ſtrength in all mens judgement ſufficient for the long defence C of that place. The laſt of Iuly, Matthias the Archduke about the going downe of the Sun departing out of the citie of Rab, ouer the riuer into the Iſland ouer againſt it, came Sinan Baſſa with his huge armie and beſet it round, caſting vp trenches and mounts, whereon he skilfully placed his gabions and great artillerie, and whatſoeuer els was neceſſarie for ſo great a ſiege: and that with ſuch celeritie as was to the beholders thought moſt ſtrange. The ſecond of Auguſt he with great furie battered the citie, and brought his trenches within musket ſhot of the walls. At which time foure thouſand Tartarian horſemen ſwam ouer the Danubius betweene Rab and Comara, after whom followed ſix thouſand Turkes, who being with much adoe got ouer to the farther ſide, ſuddenly ſurpriſed a fort of the Chriſtians next vnto the riuer, and D forthwith turning fiue great pieces of ordnance which they found therein, diſcharged them vpon the campe of the Chriſtians: who terrified with the ſudden accident, riſe vp all in arms, and hardly charging thoſe deſperat aduenturers, ſlew many of them, eſpecially ſuch as ſeeking after bootie, had diſperſed themſelues from their fellowes, and forced the reſt againe to take the water, wherein moſt of them periſhed. About fiue dayes after, the Tartarians (liuing for moſt part vpon prey) ſwam againe ouer the riuer, and vpon the ſudden burnt a village in the Iſland, and ſlew certaine Chriſtians in their tents; but being quickely encountered by the Chriſtian horſemen, they were eaſily ouerthrowne and many of them ſlaine: the reſt caſting away their weapons, and forſaking their horſes, ran headlong into the riuer, truſting more to E their ſwimming than to their fighting: whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, in the verie Riuer ſlew about 2000 of them; and by this victorie obtained many of the Tartarians ſwift horſes, with their ſcimiters, their bowes and arrowes, and ſuch enſignes as they had. All this while Sinan Baſſa without intermiſſion lay thundering with 60 great pieces of batterie againſt the citie; but to little or ſmall purpoſe, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, but the harme that was done, was vpon the towers, or high built houſes, or in the campe, by ſuch randome ſhot as flying ouer the towne, fell by chance among the tents of the Chriſtians. And the Ianizaries intentiue to all opportunities, in a great raine furiouſly and with a moſt horrible cry (as their manner is) aſſaulted an vtter bulwarke of the Chriſtians, which they for feare forſook and retired themſelues into the citie. Vpon which bulwarke ſo taken the Ianizaries had ſet vp three of their enſignes; when the Chriſtians aſhamed of that they had done, and better aduiſed, taking courage vnto them, forthwith ſallied out againe, and couragiouſly charging the Ianizaries, but now entred, ſlew many of them, and recouered againe the bulwarke.

The Tartarians the ſecond time ouerthrowne.

Rab battered.

Sinan Baſſa leauing nothing vnattempted that might further his deſire for the winning of the citie, was now caſting vp a great mount againſt the citie: which whileſt he daily ſurueyed, he chanced to fall ſick, and therefore appointed one of the Baſſa's in his own ſtead to oucrſee the worke; who whileſt he was walking too and fro haſtening the worke, and commanding this and that thing to be done, he was taken with a ſhot out of the towne and ſlaine. G

The fifteenth of Auguſt certaine Turks before the riſing of the Sun getting ouer Danubius in boats, aſſailed a fort of the Chriſtians: which the ſoldiers that had the keeping of it, preſently forſooke and left it to the enemie. Which Iohn de Medices, lately come into the campe with two thouſand Italians, perceiuing, forthwith came to the reſcue of the fort, draue out the Turks, and hauing ſlaine diuers of them, forced the reſt into the riuer, where they were all drowned. At which time fiue thouſand Tartars in another place paſſing ouer the riuer into the Iſland, were encountered by the Lord Palſi and the Huſſars his followers, and without any great reſiſtance put to flight, wherein many of them were ſlaine: the reſt taking the riuer, were in good hope to haue got ouer, and ſo to haue ſaued themſelues: but other Turkes meeting them in the riuer, would with their weapons haue beaten them backe and ſtayed their flight: H against whom the Tartars oppoſing themſelues, made with them in the very riuer a moſt cruel fight, but with ſuch loſſe vnto the Tartars, that of the fiue thouſand which adventured ouer, few returned to carrie newes vnto their fellowes, how they had ſped. Now began great ſcarcitie of victuals in the Turks campe, ſo that the ſouldiers were faine to feed vpon vnripe fruit, and ſuch other vnwholeſome things; whereof enſued the bloudie flix and many other dangerous diſeaſes; which raging amongſt them, did wonderfully conſume the Baſſa's army. Beſide that, they of the citie with continual ſhot had ſlaine many, and amongſt them a ſon in law of the great Baſſa's, whoſe death he is reported to haue taken ſo vnpatiently, that he fell ſicke for griefe, but in ſhort time after paſſed it ouer and recouered againe.

A fight in the River betwixt the Turks and the Tartars.

The Tartars not yet warned by their often loſſes, but paſſing againe ouer the riuer into the I Iſland the 19 of this moneth, were there 3000 of them ſlaine. In the meane time certain companies alſo of the Turks hauing ſecretly paſſed the riuer, in another quarter aſſailed the Chriſtians in their camp: in which hurly-burly other of the Tartars got ouer the riuer not far from Comara, hoping now at length to performe ſome great matter, which they had before to their coſt vainly attempted. But finding the Turks ouerthrowne before their comming, & the Chriſtians (contrarie to their expectation) in armes readie to receiue them, they were eaſily diſcomfited, and two thouſand of them ſlaine. In this conflict the Sanzacke of Strigonium, with two others, and many moe of great account among the Turks, periſhed. Shortly after, the Chriſtians ſallying out of the citie, ſlew a great number of the Turkes, and ſo retyred with ſmall K loſſe. Thus was the Turks armie dayly diminiſhed, beſides that the want of victuals with the bloudie flix ſo increaſed, that many perſuaded the Baſſa to haue raiſed his ſiege, and to haue remoued with his armie to ſome other more wholeſome place and of greater plentie: but he reſolutely ſet down not to depart before he had either woon the towne, or enforced them therein to yeeld, would not hearken to any perſuaſions to the contrarie.

Whileſt Sinan thus lay at the ſiege of Rab, Maximilian the Emperors brother tooke Craſtowitz a fortreſſe of the Turks vpon the borders of Croatia, and put to ſword all the Turkes there in garriſon. After that, he laid ſiege to Petrinia, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Turks, which they but a few yeares before had contrarie to the league built in the Emperors territorie, for the annoying of Croatia, and for the exceeding ſtrength thereof was thought almoſt impregnable. L Yet ſuch was the induſtrie of Maximilian and his ſouldiers, that what with continual batterie and mines, they ſo terrified the Turks there in garriſon, that they for feare ſet fire on the fort, and flying away by night, made ſhift euery man for himſelfe as he might. Which they in the caſtle of Siſeg hearing, ſet fire alſo vpon it, and ſo left it to the Chriſtians. Whoſe example they alſo of Gara followed: by which ſo proſperous and happie ſucceſſe of Maximilian, not the frontiers only, but euen the whole country of Croatia was for that time deliuered of a wonderfull trouble and no leſſe danger.

A great skirmiſh betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

The eight and twentieth day of Auguſt twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians paſſing ouer the riuer by a bridge out of the Iſland, and ioyning with them of the Towne, ſallied out vpon the Turks camp. The Hungarian Heidons in the foreward at the firſt onſet tooke two of the Turks M bulwarks; and hauing beaten out the enemies, cloyed certaine of their great pieces: but the Turks returning with greater power, enforced the Chriſtians to retire, & recouered againe their loſt bulwarkes. In this conflict many were ſlaine, as well Chriſtians as Turkes. In the meane while Thonhanſe a great captain of the Chriſtians, and Geitzhofler, Countie Hardeck his lieutenant, A nant, with 1500 Hungarians and German foot came in great boats to haue holpen their fellowes, but landing ſomewhat too late, they were by the enemie beaten backe, and enforced with ſuch ſpeed to retire, that many of them being not able to recouer the boats, were drowned in the riuer, amongſt whom Geitzhoſler himſelfe periſhed, and Thonhauſe was deadly wounded in his breſt. Yet the Chriſtians not diſcouraged with this loſſe, but gathering themſelues together vnder the very walls of the citie, gaue a ſecond aſſault vnto the enemie. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horſmen eaſily repulſed; but by the comming in of the Lord Rhinsberg (who was at the firſt onſet ſlaine) the Turks were enforced into their trenches, except ſome few, which diuided from the reſt, hid themſelues in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Chriſtians, were there all ſlaine. In this skirmiſh the Lord B Palſi was grieuouſly wounded in his thigh. Of the Chriſtians were ſlaine 400, and of the Turks about 2000. Theſe conflicts endured from ſeuen a clocke in the morning, vntil twelue, at which time the Chriſtians returning into the citie, and ſo into the campe, amongſt other ſpoiles, carried away with them ſeuenteene of the enemies enſignes.

Two thouſand Turks ſlain, & 17 of their Enſignes taken.

No day now paſſing without ſome skirmiſh, at length the ninth of September 10000 Turks, ſome in boats, ſome by other meanes, hauing got ouer the riuer of Danubius into the Iſland of Schut, ſuddenly ſet vp the Chriſtians, all ſleeping in ſecuritie, and little fearing any ſuch danger: of whome they ſlew about two thouſand, and after ſome ſmall fight put the reſt to moſt ſhamefull flight, in ſuch ſort, that Matthias the Archduke himſelfe with the other noblemen and captaines had much ado by flight to eſcape. Thus whileſt euery man ſurpriſed with feare, C made what ſhift he could for himſelfe; the enemie in the mean time entred the trenches, took their tents, their great ordnance, the ſhot and pouder, and all the mony which but a little before was brought for the ſoldiers pay; beſides about a thouſand waggons and two hundred boats well loaded with prouiſion for the campe, and ten gallies, wherein were an hundred and twentie pieces of great ordnance. The loſſe receiued this day was valued at 500000 duckets. And albeit that this victorie coſt the Turks two thouſand and fiue hundred of their liues, yet thereby they gained the maſterie both vpon the riuer and the land, ſo that now roming far & neere without reſiſtance, they ſpoiled the countrey all about, and burnt certaine countrey villages not far from Vienna: ſo that for many miles ſpace the countrey townes were for feare of the D enemie forſaken by the inhabitants; of whom ſome were taken and ſlaine, ſome carried into captiuitie, and ſome others (reſerued to a better fortune) with ſuch things as they had, got themſelues farther off into places of more ſecuritie. And the more to encreaſe theſe calamities, the Tartars ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius neere vnto Altenburg, firſt ſacked Weiſenburg, and after burnt it, with certaine towns thereabout: but aduenturing to haue gone farther into the countrey, they were with loſſe enforced to returne.

A great ſpoile taken by the Turks.

Whileſt the Turkes thus preuaile in Hungary, Cicala Baſſa the Turkes Admirall then at ſea with a fleet of gallies, landing his men in diuers places of Italie, did exceeding much harm, but eſpecially in Calabria, where he vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Rhegium, rifled the towne, and afterwards burnt it. From thence taking his courſe towards Sicilia, hee in the ſight of Meſſana landed certaine of his men; who aduenturing too far aſhore, were by the country people ouerthrowne and put to flight. So the Turks returning againe to Rhegium, vtterly raſed what they E had before left of that towne. In the mean time not far from Meſſana, euen in the ſight of the garriſon of the towne, they tooke a certaine ſhip comming out of the Eaſt countries, and three other comming from Apulia. Afterward chancing vpon certaine gallies of the Eaſt, they changed ſome few ſhot with them, but to no great purpoſe: and ſo turning their courſe, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certaine companies, which skirmiſhing with the Calabrians, had ſometime the better, and ſometime the worſe, and ſo with ſuch fortune as befell them, were againe receiued into their gallies. They of Meſſana, vnto whoſe eyes thoſe dangers were daily preſented, both by letters and ſpeedie meſſengers gaue the Viceroy knowledge thereof (who then for his pleaſure lay at Palermo) requeſting his preſent aid: but he dallying off the time, they for the more ſafegard of the citie and of the ſea coaſt, of themſelues raiſed fiue hundred horſemen, whom they committed to the leading of Philip Cicala, the renegate Turkiſh Admiralls brother; and beſide ſtored the Citie with all ſuch things as they thought neceſſarie for the enduring of a ſiege, if it ſhould chance the Turke to haue any ſuch purpoſe: of all which they certified the King of Spaine, as alſo of the negligence of the Viceroy, requeſting his ſpeedie aid againſt theſe terrors of the Turks. In the meane while the Neapolitans for ſafegard of their coaſt put to ſea 30 gallies: vnto whom the Pope, the Duke of Florence, the Genowaies, and the Knights of Malta joined alſo theirs, in all to the number of about 80 gallies, vnder the conduct of Auria. The prouident Venetians alſo, although they were as then in league with the Turke; yet for the ſafetie of their State put to ſea a fleet of about an hundred ſaile, ſome ſhips, ſome gallies, vnder the leading of Foſcarin their Admiral. Which two fleets ſailing vp and downe thoſe ſeas, deliuered Italie, Sicilie, Dalmatia, with many prouinces and Iſlands of the Chriſtians, of a great feare.

Rab aſſaulted by the Turkes.

Twelue thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

Sinan Baſſa hauing before encouraged his ſoldiers with great hope and large promiſes, commanded an aſſault to be giuen to the citie of Rab: which was accordingly by them begun the 23 of September, the Sun being as yet ſcarce vp, and furiouſly maintained all that day from morning vntil night. But they of the towne ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that at laſt the Turks were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retire. Neuertheleſſe the next day the aſſault was again renewed, & moſt deſperatly continued by the ſpace of two daies: wherein 12000 of the Turks there loſt their liues, the other with ſhame retiring themſelues into their trenches. In few days after, the Turks by a mine blew vp one of the bulwarks of the town, with the fall whereof the towne ditch was in that place ſomwhat filled: whereby the Turks with all their power attempted thrice the next day to haue entered, but were by the valour of the defendants ſtill notably with loſſe repulſed. Yet notwithſtanding all this cheerefulneſſe and couragiouſneſſe of them in the towne, the puiſſant enemy ceaſed not with continual batterie and furious aſſaults to attempt the citie, vntill that at length he had gained two of the bulwarks, from whence he might to his great aduantage, by the rubbiſh and earth fallen out of the battered bulwarks and rampiers, haue acceſſe vnto the towne, to the great terror of the defendants. Whereupon Countie Hardeck the gouernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpoſe many times before ſaid that the towne could not poſſibly be long defended) now tooke occaſion to enter into counſel with the other captains of the towne (diuers of whom he had alreadie framed to his purpoſe) what courſe were beſt to take for the yeelding of it vp. And ſo after a little conſultation, holden more for faſhion ſake, than for that he doubted what to doe; reſolued to ſend a meſſenger vnto the Baſſa, for a truce to be granted for a while, to ſee if haply in the meane time ſome reaſonable compoſition might be agreed vpon. Yet the gouernor conſidering into what ſcorne and danger he ſhould expoſe himſelfe, by yeelding vp of ſo ſtrong a towne; to colour the matter, and to excuſe his doings vnto the reſt of the nobilitie and garriſons of Hungary, cauſed a publike inſtrument to be made in his and all the reſt of the Captains names conceiued in writing: wherin they ſolemnly proteſted vnto the world, That foraſmuch as it was impoſſible (by reaſon of the weakneſſe of the garriſon) for them longer to defend the town againſt ſo mighty an enemy, without new ſupplies in ſtead of them that were ſlain (which they had oftentimes in vaine requeſted) they were therefore of neceſſity enforced to come to compoſition with the enemie. Which proteſtation ſo made, the gouernor with the chiefe captains confirmed with their hands and ſeals. So after a truce granted, and pledges giuen on both ſides, at length it was agreed vpon, That all the garriſon ſoldiers, together with the County and other captains, ſhould in armes with enſignes diſplaied with bag and baggage depart in ſafety, and with a ſafe conuoy be brought to Altenburg. Which agreement, though by oath confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed: for when the County had the 29 day of September at 10 a clocke in the forenoone deliuered vp the city to the Baſſa, and the Chriſtian garriſon was all come out, the Countie himſelfe with a few of his friends was with a conuoy of Turks brought in ſafety to the appointed place: but the Italians and other gariſon ſoldiers that came behind, and ought to haue bin by the gouernor protected, were contrarie to the Turks promiſe, ſpoiled of all that they had, and hardly eſcaping with life, came that night to Hochſtrate, and the next day to Altenburg. Thus was Rab, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarkes of Chriſtendome, traiterouſly deliuered vnto the moſt mortal enemy of the Chriſtian religion; being euen then when it was giuen vp, victualled for a yeare, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for defence: all which prouiſion, together with the citie, fell into the hands of the faithleſſe enemy. A loſſe neuer to haue bin ſufficiently lamented, had it not bin about foure yeares after, euen as it were miraculouſly againe recouered, to the great rejoycing of all that ſide of Chriſtendome, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare.

County Hardec corrupted by the Turkes, yeeldeth the ſtrong Towne of Rab vnto Sinan Baſſa.

Sinan glad of this victorie, as the greateſt trophey of his maſters glorie ouer the Chriſtians, gaue him ſpeedie knowledge thereof, both by letters and meſſengers. Of whom he was for that good ſeruice highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath alreadie in hope deuoured all Auſtria, with the Prouinces thereabout. The great Baſſa, becauſe hee would not with too long ſtay hinder the courſe of his victorie, without delay repaired the rent citie, new fortified the battered bulwarkes, enlarged the ditches, and filled the Cathedral church with earth, in maner of a ſtrong bulwarke, wherupon he planted great ſtore of great ordnance: and with exceeding ſpeed diſpatched all things neceſſary for the holding of the place. In the meane time he ſent certaine Tartars to ſummon the towne and caſtle of Pappa; which caſtle and little towne ſubiect thereunto, the Chriſtians the night following, ſet on fire, becauſe it ſhould not ſtand the enemy in any ſtead for the farther troubling of the countrey, and ſo fled.

Rab repaired by the Turks.

The Baſſa hauing at his pleaſure diſpoſed of al things in Rab, and leauing there foure thouſand Ianizaries, and two thouſand horſemen in garriſon, departed thence with his army & laid ſiege to Komara, a ſtrong towne of that moſt fertile Iſland which the Hungarians call Schut, which ſcituated in the very point therof about foure miles from Rab, is on the Eaſt, South, and North, incloſed with the two armes of Danubius. All theſe waies Sinan with his fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laied hard ſiege vnto the towne, and gaue thereunto diuers aſſaults: and by land, the Beglerbeg of Græce ceaſed not both by continuall batterie and mines, to ſhake the wals and bulwarks thereof. Thus was the citie on all ſides both by water & by land hardly laied vnto. But the Chriſtians within, with no leſſe courage defended themſelues and the city, than did the Turks aſſaile them, ſhewing indeed, that the liberty of their religion and country, was vnto them dearer than their liues. Matthias the Archduke in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperor his brother to haue this city defended, hauing after his late ouerthrow gathered together a good army of Germans, Bohemians, and Hungarians, reſolued to go and raiſe the ſiege: and ſo marching forward with his army, came and encamped the 28 day of October at Nitria, about fiue miles from Komara. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the camp, with purpoſe to returne home: yea the Turks themſelues wearie of the ſiege, and wanting victuall both for themſelues and their horſes, began alſo as men diſcouraged to ſhrinke away. Which the Baſſa wel conſidering, thought it not beſt with his heartleſſe ſouldiers and army now ſore weakened, to abide the comming of the Chriſtians: and therfore vpon their approch he forthwith forſooke the city, which he had by the ſpace of three weeks hardly beſieged, and by a bridge made of boats tranſported his army and artillerie ouer Danubius to Dotis, where he the next day after brake vp his army. Immediatly after the Turkes were thus departed, the Archduke arriued at Komara, where he with great diligence cauſed the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled vp, & new bulwarks and rampiers to be made in diuers places for the more ſtrength of the citie, leauing the charge thereof ſtill vnto the lord Braun the old Gouernor, who in the defence therof had receiued a grieuous wound in his right knee: of whom alſo this notable fact is reported. The Baſſa in time of the late ſiege of Komara, vnder the color of a parley, had ſent fiue Turks into the city, to the Gouernor, but indeed to proue if he were by any means to be woon to yeeld vp the citie, and not to hold it out to the laſt. The faithfull Gouernor, hauing giuen them the hearing vntil they had diſcharged their whole trecherie, preſently cauſed foure of their heads to be ſtrucken off, and to be ſet vpon long pikes vpon one of the bulwarkes for the Baſſa to looke vpon; but the fift (the beholder of this tragedie) he ſent backe vnto the Baſſa, to tell him, That although hee had found one in Rab to ſerue his turne, he was much deceiued, if in him hee thought to finde Countie Hardeck; and that he wiſhed rather to die the Emperors faithfull ſeruant in the bloud of the Turks, than to betray the city committed to his charge.

Komara beſieged by Sinan Baſſa.

Sinan Baſſa raiſeth his ſiege

Countie Hardeck late Gouernour of Rab, generally before ſuſpected to haue treacherouſly betraid that ſtrong towne vnto the Baſſa, was therefore ſent for to Vienna, & there by the Emperors commandement committed to priſon. Where among many things laid to his charge, as that hee ſhould in the beginning of the ſiege negligently haue ſuffered many things to bee done by the enemy, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the towne: and that in the time of the ſiege, he had cauſed ſome of the canoniers to diſcharge certain great pieces againſt the enemy, with pouder only without ſhot: and that ſeeing one piece among the reſt to do the enemie much harme, he had cauſed the ſame to be remoued, and ſo placed, as that it ſerued to little or no vſe: beſide that, he (as it ſhould ſeem) making ſmall reckoning of the towne, should G oftentimes ſay, That if the Turkes ſhould win it, he ſhould be but one towne the richer: with diuers other ſuch things, giuing iuſt cauſe of ſuſpition. The thing that lay moſt heauy vpon him, was the teſtimony of one of Sinan Baſſa his chamber, who being taken yong by the Turks, and ſeruing in the Baſſaes chamber, was now fled from the Turks, and comming to the Archduke in the time of his ſiege, declared vnto him, that there was treaſon in his campe: and that he but three daies before by the commandement of his maſter, had deliuered two bags full of duckats vnto two Chriſtians, of whom the one had a notable ſcarre in his face, and was afterwards knowne to haue bin one of the Counties ſeruants. Vpon this and ſuch like proofes, the Countie was after many daies hearing, in open court, by the iudgement of ſeuen and forty noblemen and captains of name, condemned of treaſon, and adiudged to be hanged, his dead body H to remaine vpon the gallowes by the ſpace of three daies, and all his lands and goods to be confiſcat: the rigor of which ſentence was afterward by the Emperor mitigated, and the traitor by him adiudged to haue his right hand (by him before giuen vnto the Emperor, in pawne of his faith) and his head ſtrucke off vpon a ſcaffold at Vienna, and ſo buried. Which ſeuere ſentence was afterwards accordingly put in execution: for the tenth of Iune following, the traitor being brought to the ſcaffold built of purpoſe in the hie ſtreet of Vienna, after the ſentence of his condemnation there ſolemnly read, commending himſelfe vpon his knees to the mercy of God, with his eies couered, and his right hand laied vpon a blocke couered with blacke, had both his hand & head ſo ſuddenly ſtrucke off by the executioners, as that the beholders could hardly iudge which of them was firſt off. His dead body with his head and hand, was preſently I by his ſeruant wrapped in a blacke cloth, and layed in his coach, which ſtood there by of purpoſe couered with blacke, and was afterwards buried amongſt his anceſtors.

County Hardeck condemned & executed for betraying of Rab.

The Tartars but lately before departed from Sinans campe, paſſing ouer Danubius at Strigonium, had purpoſed through the vpper part of Hungarie, and by the borders of Tranſyluania and Moldauia, to haue againe returned into their country: of whom two companies falling into the hands of the lord Palfi, were by him cut off and vtterly defeated: the reſt comming vnto the borders of Tranſyluania, and finding the paſſages ſo beſet by the Prince and the Vaynod of Valachia, as that they could not without moſt manifeſt danger paſſe that way, returned againe the ſame way they came: and hauing rifled and burnt certaine townes and villages K in the vpper Hungarie about Tockaie, paſſed the riuer againe at Strigonium, and wintering at Veſprinium, Palotta, and other places in the Countrey which is about Rab, liued vpon the ſpoyle of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, vpon the frontiers of Auſtria, euen as farre as Meinerſdorf.

Theſe Tartars (of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) at their firſt comming to the aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkiſh Sultan, ſtaied vpon the frontiers of Tranſyluania, of purpoſe to haue ſurpriſed that country, and either to haue thruſt Sigiſmund Bator the yong prince out of the gouernment thereof, or elſe to haue ſent him in bonds to Conſtantinople: for it was commonly reported, That he wearie of the heauie tribute which he yerely payed vnto the Turke, and had now after their greedie manner been diuers times enhaunſed; had purpoſed to L reuolt from the Turkiſh Sultan, and to enter into confederation with the Chriſtian Emperor. Which innouation and change, certaine of the Nobilitie and chiefe States of Tranſyluania, ſought by all means to hinder: and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entring into conſpiracie with the Tartars, vndertooke to deliuer the whole country into their hands, & to ſend the Prince priſoner to Huſt, where the Tartars then lay vpon the borders encamped. Wherefore diſſembling their purpoſe, they cunningly perſuaded the Prince, that Samoſche the great Chancellor of Polonia, in the confines of his countrey lay with a great power expecting his comming, to conſult with him of matters of great importance. And the better to colour this their trecherie, they had counterfeited letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought ſo effectually, that the Prince not ſuſpecting any ſuch treaſon, gaue credit to M their perſuaſions, & ſo put himſelf vpon his way towards the Chancellor (as he ſuppoſed:) but by the way, he was aduiſed by ſome of his friends which had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter, not to goe any farther, for that his comming was not entended by the Polonians his friends, (as he was perſuaded) but by the Tartars his enemies, who lay in wait for him at Huſt, to be-

A reaue him of his life and gouernment. The Prince aſtonied with the nouelty of the matter, liſtned vnto their perſuaſion, and retired with his traine to the ſtrong fort of Kehwere; where he ſtayed foureteene daies, as if it had been onely for feare of the Tartars. In the meane time, hee gaue notice to the Nobility and Gouernours of the countrey, his friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitours proceeding in their purpoſe, ceaſed not to perſuade Bornemiſſa, who had the leading of the Princes army, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no ſmall danger: and that therefore if he wiſhed wel to his country, he ſhould not haue to do with them, but onely ſhew himſelfe neere vnto them, and that he was not vnprouided for them: which was accordingly done, and the Tranſyluanian armie brought ſo nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noiſe of their drums B and trumpets. Whereby the Tartars as by the watchword, perceiuing themſelues diſcouered, and nothing to fall out according to their expectation, as had bin vnto them promiſed for the betraying of the Prince; they remooued thence, and by another way breaking through the midſt of Tranſyluania, and ſo into Hungarie, rifled and burnt fiue hundred villages, ſlew al the males that were aboue twelue yeares of age, and carried away the reſt vnto the Turkiſh army then lying at the ſiege of Rab. In the mean time the traitors (when as this firſt plot ſerued them not) conſpired to ſet vp one Balthazar Bator, the yong Princes nigh kinſman, and with the good fauour of Amurath to preferre him to the ſoueraigne gouernment of their countrey. Which their purpoſe the Prince perceiuing, and doubting altogether to truſt vnto the fidelitie of his owne ſubiects, writ to his neighbors the Raſcians, and other his confederats, praying their aid C in this his ſo dangerous and doubtfull eſtate. Which after he had receiued, he appointed a generall aſſembly of all his ſtates to be holden at Clauſenburg, and that vpon a great paine to be inflicted vpon all ſuch as ſhould not there perſonally appeare: ſo at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinall Bator and Stephen his brother, who guilty of ſo foule a treaſon againſt their owne bloud, were now before fled into Polonia. Being all thus met together, the Prince commanded the gates of the citie to be ſhut, and diligent watch and ward to be kept, forbidding by open proclamation, That any man vpon pain of death ſhould ſo much as ſpeake of any imagined treaſon. And at the ſame time politickly cauſed to be publiſhed in writing, how that the Germans had in the farther ſide of Hungarie got a notable victory ouer the Turks, for ioy whereof he commanded bonefires to be made, and the great ordnance to be in triumph ſhot D off, with many other ſignes of ioy and gladneſſe: and withall cauſed a notable banquet to bee prepared, whereunto together with others, were inuited alſo all the chief of the conſpirators: of whom, euen as they were at dinner & leaſt feared any ſuch matter, he commanded fourteen to be apprehended and committed to priſon, and the next morning cauſed fiue of them to be executed in the open market place. The principal of whom, who had vndertaken to haue himſelfe ſlain the Prince, after three or foure light cuts in the necke, he cauſed to be drawne in pieces with foure horſes: the other foure, namely Alexander, and Gabriel Gengi, Gregorie Diaco, & Ladiſlaus Sallentz were beheaded, and their dead bodies al that day left in the market place for the people to behold: the reſt were alſo afterwards worthily executed; and Balthazar Bator, E whom the conſpirators had intended to haue exalted, ſtrangled. Hauing thus reuenged himſelfe vpon his enemies, he by a publicke edict divulged through all his dominion, gaue leaue to all his ſubiects in general, of their owne charge to take vp armes againſt the Turks, & whatſoeuer they could take from them, to haue it to themſelues, as good priſe gotten from their lawfull enemies. By which vnwonted libertie, the Tranſyluanians encouraged as with a great bounty, armed themſelues on all hands, to the number of forty thouſand, who being muſtered and ſworne to hold together againſt the Turks, made their firſt expedition towards Danubius: where at their firſt arriual, by good hap they light vpon certain of the Turks ſhips laded with prouiſion for the campe, and merchandiſe of all ſorts, and much treaſure: of which rich ſhips, they at the firſt onſet tooke ſeuen, but the eighth (beeing indeed the Admirall) eſcaped their hands. In theſe ſhips they tooke an exceeding rich bootie, ſlew many of the Turks, and in token of the victorie, carried backe vnto the Prince ſeuen of the Turkiſh enſignes. This victorie cauſed great ioy in Tranſyluania, euery man of ſo proſperous a beginning, conceiuing good hope of moſt happie ſucceſſe. It is reported, that Sinan Baſſa hearing of this loſſe, ſhould ſay, That if this prouiſion had come to him in ſafety, he could with that treaſure more eaſily haue bought Vienna in Auſtria, than he had Rab in Hungary. After this victory the prince laid ſiege to Temeſwar, but hearing of the returne of the Tartars from the Turks campe, and that they were comming toward Tranſyluania (as is before ſaid) he left Temeſwar, to looke to the defence of his owne countrey. G

Not long after, about the two and twentieth of December a tumult riſe among the Ianizaries of the court at Conſtantinople, which grew to ſuch an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Baſſaes was by them ſlain, with ſome others of good account, and one of Amuraths ſons ſore wounded, and with much adoe ſaued. Vpon conceit whereof, Amurath for anger & griefe fell into a fit of the falling ſickneſſe (whereunto hee was much ſubiect) and was therewith for the ſpace of three daies and three nights ſo grieuouſly vexed, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen vp the ghoſt: ſo that the citie was filled with heauineſſe and feare, and the great men of the Court were euen ready to thinke vpon a new Lord. This tumult of the inſolent Ianizaries many ſuppoſed to haue been the cauſe of Amurath his death, which ſhortly after enſued: his griefe and maladie encreaſing daily by the euill news ſtill brought vnto him both by meſſengers & letters, eſpecially out of Tranſyluania, where the Prince waiting vpon euery occaſion, was ſtill at hand with the Turks, cutting them ſhort in euery place; and in ſundrie rodes which he made vpon them this moneth, tooke many of their caſtles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in diuers places three armies: one vnder the conduct of Geſty Ferens, in the country of Lugaz, neere vnto Temeſwar: another vnder the leading of Michael Horwat, on the ſide of Danubius, to intercept the Turks comming to Buda: and the third commanded by Caſpar Corneyſe in the countrie neere to Giula, vnto whom came ſhortly after fifteene hundred horſemen out of the vpper Hungarie. 1595

The Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund Bator thus lately reuolted from the Turke, for the ſtrengthning of his ſtate thought it beſt betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of Valachia and Moldauia (who moued by his example, ſhortly after in like maner alſo caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Turke) but eſpecially with the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph. For which purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors honourably accompanied: who comming to Caſſouia in Hungarie the fourteenth of December, arriued at Prague the twelfth of Ianuary, with twenty waggons, and an hundred and fiftie horſe, where they were by the Emperors appointment moſt honourably receiued and royally entertained; and after a few daies hauing deliuered vnto the Emperor the ſumme of their embaſſage, which was for a confederation to be made betweene the Emperour and the Prince: after much graue conſultation and ſerious diſcourſe it was fully concluded and agreed vpon: the chiefe points whereof I thought it not amiſſe here in briefe to ſet downe, for the ſatisfying of ſuch as deſire to know in what termes that worthy Prince next neighbour vnto the Turke then ſtood with the Chriſtian Emperour. I K

The capitulations of the league betwixt the emperor & the Tranſyluanian prince.

Firſt it was agreed vpon, That the Emperour for himſelfe and for the States of Hungarie ſhould promiſe to proceed in his wars begun againſt the common enemie, and not to conclude any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the Prince. And that in all concluſions of peace to be made betwixt him and the Turke, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, ſhould be alwayes compriſed: in regard whereof, the Prince likewiſe promiſed for himſelfe and the States of Tranſyluania, to proſecute the commenced warre, and not to enter into any league with the Turke, without the knowledge and conſent of the Emperor and the Nobilitie of Hungarie, and this to be confirmed by ſolemne oath on both ſides.

Secondly, that the Prouince of Tranſyluania with all the parts and confines thereof hitherto poſſeſſed by the Prince of Hungarie, ſhould remaine vnto the ſaid Prince Sigiſmund and to his heires male, with all the profits ariſing thereof, in ſuch ſort as they had done in the time of Iohn, Stephen, and Chriſtopher, his predeceſſours, to haue therein a moſt free and abſolute authority; yet ſo, as that they ſhould acknowledge his Imperiall Maieſtie and his lawfull ſucceſſors for their lawfull ſoueraignes; vnto whome they ſhould alwayes ſweare their fealtie, but without any homage doing: and that to bee performed by his ſucceſſours at the time of the change, but by the Prince himſelfe, preſently after the confirming of this league. But that for lacke of heires male, the countrey of Tranſyluania with all the territories thereunto annexed, ſhould diſcend vnto his ſacred Maieſty and his ſucceſſors the Kings of Hungarie, as a true and inſeparable member thereof: whereunto the Prince and all the States of Tranſyluania ſhould bind themſelues by ſolemne oath. But yet that at ſuch time as the heirs male ſhould faile in the line of the preſent Prince, and that the country of Tranſyluania ſhould according to theſe preſent conditions be deuolued to the crown of Hungarie; as well his preſent Imperiall and Royall Maieſty as his ſucceſſors, ſhould keep inuiolate the antient lawes, priuiledges, and cuſtomes of that countrey, and alwaies appoint one of the nobilitie of Tranſyluania to be Gouernour or Vayuod of the ſame, and no other ſtranger.

Thirdly, that his Maieſtie ſhould acknowledge the Prince of Tranſyluania for an abſolute Prince, and by ſpeciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Moſt excellent.

Fourthly, that his Imperial Maieſty ſhould procure one of the daughters of the late Archduke Charles his vncle, for a wife for the Prince, that as they were now to be ioyned in league, ſo they might be ioyned in affinitie alſo.

Fiftly, that the Emperor ſhould procure him to be made one of the order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixtly, that the Prince might with more cheerefulneſſe and ſecuritie make war againſt the common enemy, his imperiall and royall Maieſty ſhould not at any time, howſoeuer things fel out, forſake the ſaid Prince or any of the countries ſubiect vnto him: and euen now preſently to aid him according as the preſent occaſion required, and afterward (if greater need ſhould be) with greater help, whether it was by his Generall of Caſſouia, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both ſides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the neceſſity of the one or other part ſhould require: and that where moſt need was, thither ſhould moſt helpe be conuerted.

Seuenthly, that the ſacred Roman Empire ſhould take vpon it the protection and defence of the Prince and his territories. And that his Imperiall Maieſtie ſhould create the ſaid Prince and the Princes his ſucceſſors, Princes of the Empire: yet ſo, as that they ſhould haue neither voice nor place among the ſaid Princes.

Eightly, that whatſoeuer caſtles, townes, cities, or other places of ſtrength, ſhould by their common forces be taken or recouered from the common enemie, at ſuch time as his imperiall Maieſtie ſhould ſend into the field a ful armie, ſhould be all his Maieſties: but ſuch places as the Prince ſhould by his own forces or policie gaine from the enemie, ſhould remain vnto the Prince himſelfe. Yet that what places ſoeuer the Prince ſhould recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of Hungarie before it was taken by the Turke, thoſe he ſhould forthwith deliuer to his Maieſtie, as ſoone as reaſonable recompence were by him therefore made vnto the Prince.

Ninthly, his ſacred Maieſtie ſhould promiſe of his own bountie to giue vnto his Excellency ſufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of ſuch places as ſhould be thought neceſſarie for the behoofe of the Chriſtians: as again the ſaid Prince ſhould likewiſe promiſe not to ſpare his own cofers or forces, that the ſame places ſhould be throughly fortified and defended for the behoofe of his Maieſtie and the common good of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Laſtly, that foraſmuch as the euents of war are vncertain, and many things ſuddenly happen contrary to mens expectation, if ſuch neceſſity ſhould chance vnto his Excellencie or his ſucceſſors (which miſhap God forbid) that hauing ſpent themſelues, they ſhould not be able longer to defend their ſtate & country, but that the mighty enemy preuailing, they ſhould at laſt be enforced to forſake the ſame: in this their extremitie, his imperiall & royall Maieſty ſhould promiſe both for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors, within the ſpace of one moneth to aſſigne ſome certain place in ſome other of his dominions, where the ſaid prince & his ſucceſſors might honorably liue: and the like regard to be had alſo of other ſuch principal men, as ſhould together with the Prince aduenture their liues and liuings in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed vpon, & ſolemnly confirmed, the ſame Embaſſadors were with all kindnes, bounty, & magnificence diſmiſſed and ſent back again vnto the Prince: who was not himſelfe in the mean time idle, but labouring by all the means he could to draw vnto him Michael the Vayuod of Valachia (a man of no leſſe worth than himſelfe) and Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia, both of them then the Turks tributaries; & by them to alienat from the Turke both thoſe countries, that ſo with their combined forces they might the better defend their liberty, and withſtand their common enemy: wherein he did ſo much, and preuailed ſo farre with them both, that caſting off the Turks obeiſance, they ſhortly after to the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and no leſſe hinderance of the Turkes proceedings in Hungarie, ioyned hands both together with him for the recouery of their loſt liberty. Which reuolt of theſe bordering Princes, for that it ſo much concerned the common good, as that the ſafegard of Auſtria, and of the remnants of Hungary, with ſome good part of Germanie alſo, is euen by them that in thoſe matters ſaw much, not without cauſe ſuppoſed to haue reſted therein; & that this noble Vayuod (of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter) was the ſecond actor herein, it ſhall not be from our purpoſe to ſee the manner of his reuolt alſo from the Turke, as we haue alreadie the Tranſyluanians. For the more euidence whereof, as for the honor of the man (whileſt he liued, a moſt worthy member of the Chriſtian commonweale) we will a little ſtep backe to ſee how hee obtained of the great Turke this ſo honourable a preferment, as was the Vayuodſhip of Valachia, not without his reuolt long now to be holden.

Valachia oppreſſed by the Turkes.

Alexander the late Vayuod of Valachia, a Moldauian borne, and by Amurath himſelfe promoted to that dignitie; proud aboue meaſure of this his ſo great a preferment, as alſo of his owne nobilitie, and the deceitful fauor of Fortune ſtill fawning vpon him; not only oppreſſed his people himſelfe with intollerable impoſitions, but to be in farther fauor with the Turkes, brought into that country (too much before exhauſted) ſuch a company of them, as that they ſeemed now almoſt wholly to haue poſſeſſed the ſame, oppreſſing the poore Chriſtians (the naturall inhabitants) with new exactions, and more than tyrannicall iniuries, euen ſuch as were not elſwhere by the Turks themſelues vſed; not only breaking at their pleaſure into their houſes, and diſpoiling them of their goods, but taking tythe alſo of their children, as if it had bin of their cattell, a thing neuer before there ſeene: and for the ſatisfying of their beaſtly luſt, rauiſhing their wiues and daughters, euen in the ſight of their husbands and parents, with diuers other ſuch outragious villanies, not with modeſtie to be rehearſed. So that by this meanes he had violently taken from his Chriſtian ſubiects all hope of recouerie of their antient libertie, had it not as ſometime it falleth out in theſe worldly things both vnto men & commonweals, which brought vnto the laſt caſt, & euen as it were to the bottome of diſpaire, by the goodnes of God, contrary to all hope, find ſometime ſuch vnexpected help and reliefe, as that thereby they, beyond their hope, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, mount vp again vnto a greater luſtre of their ſtate than was that from which they before fell: it had euen ſo by the ſingular mercy of God now hapned vnto the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themſelues. There was at Crailowa (a city in the confines of Valachia towards the confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Gouernor of thoſe borders is for the defence therof with a ſtrong garriſon alwaies reſiant) a noble gentleman called * Ion Michael, ſon to Peter the Palatine of that countrie, the aforeſaid Alexander his predeceſſor: who as he was vnto the people for the honor of his father, the prerogatiue of his birth, the comelineſſe of his perſon, and talneſſe of his ſtature, well knowne; ſo was he for his zeale towards the Chriſtian religion, his loue towards his country, his kindneſſe towards his equals, his courteſie towards his inferiours, his vpright dealing, his conſtancie and bounty vnto them, no leſſe gracious; & for other the noble vertues of his heroical minde and naturall diſpoſition for the performance of great matters, his deepe wiſedome and quicke foreſight, his ſweet and pleaſing ſpeech, void of all affectation, vnto all good men moſt deare: whoſe fame, both for the honor of his houſe, & of his own vertues, ſtill more & more encreaſing, and riſe in the eares of Alexander the Vayuod, was the cauſe that he commanded him as the ready or rather naturall competitor of his ſtate and honor, to be ſecretly apprehended, and ſo taken out of the way; wherof he by good fortune hauing intelligence, and carefull of his owne health, for ſafegard of himſelfe fled firſt into Hungarie, and there not ſtaying long (God ſo directing him) went to Conſtantinople in the yeare 1591, to ſue for the Vayuod his place, all the nobilitie of his country and the Prouinces thereunto adioyning, ſecretly reioycing thereat. About which time the chiefe and moſt graue of the Valachian nobilitie and counſellors proſtraiting themſelues at the feet of Amurath, moſt grieuouſly complained vnto him of the manifold and intollerable iniuries they had already ſuſtained, and were ſtill like to endure, without hope of redreſſe, from Alexander their Vayuod, and the followers of his court, the Turks garriſons and merchants with plentifull tears orderly declaring many his moſt foule and deteſtable facts, and afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his rare vertues, as the true heire of their prouince, moſt humbly requeſted Amurath either to haue him appointed the lawful Gouernor of their country, or els ſome other place by him aſſigned for them to dwell in, wiſhing any where to liue, rather than vnder the heauie command of ſo mercileſſe a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their ſute, Michael his vncle by

the

A the mothers ſide, a Greeke borne, and a man for his exceeding wealth in great fauour in the Turks Court, ſpared for no coſt. So Michael by the goodneſſe of God was by Amurath with great ſolemnitie created Vayuod of Valachia, and the oppreſſed and almoſt forlorne ſtate of that ſometime moſt flouriſhing countrey by little and little well relieued (although not altogether without moſt ſharpe and violent remedies, ſuch as extremities oft require) began now againe to lift vp the head, and to aſpire vnto the antient libertie and honour thereof. At the beginning of whoſe happie ſoueraigntie, Alexander his predeceſſour in his owne conſcience guiltie of his euill and ſhamefull gouernment of that ſo notable and great a prouince, and now in feare to be called to account, ſecretly fled. But certaine yeares after remouing to Conſtantinople with his wife, and there attempting diuers euill meanes for the obtaining of the B Palatinat of Moldauia, and for thoſe his vnlawfull practiſes accuſed by the Palatine his Agent; he was by the commandement of Amurath taken in his owne houſe, and there in his princely apparell moſt miſerably ſtrangled vpon Palme Sunday, in the yeare 1597, about ſix yeres after his departure out of Valachia.

Michael by Amurath created Vayuod of Valachia.

Alexander ſtrangled at Conſtantinople.

Michael thus made Vayuod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortuned the reuerend Father Cornelius de Nona, ſent from Pope Clement the eighth vnto the great Duke of Muſcouie, in his returne conferring with Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince, and Aaron Palatine of Moldauia, enformed them of the great conſent of diuers zealous Chriſtian Princes, for the maintenance of the war againſt the dangerous and common Enemie; with many graue and effectuall reaſons perſuading them (but eſpecially for that they were themſelues Chriſtians) in C that Chriſtian quarrel to joine vnto them their forces alſo, raiſed in thoſe their countries neere vnto the great riuers of Danubius and Neſter; but vnto Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, hee could not for diuers his other important buſineſſes then come: whom for all that, the aforeſaid Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund his neighbour deſirouſly ſought to draw into the fellowſhip of this war, euen for the ſame reaſons almoſt wherewith he had been himſelfe mooued. Firſt, by diuers great reaſons remouing ſuch doubts as might juſtly ſeeme to hinder him from giuing thereunto his conſent; and then by declaring the Turkiſh inſolencie daily increaſing, with the infinite grieuances by them deuiſed againſt the miſerable Valachians; when as the incurſions of the Turks or Tartars, or their paſſages that way (no leſſe troubleſome, than their inrodes) was almoſt euery moneth to be feared, their armies as friends to be in Winter and D Sommer receiued, their ſouldiers to their great charges relieued, and their commanders and captaines rewarded. Valachia thus impoueriſhed, was not able (as he ſaid) to pay the great ſums it did alreadie owe, neither was to expect any releaſement of the euils it was wrapped in, much leſſe was it able to ſuffice vnto the grieuous exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards impoſed. None of his predeceſſors (as he ſaid, and as truth was) had for many yeares now paſt, for any long time, or with any ſecuritie held their ſtate or gouernment: but that either by the calumniation of the Enuious, or bribes of their ambitious competitors, brought into ſuſpition with the Sultan, they were violently thruſt out, or moſt cruelly put to death. In briefe, he ſaid it was a wiſe mans part, not without moſt manifeſt and weightie reaſons, to promiſe vnto himſelfe better fortune, or more aſſurance of his ſtate, than had his vnfortunate predeceſſors before him; but warned by their harmes, betimes to prouide for his owne ſafetie. By which perſuaſion he ſo preuailed, that the Vayuod (whoſe name, whoſe fame, whoſe wealth and life together with his ſubiects was all thereby indangered) although he would not (for the weightineſſe of the matter) at the firſt yeeld thereunto; yet aſſuredly promiſed, with his friends and the reſt of the Nobilitie of his countrey to conſider thereupon. Hauing it by the Prince plainly laid downe before him, how a ſufficient number of ſouldiers might at all times be raiſed, their pay prouided, and aid ſtill ſent him as need ſhould be, from the German Emperor, or himſelfe out of Tranſyluania: as alſo that Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia would at all times be readie to combine himſelfe vnto them; that ſo with their vnited forces they might vpon the banks of Danubius and Neſter eaſily repulſe the incurſions both of the Turkes and Tartars their enemies: the Chriſtian Emperor in the meane time with leſſe trouble proceeding in his wars againſt the Turke in the other ſide of Hungarie.

Now whileſt this plot was thus in laying, and matters too and fro debating, not altogether without the Turks ſuſpition; Sinan Baſſa comming with a great armie into Hungarie, had taken the ſtrong Towne of Rab, as is before declared: with which miſchance ſo much concerning the poore remainders of Hungarie, the Vayuod not a little moued, began more deeply to G conſider of his owne eſtate. And as he was a man of a great ſpirit, and no leſſe zeale toward his countrey, grieuing to ſee his ſubiects committed to his charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks ſtill more and more oppreſſed: he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſyluanian) called an aſſemblie of all the States of Valachia, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the remedie of ſo great euils, as alſo for the preuenting of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where by the general conſent of them all it was agreed, rather to ioine with the Emperor and the other Chriſtian Princes in confederation, as they had bin oftentimes by them requeſted, than longer to endure that heauie yoke of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauerie.

Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thouſand of the Hungarian garriſon ſouldiers, now before for that purpoſe ſecretly layd vpon the frontiers of his country; and calling vpon H the name of Chriſt Ieſus, in one day to begin withall, ſlew about two thouſand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that country proudly ſeated themſelues) with all the reſt of the Turks (in the midſt of their inſolencie) together with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open countrey. And purpoſing to driue them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a cleane riddance of them, he within fourteen dayes after ſet vpon Dziurdzowa, a great towne of the Turks vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all ſauing the caſtle, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, and loded with the ſpoyle of the Turks, returned to Buchareſta the chiefe ſeat of his Palatinat.

The Turks cal all them that are diſcended of the ſtocke of their Prophet Mahomet, by the name of Emirs, or Lords.*

But long it was not after this his ſo great preſumption, but that he perceiued the Turks in reuenge thereof to ſeek after his life: although he yet ſeemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amurath, I and to haue done that he did as enforced thereunto by the inſolencie of the Turks, & for the neceſſarie reliefe both of himſelfe and his ſubiects. For the ſame moneth (Rab being, as is aforeſaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, diſcended of the great familie and ſtock of Mahomet their falſe prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great account and place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with 2000 choſen ſouldiers, fiftie of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zauſij and Spahi, vpon the ſudden came to Buchareſta vnder the colour of refreſhing themſelues after their long trauell, but indeed with purpoſe to haue taken the Vayuod: where they without controlment committed all kind of outragious villanie; and taking vp all the chief houſes in the citie, imperiouſly demanded of the Vayuod (who then lay at his palace neere vnto the new monaſterie without the city, built without any caſtle or defence, vpon the K riuer Dembowiza) 10000 florens for a Preſent, with victuals and other neceſſarie prouiſion for his followers. And preſently after being certainly informed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelfe alone, the Emir himſelfe on foot with a thouſand of his ſoldiers, went out of the city, as if it had bin but for his pleaſure, and in curteſie to haue ſeene him.
Of which ſo ſuſpitious a gueſts comming the Vayuod vnderſtanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily ſent certaine of his followers, to know of him to what end he in time of peace did entertaine ſuch a number of Hungarian ſoldiers? Whereunto the Vayuod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter the ſonne of Alexander, ſometime Palatine of Moldauia: L who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Conſtantinople, yet that thoſe ſoldiers were for their readie ſeruice, of neceſſitie ſtill to be bilited in the countrey vntill ſuch time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commanded the Vayuod forthwith to diſcharge them as men vnneceſſarie, and to his ſubiects troubleſome, promiſing the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages.
Which feigned promiſe the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to take; yet neuertheleſſe commanded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to ſtand in readineſſe in the campe, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him diſtreſſed, they ſhould betake themſelues to flight: whileſt he in the meane time with his courtiers and other ſouldiers ſecretly aſſembled into a vally there by, came ſuddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any ſuch thing) compaſſed about M the Innes wherein they lay, and ſetting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the ſword, the two greateſt extremities of war; ſeeking now for nothing more than the iuſt reuenge of his ſpoiled Citie, his forced Virgins, and wronged ſubiects.
Howbeit the Turkes for a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelues, and by plaine force

(although

A (although in vaine) ſought to haue broken thorow the midſt of their enemies, and ſo to haue fled. Yea many of them by force of the fire driuen out of their lodgings, and tearing off their burning cloathes, fought ſtarke naked: but moſt of them which could, fled vnto the palace where the great Emir lay, there with him readie to die or liue. All which their laſt endeuors of deſperation the Vayuod eaſily fruſtrated, with two great pieces of Artillerie opening a way for his ſoldiers vnto them. So that the proud Emir now in deſpaire (like the hunted Caſtor) threw downe out of a window a great cheſt full of gold and pretious ſtones, and other jewels of great value, if happily he might haue ſo appeaſed the Vayuods wrath; humbly now requeſting no more, but to haue his life ſpared; fearefully promiſing a large ranſome for himſelfe and thoſe few which were yet left aliue with him. Howbeit the Vayuod mindefull of B the manifold iniuries by them done vnto him and his ſubiects, and nothing mitigated or moued with the rich ſpoiles thruſt vpon him, or the large promiſes the Turks had made him; commanded all thoſe his enemies now in his power, to be ſlaine euery mothers ſon: of whom his ſouldiers had a wonderfull rich ſpoile, although much more was loſt in the fire: and ſo giuing thanks vnto God for the victorie, reſted with his people a while at quiet. Yet within leſſe than a month after, he ſent Albertus Kiral his Lieutenant with an armie to Phloch (a great open vnwalled towne on the farther ſide of Danubius, equally diſtant from Vroſczok and Nicopolis) from whence the Turks oftentimes paſſing ouer that frozen riuer into Valachia, had there done great harme: which towne not inferior vnto a good citie, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed, and ſacked it, put to the ſword all the inhabitants thereof, except ſuch as were before his comming fled. C And ſhortly after (the more to annoy the Turks) marching againe ouer the frozen riuer to haue ſurpriſed Herſowa a walled citie but one dayes journey from Brailoua, he was by the way vpon the yce encountred by the Turks, whom he there in a great conflict ouerthrew, and hauing ſlaine many of them, and put the reſt to flight, holding on his intended journey, tooke that rich citie, which he rifled and burnt downe to the ground all except the caſtle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended: and ſo with the ſpoile of the citie returned againe ouer the riuer, there to refreſh his ſouldiers, wearied with labour and the extremity of the Winter weather. And yet not ſo contented, within ſix dayes after paſſing againe ouer the riuer, and hauing vpon the ſide thereof in a great battell ouerthrowne the Turks garriſons, tooke Siliſtra a great citie of Macedonia built by Conſtantine the Great (being the ſeat of one D of the Turks Sanzackes, and well inhabited with rich merchants) which faire citie he ranſacked, and hauing ſlaine moſt part of the inhabitants, burnt it downe to the ground as he had the other, no leſſe terror than griefe vnto the Turks.

The Cadileſher with all the Turkes his Followers ſlaine.

But whileſt the aforeſaid confederation betwixt the Emperor and the Tranſyluanian prince was yet in hand, and the troubles in Valachia thus ariſing, Amurath the great Sultan grieuouſly troubled with the Stone, and attainted with the falling ſickneſſe his wonted diſeaſe, and inwardly alſo tormented with the late inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and reuolt of the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, (no ſmall hinderance to the proceeding of his wars in Hungarie) as a man both in ſoule and bodie tormented, with great impatiencie and agonie of mind departed this life the eighteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord 1595; when he had liued one and fiftie, or as ſome ſay two and fiftie yeares, and thereof raigned nineteen. At the time of his death ariſe ſuch a ſudden and terrible tempeſt at Conſtantinople, that manie thought the world ſhould euen preſently haue been diſſolued. His dead bodie was not long after with great pompe tnd ſolemnitie buried by Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, in a Moſchie which he himſelfe had before built at Conſtantinople.

MAHOMETHES III TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEPTIMVS QVI, NVNC REGNAT AN° 1603 1603

Si quid in humanis, magnum te reddere poſſit: Quid prohibet magnis nomen ineſſe tuum?
Qui ſubiecta vides, tot diſſona regna, tot vrbes:
Et nulli cedens, ſceptra ſuperba geris.
Cum tamen ignores, quid ſit ſapientia Chriſti, Omnia quæ iactas ſunt, Mahomete, nihil.

Rich. Knolles.

In Engliſh thus:

If ought there be might make thee great that on the earth is found, What then ſhould let thy name among the greateſt for to ſound?
That ſees thy kingdomes and thy townes, ſo many and ſo great:
And giuing place thy ſelfe to none, do'ſt ſit on royal ſeat.
Yet ſith thou knoweſt not aright for grace by Chriſt to call,
All that thou boaſt's, ô Mahomet, is nothing worth at all.

THE

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

1595

THe death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made knowne in the Court, but with wonderful ſecrecie concealed, not onely for feare of the Ianizaries, (who in time of the vacancie of the Empire alwaies do whatſoeuer pleaſeth themſelues) but alſo for that the people hauing in diſtruſt the fierce nature of Mahomet, Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, were generally better affected to Amurath the yonger brother, a Prince of a more milde ſpirit and curteous diſpoſition, vnto whom they in heart wiſhed thoſe ſtately honours, which could by no meanes without the great wrong and preiudice of his elder brother, and danger of the whole ſtate, be giuen vnto him. Ten dayes after, came Mahomet in poſt from Amaſia to Conſtantinople, and was there by the great Baſſa's and other his mightie fauourits ſaluted Emperour: which done, he preſently after cauſed all his brethren to be inuited to a ſolemne feaſt in the court: whereunto they (yet ignorant of the death of their father, came cheerefully, as men fearing no harme; but being come, were there all by his commandement moſt miſerably ſtrangled: and at once to rid himſelfe of the feare of all competitors (the greateſt torment of the Mightie) he the ſame day (as is reported) cauſed ten of his fathers wiues and concubines, ſuch as by whom any iſſue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the ſea.

Mahomet ſaluted Emperor of the Turkes.

He murthereth his brethren.

The Ianizaries in a tumult.

The Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court not before acquainted with the death of Amurath, neither with the choice that the great Baſſa's had without their priuity made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to ſee themſelues ſo diſappointed of ſuch ſpoiles as they reckon due vnto them in the time of their vacancie; as men diſcontented, riſe vp in a rage, and made ſuch hauock and ſpoile in the Imperial city, as greater they could not wel haue made, had there bin as yet no Emperor choſen at all; and not ſo contented, were now euen vpon the point to haue rifled their new Emperors court, and to haue laid violent hands vpon the perſon of himſelfe, in reuenge of the tyrannie by him executed vpon his brethren and fathers wiues (which inhumane cruelty the Turkiſh Emperors eaſily excuſe by the name of the policie of their ſtate.) For the appeaſing of which ſo dangerous a tumult, Mahomet called vnto him certaine of the chiefe men among theſe ſeditious, ſuch as were thought to be able to do moſt with them, whom he ſought by faire perſuaſions and large promiſes to win vnto him, and by them to pacifie the reſt. Which ſerued him to little or no purpoſe, vntill ſuch time as the great Baſſa's themſelues came out with their followers: who with many faire perſuaſions, mixt with moſt grieuous threats, and firme promiſe of a generall pardon, with much ado appeaſed the tumult: yet for the more ſafetie, kept all the chiefe ſtreets of the citie with ſtrong watch and ward. This broile thus ouerblowne, a new tent was by the commandement of the new Emperor ſet vp before the Temple of Sophia: wherein on the right hand was placed the dead bodie of the late Sultan Amurath his father, and on the left hand the bodies of his nineteene ſtrangled brethren, layed

The tumult appeaſed.

A forth of purpoſe, as an heauie ſpectacle for the people to behold: who all not long after were together with their father with great ſolemnitie after the Turkiſh maner buried, and Mahomet himſelfe (being about nine and twenty yeares old) now openly proclaimed great Emperor of the Turks, and lord of all, from the riſing of the Sun, to the going downe of the ſame. After that, returning to his pallace, he made vnto his Baſſaes and other great men a ſumptuous and royall feaſt, as the manner was: but whileſt they were in the midſt of their mirth, vpon the ſudden all the city was again in an vprore, & the people in arms, in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought ſcarce one man would haue eſcaped aliue from that banket, had not the chiefe Baſſa with his grauitie and wiſedome and wonderfull labor in good time appeaſed their fury, and withall to their greater terror, cauſed al the great ordnance in the city to be brought forth into the ſtreets B ready charged, to be ſhot off amongſt them.

The Ianizaries againe in an vprore.

Whileſt theſe troubles thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, vpon the late confederation made betweene the Emperor, the Tranſyluanian Prince, the Valachians and Moldauians, diuers fortunate inrodes and skirmiſhes were by them made in the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, many ſtrong places were ſurpriſed, many rich booties taken, and notable exploits done, which we will but briefely paſſe ouer, as the precedents of a greater war. The city of Weitze, before taken by the Turks, was now againe in the beginning of this yere recouered: and the Chriſtians about Scuthia, in number about foure thouſand, breaking into the Turkes frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich prey, with diuers notable captiues. The like did alſo the Chriſtians of Viuaria: at which time alſo the garriſon ſouldiers of Altenburg making a rode into the coun- C trie about Rab, encountered with foure thouſand Turkes, of whom they ſlew two hundred, tooke certaine priſoners, whom they ſent ſome to Presburg, ſome to Altenburg: and Sinan Baſſa the late Generall returning towards Conſtantinople with much treaſure, which he had greedily ſcraped together in the late wars in Hungarie, was by the Valachians ſet vpon by the way not far from Belgrade, and ſtript of all that he had, hauing much adoe to eſcape himſelfe with ſome few of his followers. The ſame Valachians, together with the Tranſyluanians, vnder the conduct of their valiant captaine Geſtius Ferens, entring further vpon the Turks, tooke from them diuers of their townes and caſtles, as Pondeſie, Nicopliſe, Killa, and Rebnichi, and meeting with twelue thouſand Tartars, ſlew a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. D With this inſolencie of the Valachians his late tributaries, but now his enemies, the Turkiſh Emperour was highly offended: and therefore ſent one Bogdanus a Valachian borne, deſcended of the Palatines houſe, with a great power to expulſe the old Vayuod, and to poſſeſſe himſelfe of that honour, as his tributarie; promiſing vnto him all fauour and kindneſſe. Bogdanus thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into Valachia; yet thought it beſt before hee attempted any great matter, to expect the comming of the Tartars left the laſt yeare in Hungarie by Sinan: of whoſe comming the Valachians and Tranſyluanians hauing vnderſtanding, met them by the way, and ioyning battell with them, ſlew eight thouſand of them, put the reſt to flight, and ſo returned: vnto whom preſently after this victorie the Tranſyluanian Prince ſent fourteene thouſand ſouldiers moe to aid them againſt the Turks. But Bogdanus vnderſtanding both of the ouerthrow of the Tartars and the comming of this new ſupplie, durſt not proceed any farther in his enterpriſe, but kept himſelfe ſtil in his trenches. Not long after, by the commandement of the Turkiſh Emperour, Han the Crim Tartar with a great power of his Tartarian horſemen entered into Moldauia, with purpoſe to haue by fire and ſword reduced that countrey againe vnto the Turkes obeiſance: of whoſe comming Aaron Vayuod of Moldauia hauing knowledge, and aided by his neighbour Michael Vayuod of Valachia, ſo belayed the Tartars, that hee in three diuers battels ouerthrew them, and hauing ſlaine twelue thouſand of them, enforced the reſt to retire againe out of his countrey: and following the courſe of this victorie, preſently after tooke Bendar, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechuis, with ſome other Caſtles and fortreſſes of the Turkes neere vnto the riuer of Danubius, all which hee furniſhed with his owne garriſons, and withall tooke in the rich Countrey of Bobriga, the inhabitants thereof willingly ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, as men wearie of the Turkiſh thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Coſſackes, hee ouerthrew Ianicula the ſonne of Bogdanus, ſometime Vayuod of Moldauia, now ſent by Mahomet with a great power, as a moſt fit inſtrument to trouble the Vayuod, and to recouer againe that countrey: with whom Aaron couragiouſly encountering at Scarpetra, a mile from Danubius, ouer-Diuers fortunat rodes made by the Chriſtians vpon the Turks.

ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and hauing ſlaine eight thouſand of his Turkes, put him to G flight, and tooke the ſpoile of his whole campe. Neither yet ſo contented, marched preſently to Neſter Alba, where he put the Turkes in a great feare, and afterwards burnt the ſuburbs of the citie, and ſo retired.

The Emperors embaſſador dieth in priſon at Belgrade.

How Amurath the late Sultan in the beginning of theſe troubles, had at Conſtantinople ſhut vp in priſon Frederick Krecowitz the Emperors Embaſſador, is before declared. This Embaſſadour Sinan Baſſa brought with him the laſt yeare when he came into Hungarie, who after many indignities by him ſuffered both vpon the way and at Belgrade, there died: fiue of whoſe ſeruants the falſe Baſſa cauſed to be kept in ſtraight priſon, as guiltie of their maſters death, ſo to auert the infamie thereof from himſelfe. But now lying himſelfe at Belgrade for the better mannaging of this yeares warres, vpon the comming of a new Treaſurer from the Court, H he cauſed the fiue poore priſoners to be brought before him, and moſt impudently charged them with the death of their maſter: ſaying, that they ſhould anſwere for the ſame vnto God and their Emperour; and that his purpoſe in bringing of him from Conſtantinople, was to no other end, but to haue vſed his helpe in concluding a peace betweene the Great Sultan and the Emperour, and ſo to haue ſet him with all his at libertie; But now that hee was dead, he would ſend them his treacherous ſeruants to the Emperour to bee by him examined: and withall to tell him, That hee was ſent from the Great Sultan, (whoſe power was not by any but God onely to be withſtood) to beſiege Vienna, which he could (as he ſaid) the laſt yeare haue taken with leſſe labor than he had done Rab: and that therefore it were beſt for him betime to ſeeke for peace, before ſo great a power had taken the field: and that for farther inſtructions, I he would referre them to his ſonne the Baſſa of Buda, to whom he ſent them from Belgrade, together with the new come Treaſurer. Being come to Buda, they were forthwith brought before the Baſſa, and amongſt them the late Embaſſadors Secretarie, vnto whom after he had ſaid ſomwhat of the hard dealing with the Embaſſador and his followers, he declared, that he had alwaies diſliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes entreated his father for their liberty; and now at laſt to haue obtained, that the Embaſſador being dead, his ſeruants might be ſet free: and ſo put them in good hope, that they ſhould in ſhort time be reſtored to their wonted libertie. In the meane time, that one of them ſhould go vnto the Emperors Court, and there ſpeake with one of his Secretaries, whom he had before aduiſed to bethinke himſelf of peace: vnto whom alſo he afterwards writ, vpon what conditions he thought peace K might be at the Sultans hand obtained. Which were, If all the caſtles and ſtrong holds taken by the Emperours forces in theſe wars, as Filek, Setchine, and Nouigrade, with their territories, ſhould be reſtored, Siſeg in Croatia ſurrendered; if the Emperor ſhould from thenceforth refuſe to aid or protect the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians, and leaue them to the Great Sultan to bee chaſtiſed as rebels; if finally the Emperour would at once ſend vnto the Turks Court his woonted tribute for the yeres paſt, and ſo yerely afterwards: ſo he could be content by the mediation of his father, to attempt to appeaſe the fierce and inueterat diſpleaſure of the Sultan, and to further the treatie of peace. This he commanded the Secretarie to write, and to ſend it by the yong lord Perling, and to require thereof anſwer: yet that he ſhould go with this condition, That if the ſaid Perling within the ſpace of fiue and twentie daies returned L not with anſwer, all the reſt ſhould for his default loſe their heads. A ſubtill deuice and full of deceit, wherein the craftie Baſſaes, both the father and the ſon, ſought for nothing elſe but to ſee what confidence the Chriſtians had in themſelues, and to breake the confederation made between the Emperor, the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians: and that other Princes, whom God had ſtirred vp in defence of ſo iuſt a cauſe, hearing of a rumour of peace, might grow cold, and deferre to ſend their promiſed aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtfull and dangerous the reuolt of the three countries of Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and Valachia was vnto them, as they which brought ten hundred thouſand duckats yearely into the great Sultans Treaſurie: beſides that, thoſe people now become their enemies, were of all other fitteſt to intercept all manner of prouiſion to be brought by land either to or from Conſtantinople, were it victuall or other warlike prouiſion. Notwithſtanding this motion of peace made by the two Baſſaes, Sinan the old Baſſa in the mean time, with great diligence at Belgrade prepared al things neceſſary for war, and cauſed three bridges to be made, whereby hee might in diuers places as hee thought beſt, transport his armie ouer Danubius:

and

A and at the ſame time ſent for the garriſons round about, and other ſouldiers before billited in the countrey, and put in readineſſe all things neceſſarie for a moſt mortall warre.

The Baſſaes ſubtill demands anſwered with like.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the Emperors court with anſwer to the letters written by the Embaſſadours Secretarie, at the commandement of the Baſſa; the effect whereof was, that he had receiued his letters by Perling, and did thereby vnderſtand what had paſſed betweene the captiue ſeruants of the late Embaſſador, and Sinan Baſſa at Belgrade, and alſo betweene them and Sinan Baſſa his ſon at Buda; and that the Emperors minde was neuer other, but that a firme peace might haue been made between him and the Sultan; and that the Emperour had done nothing elſe by his Embaſſador at Conſtantinople, or by others in other places, but that ſuch reaſonable conditions might haue beene found out, as might haue ended B thoſe wars, and haue on both ſides deliuered their innocent ſubiects from their great and daily calamities, which might eaſily haue been done, if Sinan the author and fautor of this warre, had with like deſire furthered the peace. But that it was manifeſt vnto the whole world, that all complaints of infinit grieuances, being by the Embaſſador, yea and by the Emperour himſelfe, by his letters laid open vnto the Sultan and his chiefe Baſſaes, had not only nothing preuailed, but alſo to haue beene with great contempt reiected, and the treatie of peace once begun, to haue by the inſolencie of the Baſſa of Boſna bin interrupted: That the Emperour, becauſe the matter ſhould not breake out into open war, had ſent his double tribute into the confines of Hungarie, which was a great while laid vp at Comara vntill the Sultans minde were known. But when all his deſignes tended to war, and the Christian Prouinces were by his robC bers on euery ſide ſpoiled, the inhabitants led away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, the townes and villages burnt, yea whole countries lay deſolate, and all manner of outrages were vpon a meere pride and contempt as it were of the whole world exerciſed: then the Emperour to haue taken his refuge vnto the defence of his iuſt cauſe, and to haue vſed ſuch remedies as are both before God and the world to be allowed, and ſo by lawfull war to haue repulſed warre. And that although all had not the laſt yeare proſpered in his hand, but that he had receiued ſome loſſe: yet that Sinan Baſſa him ſelfe, & the Baſſa of Buda his ſonne with other of the wiſer ſort of the Turks muſt needs confeſſe that to haue chanced, not by their wiſedome, policie or power, but by the ſufferance of God, by a rare misfortune, through the inexcuſable negligence and treaſon of ſuch as he had put in truſt with the confines of his empire, worthie moſt ſeuere D chaſtiſement. And that no man could denie, but that great powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes bin ouerthrowne and diſcomfited, by ſmall handfuls of the Chriſtians: therefore their power not to be ſo inuincible, as they vainly vanted of. But whereas it is written, that the great Viſier Sinan and the Baſſa his ſonne are of opinion, that the Emperor is brought to ſo low an ebbe, that he muſt be glad to accept of moſt hard and diſhonorable conditions of peace propounded by them: therein they erre much, and deceiue themſelues far; for by the power of God they ſhould ſhortly by experience know, that his imperiall Maieſtie wanteth neither power nor wealth, to repaire the loſſe receiued through the treaſon of them he truſted, yea and to recouer whatſoeuer he had loſt elſe: and that it ſhould in ſhort time be witneſſed vnto the whole world, by the help of God and the defence of a moſt iuſt cauſe, that the Emperour E was not ſo poore and weake as they ſuppoſed him to be. Yet as he of his owne naturall goodneſſe and clemencie, with his owne incomparable loſſe and harme, had alwayes ſought for the quiet and profit of his ſubiects, and to the vttermoſt of his power ſtaid the effuſion of innocent bloud, ſo now alſo forgetting all iniuries, he could happily be content to thinke of an honorable peace: whereunto he was more enclined than to protract the warre with the vnſpeakeable harmes of the ſubiects on both ſides. Yet aboue all things it behooued Sinan to know, that he was to reſtore all ſuch caſtles and townes as haue in this warre beene taken by the Turkes, beginning at Wihitz in Croatia euen to the laſt innocent ſubiect by them carried away into captiuitie. And that the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians (people many ages ioyned and vnited as inſeperable members to the kingdome of Hungarie, as vnto the true bodie, and now of late by the practiſe and treacherie of certaine rebellious perſons ſeperated from the ſame) were from henceforth to be left vnder the protection and gouernement of his imperiall Maieſtie, and neuer more to be impugned by the Turkes. If theſe things were done, and order taken that the iniurie and diſgrace done vnto the Emperors late Embaſſador (a fact that all the Princes of the world cried ſhame of) might not remaine vnpuniſhed: and that his ſeruants in durance at Buda and Conſtantinople, might be reſtored vnto their woonted libertie, then ſome good forme of peace, and bounding of their territories might happily be agreed vpon: without which conditions, all talke of peace was but vaine; for that God the iuſt and mightie protector of ſuch as put their truſt in him, would not faile to helpe his imperiall Maieſtie, with the reſt of the confederat princes, in their ſo iuſt a quarrell, and abate the pride of ſuch as truſt in their owne ſtrength and power.

This anſwer the captiues at Buda were commanded to giue vnto the Baſſa, either by writing or by word of mouth: and withall earneſtly to requeſt him both for their owne libertie and their fellows, wrongfully detained at Conſtantinople. Which if it could not be obtained, yet to comfort themſelues with that, that they ſhould in bounteous manner receiue from the Emperour ſuch allowance, as ſhould ſuffice to prouide them things neceſſarie: as he had granted to Perling, whom he might haue iuſtly detained and not ſent him backe againe, but for his oaths ſake being no lawfull priſoner. Thus were the vnreaſonable conditions of peace craftily by the Baſſa propounded, by others anſwered: but by whom he knew not, no mans name being ſet thereunto.

The Emperor not ignorant with what an enemie he had to doe, and of nothing more carefull than of the kingdome (or more truly to ſay, of the reliques of the kingdome) of Hungarie, lying now as it were in the Lyons mouth, ceaſed not to pray aide, not of the Princes Electors onely, but of others alſo farther off; yea euen as far as Italie and Spaine, but eſpecially of the King of Polonia, as his neere alliance & neighbor. Vnto whom both he and the States of Hungarie ſent their Embaſſadors, at ſuch time as he, moued with the daily incurſions of the Turks and Tartars into the countries adioining vpon his, had for the ſafetie of his owne Kingdome, called a parliament of all his States in Februarie laſt, at Cracouia. Wherof Mahomet the Great Turke hearing, ſent alſo two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vſuall Embaſſadors vnto the king and his States ſo aſſembled, to craue his aid in his wars in Hungarie: which if the king ſhould not refuſe, then to promiſe him to want no coine to pay his ſouldiers; and that Mahomet mindfull of ſo great a courteſie, would at all times be ready to requite him with like, when his occaſions ſhould require. Theſe Embaſſadors, hauing obtained ſafe conduct from Michael the Vayuod of Valachia for their paſſage through his countrie; comming thither, were by the Vayuod himſelfe honourably entertained and welcomed, and ſo brought into a faire lodging, where they diſcourſed with him of many matters. But the Vayuods followers, grieued to ſee ſo great honor done to theſe their ſworne & mortall enemies, with weapons in their hands brake into the roome where the Embaſſadors were, and without more adoe ſlew them both: and in the ſame fury ſetting vpon the reſt of the Turks their followers, cut them all in pieces, ſo that of them none came into Polonia to do their great Maſters meſſage, either yet returned to Conſtantinople to carrie newes of the reſt, but there altogether periſhed. Of which outrage Mahomet yet vnderſtanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatening all euills both to the Moldauians and Valachians, and forthwith ſent out other Embaſſadours to the ſame purpoſe; who with better fortune afterwards in ſafetie arriued in Polonia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) ouerthrown, and many ſtrong caſtles and forts taken from the Turkes by the Tranſyluanians, Valachians, and Moldauians, the Turkiſh affaires going to wracke in thoſe quarters, and ſore ſhaken on that ſide of Hungarie; Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour called home to the Court Sinan Baſſa his Generall in Hungarie, to conferre with him (as it was thought) of ſome great matters. In whoſe place he ſent Ferat Baſſa, hee who ſometime had the leading of Amuraths great armies againſt the Perſians: who now departing from Conſtantinople, came to Belgrade in Aprill, and there tooke the charge vpon him. Where at his firſt comming, in the night time all the ropes and cordes of the tents were ſuddenly cut in ſunder, and ſo the tent let fall about his eares: which ſome ſuppoſed to haue beene done to his diſgrace, by the procurement of Cicala Baſſa before by him wronged; or as others thought, by the inſolent Ianizaries, who diſliking of him, did it deſpight, wiſhing rather to haue beene led by Mahomet himſelfe. Now at his comming, the Famine which the laſt yere began amongſt the Turks, was growne exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade onely, but euen generally in moſt places of Hungarie poſſeſſed by the Turks: inſomuch, that the Tartar women that followed the campe, were faine to roaſt their owne children & eat them. This Famine was alſo accompanied with a moſt terrible Plague, whereof great numbers of the

A the Turks and Tartars died daily: ſo that of foureſcore fiue thouſand Tartars which came the laſt yeare into Hungarie,now remained ſcarce eight thouſand,the reſt being all deuoured with the Sword,Famine,and the Peſtilence.

Great were the harmes the Turkes ſtill dayly receiued from the late reuolted countries of Tranſyluania,Valachia,and Moldauia,the Chriſtians of thoſe places ſeeking by all meanes to annoy them. Michael Vayuod of Valachia, not contented with that he had already done,but entring into the Turks frontiers,ſurpriſed Scihmele, together with the caſtle; wherin he found fourteene field pieces,amongſt which were two which had vpon them the armes of the Emperor Ferdinand, and other two hauing vpon them the armes of Huniades; which pieces he afterward ſent as a Preſent to the Tranſyluanian Prince. After that,he tooke Oroſige, a famous B port towne, the dwelling place of the Turks great purueyor for butter, cheeſe, and hony, and ſuch other prouiſion for the court, wherein he found ſuch ſtore of the aforeſaid prouiſion, as might well haue ſufficed eight thouſand men for a whole yeare: and ſtill proſecuting his good fortune,took from the Turks Kilec and Galempe,with the ſtrong caſtle of S.George,commonly called Grigio, and at length beſieged Laganoc.

Michael Vaynod of Valachia doth the Turks great harme.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archduke and Generall of the Chriſtian armie, from the aſſemblie of the nobilitie of Hungarie at Presburg, to Vienna, and ſo from thence to the Emperor his brother at Prague; who appointed him General of the lower Hungarie; and Maximilian his brother Generall of the vpper Countrey: giuing them for their Lieutenants,vnto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach,and to Matthias the Countie Charles Manſfelt, by him ſent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire. C Iohn de Medices, who was yet in Hungarie,he made Maſter of the great ordnance,with charge to fortifie Komara; which he ſo well performed,as that it was thought nothing in ſtrength inferior to Rab. All this while the Emperor ceaſed not by his Embaſſadors and letters to ſolicite the Chriſtian Princes,for the repreſſing of the common enemie to put too their helping hands: and ſo much preuailed with them,that out of his owne hereditarie prouinces,& from other Princes his friends,he had this Spring raiſed a right puiſſant and ſtrong army for the defence of Hungarie: which how it was raiſed,& from whom,it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefly to remember,as the chiefe ſtrength vnder God,whereby the Chriſtian commonweale was this yere moſt noatbly defended. Out of the higher Saxonie came a thouſand two hundred horſmen,and out of the lower Saxonie ſix hundred: from Franconia a thouſand horſmen: from Sueuia foure thouſand footmen: out of the Countie of Tirol as many: from Bauaria three thouſand: out of Bohemia two thouſand men at armes,ſix hundred light horſemen, and ſix thouſand footmen : from Sileſia a thouſand fiue hundred horſemen: from Luſatia fiue hundred horſe and a thouſand foot: from Morauia a thouſand horſe,and two thouſand foot: out of Auſtria two thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot: from Hungarie fiue hundred horſemen and a thouſand foot: from the nobilitie of Sueuia and Franconia foure thouſand foot: from the King of Spaine out of the Low-countries vnder the conduct of Charles Countie Manſfelt, two thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot: vnto theſe the Biſhop of Rome added two thouſand horſemen, and eight thouſand foot: the great Duke of Florence ſent fiue hundred horſe & three thouſand foot: the of Duke Ferrara a thouſand fiue hundred footmen: the Duke of Mantua a thouſand foot: & the Duke Venturee fiue hundred horſe. Al which being put together, fill vp the number of fifteene thouſand nine hundred horſemen, and fiftie thouſand fiue hundred foot. Which notable armie,raiſed from the power of diuers Chriſtian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chiefetaines, had by the goodneſſe of God much better ſucceſſe this Summer againſt the antient enemies of Chriſtendome, than had the like armie the yeare before,as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare.

The notable army of the Chriſtians, & from whence it was raiſed.

Among the worthie Commanders that were in this puiſſant army, Charles Countie Manſfelt the ſonne of Peter Erneſtus the old Countie, from his youth brought vp in armes, was by the King of Spaine at the requeſt of the Emperour ſent with the aforeſaid forces of two thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot out of the Low-countries,as a man for his approued valor & direction, fit to mannage theſe dangerous warres againſt the Turke vnder Matthias the Archduke,as his Lieutenant Generall: who hauing raiſed the appointed forces,for moſt part Wallons, departed from Bruxelles about the midſt of Februarie, and by the way taking his leaue of his aged father at Luxenburg, and trauelling through Germanie, came in March to Prague, where he was by the Emperour and the Archduke his brother moſt honourably entertained, and ſhortly after with great ſolemnitie created one of the Princes of the Empire. G His forces following after him, were by the way ſtaied, partly by the inundation of waters (the riuers they were to paſſe ouer at that time riſing to an vnwonted height) partly by the iealouſie of ſome of the German Princes, who denied them paſſage through their territories, vntill ſuch time as that the Emperour by his letters had opened vnto him the way: which Princes for all that ſtood vpon their guard, and ſo gaue him paſſage.

Now ran great rumors of the wonderfull preparations of the Turks, as alſo of the Chriſtians; Fame after her woonted manner, encreaſing the report of all things aboue meaſure: which cauſed the Turkes with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier townes, eſpecially of Rab and Strigonium, as did the Chriſtians to the fortification of Komara and Altenburg. H In the meane time many hot skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Chriſtians and the Turkes, eſpecially in the late reuolted countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, wherein the Turkes were ſtill put to the worſe, to the great diſcontentment of their Emperour. Neere vnto Temeſwar the Baſſa of Buda was ouerthrowne, by the valiant captaine Geſtius Ferentz, and the Tranſyluanians. And in Valachia the Turks Generall entering with a great armie, was there alſo by the Lord Nadaſti and the Valachians, aided with the Tranſyluanians, in a great battell diſcomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thouſand of the Turks heads in token of this victorie the Lord Nadaſti ſent to Alba-Iulia to the Tranſyluanian Prince, and certaine enſignes, amongſt which one was moſt richly garniſhed with precious ſtones and pearle, thought to be worth thirtie thouſand dollars; which the Prince afterward reſtored againe to Nadaſti, offering him great poſſeſſions in Tranſyluania, if he could haue beene content there to haue ſeated himſelfe. I Ferat Baſſa ouerthrowne in Valachia.

All this Spring the Turks countenanced their warres with greater boaſts and threats, than true force; giuing it out, That they would in ſhort time worke wonders both by ſea and land. For the more credit wherof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat, was ſent out with twelue gallies, who landing here and there vpon the coaſts of Italie, did much harme, cauſing it to be reported in euery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him: which raiſed a great feare, as well in other places, as in Italie. Howbeit, no ſuch fleet afterwards appeared: for why, the Turkiſh Emperor, much troubled with the reuolt of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and the great mortalitie then raging K both among his ſouldiers and their horſes, was not at leiſure to looke into the ſea, hauing his hands full enough with the troubles of Hungarie, where his men of war enioyed little reſt in the frontiers of his territories.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince, had vpon ſome iuſt cauſes, of late ſuſpected Aaron the Vayuod of Moldauia, to haue intelligence not only with the Polonians, but alſo with the Cardinall Bator and other his mortall enemies, and ſecretly to haue been about to make his peace with Mahomet, and ſo againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: which vehement ſuſpition growing daily more and more, was about this time manifeſtly confirmed by certain letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the Prince cauſed Aaron to be apprehended, and with his wife and ſonne to be ſent as priſoners to Prague: in whoſe roome L he by the conſent of the nobilitie of the countrie, placed one Stephen Rozwan, a wiſe and diſcreet man amongſt them, and ſuch an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much as in him was, prouiding, that that countrie ſhould not be rent from him and the vnion of the other. But againſt the ſecret practiſes of the Polonians, he proteſted openly by letters vnto the Emperour, by the power of God, and aid of his faithfull ſubiects, to redreſſe thoſe ſo great iniuries himſelfe by the ſword.

Mahomet ſendeth Embaſſadours to the prince of Tranſyluania.

In the middeſt of theſe troubles came three Chiaus, Embaſſadors from the Turkiſh Sultan vnto the Prince, to perſuade him againe to put himſelfe into his protection, and to giue him paſſage through his countrey, as in former time, into Hungarie; promiſing him, that all the iniuries by him or his people done, ſhould be for euer forgotten and forgiuen: and that he ſhould haue thoſe three countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and ſo to be accounted as the Turks moſt louing friend and vaſſall. What the Prince anſwered thereunto, was not knowne, but by his doings afterwards it was eaſily to be gathered, that hee hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the faithleſſe

A faithleſſe tyrant, truſting more vnto the league he had with the Chriſtian Emperour. Theſe Embaſſadors were ſcarce gon, but that a ſecret meſſenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Chriſtians in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good ſucceſſe proſecute his wars, they would be readie to follow his fortune, and to joine hands with him againſt the cruel tyrant, and to ſhut vp all the paſſages that way into Valachia, Moldauia, and Hungarie.

Whileſt theſe troubleſome times thus paſſed in Tranſyluania and Hungarie, one of the old Ianizaries called Waſuode Giezi, an old ſouldier, but a confident bold ſpoken fellow, moued as ſhould ſeeme with the diſcontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomet the great Sultan at Conſtantinople, and there openly ſet vpon him with this rough and abrupt ſpeech:

B How long at laſt, moſt mightie Emperour, wilt thou endure thy ſelfe to be ſeduced and blinded by the great Baſſa's of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies? How long wilt thou ſuffer thy ſelfe to be deceiued, to the great danger of thy ſelfe, and hurt of thy Subiects? Seeſt thou not how ouerthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly, they, mooued onely with their owne couetous and ambitious humour, haue hitherto dealt with thee and thy father? eſpecially in that, that perſuaded by them, thou haſt diſhonourably broken thy league, and taken vp armes againſt the Chriſtian Emperour. At length open thine eyes and ſee their deceit, and how much they abuſe thy power. Sinan Baſſa, who muſt haue himſelfe honoured and exalted aboue all others, hath not by ſtrong hand honourably woon Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Anceſtors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby caſt thee into a moſt dangerous war and infinite troubles. C O Rab, Rab, now the cauſe of great triumph and reioycing, as if thereby all Chriſtendome ſhould in ſhort time be ſubdued to thy Scepter. But thou art therein much deceiued; thy barnes, thy ſtore-houſes, as are Tranſyluania, Valachia, Moldauia, Bulgaria, and other Prouinces adioyning, from whence this thy Imperial citie of Conſtantinople, with the countrey about it, thy Court, yea thy ſelfe art to be relieued, are by this war ſhut vp; ſo that downe the riuer of Danubius out of the Weſt, or by the Euxine out of the Eaſt, thou art not able to looke for any prouiſion. From whence then ô moſt mightie Emperour, wilt thou maintaine thy ſelfe, thy Court, this populous Citie, and the Countrey hereabout? Not to ſpeake in the mean time of thy mightie Army now in Hungarie, fleſh, fiſh, corne, all manner of victual are now at ſuch a price, that the common ſouldier cannot buy them. In this extreame dearth of all things, not men onely, but euen the very beaſts and cattell ſtarue for hunger. Thy D horſes go fat perhaps into Hungarie, but neither thou nor thy ſelect ſoldiers can liue by graſſe and weeds, all that is left in that countrey. This miſerie and calamitie of thy people thou ſeeſt daily, and yet thou wilt not with ſound iudgement lift vp thine eyes, to ſee from whence theſe harmes come, and how that they by thee put in greateſt truſt, ſtudie not for thy profit or the profit of the commonweale, but onely how by all meanes to enrich themſelues.

The preſumptuous ſpeech of one Waſuode an old Ianizary, to Mahomet the great Sultan.

Mahomet much mooued with the confident ſpeech of the old Ianizarie, commanded him to be forthwith committed to ward, and by faire means to be examined, by whoſe ſetting on, and for what cauſe he had ſo boldly vttered this rude ſpeech vnto his Soueraigne, and what further thing he had intended: but the reſt of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, riſe preſently in a E tumult, and by ſtrong hand tooke him out of priſon, and by ſolemne oath combined themſelues to defend him, euen to the ſpending of their owne bloud; whereat Mahomet was glad to winke.

The greateſt part of the aid promiſed by the Chriſtian Princes for the maintenance of this yeres wars againſt the Turke being now come to Vienna in Auſtria, Countie Mansfelt Lieutenant General vnder the Archduke, forthwith called a Councell of the Colonels, captains, and other great commanders of the armie, to conſult with them what courſe to take for the beginning of this great war: as whether they ſhould preſently lay ſiege ro ſome towne of the Enemies, or elſe to expect him in the plaine field, and to giue him battell. All things well conſidered, and that reſolued vpon which was thought moſt expedient, he remoued from Vienna to Altenburg, where he muſtered his whole armie; and departing thence, with ſome few of his followers came to Walkenburg, a village vpon the ſide of Danubius, where he made choice of a place to incampe his army in: which after he had marked out, hee returned againe with ſpeed to Altenburg, and by open proclamation thorow the Campe gaue ſtraight commandement, That againſt a certaine houre euery man ſhould be in readineſſe to remooue and ſet forward ward toward the enemy: but diuers of the ſouldiers, and eſpecially the Germans, began forthwith after their wonted manner to cry out for their pay before they would ſtir any farther: ſo that the Countie was glad by a ſecond proclamation to command them to riſe, promiſing them their pay within eight days. But they ſtil ſtanding vpon their former reſolution for their pay, refuſed any farther to follow their captaines, and ſent ſix of the beſt ſort among thoſe mutinous ſoldiers to the Countie, in the name of all the reſt to demand their pay; whom he forthwith commanded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reaſonably excuſed themſelues, he let them go, and cauſing the other three to caſt lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them. Which ſeuere execution ſo terrified the reſt, that vpon the ſigne giuen they all riſe, and with the reſt of the armie followed the Countie. The whole army being come to Walkenburg vnto the place where they were to encamp; the Countie himſelf with others of the nobility began with ſpades and ſhouels to dig and caſt vp the trenches, and ſo wrought vntil they ſweat again; with whoſe example all the reſt of the armie, of what degree ſoeuer, being moued to labor, had in ſhort time caſt vp a very great trench from Danubius vnto the Mariſhes, large enough for 80000 men to incampe in, the great worke with reſtleſſe labor going forward both night and day vntill it was fully finiſhed. The Countie lying thus intrenched with his armie, was ſtill carefull by his eſpials to vnderſtand where the enemie lay, and what he did. He was ready ſtill to heare all, but to beleeue that which ſeemed moſt like to be true: what he purpoſed, he kept moſt ſecret, ſo that the enemy could neuer diſcouer any of his deſignes (wherein the Generals of late yeres before him had much erred:) and commonly his moſt certaine reſolutions were ſhadowed vnder the open ſhew of ſome other matter nothing meant: ſecuritie he much abhorred, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers meſſengers brought vnto him, That the enemy was but of ſmall ſtrength, vnable to meet him, diſorderly incamped, and in great diſtreſſe for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credit thereunto, as knowing ſuch reports to haue oftentimes bin giuen out by the Turks, of purpoſe to lul the Chriſtians in ſecuritie, the more eaſily to oppreſſe them. The Chriſtian armie thus ſtrongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordnance, the Countie himſelfe with certain troupes of horſemen would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe before Rab, and ſometime before Dotis, viewing ſometime the one place, and ſometime the other, as if he had verily purpoſed to haue beſieged one of them: and to giue the greater ſhew that he had ſo determined, he cauſed the ground to be marked out for his armie moſt conueniently to incamp in, and for the caſting vp of his mounts. Which cauſed the Turks of Strigonium, Veſprinium, Palotta, and other places farther off, to ſend part as well of their warlike prouiſion, as of their garriſon ſouldiers, ſome to Rab, ſome to Dotis, for the defence of thoſe places, neereſt as they thought vnto danger. The Countie in the meane time hauing now put all things in readineſſe, came with his army and ſat downe before Dotis, demanding to haue it yeelded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turks that he would aſſuredly beſiege that place, he began to caſt vp his trenches, and to raiſe his mounts as ſeemed moſt conuenient; ſtraitly commanding euery man of what condition ſoeuer, to put his hand in ſome meaſure to the furtherance of thoſe works: and the more by his own example to encourage others, would oftentimes himſelf carry a faggot or ſome other thing before him vpon his horſe for the raiſing of the mount. For all that, certaine Hungarian gentlemen diſdaining ſuch baſe labor (as they deemed it) refuſed to do any thing therein: which the Countie perceiuing, ſtraitly charged one of them by his example, to carry a fagot to the mount: which the Hungarian gentleman refuſing, the Countie therewith much mooued, laid the fagot he was carrying himſelfe, before the Hungarian vpon his horſe, charging him to ſee that he caried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian diſdainfully taking it, carried it vntill he thought he was out of the Counties ſight, and then in ſcorne threw it down: which the Countie (hauing ſtill an eye after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid to be preſently hanged vpon the next tree for his obſtinacie. Which wholſome ſeueritie, both then and afterwards cauſed others more diligently to do what they were commanded by their ſuperiours.

An obſtinate Turke.

It happened about this time, that three Turkes being taken priſoners, were brought into the camp: whom the Countie ſtraitly examined of many matters. But the firſt of the three could neither by faire or foule means be induced to anſwer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore by the commaundement of the Countie in the ſight of the other two cut into ſmall pieces. Who terrified with his diſmembring, confeſſed many things wherof they were asked:

and

A and among others, That the Turkiſh Sultan had determined to turne his greateſt forces into Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and the vpper part of Hungarie; and therefore would this Sommer ſend ſmall forces or els none at all into thoſe quarters.

Now was Dotis ſo belayd by the Countie, as that no man doubted but that he had thereon purpoſed to haue gaged his whole forces, when ſuddenly the laſt of Iune, commandment was giuen through the campe, That euery man vpon ſigne giuen, ſhould be in readineſſe to follow his leaders, for that the Countie had determined forthwith to remoue: yet whither the army was to be remoued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commanders. As for to go to Strigonium, few there were that ſo much as dreamed thereof, all was kept ſo ſecret: yet was it the Counties purpoſe euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that city, B which the Archduke had in vaine the laſt yere beſieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the Countie riſe with all his army, and the next day being the firſt of Iuly, came to Strigonium, they of the citie not hearing of his comming before they ſaw him vnder their walls. Wherefore the Turks in the ſuburbs called the Raſcian city, and they in the fort vnder S. Thomas hill, deſpairing of the keeping of thoſe places, ſetting fire on the houſes, and defacing the fort ſo much as in that ſudden feare they poſſibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the Countie without reſiſtance tooke the foreſaid places forſaken by the Turks, which he manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, caſt vp certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the ſiege. In three dayes he had againe repaired the fort vnder S. Thomas hill abandoned by the Turks, and therein placed foure great pieces of artillerie, wherewith he began to batter the lower towne, & in other places to ſtrait the beſieged more than they had bin the yere before. The Baſſa of Buda not ignorant of the want both of men and munition in the beſieged city, (and the rather, for that they had but a little before ſent part of their garriſon with ſhot & pouder to Rab and Dotis) attempted thrice (as he did many times after during the time of the ſiege) to haue by the riuer put new ſupplies both of men and munition into the citie: but was ſtill by the diligence of the Chriſtians excluded, and enforced with loſſe to returne. In ſhort time the lower towne, which they call Waſſerſtat, or the Water-towne, was with continual battery ſore beaten, ſo that ſcarcely any houſe or building was left whole; and a counterſcarſe made the laſt yeare, beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were ſent, onely to haue viewed the bredth and manner of the ditches: after whom certaine companies of the Hungarian Heidons preſently followed, without any command of their captaines; who with great courage got to the top of another high counterſcarſe, & there ſet vp ſome of their enſignes. Which the Turks beholding, & comming on cloſe together, by plain force enforced them with loſſe to retire. Among theſe Hungarians were diuers alſo of the Wallons ſlaine, with ſome others of good name and place, to the great griefe of the County, being not a little offended with that diſordered ſeruice: yet day & night the battery ceaſed not, and the Chriſtians out of their trenches with their musket ſhot flew manie of the Turks vpon the walls, receiuing little hurt againe, the Turks ſtil ſhooting ſparingly, for feare of wanting ſhot and pouder at their greater need; yet that they ſpent they beſtowed ſo well, that amongſt others they had ſlaine foure of the Chriſtian canoniers, and one Wallon captaine. About the midſt of Iuly the Countie with continual batterie had made the Water-towne (as he thought) ſaultable: and therefore ſent certain companies to begin the aſſault: who hauing paſſed the counterſcarſe, found the ditch full of deepe mud, and but newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, ſo that it was thought ſcarce poſſible to be paſſed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wal with ſtrong bulwarks; and within all this was another new caſt ditch, and vpon the very brinke thereof a thicke and high parapet: all which for all that, certaine companies of Wallons with great labor and danger aduentured to paſſe: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, and the ſmall number of them that came on to the aſſault, with the diſaduantage of the place wherein they ſtood, that at length they were glad to retire with the loſſe of many of their fellowes. The Chriſtians in the beginning of this ſiege had taken a little Iſland in the riuer before the city, which was kept with ſome few companies of the Lord Palfi his Heidons; whereof the Turks hauing intelligence at Buda, with three gallies and certaine other veſſels, landed in the Iſland 3000 ſoldiers, which ſlew the Heidons, vnto whom no ſuccor could be ſuddenly ſent, and ſo recouered againe the Iſland: wherein they left a ſufficient garriſon for the keeping thereof, furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, and ſo departed.

About

ward toward the enemy: but diuers of the ſouldiers, and eſpecially the Germans, began forthwith after their wonted manner to cry out for their pay before they would ſtir any farther: ſo G that the Countie was glad by a ſecond proclamation to command them to riſe, promiſing them their pay within eight days. But they ſtil ſtanding vpon their former reſolution for their pay, refuſed any farther to follow their captaines, and ſent ſix of the beſt ſort among thoſe mutinous ſoldiers to the Countie, in the name of all the reſt to demand their pay; whom he forthwith commanded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reaſonably excuſed themſelues, he let them go, and cauſing the other three to caſt lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them.
Which ſeuere execution ſo terrified the reſt, that vpon the ſigne giuen they all riſe, and with the reſt of the armie followed the Countie. The whole army being come to Walkenburg vnto the place where they were to encamp; the Countie himſelf with others of the nobility began with ſpades and ſhouels to dig and caſt vp the trenches, and ſo wrought vntil they ſweat again; H with whoſe example all the reſt of the armie, of what degree ſoeuer, being moued to labor, had in ſhort time caſt vp a very great trench from Danubius vnto the Mariſhes, large enough for 80000 men to incampe in, the great worke with reſtleſſe labor going forward both night and day vntill it was fully finiſhed. The Countie lying thus intrenched with his armie, was ſtill carefull by his eſpials to vnderſtand where the enemie lay, and what he did. He was ready ſtil to heare all, but to beleeue that which ſeemed moſt like to be true: what he purpoſed, he kept moſt ſecret, ſo that the enemy could neuer diſcouer any of his deſignes (wherein the Generals of late yeres before him had much erred:) and commonly his moſt certaine reſolutions were ſhadowed vnder the open ſhew of ſome other matter nothing meant: ſecuritie he much abhorred, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers meſſengers brought vnto him, I That the enemy was but of ſmall ſtrength, vnable to meet him, diſorderly incamped, and in great diſtreſſe for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credit thereunto, as knowing ſuch reports to haue oftentimes bin giuen out by the Turks, of purpoſe to lul the Chriſtians in ſecuritie, the more eaſily to oppreſſe them. The Chriſtian armie thus ſtrongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordnance, the Countie himſelfe with certain troupes of horſemen would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe before Rab, and ſometime before Dotis, viewing ſometime the one place, and ſometime the other, as if he had verily purpoſed to haue beſieged one of them: and to giue the greater ſhew that he had ſo determined, he cauſed the ground to be marked out for his armie moſt conueniently to incamp in, and for the caſting vp of his mounts. K Which cauſed the Turks of Strigonium, Veſprinium, Palotta, and other places farther off, to ſend part as well of their warlike prouiſion, as of their garriſon ſouldiers, ſome to Rab, ſome to Dotis, for the defence of thoſe places, neereſt as they thought vnto danger. The Countie in the meane time hauing now put all things in readineſſe, came with his army and ſat downe before Dotis, demanding to haue it yeelded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turks that he would aſſuredly beſiege that place, he began to caſt vp his trenches, and to raiſe his mounts as ſeemed moſt conuenient; ſtraitly commanding euery man of what condition ſoeuer, to put his hand in ſome meaſure to the furtherance of thoſe works: and the more by his own example to encourage others, would oftentimes himſelf carry a faggot or ſome other thing before him vpon his horſe for the raiſing of the mount. For all that, certaine Hungarian gentlemen diſdaining L ſuch baſe labor (as they deemed it) refuſed to do any thing therein: which the Countie perceiuing, ſtraitly charged one of them by his example, to carry a fagot to the mount: which the Hungarian gentleman refuſing, the Countie therewith much mooued, laid the fagot he was carrying himſelfe, before the Hungarian vpon his horſe, charging him to ſee that he caried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian diſdainfully taking it, carried it vntill he thought he was out of the Counties ſight, and then in ſcorne threw it down: which the Countie (hauing ſtill an eye after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid to be preſently hanged vpon the next tree for his obſtinacie. Which whol ſome ſeueritie, both then and afterwards cauſed others more diligently to do what they were commanded by their ſuperiours.

The vigilant carefulnes of Countie Manſfield.

Dotis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

It happened about this time, that three Turkes being taken priſoners, were brought into the M camp: whom the Countie ſtraitly examined of many matters. But the firſt of the three could neither by faire or foule means be induced to anſwer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore by the commaundement of the Countie in the ſight of the other two cut into ſmall pieces. Who terrified with his diſmembring, confeſſed many things wherof they were asked:

An obſtinate Turke.

and among others, That the Turkiſh Sultan had determined to turne his greateſt forces into Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and the vpper part of Hungarie; and therefore would this Sommer ſend ſmall forces or els none at all into thoſe quarters.

Countie Manſfield remoueth with the armie from Dotis to Strigonium.

The Chriſtians repulſed.

Now was Dotis ſo belayd by the Countie, as that no man doubted but that he had thereon purpoſed to haue gaged his whole forces, when ſuddenly the laſt of Iune, commandment was giuen through the campe, That euery man vpon ſigne giuen, ſhould be in readineſſe to follow his leaders, for that the Countie had determined forthwith to remoue: yet whither the army was to be remoued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commanders. As for to go to Strigonium, few there were that ſo much as dreamed thereof, all was kept ſo ſecret: yet was it the Counties purpoſe euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that city, which the Archduke had in vaine the laſt yere beſieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the Countie riſe with all his army, and the next day being the firſt of Iuly, came to Strigonium, they of the citie not hearing of his comming before they ſaw him vnder their walls. About the midſt of Iuly the Countie with continual batterie had made the Water-towne (as he thought) ſaultable: and therefore ſent certain companies to begin the aſſault: who hauing paſſed the counterſcarſe, found the ditch full of deepe mud, and but newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, ſo that it was thought ſcarce poſſible to be paſſed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wal with ſtrong bulwarks; and within all this was another new caſt ditch, and vpon the very brinke thereof a thicke and high parapet: all which for all that, certaine companies of Wallons with great labor and danger aduentured to paſſe: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, and the ſmall number of them that came on to the aſſault, with the diſaduantage of the place wherein they ſtood, that at length they were glad to retire with the loſſe of many of their fellowes. The Chriſtians in the beginning of this ſiege had taken a little Iſland in the riuer before the city, which was kept with ſome few companies of the Lord Palfi his Heidons; whereof the Turks hauing intelligence at Buda, with three gallies and certaine other veſſels, landed in the Iſland 3000 ſoldiers, which ſlew the Heidons, vnto whom no ſuccor could be ſuddenly ſent, and ſo recouered againe the Iſland: wherein they left a ſufficient garriſon for the keeping thereof, furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, and ſo departed.

About three dayes after the former aſſault, the Chriſtians in hope of better ſucceſſe, the ſecond time aſſaulted the Water-towne, in which aſſault the chief leaders were the lord Greis G and Anthonie Zinne a famous captaine, had he not ſtained his honour with Countie Hardeck at Rab; but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now together with the reſt appointed to that ſeruice, moſt couragiouſly aſſault the breach, but were againe by the Turks notably repulſed, and enforced at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, and ſo to retyre with the loſſe of 150 men: among whom Zinne himſelfe was ſlaine, with one Captaine Ruger, and ſome of the Counties owne Guard: the Lord Greis was wounded in the head, and the younger Lord Schuendi with diuers other Captaines grieuouſly hurt. The next day after, 600 of the mountaine people came into the campe vnto the Countie, with ſupplications to requeſt him, Not to giue ouer the siege vntill he had woon the Citie; promiſing him in the name of thoſe Townes and Villages from whence they were ſent, Of their own charges to repaire for him what harme ſoeuer he ſhould H do in the Citie for the taking thereof, yea though he ſhould lay it euen with the ground: for why, the harmes they dayly receiued from the garriſon of that Citie were wonderfull.

Mahomet carefull of Strigonium.

At the ſametime alſo he was aduertiſed by his eſpials (of whom he maintained many for the diſcouerie of the enemies doings) that Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had writ vnto the Baſſa of Buda, carefully to prouide that his beloued citie of Strigonium tooke no harme, and not to ſpare either for men or money in time to relieue it: and therein to do nothing without the aduice and good liking of his old and faithfull ſeruant Alis Beg, who of long time had gouerned and alſo defended that citie: and to the intent that nothing ſhould be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had ſent Alexander Aga of the Ianizaries from the Court (whoſe ſeruice he might well haue ſpared) whoſe approued counſel and helpe he might alſo vſe in all things: I for that he had rather loſe ſome other whole kingdome, than that one citie: And that therefore he ſhould beware that it were not by the enemie woon, or by any compoſition yeelded: wherein if he failed, he threatened vnto him his heauie diſpleaſure, not to be appeaſed without the price of his head. Which ſo ſeuere a commandement of the great Sultans the Baſſa ſent to them of Strigonium; with moſt grieuous threats from himſelfe, if they, terrified with any batterie, vndermining, or aſſault, ſhould yeeld the citie, & not hold it out as became valiant ſouldiers vnto the laſt man, ſwearing to impale them all vpon ſtakes that ſhould conſent to the yeelding vp thereof. The old gouernor Alis Beg hauing receiued this ſo ſtrait a command from him that was both able and like ynough to performe what he had threatened; vtterly to deter the K ſouldiers from once thinking of yeelding, cauſed diligent enquirie to be made throughout the gariſon, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yeelding vp the citie, or otherwiſe murmured againſt their captaines or commanders appointing them to any ſeruice: and ſuch as he found to haue ſo done, he to the terror of others cauſed to be preſently executed: and after that went downe himſelfe into the lower towne, to ſee that nothing were there wanting or amiſſe, where moſt danger was. But when he would haue again returned into the vpper town, he was ſtayed by the Ianizaries, who told him, That ſeeing he was of ſo valiant and couragious a mind, and their gouernor, he ſhould there ſtay with them, and take ſuch part as they did, were it better or worſe: and ſo would he, or would he not, there needs ſtay he muſt.

Now the Baſſa's of Buda and Temeſware, with diuers Sanzackes as well of thoſe parts of Hungary which the Turks poſſeſſed, as other places, were aſſembling their forces for the relief of the beſieged in Strigonium: whereof the Tranſyluanian prince hearing, made ſhew as if he would forthwith haue beſieged Temeſwar, ſo that the Baſſa thereof leauing the intended expedition for Strigonium, was glad to returne for the defence of his owne charge. They alſo of Stiria, Carinthia, and Croatia, with the troupes of Countie Serinus had ſo ſtopped all the paſſages, that twelue thouſand Turks which were comming from Zigeth and the places thereabout, could by no meanes come to joine themſelues with their fellowes for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed citie.

The higher city of Strigonium battered by the Christians.

The Countie leauing nothing vnattempted or vndone that might help for the gaining of Strigonium, had made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed fiue great culuerins: wherewith he furiouſly battered the higher city, and did therein great harme: and thereby alſo brought to paſſe that no man could go vp or downe the hill betwixt the vpper towne and the lower, but he was in danger to be fet off with thoſe pieces, or the musketiers, who defended by thoſe great pieces, lay vpon the ſide of the hill in caues and buſhes, awaiting for ſuch as ſhould

A ſhould go vp or downe betwixt the two townes. Thus the Chriſtians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the ſtrong towne and fort of Gokara, ſtanding on the farther ſide of Danubius ouer againſt Strigonium, beſieged by the lord Palſi. But of all theſe places, Gokara was with the furie of the great ordnance moſt ſhaken: which the County perceiuing, cauſed the batterie to be encreaſed, and ſo continued, vntill he had beaten downe the counterſcarſe, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Morauians (vnto whoſe lot it fell) the one and twentieth of Iuly gaue an aſſault in fiue diuers places, whom the Lord Palſi ſeconded with his Hungarians, of whom certaine were of purpoſe appointed, beſide their armes, to bring things with them for the firing of the towne; which they in the time of the aſſault found means ſo well to beſtow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. B The Turks at firſt made notable reſiſtance, but finding themſelues ouerpreſſed, and ſeeing the towne now on a fire about their eares, which with the wind ſo encreaſed, that it caught hold of the lower towne on the other ſide of the riuer; they retired to the riuer ſide, where ſome of them by boats got ouer to Strigonium, other ſome periſhed in the riuer, the reſt falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were by them all put to the ſword. Gokara thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Chriſtians repairing the breaches, and ſtoring it with all warlike prouiſion, left in it a ſtrong gariſon. Within a night or two after, were two hundred of the Turks horſemen deſcried in a field faſt by, which cauſed an alarme to be raiſed in the campe, as if the whole armie of the Turks had been at hand: howbeit thoſe horſemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were only ſcouts ſent out by the Turks to take C view of the armie of the Chriſtians, in what ſort they lay incamped.

Gokara taken by the Chriſtians.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned, that a young country fellow ſecretly ſent out of the citie by the gouernor, and falling into the hands of Palſi, was by him ſent to the Countie; by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, from whence he came, whither he was going, and whereabouts: Whereunto the youth frankly anſwered, That he was ſent from the gouernor with letters to the Baſſa of Buda; which he preſently drew out of his boſome, and deliuered them vnto the Countie: who after he had read them, cauſed them to be cloſed vp againe, and ſo deliuered to the yong man, with ſome few crownes, commanding him to carrie them to the Baſſa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Baſſa's anſwer, promiſing for his D ſo doing to reward him bountifully: which the yong man vndertooke to do, and ſo departed. Now the purport of the gouernours letters was, That if the Baſſa did not within ſix or ſeuen days ſend him aid and relieue him, he ſhould for want of victuals & other things neceſſary for the holding out of the ſiege, be inforced either to abandon the city, or to yeeld it vp into the enemies hands. Wherunto the Baſſa returned anſwer by the aforeſaid meſſenger, that he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the meane time to be mindefull of his wonted valor, and not to be with any thing diſcouraged: appointing him the day, the houre, the way, the meane, with all the other circumſtances how he would relieue him. Which letters the yong man according to his promiſe deliuered vnto the Countie: who thereupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Baſſa. Within a day after alſo, one of the Turks canoniers conſidering the danger the city lay in, and fearing that it would be loſt, fled out of it into the campe: who beſides that he aptly declared the ſtate of the city, and the wants the beſieged E were in, did alſo afterwards good ſeruice during the time of the ſiege. The Turks had in this while many times ſallied out to their great loſſe: yet now vpon hope of better ſucceſſe, they aduentured the nine and twentieth of this moneth to ſally out againe; but with like fortune as before, leauing fourſcore of their men behinde them, hauing ſlaine but fiue of the Chriſtians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the ſpace of a moneth right worthily defended Strigonium, expecting ſtill for reliefe. At length newes was brought into the campe, That the Baſſa of Buda with 20000 men was comming to raiſe the ſiege: who the ſecond of Auguſt came accordingly, and with his armie encamped within foure miles of the Chriſtians: lying ſo nigh, that certaine of the Turks horſemen ſeeking after bootie, came very neere vnto the campe of the Chriſtians, and out of the paſtures, euen vnder their noſes, carried away ſome few horſes: againſt theſe deſperat aduenturers, certaine troups of the Hungarian and German horſemen iſ- F ſuing out, had with them an hot ſkirmiſh: but the Turkes of purpoſe retiring as men ouercharged, and the Chriſtians ſtill following on, had at length drawne them vnto the place where diuers other troupes of the Turks lay in ambuſh for them, who now ſtarting forth, on euery euery ſide hardly charged them. The Hungarian light horſemen well acquainted with ſuch skirmiſhes, ſeeing the danger, preſently fled and left the Germanes to themſelues: who for a G while valiantly encountered their enemies, but oppreſſed with multitude, were glad at laſt to flie alſo. In this skirmiſh of the Chriſtians were loſt and grieuouſly wounded about 100. The Turks encouraged with this ſo proſperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their armie, being before reſolued, by plaine force to open themſelues a way into the citie, and ſo to relieue the beſieged. Of all theſe things was not the Countie ignorant, as thereof forewarned by the Baſſa's letters before deliuered vnto him; and had therefore with his armie ſtrongly belaied all the wayes vnto the citie. Neuertheleſſe the enemie came ſtill on between the hils S. Thomas and S. George, and neere vnto the ſuburbs called the Raſcian citie, put themſelues in order of battell, as did alſo the Chriſtians, giuing the enemie leaue to come euen to their trenches. H In the mean time the Lord Palſi with his Hungarian horſemen fetching a compaſſe about the hill on the one ſide, and the lord Swartzenburg with his horſemen on the other, had ſo inclosed the Turks behind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both armies orderly ranged, and the ſignal of battell giuen, the Turks hauing before without any great harme done diſcharged 17 field pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a moſt hideous cry, and at the firſt onſet, with their Turkiſh arrowes, as with a thick ſhoure darkned the skie: when on the other ſide the German and Wallon horſmen with their petronels ſent their deadly ſhot as thicke as haile amongſt them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their coſt, how vnfit their light and halfe naked horſemen were in a ſet battell to meet with them ſo wel appointed: in a trice, but not without great ſlaughter, the battel was brought to the ſword, and to be tried by true valour: There was to be heard a cry heauens high, the thundering I of artillerie both great and ſmal, the clattering armor, the gliſtering weapons, the neighing of the horſes, the crying of the wounded, the heauie groanings of the dying, with the noiſe of the trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, made deaf the eares of the hearers, preſenting vnto them nothing but horror and euen preſent death. It was a moſt miſerable ſight to ſee ſo many men in ſo ſhort time ſlaine: for the battel had ſcarce endured halfe an houre, when many thouſands of the Turks lay dead vpon the ground, and the reſt ſeeing the victory incline to the Chriſtians, betooke themſelues to flight, leauing behind them their great ordnance and whatſoeuer els they brought for the reliefe of the beſieged: whom ſo flying, the lords Palſi & SwartZenburg (who had before taken the ſtraits whereby they were to paſſe between the mountains) K ſo receiued with their freſh horſmen, that of them that came that way few eſcaped. The Baſſa himſelfe, who ſtood vpon the hil, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his men, fled alſo himſelfe: the Baſſa of Natoſia with about 100 of the Turks moe by good fortune got into Strigonium.

The number of the Turks ſlain in this battel was great, and is of diuers diuerſly reported, ſome ſaying that there were ſlain 14000, and ſome fewer. Beſides them that were ſlaine, many were alſo taken, and ſome of them men of great name and place. There was alſo taken 27 enſignes, with a multitude of camels, aſſes, and mules, laded with mony, ſhot, pouder, and other neceſſarie prouiſion: all which, brought thither for the reliefe of the beſieged, became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In the heat of this battel they of the city ſallying out, had entred a fort of the Chriſtians vpon the riuer ſide, but were againe preſently driuen out, and with loſſe enforced to retire. L After this victorie the Countie ſent certaine companies of the Hungarian and Germane horſemen with 500 waggons to the enemies campe not far off in the mountaines: who comming thither found it vtterly forſaken by the enemie, but wel ſtored with all manner of neceſſarie prouiſion, which they carried all away, together with 600 tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, ſatin, and other ſilke, richly embroidered or layed with gold lace or gold twiſt. The Baſſa's rich Tent taken by the Colonell of the horſemen, was afterwards by him giuen vnto the Countie, as was alſo the plate and money there found, all which he diuided among the ſouldiers according to their deſerts. In the Turks campe were alſo found certaine heads of the Chriſtians, with the dead bodie of the Lord Brandenſteine, ſlaine in the conflict but the day before, which the Chriſtians carried away with them into the camp, and there honorably M buried them. Thoſe that remained of the Turks army hid themſelues in the mountains and woods, and ſo holpen by the darkneſſe of the night, made beſt ſhift for themſelues that they could. The Baſſa himſelfe accompanied but with twentie horſe came to Buda about midnight, and by his comming filled the Citie with great heauineſſe, euerie man lamenting

A his loſt friends. The Hungarian Heidons beſt acquainted with the countrie, pricking vp and down the mountains and by-waies, for certain dayes after the battell, brought in daily into the camp ſuch priſoners as they tooke, or els the heads of ſuch Turks as they ſlew. Of this ſo notable a victory, the Countie by a ſpeedy meſſenger certified the Archduke at Vienna, who rewarded him for his good news with a chaine worth fiue hundred duckats: and preſently cauſed the ſong of thankeſgiuing to be ſung in the church of the Auguſtine Friers, and afterward in all the churches of the citie. The Countie alſo to gratifie the Emperor, ſent him by the lord Chalon his nephew, vnto Prague, two of the chiefe priſoners taken in the late battel, with foure horſemens Guidons cunningly made of horſe haires, ſuch as are commonly carried before the greateſt commanders of the Turks armies, and foureteene other enſignes of the Turkes, with B foureteene moſt goodly horſes of the Turks, for a Preſent.

The next day after this battell, the Countie ſent the Lord Palſi with an interpretor vnto the citie, to demand it to be yeelded: who hauing audience, declared vnto the Turks in what danger they were, that the helpe they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be ſent vnto them; and that therefore it ſhould be good for them, whileſt yet they might, to be well aduiſed, and betime to bethinke themſelues of yeelding vp the citie, leſt haply when they would, it then would not be accepted: promiſing to intreat with the Generall, that they might in ſafetie depart, and with ſure conuoy be brought vnto ſuch place of ſafetie as were conuenient. Whereunto the beſieged Turks anſwered, That the Chriſtians had now fiue weekes lien at the ſiege, and muſt yet lie three weeks longer: and that whereas of C late ſome few of their friends came to haue relieued them, & had failed therein; there was yet an hundred thouſand moe to come after them, who if they ſhould not be able to perform that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliuer or forſake the citie, before they were readie to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to reſolue thereupon.

Now had the Chriſtians with long and continuall batterie ſore beaten both the vpper and the lower towne, which batterie they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the ſiege, and within the city their wants encreaſed daily, hauing nothing left to liue vpon but a little wheat and barly, with ſome horſe fleſh: vnto whom thus diſtreſſed, the D lord Palſi by the commandement of the Countie (to trie what confidence they yet had in themſelues) the ninth of Auguſt, ſent two Gentlemen to the citie, to do a meſſage from him to the Gouernour. Who aduertiſed thereof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Ianizaries, came to the wals to heare what they had to ſay; where one of the ſaid gentlemen in few words deliuered him this ſhort meſſage.

The meſſage ſent by the lord Palſi to the Gouernor of Strigonium.

My moſt gracious Lord the Lord Palſi, moſt worthie Gouernour greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to bee a Captaine both valiant and wiſe, and one that hath alwayes courteouſly vſed ſuch as haue fallen into thine hands, hath compaſſion of thy deſperate obſtinacie: and therefore, whereas thou art to looke or hope for nothing elſe but preſent death and deſtruction, bee as thy neighbour and a louer of thy vertues, aduiſeth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt ſaue thy ſelfe and thine from moſt vndoubted and imminent death and vtter confuſion, without delay to deliuer vp this citie, which thou canſt not longer hold.

E Vnto whom the old Gouernour thus without ſtay courteouſly anſwered:

The reſolute anſwer of the old Gouernour, to the meſſage ſent him by Palſi.

Thy ſpeech my friend, and thy maſters aduice are vnto me both vain. Tell the Lord Palſi in my name, that I cannot pleaſure him with the leaſt ſtone in this citie. One foot I haue alreadie in the graue, and wil with honour carrie theſe my gray haires into the ſame: and am yet comforted with a moſt certaine and vndoubted hope, that my moſt dread and mightie Soueraigne, and my Lord Sinan Baſſa will not forſake mee: yea and that if they ſhould write vnto mee, that they could finde no meanes or way to relieue me (which I am ſure they can) yet would I well, and at leiſure conſider, whither it were fit for me to deliuer vp this Citie or not; ſeeing that of the defence thereof, dependeth all mine honour and credit: Beſides that what reward they haue on both ſides, that ſo eaſily deliuer ouer the cities they haue in charge, all the world doth ſee.

With this anſwer he ſent them away. All this while the Aga of the Ianizaries ſtanding by, ſpoke not one word, but ſighing in ſilence and grinding his teeth, declared by his countenance his indignation and inward griefe.

lieth a little Iſland called Vizze, wherein many rich clothiers dwelt: this Iſland the Hungarian Heidons ſpoiled, and in returning thence, met with 24 wagons laded with corne, going to Buda, which they tooke, with eight and twentie priſoners which they brought into the camp. The lower towne being with long and continuall batterie made ſaultable, was by the Chriſtians the thirteenth of Auguſt, in three diuers places at once aſſaulted. The Bauarians were by lot to giue the firſt charge, who in the performing thereof, beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulſed by the Turkes) but ſeconded by them of Reitnaw and Sueuia, pluckt downe a great paliſado, filled the ditches, remoued whatſoeuer ſtood in their way, and ſo long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the comming in of the Marqueſſe of Burgawe with ſix enſignes of freſh men, they preuailed vpon the enemie, and ſo altogether brake in the towne. In the midſt of this dangerous fight was the Marqueſſe himſelfe, who both with his preſence and cheerefull ſpeech ſo encouraged his ſouldiers, that they as men fearing no perill, ran headlong into all danger vntill they had entred the towne: there might a man haue heard a moſt miſerable crie, eſpecially of women and children throughout the citie; when as the Chriſtians breaking in on euery ſide, ſlew whoſoeuer came in their way, without reſpect of age or ſex, ſparing neither woman great with child, neither the little children hanging at their mothers breaſts. Yet did not all that were entred, ſo much attend the preſent execution, as ſome of them did the ſpoile and prey; and eſpecially the Hungarians, vnto whom all was good bootie, euen the very hinges of the doores and windowes: whereby many eſcaped into the caſtle and vpper towne with the Baſſa and Aliu-Beg the old Gouernour. The Chriſtians had not many houres poſſeſſed the towne, but that diuers fires began to breake out in diuers places, but by what meanes was not at the firſt knowne. At laſt it was found out, that the Turks doubting the loſſe of the Towne, had before where they thought beſt left gunpouder, which taking fire by matches left burning for that purpoſe, ſhould at a certaine time ſet all on fire: by which means many moſt horrible fires were raiſed in the town, which conſumed many goodly buildings, and other things which might haue ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead, and could hardly be in a day or two quenched.

Countie Manſfeld died at Komara.

This ſo ioyfull a victorie ſaw not he, by whoſe good direction next vnder God it was gained, the worthie Countie: for hee a few daies before being fallen ſicke of a feauer, taken by drinking too much could drinke in his heat, with immoderat pains taking in the late battell, & ſo afterwards falling into a great flix with a feauer, was by the counſel of his phyſitians (for the better recouering of his health) remoued to Komara, as a place of more quietneſſe: hauing before his departure ſent for the Archduke to come into the camp, and for Blankemier into Bauaria to ſupplie his owne roome. But his diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, became at laſt deſperat, ſo that the phyſitians themſelues now diſpaired of his health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almoſt euery houre inquired how the armie did, and whither the citie were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking therof. But when it was told him a little before his death that the lower towne was woon, he thereat greatly reioiced, and the next day being the fourteenth of Auguſt, towards night quietly departed this world, to the great loſſe of the Chriſtian commonweale, and the exceeding griefe of the whole armie. A man euen from his childehood brought vp in armes, of ſtature great, but of courage greater, and painful aboue meaſure, not the leaſt cauſe of his vntimely death. All the time of this ſiege he took little reſt either by day or night, ſcarce ſo much as to lie downe vpon his bed in two or three nights together. The little meat he did eat, he moſt part eat it ſtanding or walking, yea & ſomtimes on horſbacke: he was a moſt ſeuere obſeruer of martiall diſcipline, which cauſed him to be of his ſoldiers both beloued and feared. His bowels were with due ſolemnitie buried at Komara where he died, but his bodie was brought backe againe to Luxenburg, there to be honourably enterred with his anceſtors.

About which time Theodore the great Duke of Muſcouia, hearing of the wars betwixt the Emperor & the Turke, ſent two Embaſſadors with letters and Preſents to the Emperor: which Embaſſadors comming to Prague the ſixteenth of Auguſt, accompanied with two hundred and fiftie horſe, were by the Emperours appointment, honourably receiued and entertained. And afterward hauing audience, firſt deliuered the letters of credence from the great Duke, reported to haue beene of this purport.

Your

The copy of the great dukes letters vnto the Emperour.

A Your Maieſtie hath ſent vnto vs your Embaſſadour Nicholas Warkotſie, requeſting our brotherly aid againſt the hereditarie enemie of all Chriſtianitie, the Turkiſh Sultan. Wherefore we alſo deſiring to liue with you our deere and welbeloued brother in all perpetuall amitie and friendſhip, ſend vnto you by our faithfull counſellor and ſeruant Michael Iwanowitze, and Iohn Sohnie, aid out of our treaſurie againſt the ſaid enemie: vnto whome we haue alſo giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your Maieſtie, requeſting you to giue vnto them in all things full credit. Giuen in the great Court of our power at Muſco, in the yeare of the world 7103, and from the natiuitie of Chriſt 1595, in the moneth of Aprill.

What things in particular theſe Embaſſadors were ſent for, was not commonly knowne, but among others it is ſaid, That the Muſcouite requeſted the Emperor to ſend an embaſſador vnto the B Perſian king, to draw him alſo into the league with them againſt the Turke: which Embaſſadour ſhould firſt come into Muſcouia, and that way to paſſe into Perſia. The Preſents which the great Duke ſent vnto the Emperor, were, an hundred and fiftie thouſand Florens of gold, great ſtore of moſt rich furs, and precious perfumes deemed to be of exceeding value, two white Faulcons, and three Leopards aliue. And Iwanowitze the Embaſſador himſelfe, preſented vnto the Emperour of himſelfe, certaine rich Turkie, Perſian, and Babylonian hangings and carpets, certain timbers of Sables, with other rich furs no leſſe precious than Sables, ſo many as eight porters could hardly carrie. Theſe Embaſſadors tarried at Prague vntill the ſeuen and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with the Emperours anſwer to the Duke.

C But to returne againe vnto Strigonium. The Chriſtians now poſſeſſed of the lower towne, bent their whole batterie vpon the higher towne, where it fortuned the fourteenth of Auguſt that the old Gouernour Alis-Beg, whileſt he was carefully walking from place to place to ſee where moſt danger was, had his arm ſtruck off with a great ſhot, of which hurt he preſently died. He was a man of great grauitie, about the age of fourescore yeres, & had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous citie, the loſſe whereof was like enough to haue been vnto him greater griefe than was the loſſe of his life there. Much about the ſame time alſo died the Aga of the Ianizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chiefe commanders thus ſlaine, the Ianizaries with the other ſouldiers and citiſens made choice of the Baſſa D of Natolia (who as is aforeſaid eſcaped out of the late battell into the citie) for their Gouernor) who with heauie cheere tooke vpon him that forlorne charge. The Chriſtians not ignorant of the death of theſe two worthy men, in whoſe great and approued valor they ſuppoſed the chiefe defence of the citie to haue reſted, were in good hope that now the reſt would the more readily hearken to ſome good compoſition; and therefore ſent a meſſenger to demand if they would yet whileſt there were ſome mercie left, yeeld the citie. Who though they had loſt their chiefe Commanders with the greateſt part of the garriſon, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things elſe neceſſarie for their defence; yet their anſwere was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the laſt man. The greateſt cauſe of which their obſtinat reſolution, was the ſtrait charge the Baſſa of Buda had giuen them for the defence thereof: beſides that, they accounted their city holy, as won by their magnificent Emperor Solyman, whom the Turks generally yet haue in a deuout remembrance; and therfore thought it a great impietie to deliuer it vp vnto the Chriſtians. The next day after came Matthias the Archduke into the campe; who after he had well viewed the whole armie and the manner of the ſiege, he called together into his tent the chiefe commanders, namely the Marqueſſe of Burgaw his couſin, Iohn de Medices the Florentine, and the Lord Palſi the Hungarian; to conſult with them, what were further to be done for the winning of the citie. Shortly after, he commanded the citie to be at once in two places aſſaulted, which was by the Wallons and Germanes couragiouſly performed: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, that when the Chriſtians had done what they could, they were glad at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retire. About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three Counties his brethren to the ſiege, and now the Turks began againe to draw together neere vnto Buda, there to make head for the reliefe of Strigonium, and to be reuenged of the loſſe they had there before receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, ſent out againſt them eight thouſand choſen ſouldiers out of the campe, who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks in their campe, before the riſing of the Sunne made a great ſlaughter amongſt them, and tooke certaine priſoners, of whome the Sanzacke of Copan was one: and ſo with victuals returned to the ſiege.

The beſieged Turks in Strigonium vnderſtanding of this ouerthrow of their friends, from whom they expected moſt ſpeedie reliefe, and beſide the terror of the continuall batterie and ſtill-feared aſſaults; pinched alſo with extreme wants of all things, began now to faint. Wherefore the Baſſa with the other captains, ouercome with the aforeſaid difficulties, and the generall outcrie of the fearful people, reſolued with one conſent to come now to parley, and vpon reaſonable conditions to yeeld vp the citie: whereupon a flag of truce was ſet vp, and parley craued. Which granted, the Archduke after the going downe of the Sun came into the lower town, where nine of the Turks attended his comming: who entring into parley, required that they might vnder ſafe conuoy with bag and baggage depart, & ſo leaue him the citie: which the Archduke would not by any means agree vnto. At length with much intreatie, they obtained that they might vpon the ſame conditions depart, that the Chriſtians did at Rab; with their ſcimitars by their ſides, & ſo much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backs, vnto ſuch ſhips as were to be appointed for the cariage of them to Buda. For the performance whereof, hoſtages were on both ſides giuen: and ſo the next day (being the 2 of September) they began to come out of the citie, moe in number than either the priſoners taken in the time of the ſiege had confeſſed, or the Chriſtians had thought. Thirty ſhips were appointed for the conueying of them down the riuer to Buda, which not ſufficing, many of them tarried in the city vntill the next day, at which time the Baſſa with the ſicke and wounded ſailed to Buda, the priſoners and pledges on both ſides being before faithfully deliuered. Thus by the goodneſſe of God and the good conduct of a few valiant Chriſtians, was Strigonium the Metropolitical citie of Hungarie, after it had 52 yeares groaned vnder the miſerable yoke of the Turkiſh ſeruitude, againe reſtored vnto the Chriſtian commonweale: which the Chriſtians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought beſt for the defence thereof againſt the enemie. All which being done, about the midſt of this month the Archduke ſent eighteen thouſand to beſiege Vicegrade, otherwiſe called Plindenburg, a ſtrong caſtle of the Turks vpon the riuer between Strigonium and Buda; which caſtle they tooke. Which when they of Buda vnderſtood, they were ſtrucken with ſuch a feare, that many of the better ſort were readie to forſake the citie; inſomuch, that the Baſſa to ſtay their flight, was glad to command the gates of the citie to be ſhut vpon them, and no man ſuffered to paſſe out. This good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in theſe warres, cauſed great reioicing to be made in moſt parts of Chriſtendome.

Strigonium yeelded vnto the Chriſtians.

The caſtle of Vicegrade taken by the Chriſtians.

All this while the Chriſtians were thus buſied at the ſiege of Strigonium, the Tranſyluanian Prince was not idle, but in diuers places did the Turks exceeding much harm; ſo that now his name began to be dreadful vnto them. It fortuned that the ſame day that the county Manſfelt departed at Komara, that the Prince at Alba-Iulia with great ſolemnitie married Maria Chriſtina, the daughter of the late Archduke Charles the ſonne of the Emperor Ferdinand; her other ſiſter Anna being before married vnto Sigiſmund, now King of Polonia: for ſo it was agreed for the more aſſurance of the league between the Emperor and him, that he ſhould take his wife out of the houſe of Auſtria, which he now did. Of this ſolemnitie the Turks (his euill neighbours) hauing intelligence, aſſembling to the number of 30000 or more, thought as vnwelcome gueſts to haue come vnbidden or vnlooked for thereunto: but the vigilant Prince vnderſtanding of their comming, prouided for their entertainment accordingly, and ſetting his pleaſures for a while apart, and comming vpon them when they leaſt looked for him, in a great battell ouerthrew them, and ſlew moſt part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant victor, the whole ſpoile of his enemies.

About the ſame time the Tranſyluanians alſo beſieged Fagiat a town holden by the Turks not far from Temeſwar, where after they had lien twelue daies, they of the towne diſpairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and couenanting to depart with bag and baggage, began to goe out of the towne. But in their departure, vnderſtanding that the Baſſa of Temeſwar with the Sanzacks of Lippa and Ienne were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the towne began to finde delaies, and they that were alreadie gone out began to returne. Wherewith the Tranſyluanians much moued, by plaine force entered the towne, & put them all to the ſword: and afterward turning vpon the Baſſa, who with ten thouſand Turks and certaine field pieces was comming to haue relieued the towne, had with them a cruell battell; wherin moſt part of the Turks fell with ſmal loſſe of the Tranſyluanians: who ſo eagerly purſued

A ſued the victorie, that the Baſſa himſelfe had much adoe with fiue hundred others to eſcape. The two Sanzackes, with diuers others of good place, were taken and ſent priſoners to the Prince. Not long after, about the latter end of Auguſt, the Tranſyluanians alſo beſieged Lippa, a famous citie of Hungarie, ſtanding vpon the riuer Maracz, not far from Temeſwar, which the Turkes being not able longer to hold, fled into the caſtle: where finding themſelues in no great ſafetie, after three daies ſiege they came to parle, and ſo yeelded, vpon condition that they might in ſafety depart with ſo much of their goods as they could themſelues carrie. About which time alſo the Baſſa of Boſna with ten thouſand Turkes and Tartars went forth to haue againe recouered Babotſca, a frontier towne, before taken by the Chriſtians: which the Stirians and the reſt of the Chriſtians dwelling thereabouts, betweene the two riuers of B Sauus and Drauus, vnderſtanding, conducted by the Lords Herbenſtein, Leucowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of thoſe frontiers, ouertooke the ſaid Turks and Tartars neere vnto Babotſca, fought with them, and in the plaine field ouerthrew them.

Lippa taken by the Tranſyluanians.

Mahomet not a little grieued with the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in euery part of Hungarie, and aboue meaſure offended with Ferat Baſſa his General, through whoſe negligence all or at leaſtwiſe moſt part of this had hapned (as he was by the enuie of Sinan Baſſa perſuaded) ſent for Ferat home, and in his place ſent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans diſpleaſure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that beſt knew, euen the Sultans mother, and aduiſed not to come in ſight vntill his peace were made. Who neuertheleſſe truſting to his owne innocencie (the comfortable, but moſt dangerous and weake ſtay of the great) and C doubting not to anſwere whatſoeuer Sinan ſhould bee able to charge him with, came to the court: where he was by the commandement of Mahomet ſhortly after ſtrangled, and his goods to the value of fiue hundred thouſand duckats confiſcated.

Ferat Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople, & there ſtrangled.

Sinan Baſſa ſent in Ferats ſtead.

Among all the dangerous enemies of the Chriſtian common-weale, was none at this time more cruell than was Sinan, an Epyrot borne, a fiſhers ſonne, of a rough and vnciuile diſpoſition, now about fourescore and three yeares old, euen from his youth brought vp in the wars: and yet (as his Motto was) breathing nothing but Bloud and Warre. He had many times fortunatly led the huge armies of the Turkiſh Emperours, Solyman, Selymus, and Amurath, and is now ſent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fitteſt man to reduce the late reuolted countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, to their former thraldome: which hee before promiſed vnto Mahomet, vpon perill of his head to doe. D Hee hauing raiſed a right puiſſant army, by a bridge made of boats (after a moneths labour ſpent therein) paſſed ouer the great riuer of Danubius into Valachia: of whoſe comming the Tranſyluanians, with the Valachians and Moldauians hauing knowledge, had before ſo ſhut vp the paſſages of the countrie, as that he could not without much danger haue farre entered; and were alſo readie with their vnited forces euen at his firſt entrance to giue him battell. Which hee not refuſing, there began a moſt mortall and cruell fight, with much bloudſhed on both ſides. Thrice were the Tranſyluanians enforced to retire, but ſtill relieued with new ſupplies, and knowing that they then carried in their armes the welfare of their whole Countrey, came on freſh againe, and as hardly charged the Turkes, as they had beene by them charged. Thus with doubtfull E fortune and great ſlaughter was the battell maintained from the morning vntill night, victorie with doubtfull wings houering now ouer the one ſide, now ouer the other: vntill that at length, the Turkes ouercome by true valour, their battells beeing quite diſordered and broken, were now glad to ſeeke to ſaue themſelues by flight. In this battell, being fought the eleuenth of September, beſides many thouſands of the common ſouldiers, were ſlaine alſo diuers of great account amongſt the Turks: and amongſt the reſt Haider Baſſa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead euen in the ſame place where the battell was fought. Sinan himſelfe, in making too much haſte to get ouer the bridge, fell into the deep mud, and in that generall confuſion of his armie, was like enough there to haue periſhed: but as the common Prouerbe goeth, Seldome lyeth the Deuill dead in a dike, the old Veiliarde was with much adoe drawne out by them of his guard, and ſo ſaued to further miſchiefe. Neuertheleſſe, the danger was ſo great, that for certaine dayes it was commonly reported, that hee was there drowned, moſt of his owne people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the ſpoile of the Turks became a prey vnto the Chriſtians, as did alſo their great ordnance, & many of their enſignes; amongſt which was one greene one, which they accounted religious, as

A mortall battel betwixt Sinan and the Tranſyluanian Prince.

The Turkes ouerthrowne.

Sinan in flying like to be drowned.

ſacred to their Prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greateſt diſtreſſe flie, as vnto their laſt refuge : there was taken alſo all their tents, with great aboundance of Victuals and G other warlike prouiſion.

The old Baſſa thus ouerthrowne, full of griefe, and euen mad for deſpight, poſted himſelfe in all haſt to the Court, thinking it better himſelfe to make the beſt of that which was indeed nought, than to haue it made worſe than nought by the enuious report of others: and withall to fill the mind of the great Sultan with deſire of reuenge, which no man ſo much longed after, as himſelfe ; wherein he ſo diſcreetly vſed the matter, as that the late loſſe was eaſily paſſed ouer, as receiued by the common chance of war, or any other occaſion els whatſoeuer rather than by any default of his; and new commiſſion giuen him for the raiſing of another armie for the ſubduing of the late reuolted countries. In the meane time, to ſhew his hatred vnto H the Chriſtians, and to pleaſe the eyes of them of the court with the noueltie of the fight, he cauſed an hundred and twelue Chriſtian captiues whom he had in priſon at Belgrade, to bee brought in chains like beaſts to Conſtantinople; and ſo being led through the principal ſtreets of the city, to the vain contentment of the citiſens, to be brought to the court gate for the Sultan to looke vpon, and the courtiers to deride : from whence they were after many vnſpeakeable indignities conueyed to moſt miſerable and loathſome priſons, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation.

The Turkes ouerthrowne in Croatia.

About this time the Turks vnder the command of the Baſſa of Boſna, to the number of almoſt twentie thouſand, made a rode into Croatia, where they were by the Chriſtians vnder the leading of the Lord Eckenberg and Lencowitz ouerthrowne and almoſt all ſlaine: the Chriſtians following the chaſe euen into the Turks frontiers, burnt fifteen of their villages, & took I the caſtle of Varuiuar : immediatly after, their forces encreaſing by the comming in of the Lord Herbenſtein, Gouernor of Valeria and Windiſmarche, and certaine other troups of horſemen out of Carinthia and the countries thereabouts, they returned the thirteenth of September to beſiege Petrinia, otherwiſe called Petrowina; which becauſe they were in hope to take by aſſault, they euen at their firſt comming couragiouſly aſſailed. But after two houres hard fight, finding both greater reſiſtance, and more difficultie than they had before ſuppoſed to haue found, and that without great ordnance (which could not in ſhort time be got ouer the mountains) there was no good to be done, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, & with ſuch loſſe as they had receiued, to returne to Siſeg, there to conſult further of the matter. But the K ſame night a fugitiue horſeman fled from the enemie, came to the camp and told the Chriſtians, That Ruſtan Beg, Gouernor of Petrinia was in the late aſſault wounded in the breaſt with a ſmall ſhot, and dead : and that the Turks in the towne diſcouraged with his death and the late ouerthrow of their friends in Croatia, would vpon the firſt ſight of them abandon the town, if they would but againe returne to beſiege it. Vpon which good hope the Chriſtians preſently riſe, and ſet forward again towards Petrinia: which the Turks (hearing of their comming) had before, as the ſouldier reported, for feare abandoned. So the Chriſtians without reſiſtance entering the towne, found therein ſome pillage, but better ſtore of ſhot and pouder : and preſently ſending for certain troups of horſemen to purſue the flying Turks, took diuers of them, and among the reſt the late Gouernors Lieutenant, whom they brought backe againe into the L towne. Thus was Petrinia againe recouered from the Turks, to the great quiet and ſafetie of all that ſide of the countrie.

Petrinia taken by the Chriſtians.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince not ignorant with what an enemie he had to do, either of the malice of old Sinan, who he knew would not be long before he returned, or yet of the ſecret practiſe of the Polonians, for the withdrawing of the countrie of Moldauia from him, ſought now by all means (as it ſtood him vpon) to make himſelfe ſo ſtrong as he could againſt ſo many ſtormes ariſing. It fortuned that euen at the ſame time the Zaculians (better known by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as then tributary vnto the Turks, bordring vpon the Northeaſt part of Tranſyluania; now weary of the Turkiſh thraldome, and ſeeing the good ſucceſſe of the Prince, and the late reuolted countries their neighbors, offered vnto the Prince their ſeruice; promiſing of their owne charge to maintaine forty thouſand men in the field during his wars with the Turke, and yearely to pay him of euerie houſe a dollar, with a certaine meaſure of wheat, oats, and barly, after the manner of their owne countrey : and further, That if God ſhould bleſſe him with a ſon to ſucceed him in his gouernment, euerie houſholder ſhould giue vnto him a good fat oxe. For all which ſeruice they craued no more, but that they might as his ſubiects liue vnder his protection: yet ſo, as to be gouerned by their owne antient lawes and cuſtomes. Of which their offer the Prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their campe, and all the people ſworne to the performance of the aforeſaid agreement. And hauing at that preſent but fiue and twentie thouſand in the field, they without delay ſent out their officers to preſſe out fifteene thouſand moe, for the filling vp of the promiſed number of fortie thouſand; wherewith they came vnto the Prince, who taking a view of his armie, found himſelfe to be now foureſcore thouſand men ſtrong to welcome the Baſſa withall when he ſhould come againe into his countrey.

The prince taketh a view of his armie.

Now had Sinan with great ſpeed raiſed an armie of 70000 choice ſoldiers, amongſt whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire. With which power joined vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himſelfe ſtrong enough for the ſubduing of the Prince: vnto whom came alſo afterward Haſſan Baſſa the ſon of the great Baſſa Muhamet, one of the Turks moſt renowned men of warre, and Bogdanus the late expulſed Vayuod of Valachia, with many others of great name. With this armie the old Baſſa by a bridge which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, paſſed ouer the great riuer of Danubius at a towne called Zorza or Giorgo (with vs S. George) in Valachia, a great way beneath that place where ſometime the Emperor Trajan built his famous bridge of ſtone, worthily accounted amongſt the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world. From Zorza hee marched with his armie to Tergouiſta, (ſometime the Vayuod his chiefe citie, but then in the power of the Turks) where is a notable monaſtery, which he conuerted into a caſtle, fortifying it with deepe trenches and ſtrong bulwarks, and good ſtore of great ordnance, purpoſing to make that the ſeat of his war, vntil he had againe reſtored thoſe late reuolted Countries vnto the Turkiſh Empire, which he vpon paine of his head had vndertaken to performe. The Prince both by meſſengers and letters vnderſtanding of the Baſſa's arriual there, and hauing his armie in good readineſſe, ſet forward to meet him and to giue him battell. But being come into Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That a great Eagle deſcending from an high rocke there by, called, The Kings rocke, and houering ouer the Chriſtian armie, flew about the Princes Tent, and there lighting, was taken and preſented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the preſage of his good fortune, holding on ſtill his way; and the fifteenth of October beeing come within halfe a dayes march of Tergouiſta, he vnderſtood by two Chriſtians lately eſcaped from the Turks, That two dayes before, the Turks hearing of his comming were ſtrucken with ſuch a generall and ſudden feare, that Sinan had much ado either by faire meanes or by foule to ſtay the Ianizaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certain companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the truth was, That Sinan ſeeing the general feare of his armie, and he himſelf no leſſe fearefull than the reſt; vpon the Princes approch fled with all his armie, leauing behind him for haſt his tents, his great ordnance, with much victuals & other warlike prouiſion, carrying with him only ſuch things as were of moſt value. As for the city of Tergouiſta, with the caſtle which he had made of the monaſterie, he committed to the keeping of Haſſan Baſſa and Bogdanus the late Vayuod, now become a renegate Turke, with a garriſon of 4000 choſen ſoldiers, promiſing within a few dayes if need ſhould be, to relieue them, but fled himſelfe in all haſte with his armie to Buchareſta, a dayes journey from Tergouiſta. From whence he preſently writ backe againe to Haſſan Baſſa, willing him if he could to defend the caſtle; but if he ſhould thinke it not poſſible to be kept againſt the power of the Prince, then betime to forſake it and to ſhift for himſelfe. But theſe letters being intercepted by the Chriſtians, neuer came to the Baſſa's hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the Prince comming to Tergouiſta, entred the forſaken campe, where he found many tents with ſome ordnance, and great ſtore of victuals, and without further delay ſummoned both the citie and the caſtle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Haſſan conſidering the flight of Sinan, the power of the Prince, and withall doubting if need ſhould be, to be relieued by Sinan, whom he not without cauſe ſuſpected not to loue him, was about vpon ſome reaſonable compoſition to haue yeelded vp both the city & the caſtle: wherunto the garriſon ſoldiers (being moſt part of them Ianizaries) would not in any caſe giue their conſent, but ſtood vpon the defence of the place. Wherupon the prince began furiouſly to batter both the city and the caſtle, and after ſome few houres battery, by aſſault tooke both, & put to ſword the whole gariſon; only Haſſan Baſſa, as taken with his owne hand, he ſpared, and two other Sanzacks. Bogdanus the renegate was there ſlaine among the reſt. The Chriſtians had there a rich prey, beſides 42 great pieces of ordnance, and good ſtore of all manner of warlike prouiſion. Haſſan thus taken, grieuouſly complained, That Sinan had of a malicious purpoſe expoſed him to ſo manifeſt peril, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Viſier Mahomet, vpon whom becauſe he could neuer be reuenged, he now by ſiniſter means had cunningly performed it vpon his ſon: yet he craued of the Prince to be wel vſed, offering for his ranſome 100000 Hungarian duckets. Whilſt the prince yet thus lay at Tergouiſta, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence, ſent forth to ſpoile the countrey, and to ſeeke after prey, thinking to haue there found him ſtill: who now falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were there all ſlain, and 60000 head of cattel recouered, which theſe Turks had taken out of Valachia and Moldauia, & ſhould by Sinans appointment haue bin ſent to Conſtantinople. For Valachia and Moldauia do ſo abound with corne and cattell, that they plentifully ſerue the Imperial city of Conſtantinople not only with corne and fleſh, but alſo yerely ſend at the leaſt 150 ſhips thither by the blacke ſea, laded with other kinde of victuals. Of which ſo great commodities the Turks were now depriued, by the reuolt of the aforeſaid countries.

Bucareſta takē by the Prince.

The Prince leauing a ſtrong garriſon in Tergouiſta, ſet forward with his armie towards Bucareſta, hoping there to haue found Sinan. But he hearing of the loſſe of Tergouiſta, and thinking himſelfe in no good ſafetie at Bucareſta, fled thence alſo to Zorza. The Prince comming to Bucareſta, found it abandoned by the Turks, and ſo took it without reſiſtance, yet had therein certaine field pieces, with good ſtore of ſhot and pouder left there by Sinan. Hauing there ſtayed a while for the manning of the place, hee ſet forwards againe towards Zorza; and that with ſuch ſpeed, that he ouertooke great numbers of the Turks, whom he put all to the ſword: ſo that the fields betwixt Bucareſta and Zorza were in many places couered with the dead bodies of the Turks. Neuertheleſſe he could not make ſo great haſte, marching ſtill in good order, but that the fearefull Baſſa diſorderly haſting, was about ſome ſix houres or more before come to the bridge he had with great charge made ouer the riuer of Danubius; the forme whereof you may here ſee:

Ouer the hithermoſt part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greateſt part of his armie (before the comming of the Prince) got ouer into an Iſland in the midſt of the riuer, wherin he had at his comming ouer incamped: but doubting now there to ſtay, with all the ſpeed he could got him ouer the other part of the bridge alſo vnto the farther ſide of the riuer, with ſo many of his men as in ſo ſhort time poſſibly could. Where to ſtay the farther purſuit of the Prince, hee brake the bridge on that ſide, and ſet fire vpon it: and thereby cut off alſo many of his owne men that were not as yet come ouer. Whom the prince incloſing, forced many of them into the riuer, where they periſhed; the reſt flying into the Iſland, were by the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing them, either there ſlaine, or ſeeking by the other part of the bridge to haue got ouer, (whereof the farther end was before broken downe by Sinan, and the hither end toward the Iſland now cut off by the Chriſtians) were together with the bridge carried away by the violence of the riuer, and ſo altogether periſhed. Other ſome of the Chriſtians in the meane time tooke the bridge that leadeth vnto the caſtle of Zorza, which ſtandeth compaſſed about with an arme of Danubius, and being not very great, was kept by a garriſon of ſeuen hundred ſelect ſouldiers. Vnto which caſtle the prince preſently laied ſiege, (the reſolute ſouldiers being not by any meanes to be perſuaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out euen vnto the laſt man) and after he had ſore battered it, by plain force tooke it, and put to the ſword all the garriſon ſoldiers he could lay hands vpon. About an hundred of theſe Turks ſeeing they muſt needs fall into the power of their enemies, deſperatly leapt from the top of the caſtle into the riuer, where not one of them eſcaped, being all either drowned or ſlaine with ſmall ſhot. In the winning of this caſtle, two hundred and fiftie of the Chriſtians were loſt, and many wounded: but of the Turks and Tartars, betwixt the eighteenth and the laſt of October, periſhed aboue ſix and twentie thouſand. In this caſtle were taken thirtie nine great pieces, with ſuch ſtore of armour and other warlike prouiſion, as might haue ſerued for an whole kingdome, and foure thouſand Chriſtians beſide women and children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, reſtored to their former libertie. With whom the Prince after he had ſet all things in order, returned in great triumph to Tergouiſta, and ſo afterwards to his palace at Alba-Iulia, where, as alſo at Claudiopolis and other cities through his dominions, he cauſed publike prayers with thankſgiuing to almightie God, to be deuoutly made for ſo great a victorie: as did alſo Michael the Vayuod in Valachia; who in all theſe great wars againſt the Turks was nothing inferior vnto the Tranſyluanian himſelfe. A greater loſſe than this, the Turkiſh Emperor receiued not at land in many yeares before, being by this ſo happie & victorious a Prince, and the reuolt of theſe three countries, depriued of ſo much territory as they had not from the Chriſtians of long time gained. It was by ſome of them of the better ſort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Baſſa ſhould oftentimes ſay, That this yong Tranſyluanian Prince had bereft him of all the honor & renown he had with great trauel got in the courſe of his long life; and that although he had eſcaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cauſe for him in theſe his great yeares, euen in the winding vp of all, to loſe his life together with his goods and honor. Now was the Tranſyluanian Princes name (after the ouerthrow of this great Baſſa) become dreadful vnto the Turks, and alſo famous through all Chriſtendome. Which as it hath filled the eares of many with admiration, ſo haply may the liuely repreſentation of his feature by cunning hand ſet forth, feed the longing eyes of ſome with delight, and ſerue in better ſtead than the rude deſcription of his perſon.

Miles eras Chriſti, nulli pietate ſecundus Et ſolus patriæ gloria magna tua Inclita. Si virtus, quæ te ſuper æthera vexit,

Of Chriſt thou waſt a ſouldier true inferiour vnto none;
Thy countries joy and glorie great, vnto the world wel knowne.
If worthie vertue that thee rais'd aboue the ſtarrie skie, With ſtedfaſt pace had run the race ſo well begun by thee.

Ienna yeelded to the Tranſyl-uanians.

Whileſt this worthie Prince was thus buſied in this expedition againſt Sinan, he cauſed the caſtle of Ienna (ſtanding vpon the highway betweene Temeſwar and Giula) to be beſieged by certaine of his captaines appointed to that ſeruice; in which caſtle lay one of the Turks Sanzackes with a garriſon of 700 Turks, who much troubled ſuch as paſſed that way. They now brought to ſome extremitie, and terrified with the ſucceſſe of the Prince, offered to giue vp the caſtle, ſo that as ſouldiers with their ſcimiters by their ſides they might in ſafetie be brought to Panoda. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now vpon their way, the Hungarian light horſemen that ſhould haue conducted them, enformed that theſe Turkes now vnder their charge had ſecret intelligence with the Turks in garriſon at Giula and Temeſware, That they ſhould lie in ambuſh for them neere Panoda, and ſo cut them off by the way; ſet

A ſet vpon theſe Turks whom they ſhould haue conducted, and cut the throats of foure hundred of them: and yet ſtill holding on their way, met with theſe Turks that lay in ambuſh for them, whom they after a ſharpe skirmiſh ouerthrew, and hauing ſlaine a great many of them, put the reſt to flight. By the taking of Ienna the wayes thereabout were quieted, eſpecially for them of Waraden. The Sanzacke of Ienna reported, That Mahomet had a little before ſent word vnto his Baſſa's and Sanzackes in Hungarie, That ſuch caſtles and townes as they thought were not to be defended againſt the Chriſtians, they ſhould betimes as occaſion ſerued, yeeld them vp, or forſake them, ſo to ſpare the needleſſe loſſe of his good ſoldiers: of whom he had with ſo many townes and ſtrong holds loſt no ſmal number this yere in Hungarie. Ienna thus taken, diuers of the richer ſort in Temeſware fearing to be euen preſently beſieged, ſent their wiues B and children with their treaſure and ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, out of the citie in waggons to be conueyed vnto places of more ſafetie: of which waggons, ſeuentie were by the Chriſtians (lying thereabout in garriſon) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich bootie.

Mahomet hauing this yere fully purpoſed the vtter ruine of the Tranſyluanian prince, & the reducing of the countries of Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and Valachia, vnto his obeiſance by the great Baſſa Sinan: had for the better effecting thereof, before prouided that the Crim Tartar (readie ſtill at his call) ſhould with his owne people (whereof he hath great ſtore) and certaine bands of the Turks, at the ſame time inuade Moldauia; and poſſeſſing himſelfe of this country, to place one Sidriake Vayuod, in ſtead of Stephen placed by the Prince, and to people the countrey C with his Tartars, in reward of his good ſeruice, as he ſaid; but indeed to haue them always neere at hand to do his commandements in Hungary, Polonia, Tranſiluania, or the other countries of the Chriſtians thereunto adioyning. The Tartar according to his appointment, came with 70000 Tartars, accompanied with their wiues and children, to haue planted themſelues in the countrey, at the very ſame time that Sinan came to Tergouiſta. But being come vpon the frontiers of Moldauia, to haue put in execution what he was by Mahomet commanded, he found there Zamoſchie the great Chancellour of Polonia readie with a ſtrong armie to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, and to ſtay his farther paſſage. Whereupon ſome light skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Tartars and the Polonians: where the Tartars were ſtill put to the worſe with the loſſe of three thouſand of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake the Vayuod apD pointed by the Turke, finding themſelues, though in number moe, yet in ſtrength inferior vnto the Polonian, and that without his good leaue he could not paſſe; ſent vnto the Chancellor to excuſe that was alreadie paſt, as done without their conſent by the inſolencie of their ſoldiers; and to tell him, That their comming was not to fight with him, as hauing expreſſe commandement from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no caſe to diſturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to paſſe by their frontiers into Moldauia, and there to place Sidriake Vayuod his tributary, in ſtead of Stephen that now vſurped the place by the appointment of the Tranſyluanian; which that they might do, they craued his leaue as friends to paſſe. Whereunto the Chancellor anſwered, That he was come thither by the commandement of the King, to defend thoſe countries from the inuaſion of ſuch as had in them no right: and that there had of long time bin an antient league betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkiſh Emperours, vpon certaine conditions, which he would for his part keepe inuiolate, with the fauor of the Turkiſh Emperor, yet ſo, as that the kingdom of Polonia tooke no harme thereby, and that they might quietly liue by him as their good neighbor; which league he proteſted not to haue beene by him, but by them infringed: as for to giue them paſſage, he ſaid he could not. Meſſengers paſſing thus to and fro, and ſome parley had, at laſt certaine articles were agreed vpon, to the reaſonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor (though not of Sidriake, diſappointed thereby of his Vayuodſhip) as alſo of the Turkiſh Sultan, whoſe pleaſure they both ſeemed to haue in ſpeciall regard. Hereupon the Tartar with his multitude preſenly returned, leauing the Chancellor to his owne deſignes. Now was it commonly thought, that the Chancellor had done the Tranſyluanian prince great ſeruice by keeping out of the Tartars, & much honor was by many that ſaw leaſt ſpoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thought to do the Tranſyluanian therin any ſuch good, at whoſe glory he enuied, and had with the cardinal and his brother, the Princes vnkles (but moſt deadly enemies) ſecretly conſpired, ſo much as in them was, his vtter ruine and ouerthrow: wiſhing thoſe Countries rather in the ſubiection of the Turke, than to ſee them ſo honorably at libertie, gouerned by the Prince: ſuch is G the force of malicious enuie, the inſeperable companion of worthie vertue. Which the Chancellor (otherwiſe a man of great fame and honor) began now openly to poure forth: for preſently after the departure of the Tartars, hee with all his power paſſing ouer the riuer Nijeſter or Tyros, into Moldauia, euen at ſuch time as the prince was going againſt Sinan at Tergouiſta, firſt ſeiſed vpon the caſtle of Chotijm, which he furniſhed with his owne ſouldiers: and from thence marching to Zorona, the metropolitical citie of that prouince, and ſeat of the Vayuod, had it yeelded vnto him; and ſo proceeding on, had in ſhort time almoſt the whole countrey deliuered vnto him; Stephen the Vayuod placed by the Prince, flying from place to place before him, from whom he leſt feared any ſuch thing, hauing made account of no other enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayuod thus driuen out, and the Chancellour poſſeſſed of the country, he preſently placed one Hieremias Vayuod in ſtead of Stephen, to hold that H honor of the Polonian king as his ſoueraigne. Yet neuertheleſſe to ſatisfie the Turke, hee ſent a meſſenger to Sinan Baſſa, then but newly come to Tergouiſta, requeſting him not to take it in euill part, that he had entered into Moldauia, and there placed a new Vayuod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet to confirme this his doing, and the Vayuod by him placed; promiſing the country of Moldauia to remaine tributarie ſtill vnto the Sultan, and that this new Vayuod ſhould forthwith pay vnto him what tribute was behinde, and from thenceforth a far greater tribute yerely than had the country of Moldauia before. Whereunto the hautie Baſſa (then fearing nothing leſſe than that which immediatly after hapned, to be driuen out of thoſe countries by the Prince) proudly anſwered, That it was not the great Sultans minde, that the I Polonians ſhould at all inuade Moldauia, for that beſide he could without their helpe reduce thoſe countries to his obedience, he had giuen that countrey vnto the Tartar, in reward of his good ſeruice already done in Hungarie and other places; whoſe ſubiects the Tartars would ere long be readie with their wiues & children to take poſſeſſion of. Neuertheleſſe the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being preſently after ouerthrown, and driuen quite out of thoſe countries by the Prince. Who if he had not then gained the victory, the Chancelor had not now holden Moldauia, but the Turke, whoſe quarrel he ſeemed rather to fauor than the princes. The Chancellor to colour this his inuaſion, pretended that the country of Moldauia did of antient right belong vnto the kingdome of Polonia: which the K Tranſyluanians tooke to be no other but meere and open wrong. This ſuppoſed title, ſuch as it was, the Chancellor had ſo faſhioned out vnto the king and the States of that kingdom, that they referred it to his diſcretion to inuade the country, and remouing the Vayuod placed by the Prince, to place another in his ſtead: & the rather to perſuade them, labored by many forced reaſons to ſhew the power of the Tranſiluanian prince to be ſo far inferior vnto the Turks, that it was to be feared he ſhould at length be thruſt out of all his dominions, and ſo they together with Moldauia become ſubiect to the Turks: which if it ſhould ſo come to paſſe, then ſhould the Polonians haue an vntruſty and troubleſome neighbour. And that therefore it were better that Moldauia were poſſeſſed by them that were better able to defend it than was hee, that ſo the Turke might be kept farther off from Polonia. Which occaſion he ſaid was not L longer to be delaid, but now betime to be laied hold vpon; perſuading himſelfe to find ſuch grace and fauor with the Turkiſh Emperour, as that he ſhould be therewith right well contented: which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Tranſiluanian ſhould thereby be much weakened. By theſe and ſuch like reaſons, framed to ſerue his owne turne, the Chancellour ſo preuailed with the King and the States of the kingdome, that he receiued (as I ſaid) full authoritie to proceed in the matter as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the Prince, and benefit of the Turk: the late choſen Vayuod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into Tranſyluania, one by the country of Siculi, another by the way that leadeth to Alba-Iulia, and the third by Valachia.

The reaſons pretended by the Chancellor for the inuaſion of Moldauia.

The late choſen Vayuod opens three ways vnto the Turks & Tartars into Tranſyluania.

The Tranſyluanian Prince ſeeing the country of Moldauia by the practiſe of the Chancellor thus taken from him and diſſeuered from the other vnited prouinces, to the great weakning of his eſtate, after the flight of Sinan, ſent certain companies both of horſe and foot, to Stephen the late Vayuod, but now driuen out by the Polonians, to prooue if happily he could by that meanes driue out the Polonians againe, and recouer his former dignitie. With this ayd ſent

A from the Prince and others that fauored his quarrell, he ioyned a bloudie battel with the Polonians: but being therein by them ouercome and taken, and for a ſpace kept (as the Prince feared, to haue been deliuered vnto the Turke) he was by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This foule dealing of the Polonian in Moldauia much grieued many good Chriſtians, as tending to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale. For which cauſe the Emperor by his Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe vnto the Polonian king, ſought to perſuade him to de-ſiſt from ſuch inuaſion of the Tranſyluanian Prince by his Chancellour, as nothing ſtanding with his honour; and that ſome good reconciliation might be made betweene the Prince and the Cardinall Bator & his brother, the Princes vncles, authors of all theſe troubles. To which B purpoſe alſo the Pope ſent a meſſenger with like inſtructions and letters vnto the king, perſua-ding him, not ſo to proſecute his wars againſt the Prince, but to turn his thoughts vnto a more peaceable and Chriſtianlike courſe, eſpecially with him with whom he was ſo neere linked in marriage. To the like effect he writ alſo vnto the Cardinall Bator, and after many graue admonitions peremptorily cited him to Rome. But foraſmuch as the proceedings of the Polonian againſt the Prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the King, it ſhall not I hope be miſtaken, if I here ſet them downe thus as I finde them by others reported.

The Popes letters vnto the king of Polonia to diſſuade him from inuading the Prince.

Pope Clement the eighth, to our beſt beloued ſonne in Chriſt, Sigiſmund, by the grace of God King of Polonia, with the benediction Apoſtolicall ſendeth greeting. By how much greater affection of C fatherly loue wee embrace your Maieſtie in the Lord, ſo much the more feruently wee wiſh all your actions to bee adorned with the greateſt commendation of true godlineſſe and wiſedome, both before God and men: Whereof it proceedeth, that wee are ſo much the more vehemently and grieuouſly moued, if we heare any ſuch thing of you, as may ſeeme not agreeable to your vertue and approoued zeale toward the Catholicke Religion, or tending to the obſcuring of the glorie of your name, as is now brought vnto vs concerning the affaires of Moldauia, whereof not without great griefe wee write vnto you. And to rehearſe things a little before paſt: With what earneſtneſſe and feruencie dealt I with you, that for Gods cauſe, and the defence of the health and libertie of the Chriſtian commonweale againſt the tyrannie of the Turks, you would combine your ſelfe with our moſt dearely beloued ſonne Rodolph the Emperour, and diuers other Chriſtian Princes? and that you ſhould not let ſlip ſo no-D table an occaſion, ſo worthily to deſerue of God, of the Catholicke faith, and of the Chriſtian common-weale in generall? And albeit wee then thought as well for many your owne priuat reſpects, as alſo of your Kingdomes, That you were to be borne withall and excuſed if you did not now openly deſcend into this confederation of the Chriſtian Princes againſt the moſt mortall and common enemie, neither apertly ioyne your forces or giue aid for the repreſſing of his inſolencie; yet wee alwayes aſſured our ſelues, that no let ſhould in any caſe proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Chriſtian Princes ſhould be the rather hindered, iuſtly to proſecute their iniuries, or to caſt off from their necks the heauie yoke of the moſt cruell tyrant: whoſe deſire of ſoueraigntie is not compriſed within the compaſſe of any bounds. But that you ſhould in fauour of the Turkes impugne the Catholicke Princes and defendours of the Chriſtian faith, and ſo ioyne hands with the enemies of the Croſſe of Chriſt, as that by your helpe their force and furie ſhould be encreaſed, and ours not onely weakened, but in the very courſe of victorie hindered, and caſt into moſt grieuous perils; this we haue not only not thought of you, but not ſo much as once ſuſpected: yea and can now ſcarce be perſuaded to beleeue thoſe things to bee done by you, which are reported vnto vs as moſt true and vndoubted. For the report goeth, That you hauing intelligence with the Turkes and Tartars, haue with them conſpired, and namely againſt our welbeloued ſonne Sigiſmund, Prince of Tranſyluania, who with inuincible courage fighteth the battels of the Lord: and leſt hee ſhould bee able to abate the force and attempts of the moſt proud E-nemie (which by the ſingular mercie of God he hath hitherto aboue his owne power performed) but rather bee enforced much to feare his owne eſtate, a new Vayuod and Prince as it were by a triumuirate authoritie and compact to bee placed in Moldauia, and him by the Turkes, you, and the Tartars together, to be made Gouernour of that Countrey. Which vnto vs ſeemed ſo new and ſo ſtrange, and contrary to the good opinion wee had alwayes conceiued of you, yea and ſo vnbeſeeming your zeale and wiſedome, that for griefe and admiration I had almoſt cryed out with the Prophet, You heauens be amazed at this, and you gates thereof be you exceedingly heauie. For what could be ſuſpected or imagined farther from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigiſmund the moſt religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had alwayes profeſſed himſelfe a moſt earneſt defendor of the Catholicke religion, who was readie euen with his owne bloud to redeeme the victorie of G the Chriſtians, and glorie of the Croſſe, againſt the moſt wicked enemies of the ſame, to be vpon the ſudden become ſo vnlike vnto himſelfe? And (ſo much as in him was) to cut off the hope, and happie ſucceſſe of that religious warre; and to doe harme to a Chriſtian and Catholicke Prince, not to refuſe to ioyne in league and friendſhip, euen with the moſt barbarous nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himſelfe, and of the Kingdome of Polonia. For which cauſes our minde is tormented with ſuch bitterneſſe of griefe, that we could not but by ſpeedie meſſengers write vnto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the ſooner ſee the greatneſſe of our griefe: and wee alſo without delay might ſignifie vnto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requeſteth in ſo important a matter. For happily wee will ſend one euen of purpoſe to you concerning this cauſe, the care whereof grieueth vs more than can well be expreſſed. Wherefore moſt dearely beloued ſonne, wee exhort you, H and in the moſt effectuall manner wee can, aduiſe you and beſeech you in the Lord, more attentiuely to conſider what great diſpleaſure both of God and man this your action and reſolution may incurre, what a ſtaine it may bring vnto your crowne and dignitie. For beleeue vs, that are to you in ſtead of a father in Chriſt, who loue you not feinedly, but faithfully, and indeed; who wiſh for your glorie in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come: beleeue vs (I ſay) this doth much blemiſh your fame with all Chriſtian Kings and Princes, all men take it in euill part, and deteſt it as a thing monſtrous, that it ſhould by your meanes bee wrought, that the Chriſtian affaires ſhould not proſper, that an heroicall Prince, who had vowed himſelfe for Chriſt and his countrey, ſhould not haue proſperous ſucceſſe in this ſo religious and neceſſarie a warre againſt the Infidels, Turkes, and Tartars, no leſſe yours, or I peraduenture alſo more yours, and other Chriſtian Princes enemies, than his. But what doe we ſay? you to hinder the procedings of the Tranſyluanian Prince? this were happily but a ſmall matter: nay verily, by this meanes not onely a Chriſtian and Catholicke Prince, and valiant champion of the Chriſtian faith (a vertue both admirable and amiable in the verie enemie) but your owne brother in law, bound vnto you with ſo many bonds of affinitie, whoſe children ſhall be as it were your childrens brethren, is by this meanes brought into great danger, and expoſed vnto the furie of the moſt mercileſſe Turkes. What doe you then my moſt dearely beloued ſonne? Beware that all men, both now liuing, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the greateſt inhumanitie: But beware yet more, that you ſeeme not ingratefull not onely to your owne nigh kinſman, but to God himſelfe, who hath bountifully bleſſed you with two great Kingdomes, and ſo many good things: and that you prouoke not him to wrath againſt your ſelfe, K that reiecteth and confoundeth all euill and wicked deuices: and that this miſchiefe that you haue brought vpon your brother, by the iuſt iudgement of God redound not to the greateſt deſtruction of you and your Kingdome, which he in mercie forbid. Doe you thinke, that the Tranſyluanian being ouercome, you ſhall in ſafetie liue from the treacherie of the Turke? Doe you not know him to be a faithleſſe man, which meaſureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none, but as ſtandeth with his owne commoditie, who with an vnſatiable deſire gapeth after euery Kingdome, nay thirſteth after the deſtruction of all Chriſtendome? Thinke alſo my ſonne, what wrong you ſhall doe vnto the Emperour your couſin, out of whoſe Imperiall bloud you haue begotten ſonnes and heires, and by the grace of God ſhall moe; but alſo our dignitie, and the dignitie of this Apoſtolicall ſeat (which you haue alwayes ſo deuoutly honoured) is thereby hurt, and your moſt deare mother (which wee know you of all other leaſt would) the Romane Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this ſacred Warre is at great and wonderfull charges: and our forces, which by you ought to haue beene relieued and encreaſed, beeing in ſo vnfit a time by theſe ſtirres in Moldauia diſſeuered and diminiſhed, and the enemies on the contrarie part encreaſed and ſtrengthened, into what danger and diſtreſſe may both our armie of the Church and the Emperours fall? And withall, how greatly all the manner and managing of this whole warre is thereby confounded, there is no man that ſeeth not. Yea and this moreouer, which no little concerneth the dignitie of vs and this holy See, wee haue vndertaken and certainely promiſed to our moſt dearely beloued ſonnes Rodolph and Sigiſmund, that your royall Maieſtie ſhould not in any thing hinder or hurt their affaires: neither did wee hereof aſſure them vpon a light occaſion, but mooued with great reaſon, not onely for that we deſeruedly ought ſo to promiſe of you in ſo iuſt a cauſe, but alſo for that it was ſo vnto vs plainely and expreſly written by the reuerend Father, the Biſhop of S. Seuerus, our Apoſtolicall Nuntio with you, whom wee know to bee both vnto vs faithfull, and to you dutifull: neither can we by any meanes doubt thereof, becauſe he hath writ vnto vs concerning ſo weightie a matter, that he receiued it euen from your owne mouth. Which things ſo ſtanding ſeeing

A ſeeing you of your ſelfe ſee the manifold abſurdities of this fact on euery ſide, not to ſpeake of the heynouſneſſe thereof: we requeſt you againe, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to applie the neceſſarie remedies to theſe hurts. The Tranſyluanian Prince your brother in law, deuoted to your ſelfe, and deſirous of your fauor, either protect with your defence, or at leaſtwiſe hurt him not: yea hurt not the whole State of the Chriſtian common-weale, and relieue not by any meanes the quarrell of the enemies of Chriſt. If you haue any controuerſie with the Prince Sigiſmund, or deſire of him any thing, referre it vnto vs, that is to ſay, vnto your moſt louing father: you know your affaires to be of vs fauoured, and wee hope by the power of God that it may eaſily come to paſſe that ſome conuenient meanes may be found whereby peace and quietneſſe may be confirmed betwixt you, and good vnity grow betwixt you two brethren our ſonnes, and ſo all the root of bitterneſſe and diſpleaſure to be vtterly pluckt out of your minds. This haue B I writ vnto you my ſonne, frankly and from a ſincere heart, though truly much grieued, becauſe we loue you, and are much carefull of your honor and good. Shew you againe in deed that you take it ſo, as written from your father, and that you altogether preferre our fatherly and wholeſome exhortations before the ſiniſter perſwaſions of others. Farther concerning theſe matters, you ſhall vnderſtand by the ſame Biſhop our Nuntio now with you, to whom you may (as you haue done) giue credit in all things, as to our ſelfe.

Theſe letters dated from Rome the eighth day of Nouember, were deliuered to the king in December, with others to the Cardinall and Chancellor, whom the Pope ſharply reproued as the authors and contriuers of all theſe miſchiefes.

C The Tartar Cham before ſtirred vp by the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, for the inuaſion of Moldauia (as is already before declared) about this time ſent his Embaſſador alſo vnto the Polonian king, for the confirmation of ſuch articles as he had before agreed vpon with the Chancellor: which becauſe they manifeſtly declare the ground and purpoſe of his entended expedition into Moldauia, with the foule colluſion of the Chancellor with the Turks and Tartars againſt the Tranſyluanian Prince, I thought it not amiſſe, or from our purpoſe (for the more manifeſtation of that which is already ſaid) here to ſet them downe, as they are tranſlated out of the Tartar language.

The copy of the Letters of the Tartar vnto the king of Polonia.

Cham Kazikiery vnto the King of Polonia and Sweden our brother, one of the great Lords among D the Chriſtians, humbly boweth his head. Firſt wee ſignifie vnto you, that Aaron Palantine of Moldauia was a forſworne traitour; who hauing gathered a power of the Valachians, and ioyning vnto him the Polonian Coſſackes ſpoiled the territories of the great Sultan. But afterward diſſention ariſing among them, the Hungarian Coſſackes liuing in Valachia, ſent Aaron in bonds vnto the King of Vienna: after him followed another traitour called Rozwan, who alſo hauing raiſed certaine companies of ſouldiers, began in like manner to forrage the countries of the Turkiſh Emperour thereabout: which as ſoone as he had knowledge of, he writ vnto mee his brother, That I ſhould with all poſſible ſpeed goe into Valachia to chaſtiſe theſe rebells, to burne their houſes and townes; and hauing with the edge of the ſword ſlaine their men, to carrie away with me their wiues and children into captiuitie. Hauing this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territorie of the great Lord Karykterey, with my brother E Lenkerry Galga, and other my brethren and Counſellors, warlike and valiant Captaines and Murzaes, mounting my horſe, came with mine armie into Valachia vnto the riuer Prut where it meeteth in another riuer called Cozoza: here we chanced vpon a faithfull ſeruitor of yours, our brother the Chancellor, who was alſo come a little before vs into Valachia; with whom after ſome light contention when we began to be more tractable, he declared vnto vs, that he was of purpoſe come into Valachia to place there a new Vaynod, which (as he ſaid) of ancient right belonged vnto the Polonians; without any wrong or preiudice therein to be done to the couenants and league they had with the Emperor of the Turks; and farther that his deſire was, that one Ieremias whom he had appointed Vaynod, might haue the command of that Prouince; and that the antient amitie, ſuch as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham Dawlethgerd, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had for my part faithfully ſworne to doe, and he likewiſe had cauſed the ſame to be done by ſuch of his as he had therefore ſent vnto me, we decreed together, that the Coſſackes on the farther ſide of Nyeſter (diſorderad and rebellious men) ſhould be vtterly rooted out, that they ſhould not hereafter doe any harme in the territories of the great Sultan and that the Preſents vſually ſent vnto vs of long, euen ſince the time of Sultan Solyman, ſhould no more be detained, nor any harmes be hereafter done in any part of our dominions. And therefore when the Chancellour coller had promiſed vnto vs, that he would take order that theſe Coſſackes ſhould be vtterly deſtroyed, I alſo conſented, that according to the pleaſure of the royall maieſtie of you my brother, Hieremias ſhould hold the Vayuodſhip of Valachia: which I forthwith by letters ſignified vnto the Turkiſh Emperour. Now if it be ſo, that your Maieſtie ſhall giue your conſent vnto thoſe things which we haue here agreed vpon with your Chancellour, you ſhall then for euer finde brotherly friendſhip with me, my brother and all other our captains and Murzis: but if you ſhall not deſtroy theſe Coſſackes, you ſhall not then performe the oath and couenants made. Theſe things we haue commanded to be declared vnto you by our Embaſſador our brother Gianach Metagra, whom we requeſt your Maieſtie courteouſly to entertaine, and by him to ſend the Preſents vnto vs: for wee will not now this yeare ſend any other. Giuen at the riuer Prut in the yeare of Mahomet 1004.

The Preſents offered by the Tartar embaſſador to the king of Polonia

After the Tartar Embaſſador had deliuered thoſe letters vnto the king, with a ſpeech in effect to the ſame purpoſe, he in the name of the Cham gaue vnto him an horſe and an arrow for a Preſent: & afterward being brought to a lodging appointed for him, was commanded there to expect his anſwer. At length his diſpatch was giuen him in letters ſealed vp, which he tooke much againſt his will, requeſting the king to ſend an Embaſſador vnto the Cham: and farther by word of mouth, to tell him what to anſwer vnto his Lord. But other anſwer could hee get none, than was alreadie deliuered him in writing: and ſo rewarded with a gowne furred with Sables, was diſmiſſed without the Preſent requeſted by the Cham, or any Embaſſador to accompanie him.

Thus the Tranſyluanian Prince, on the one ſide mightily impugned by the Turke, and on the other by the ſetting on of the Turke readie to haue been no leſſe endangered by the inuaſion of the Tartar, receiued greater harme from the Polonians beeing Chriſtians, than from both thoſe great Mahometane Princes: the Polonian in ſome ſort performing for the Turke, what hee had plotted to haue beene done by the Tartar: and ſo by the taking away of Moldauia from the Prince, not onely weakened his ſtrength, but alſo opened a way for the barbarous enemies into his Countrie. Howbeit much it is that the Polonians alledge for the excuſe of themſelues, and the defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldauia: which for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chancellour himſelfe, let vs heare how he by his letters anſwereth the matter, euen vnto Clement the Pope himſelfe.

Iohn Zamoſchie vnto Clement the eighth the great Biſhop.

Zamoſchie the great Chancellor his Letters vnto Clement the Pope.

Moſt holy and bleſſed father in Chriſt, and moſt gracious Lord, after the kiſſing of your moſt bleſſed feet, and my moſt humble commendations; I haue by your Holineſſe Letters directed both vnto the Kings Maieſtie and my ſelfe, vnderſtood as well his royall Maieſtie and my moſt gracious Lord and Maſter, as alſo my ſelfe as his ſeruant to be both accuſed vnto your Holineſſe: as if by thoſe things by vs done in Moldauia, the endeauours of the Chriſtians had beene hindered, and the power of the enemie confirmed. Whereof I am not with many words to purge my ſelfe vnto your Holineſſe, foraſmuch as I aſſure my ſelfe your holineſſe to haue alreadie fully vnderſtood both what the things were that were done in Moldauia, and how they were done: partly by the Kings Maieſties Letters, and partly by his principall Secretarie, for that cauſe eſpecially ſent vnto your Holineſſe. Yet doubt I not to requeſt this one thing of your Holineſſe, that if it hath knowne me for a man, I will not ſay of any capacitie or wit, but euen of the leaſt experience in the world, or of any religion at all; ſo to perſuade it ſelfe of mee, nothing to haue beene done, eſpecially in this matter, either raſhly, or to the hinderance of the Chriſtian common-weale. I will not now repeate what mine opinion was concerning the league and confederation to bee made with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, for the combining of their forces againſt the common enemie, eſpecially his ſacred Maieſties: as alſo what mine owne labour and endeauour was in the laſt aſſembly of the States in the high Court of Parliament. Which thing after it was euen by them whome it moſt concerned, either delayed or neglected, or vtterly caſt aſide, and yet his Maieſtie had ſtill a great deſire to doe the Chriſtian common-weale ſome great good, I alſo to the vttermoſt of my power laboured to that end; that by the common decree of the Kingdome, an expedition might be made into Tartaria, not ſo much in reuenge of the iniuries done by that enemie in theſe late yeares paſt, as ſo in the meane time to turne him from the neckes of the Chriſtians, as that he ſhould not ioyne his forces with the Turkes: or if it ſo pleaſed God to bleſſe thoſe our endeauours, vtterly at length to root out that ſo great a miſchiefe. But how it came to paſſe that this expedition, ſo much by the King deſired (yet ſcarcely begun or taken in hand) tooke not effect; it is not needfull for me to declare, for that I ſuppoſe your Holineſſe hath by others, eſpecially your Nuntio, vnderſtood the ſame. In the meane time, by others and often meſſengers newes was brought, That Sinan Baſſa with a great armie was alreadie come ouer Danubius; and I by letters from the Vayuod of the farther Valachia was aduertiſed, how that he, not able to encounter him, had forſaken that Prouince: which at the firſt impreſſion taken and almoſt vtterly waſted by Sinan, he was now come faſt vpon Tranſyluania, and in Moldauia the Tartar was ſtill expected, inſomuch that Roſwan (who hauing taken priſoner Aaron the Palatine whom hee ſerued, in his houſe, and ſo himſelfe inuaded the Palatine) began now alſo to quake for feare, and to craue helpe of mee, or rather to ſeeke how hee might flie away (as not long after he did) neither hauing any great ſtrength about him, or expecting any greater from the people of that countrey: for why, that Prouince was brought ſo low by the miſeries of the former yeares, but eſpecially by ſuch as had euill gouerned the ſame, that at ſuch time as I entered into Moldauia, I aſſure your Holineſſe there were not in it of houſhoulders aboue 15000, and thoſe alſo for the moſt part poore countrey people of the baſeſt ſort, in whom there could neither be any great helpe, neither if they had been able to haue done any thing, durſt Roſwan haue truſted himſelfe with them, vpon whom he had with all kind of crueltie tyranized. Chotym a caſtle in the very confines of this kingdome, was kept with no greater garriſon than 200 Hungarians, who perceiuing themſelues neither of ſufficient ſtrength to hold the place, nor to withſtand the enemie, they alſo by and by followed after Roſwan. All the reſt of the Prouince was not onely vnarmed, but altogether poore and naked, without any certaine gouernment, without counſell, without ſtrength, and without any defence at all, two caſtles onely excepted: which ſtanding vpon the confines of Polonia, might haue ſerued better for the enemie, out of them to haue infeſted vs, than for the defence of Moldauia againſt them: ſo that had the enemie once ſet foot into that Prouince, neither could it without a great power haue beene recouered, neither being recouered, could eaſily haue beene defended againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie: and that which worſe was, was not it ſelfe alone to haue bin conſumed with that fire, but like enough to haue carried away with it Podolia alſo, bordering vpon it, with a great part of Ruſcia. Wherefore in this ſtate of things, when as both that Prouince was in greateſt danger to haue beene loſt, and ſo many enemies houered not more ouer the heads of al Chriſtendome, than ouer this Kingdome, what was of vs to be done? I know to whom I ſpeake theſe things, euen vnto him, not onely whoſe diuine wiſedome, but ſingular loue alſo towards my natiue countrey is to mee moſt knowne. Verily I entered into Moldauia with no great armie, yet ſuch an one as haply (as in like caſe it often chanceth) Fame had made amongſt the enemies a very great one: ſo that Sinan fearing if he ſhould thruſt himſelfe with his army into the ſtraits whereby hee was to breake into Tranſyluania, to bee ſhut in by our armie, ſtayed his iourney: and the Tartar the more earneſtly he was called vpon by Sinan (by reaſon of the fame of this our armie) reſolued to make himſelfe ſo much the ſtronger. So that whileſt hee aſſembleth the Nogaian Tartars and others farther off, and ſo from all parts raiſeth the greateſt power he could, the matter was delaied almoſt vnto the end of Nouember: at which time he with a moſt huge armie, accompanied with Sendziak Iehiuenſe, and a great power of the Turkes raiſed out of their Prouinces there by, came directly vpon mee in the fields of Coroce. Sendziak the Tartar Cham his ſiſters ſonne, now called himſelfe the Baſſa of Moldauia, as did the Tartars eldeſt ſonne name himſelfe Prince of another part of that Prouince alſo: for ſo that countrey was to haue bin diuided betwixt them, that that part which was next vnto the Tartars dominions, ſhould bee allotted vnto the Tartar, and the other part confining vpon this Kingdome, to be gouerned by Sendziak, as Baſſa thereof, and ſo to make it the ſeat of a perpetuall warre, from whence Podolia, Ruſcia, and the leſſer Polonia might bee with continuall incurſions waſted euen before our faces: concerning which matter they now diſperſed their Letters, wherein they publiſhed the power and authoritie giuen them from the grand Seignior, exhorting the people of that countrey to receiue the ſame. A whole day wee fought with this multitude, our men alwaies by the goodneſſe of God hauing not onely the vpper hand, but without any notable loſſe alſo, yet not without great ſlaughter of theirs: and would to God I had had ſuch ſtrength, as that not onely the conditions of peace, but euen the enemies themſelues might haue beene in my power. But when wee were oftentimes come to parle (they ſtill requiring the ſame) and ſo at length vnto conditions of peace; if ſuch were giuen them, as whereby this onely Kingdome had without the wrong of any other beene deliuered from ſo great and ſudden a danger, what reaſonable man could finde fault therewith, if wee ſhould haue preferred the health and welfare of our countrey (whereunto all good men owe all they haue) before other mens profits? But now theſe things were ſo done, as that it was no leſſe G prouided for the good of the neighbour Chriſtians, yea and happily not the leaſt for theirs, who for the ſame ſlander this Kingdome vnto your Holineſſe: the furie of Sinan Baſſa *was by this meanes re-preſſed, who whileſt he feared to be ſhut vp in the ſtraits by our armie now come into Moldauia, and expected the Tartars comming, ſpent almoſt all the reſt of the Summer idely and without any thing doing.

The Tartar himſelfe was not onely turned from the bowels of Chriſtendome, whereinto hee had purpoſed (as the yeare before) to haue entered, wee hauing with our owne breaſts receiued his force and furie: but beeing brought vnto conditions, was expreſſely enioyned in a moſt ſhort prefined time, and without any more harme doing to returne againe into his countrey by the ſelfeſame way hee came, and by no other: whereby it is come to paſſe, that vntill this day Chriſtendome hath not this yeare H yet felt the Tartars weapons. But vnto Tranſyluania and Hungarie, what a ſpace and power was giuen for them to gather their ſtrength and forces together, and out of the ſame places to oppoſe them againſt the enemie, when as our armie kept them ſafe at their backes, and eaſed not onely Moldauia, but Valachia and Tranſyluania alſo of that care? Whereas if this cauſe of delay had not beene obiected vnto the Turkes firſt, and after vnto the Tartars; not to ſay any thing of the Turkes; the Tartars at the verie ſelfeſame time that the Tranſyluanian armie was gone into Valachia againſt* Sinan, *might haue broken into Tranſyluania before it could haue returned home, or elſe marching directly towards that armie, might haue met with it out of Tranſyluania. As for Moldauia, which together with the memorie of the Chriſtian name, yet left in it, had vtterly periſhed, it was moſt manifeſtly preſerued by the comming of our armie. Which what end it would haue had, if the enemie I might at his pleaſure haue raged as hee did in the farther Valachia, thoſe moſt bitter remembrances in it yet at this day ſmoking, doe well declare: out of which it is well knowne moe thouſands of Chriſtian captiues to haue beene carried away into moſt woefull captiuitie, than almoſt out of any other Prouince in all the time of theſe miſerable warres. Which although it bee thus, yet boaſt wee not thereof, neither ſend wee any triumphant Letters vnto your Holineſſe, nor brag wee of our good ſeruice done for the Chriſtian commonweale; contenting our ſelues with the conſcience of the thing it ſelfe.
In the meane time wee are accuſed vnto your Holineſſe: but for what cauſe? If any man complaine for the taking of Moldauia, I will not ſay it was by them before willingly forſaken, whileſt I was yet in the frontiers thereof; but that this Kingdome hath a moſt antient right vnto it, and ſuch a right as that when our Kings beeing buſied in their warres againſt the Muſcouite, the* Cruciat Teutonic K brethren, or others; ſome others alſo troubling the ſtate thereof, it for a time became a prey vnto the Turkiſh Tyrants, yet in all the Leagues made or renewed betwixt this Kingdome and them, was ſtill excepted, That all ſuch things as the Palatine of Moldauia was of dutie to performe vnto the King, ſhould by him ſtill bee performed. Which Kings of Polonia, and namely Auguſtus himſelfe, the laſt of the Iagellonian *race, appointed diuers of thoſe Palatines themſelues. Which although they be things moſt manifeſt, yet hauing more regard vnto the welfare of that Prouince, as a Chriſtian countrey, than of our right, wee reſtored the ſame into the ſame ſtate wherein it hath beene for many yeares before theſe * warres. Wherefore if any man thinke any thing done, whereby the enemies of the croſſe of Chriſt might bee eaſed or ſtrengthened, or the defendours of the Faith hindered, it is ſo farre from any ſuch thing to bee done, that rather (as is before declared) the enemies force is repreſſed and L auerted, and greater meanes giuen vnto the Chriſtians afront to impugne them, the enemie being at their backes by vs ſhut from them. But I feare that they haue not fully enformed your Holineſſe, how theſe things were done, who haue reported vnto your ſaid Holineſſe not onely the name of the Turkes to haue beene proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldauia, but alſo the name of the Tartars the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and Decrees of them three, as it were confederat together, things to haue beene ordered in Moldauia. Which their complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankely confeſſe certaine conditions to haue beene giuen them, but ſuch as whereby is prouided not onely for the quiet and ſecuritie of this kingdome, but no leſſe alſo for the whole Chriſtian commonweale, as is before declared. All which things for al that, although they were done for the good of this Kingdome, and all Chriſtendome in generall, yet were they ſo done, that they were all by mee referred vnto the Kings Maieſtie and the States of the Kingdome: ſo that at this preſent the kingdome is at free liberty either to ioyne in confederation with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes; or if that cannot vpon certaine and indifferent conditions be agreed vpon, yet with no mans iniurie or hurt to ratifie this, ioyned with the health and good of a great part of the Chriſtian commonweale:*

*Viz. to become tributary vnto the Turks

A commonweale: only God grant that the Chriſtian Princes may ſeriouſly think both of this ſo Chriſtian a confederation againſt the common enemie, and ſtriue alſo all together againſt the enemie with their weapons, and not with miſreports and ſlanders one againſt another. They are not to aſſaile the enemies feet, but his throat: neither is the ſeat of the war to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themſelues much to haue all things rather peaceable behinde them: but let the war be vndertaken with no leſſe charge and preparation, than if the enemies royal ſeat were to be aſſailed; which ſtanding in an open and plaine Countrey, ſhall alwaies without much ado be his that being ſtrongeſt can take it. This haue I written at large, as my purpoſe was, all which I moſt humbly beſeech your Holineſſe with your diuine wiſedome to conſider of, and with your woonted clemencie to accept the ſame. And ſo proſtrate at your Holineſſe feet, I moſt humbly commend me to your clemencie. From Zamoſchie the tenth of Iannarie, 1596.

B Thus much the great Chancellor in defence of himſelfe and of that he had done in Moldauia: which howſoeuer it contented the Pope, well I wot it nothing pleaſed the Emperor, and much leſſe the Tranſyluanian Prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the countrey of Moldauia from him.

To end this troubleſome yeare withall, many ſharpe and bloudie skirmiſhes yet daily paſſed in diuers places of thoſe frontier countries, the Turks almoſt in euery place ſtill going to the worſe. In the beginning of Nouember, Leucowitz gouernour of Carolſtat the ſecond time ſurpriſed Wihitz in the frontiers of Croatia, where theſe wars firſt begun: but being not able to take the caſtle, contented himſelfe as before with the ſpoile of the city, and afterward ſetting

C it on fire, departed. Maximilian alſo attempted Zolnoc: and the Chriſtians in gariſon at Strigonium and Plindenburg, now become neere neighbors vnto the Turks at Buda, did with continual inrodes not a little moleſt them both all the latter end of this yeare, and the beginning of the next. And the Turkes in Braila in Valachia vpon the ſide of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be beſieged by the Vayuod, forſooke the citie, and in ſuch haſt paſſed the riuer, that in that tumultuous paſſage three hundred of them periſhed. Sinan Baſſa by the Tranſyluanian Prince of late driuen out of Valachia, was not long after ſent for to Conſtantinople: but the craftie old fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miſery of Ferat, found occaſions to delay the time ſo long, vntil that he was ſent for again, and after that, the third time alſo. In the mean while he had ſo wrought by his mighty friends Sinan Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople.

D in court, & by rich rewards, mightier than they, that at his comming to the court he was there honorably receiued, as the chiefeſt of the Baſſa's, and being afterwards offered to be diſcharged of the wars, as a man of aboue fourescore yeares old; he refuſed ſo to be; ſaying, That hee was borne and brought vp amongſt ſoldiers and martial men, and ſo wiſhed among them to dy: as not long after he did; dying as was thought of conceit of the euil ſucceſſe he had in his wars againſt the Tranſyluanian.

His death.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor exceedingly grieued with the loſſe of ſo many his cities and ſtrong places this yere loſt, as namely Strigonium, Vicegrade, Siſeg, Petrinia, Lippa, Ienna, Tergouiſta, Bucharesta, Zorza, and many others of leſſe name: and both by letters and meſſengers

E vnderſtanding daily of the ſlaughter of his people, and waſting of his frontiers, commanded great preparation to be made againſt the next Spring; giuing it out, that he would then in perſon himſelfe come downe into Hungarie with ſuch a power as neuer had any his predeceſſors the Othoman Kings and Emperors, and there take moſt ſharp reuenge of all his former wrongs. Neuertheleſſe theſe his ſo haſtie deſignes were by the plague and famine (which then both raged extremely in moſt part of his Empire) and by other great occurrents of the ſame time, ſo croſſed, that by that time the Spring came, he ſcarcely wel knew which way to turne himſelfe firſt. For beſide theſe troubles of the Weſt, of themſelues ynough to haue filled his hands, the Georgians in the Eaſt, a warlike people, moued with the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in Valachia and Hungary, had taken vp armes againſt him; and the old Perſian King but a little before dead, had left that great kingdome to his ſonne, a man of greater ſpirit than was like to endure the manifold iniuries before done vnto his father by the Turks, to the great diſhonour of that kingdome, and preiudice of himſelfe. Of which things the Baſſa of Tauris gaue him ample intelligence, wiſhing him betimes to prouide for ſuch ſtormes: which ioyned to the reſt, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, whereunto we leaue him vntil the next Spring.

Mahomet perplexed.

The Tranſyluanian Prince carefull of his eſtate, and not a little troubled with the diſſeuering of Moldauia, thought it not vnfit for his affaires, now after the flight of Sinan and diſcomfiture of the Turks, to go in perſon himſelfe vnto the Emperor, to declare vnto him the wrong done him by the Polonian; and further to confer with him concerning the mannaging of the wars againſt the common Enemie. So hauing put all things in readineſſe for his journey, hee 1596 ſet forward in Ianuarie 1596, and by the way of Caſſouia the fourth of Februarie arriued at Prague in Bohemia, where he was by the Emperors appointment moſt honourably entertained. But immediatly after his comming thither he fell ſicke of an Ague, which grieuouſly vexed him by the ſpace of three weekes. In the latter end of Februarie hauing ſomewhat recouered his health, he went to the Church: where after his deuotions done, he was by the Deane of the Cathedral Church welcommed with a moſt eloquent Oration, ſetting forth his worthie praiſes, and further animating him vnto the like exploits againſt the common Enemy of all Chriſtianitie. Whereunto he forthwith anſwered in Latine ſo eloquently and ſo readily, that all men maruelled that heard him: proteſting in his ſpeech, That as he and his ſubjects had not hitherto ſpared their liues or goods in defence of the common cauſe, ſo would they not afterwards ſpare the ſame, but aduenture all for the benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweale: well hoping, that the Emperor and the other Chriſtian Princes would not as occaſion ſhould require be wanting vnto him with their forces, or the Clergie with their prayers: which done, he doubted not (as he ſaid) by the power of God, but to obtaine more notable victories than he had yet againſt the Turks the enemies of God.

The Siculi rebel againſt the Prince.

Whileſt he yet thus lay at the Emperors Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, offended to haue their liberties in ſome part infringed in the late aſſembly of the States holden in Tranſyluania in December laſt, riſe vp now in armes in diuers places, refuſing to yeeld their former obedience to the Prince. A matter like enough to haue wrought him much trouble, and ſuppoſed not to haue bin done without the priuitie of the Cardinal his vncle: but by the wiſedome and courage of ſuch as he had in his abſence put in truſt with the gouernment of his Country, diuers of the ringleaders of this rebellion were apprehended, and in diuers ſorts executed: and three hundred of their complices to the terror of their fellows had their noſes and eares cut off. By which wholſome ſeueritie all thoſe troubles were appeaſed, and the country againe quieted.

At the ſame time alſo the Tranſyluanians obtained of the Turks a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had about this time ſent a new Baſſa for the gouernment of Temeſwar: againſt whoſe comming the old Baſſa before Gouernor had in ſeuentie fiue waggons truſſed vp a wonderfull deale of wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former gouernment, to haue beene together with himſelfe with a ſtrong conuoy conducted to Belgrade. Of this his purpoſe the Hungarian Heidons lying at Lippa and Ienna hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his paſſing by ſet vpon him: where in a ſharpe conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and ſlew the Baſſa, whoſe head they ſent for a preſent to the Princeſſe at Alba Iulia, and tooke the ſpoile of the Baſſa's carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth, for in one of thoſe waggons is reported to haue been found twentie thouſand of Hungarian duckets.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar ſlain and a great bootie taken.

In this abſence alſo of the Prince, 10000 of the Raſcians reuolting from the Turk, came and offered their ſeruice vnto the Princeſſe: whereof ſhe by letters with great ſpeed certified the Prince her husband; who thereupon haſted to diſpatch with the Emperor, and hauing procured both from him and the Pope the promiſe of ſome aid to be afterwards ſent him, tooke of him his leaue, and being honorably accompanied, departed from Prague to Vienna, where he arriued the 11 of March, ſitting in a princely chariot drawne with ſix moſt beautifull horſes, the gift of the Emperor. At his comming thither he was met by the nobilitie of the country, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who preſented him with three goodly horſes for ſeruice, richly furniſhed. Him the prince tooke into his charet, and ſo accompanied entred the city, where he was with all due honor receiued and joyfully entertained, and ſo brought vnto the Emperors palace, where by the learned ſtudents of that Vniuerſitie, was for his pleaſure acted before him the notable hiſtorie of Ioſua. Hauing ſtaied there three dayes, and purpoſing to haue in his returne viſited his mother in law at Greics in Croatia; newes was brought him, That the Turkes and Tartars by the ſetting on of Stephen Bathor his Vncle, were about to

A to breake into Tranſyluania. Wherefore changing his purpoſe, he departed thence to Preſburg, and ſo with all ſpeed kept on his way towards Tranſyluania; where he to the great joy and comfort of his ſubiects in general, arriued in ſafetie in the beginning of April.

In this while many hot skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in the frontiers of their territories; and now the plague and famine which had of long raged in Conſtantinople and other places of the Turks dominions, began to aſſuage. Of which ſo great calamities as had deuoured many thouſands of his people, the Turkiſh Emperour finding himſelfe ſomewhat eaſed, forthwith cauſed the continuation of his wars againſt the Emperour and the Tranſyluanian Prince, to be three dayes together proclaimed in Conſtantinople, and a great armie to be raiſed to be ſent into Tranſyluania and Hungarie: giuing it out, that he would with B that ſo puiſſant an armie in perſon himſelfe come into Hungarie. At which time it was alſo reported, That he had alreadie ſent his tents and other his neceſſary prouiſion before to Hadrianople: for now was nothing more odious in the Turks Court, than the name of the Tranſyluanian Prince.

Warres proclaimed in Conſtantinople againſt the emperor & the Tranſyluanian Prince.

Of all theſe things was not the Emperor ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by letters and eſpials, as alſo by the vniforme confeſſion of ſuch Turks as were daily taken priſoners. For which cauſe he alſo with as much ſpeed and care as he could prouided for the raiſing of his armie, as he had the yere before; as alſo for the leuying of mony, and prouiſion of all things neceſſary, that the enemy at his comming might not find him vnprouided. Neither ſpared he to pray aid of the other Chriſtian Princes his neighbors, eſpecially of the Polonian, whome hee C had diuers times ſought after to haue drawn him into the confederation with the other Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turke. To which purpoſe he now alſo ſent vnto him the Biſhop of Preſlaw and the Lord Poppelius his Embaſſadors: as did the Pope alſo ſend vnto him the Cardinal Cajetane his Legat; and the Princes Electors alſo their Embaſſadors: vnto whome the Polonian gaue good hearing and good words, but would not by any meanes be perſuaded to breake his league with the Turke, or to afford any aid vnto the Chriſtians; although the cardinall with many pregnant reaſons ſhewed him what ſmall aſſurance there was in the Turkes leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his ſtate, if the Turke making peace with the Emperor, ſhould turne his force vpon him, which it was like enough he would, as knowing no man longer for friend, than ſtood with his profit, beſide the immortal blemiſh of his honor, by D diſſeuering himſelfe from the vnion of the Chriſtian Princes, to hold friendſhip with the Turks and Infidels. But all this and much more to no purpoſe, ſo reſolutely was the Polonian ſet downe for the keeping of the Turks fauour. So that of all the Chriſtian Princes ſo neere vnto the deuouring Enemy, none ſtood the Chriſtian commonweale in leſſe ſtead than he. Which for all that, moſt men imputed not ſo much vnto the King, as to others about him, eſpecially to Zamoſchie the great Chancellor, by whome that ſtate was moſt ſwayed, who was not onely ſuppoſed but openly reported to haue ſecret intelligence both with the Turke and the Tartar.

All this while the lord Palſi gouernor of Strigonium ceaſed not with continual inroades to vex the Turks euen to the gates of Buda, as did alſo the other Chriſtian captaines in other places of the Turks frontiers in Hungarie. Neere vnto Buda were two great country villages for E moſt part inhabited by Chriſtians, who hauing giuen their oath of obedience vnto the Turke, liued a miſerable life for the paiment of an exceſſiue tribute yearely. Theſe poore Chriſtians wearie of the Turkiſh thraldome, and the continual ſpoile of their labours by them of Strigonium; by ſecret meſſengers requeſted the lord Palſi, of mercie to carrie them with their goods and cattel away into ſome other place of the Chriſtian territorie, that ſo they might yet liue amongſt Chriſtians, as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Vnto which their ſo reaſonable a requeſt the Chriſtian gouernour charitably hearkened; willing them againſt a certaine appointed time to put themſelues with all their things in readineſſe. There was of theſe Chriſtians about 755 families, who with their wiues and children, and ſuch traſh as they had packt vp into 80 waggons, drawne with fourteene or ſixteene oxen a piece, at the appointed time about midnight committed themſelues with all that they had vnto the conduct of them of Strigonium, ſent out of purpoſe for them; by whom they were in ſafetie brought to Strigonium. Amongſt them were many rich men, who brought with them good ſtore of coyne, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vnto theſe new come gueſts Palſi aſſigned certaine fields betwixt Strigonium and Viuaria, on the North ſide of Danubius; where they ſo commodiouſly liued, as was poſſible in ſo troubled an eſtate of a countrey.

Six hundred of the gariſon ſouldiours of Lippa ſlaine by the Turks.

Lippa beſieged by the Turks and Tartars.

Shortly after, 600 gariſon ſoldiers of Lippa ſeeking after bootie, and aduenturing too far into the enemies territorie, were diſcouered by the Turks ſcouts, and ſo beſet by the Turks and Tartars billited in the country about Temeſwar, that there was no way left for them to eſcape. Which they wel perceiuing, reſolued among themſelues (as became valiant men) to fight it out euen vnto the laſt man: and with no leſſe reſolution performed what they had before determined; for being on euery ſide beſet and hardly charged by their enemies, they as men before reſolued to die, although ſcarce one to twentie, fought moſt deſperatly, ſeeking for nothing els but to ſell their liues as deere as they could vnto their enemies, and ſo fighting were all ſlaine, except ſome few which by great fortune eſcaped, leauing vnto the enemie a right bloudie victorie. Yet by this loſſe of ſo great a partie was the garriſon of Lippa greatly weakned, which the enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to beſiege the Towne. Which Barbelius the gouernor (a moſt valiant man) wiſely foreſeeing, ſent in poſt vnto the Tranſyluanian Prince, to requeſt him with all ſpeed to ſend him foure or fiue thouſand good ſouldiers, with which power he doubted not by the helpe of God, to be able to defend the towne, againſt all the forces the enemy was at that time able to bring againſt it. Vnto whom the prince without delay ſent 8000, who all in ſafetie in good time arriued at Lippa: for ſhortly after their arriual, 40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and ſat downe before the towne, encloſing it on euery ſide, and ſo lay for certaine dayes without any thing doing worth the ſpeaking of; they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harme they could with their great ſhot, which they ſent amongſt them not ſparingly. But they had not ſo long lien, but that news was brought into the camp, That the Tranſyluanian Prince was with a great power comming thither to relieue the towne: whereupon they preſently riſe, and retyred to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from Lippa; where certainly vnderſtanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in ſhort time be in ſuch readineſſe as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more ſtraitly beſieged the town than before. They had now brought with them ſeuenteene pieces of batterie, eight waggons laded with ſhot and pouder, and fortie ſix others laded with ſcaling ladders and other warlike prouiſion: thus appointed they began to batter the towne, and afterwards gaue thereunto diuers deſperat aſſaults, which the Chriſtians valiantly receiued, and ſtil with great ſlaughter repulſed their enemies. For that ſtrong town was with towers and bulwarks flanking one another, ſo fortified, that out of them the Chriſtians with their murthering pieces made great ſpoile of their enemies, and ſtil enforced them with loſſe to retyre, no bullet almoſt flying in vaine. In the heat of one of theſe aſſaults the gouernor cauſed one of the gates of the towne to be ſet open, hauing before within the towne placed ſixteene great pieces at the very entrance of the ſame gate, charged with all kind of murthering ſhot. Vnto which gate as of meere deſperation ſet open by the defendants, the Turks and Tartars deſirous of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be, thinking to haue thereby entered: when ſuddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforeſaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a ſithe, and ſo againe, and the third and fourth time, before they could cleere themſelues of the danger thereof, their heads, armes, and legs, and other rent limbs, flying in the aire moſt miſerably to behold. Neuertheleſſe the ſiege was by them continued, & the often aſſaults ſo reſolutely maintained, as if they had therupon purpoſed to haue gaged all their liues. But this ſo obſtinat a reſolution was by an vnexpected accident when they leaſt thought, conuerted into ſuch a deſperate feare and aſtoniſhment, that they vpon the ſudden (no man forcing them) forſook their trenches wherin they lay incamped, and leauing behinde them their tents, their great ordnance, and whatſoeuer els they had, they betooke themſelues to a moſt diſordered flight. The Tranſiluanians, who by chance were euen then comming thither, purſuing them, ſlew diuers of them, and tooke ſome others of them priſoners. At this ſiege the Baſſa of Temeſwar himſelfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of Giula with diuers others of good place ſlaine, and 4000 of the common ſoldiers. The cauſe of the Turks ſo great and ſudden feare was this, Whileſt the Baſſa of Temeſwar lay at the ſiege of Lippa, as is afore ſaid, they that were left in the citie fearing no harme, liued in great ſecuritie; in the meane time the gouernour of Lugaz ſent out ſix thouſand ſouldiers towards Temeſwar, now in the abſence of the Baſſa to ſeeke after bootie: who comming to Temeſwar with great ſpeed, rifled the ſuburbs of the citie, ſlew all the Turks they could light

vpon

A vpon,and ſet at libertie a thouſand captiues: and ſo hauing truſſed vp their bootie,ſet on fire all the ſuburbs,and departed. Which fire grew ſo great and ſo terrible, that it was plainely ſeene into the campe at Lippa, making a ſhew as if the whole citie had beene on a light fire. Which ſo daunted the hearts of the Turkes at the ſiege, that they preſently fled (as is before ſaid) leauing all that they had behinde them.

Plenia a towne of the Turkes ſacked by the Chriſtians.

The Tranſyluanian all this while buſied in raiſing of his army, and prouiding of things neceſſarie for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of Hungarie, towards Temeſwar, euen as the Turkes fled from Lippa. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that ſerued him, getting ouer Danubius not far from Nicopolis, tooke Plenia a little towne of the Turks, which they ranſacked and burnt,and hauing ſlaine in the country thereabout aboue B three thouſand of the Turks, returned with a rich prey vnto the Prince.

Cliſſa lately ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians,loſt againe to the Turks.

Not long before,the Chriſtians had ſurpriſed Cliſſa a ſtrong frontier towne of the Turks in Dalmatia not far from Spalato: which towne the Baſſa of Boſna ſought now again to recouer, and thereto laied hard ſiege. For the reliefe whereof, Leucowitz gouernor of Stiria and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, and the gouernour of Zeng with a fleet of two and fortie ſhips, wherein they had embarked 4000 ſouldiers well appointed with all things neceſſarie, ſet forward toward Cliſſa: and by the way lighting vpon a galley of the Venetians bound with certaine warlike prouiſion towards the Turkes campe, tooke her as good prize,and rifled her. This fleet with a faire wind arriued at Siret,neere vnto Trau, where the gouernor landing his men, marched that night part of his way toward Cliſſa, and C all the next day lay cloſe. The night following they ſet forward againe, and hauing marched fifteene miles, came vnto the enemies campe before day: where ſetting vpon the Turkes in their trenches,fearing no ſuch peril, they brought ſuch a general feare vpon the whole campe, that the Turks as men amaſed,fled ſome one way, ſome another,euery man (as in ſuch ſudden feare it commonly happeneth) making ſhift for himſelfe, leauing whatſoeuer they had in their trenches behind them. The Chriſtians contented ſo to haue put their enemies to flight, fell preſently to the ſpoile, as more deſirous thereof, than by the haſtie purſuit of their enemies to put themſelues in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victorie. Which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and from the hils with the dawning of the day diſcouering the ſmal number of the Chriſtians,and D how they were diſordered,they gathered themſelues againe together, and comming downe, incloſed on euery ſide the diſordered Chriſtians (greedily hunting after the ſpoile) and ſlew them downeright. Leucowitz himſelfe with the gouernor of Zeng and ſome others got into Cliſſa,where hauing ſtayed two days,and doubting to be able to keep the town,they ſecretly by night iſſued out with 600 men,in hope to haue recouered their fleet: but the Turks ſupecting ſuch a matter,had ſo beſet the paſſages,that of all that companie, Leucowitz had much ado himſelfe with three others to eſcape. The enemie now againe poſſeſſed of his trenches, layd ſtraiter ſiege to the towne than before: which they of the garriſon perceiuing,and now out of hope of reliefe,agreed with the Baſſa,that they might with bag & baggage depart,and ſo yeelded vp the towne. Thus Cliſſa one of the ſtrongeſt townes of Dalmatia, through the greedy couetouſneſſe of the diſordered ſoldiers, fel againe into the hands of the Turks.

Sombock taken by the lord Palſi.

About the ſame time, Palſi gouernor of Strigonium vnderſtanding of the meeting together E of certaine notable aduenturers of the Turkes at Sombock a Caſtle almoſt in the mid way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, raiſed the greateſt ſtrength he could, and ſo with certaine pieces of artillerie,and other things neceſſarie for an aſſault,ſet forward from Strigonium the two and twentieth of May, before the riſing of the Sun, and about three a clocke in the afternoone came to the aforeſaid caſtle; whereunto he preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault,which he neuer gaue ouer vntill he had taken it: for after that he had by the ſpace of three houres together with great danger maintained a moſt deſperat aſſault, at length he with much difficultie preuailed, and put to the ſword all the Turks he found therein, man, woman,and child; and with the reſt,fiftie Ianizaries but that day come thither. This caſtle was of great beautie, and moſt pleaſantly ſcituated, whereunto the Baſſa of Buda oftentimes for his pleaſure repaired: for which cauſe Palſi was very deſirous to haue taken it without ſpoiling: but the fire he had therein alreadie raiſed ſo preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great ſtore of victuals and other prouiſion,nothing remaining but what the Chriſtians had ſaued for themſelues.

The

Temeſware beſieged by the Tranſyluanian prince.

The Tranſyluanian Prince hauing raiſed a great armie for the reliefe of Lippa, being by great chance a little before his comming relieued, came & laid ſiege to the city of Temeſwar: where he had not long lien, but that the Turks and Tartars fearing to loſe that ſo famous a citie, aſſembled together from all places thereabouts to the number of 40000, and ſo came to raiſe the ſiege. Of whoſe comming the Prince hearing, riſe with his armie, and went to meet them, and had with them a great and terrible battell, the victorie for a great while ſtanding verie doubtful, yet ſeeming to incline rather to the Turks and Tartars, than to the Chriſtians: but at length the Turks diſordered with the great artillerie, and the Tranſyluanians charging them afreſh, began to giue ground, and ſo at laſt to betake themſelues to plaine flight. In this battell were ſlaine of the Turkes and Tartars 5000, and of the Chriſtians 1500. It was for a time reported, That the Prince himſelfe was in this battell ſlaine: which was not ſo, being reſerued to the further plague of the Turks, and comfort of his afflicted Countrey. After this victorie he returned againe to the ſiege, which he more ſtraitly continued than before, leauing nothing vnattempted that he could poſſibly deuiſe for the winning of the citie. Where whileſt he yet thus lay battering the citie both night and day, newes was brought him, That Giaffer Baſſa and the Tartars were comming with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged. Whereupon he conſidering his owne ſtrength and the power of his enemies, and that the aid promiſed him both from the Emperour and out of Hungarie was not yet readie, with great griefe of minde raiſed his ſiege, and retired with his armie to Lippa, there expecting new ſupplies as well of his owne as from his friends. Whileſt he yet there lay, he was certainly aduertiſed, That the Baſſa of Natolia (the forerunner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fourteene thouſand horſe and foure thouſand Ianizaries to joine with the Baſſa of Buda for the relieuing of Temeſwar; whoſe forces joined together were in number about threeſcore thouſand: and that Mahomet himſelfe (of whoſe comming had been rife report all this yeare) was now comming after with a far greater power. Whereupon he departed from Lippa, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo returning to Alba-Iulia, called there an aſſemblie of all his States, for the repreſſing of ſo puiſſant an enemie.

The Prince raiſeth his ſiege.

Mahomet for the better ſucceſſe of his wars in Hungarie had drawne forth the Tartar with a mightie power: who although he was at the firſt ſo vnwilling to that ſeruice (conſidering the great loſſes he had therein before receiued) that he would not, as he ſaid, ſend ſo much as one Aſſe thereunto: yet ouercome with great gifts, and the reſpect he had of the Turkiſh Sultan, was now ready with a ſtrong army vpon the frontiers of Moldauia, to meet him in Hungarie: vnto whom the late choſen Vaiuod ſent certain preſents, with ſuch ſtore of victuals as he could poſſibly prouide for him. Yet foraſmuch as he was not that way to paſſe without the leaue of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by letters and diuers his Embaſſadors entreated with the Polonian king for his paſſage: as alſo for the confirmation of the antient league he and the Polonian kings his predeceſſours had to their good of long time had with the Othoman Emperours; from which he well knew the Chriſtian Emperor, with diuers other the Chriſtian Princes to ſeeke by all meanes to withdraw him. Mahomet alſo not ignorant, how hurtfull and dangerous the confederation betwixt Michael the Vayuod of Valachia & the Tranſyluanian was vnto him and his deſignes, ſent vnto him an Embaſſador, by the ſhew of great dangers to deter him from the Tranſyluanian, and by many glorious promiſes to allure him to ſubmit himſelfe again vnto his protection, and in token of his fielitie to deliuer vnto the Sultan two of his frontier townes, ſuch as he ſhould require; in regard whereof he ſhould together with the Sultans fauour receiue golden mountaines. Whereunto the Vayuod anſwered, That as yet he was not wearie of the friendſhip he held with the Prince: and for the townes he required, that they were not in his power to giue, as belonging to the Prince; vnto whom he ſaid he would write, and ſtay the Embaſſador in the meane time vntill he had from him anſwer.

The Emperor on the other ſide had with all carefulneſſe ſo far as in him was, prouided that his army might be ready to take the field with the beginning of the Spring: but as it commonly chanceth, the ſpeedie proceedings of great actions (wherein the hands of many mighty is required) to be much hindered by delaies, ſometimes of one, and ſometimes of another; ſo fel it out with him now: for albeit that his owne forces were in ſome good time readie, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Sommer alſo far paſt, before the aid promiſed from other Princes met together. At length after long expectance, when ſome conuenient number for an

A armie was from diuers places come together at Vienna: they were by the lord Swartzenburg and their other commanders brought forth into the field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the ſelfeſame trenches that were the laſt yeare caſt vp by countie Mansfield for the ſafetie of his armie; there to expect the comming downe of the great ordnance and other prouiſion by the riuer from Vienna, as alſo the reſt of the Chriſtian forces dayly looked for. From Altenburg the Chriſtian armie remooued to Komara, and not ſtaying there long, the foure and twentieth of Iuly marched towards Vacia, otherwiſe called Woczen: but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approch of the Chriſtians, forſooke the town, and with their cattell and beſt part of their ſubſtance fled to Peſth, carrying alſo away with them the great ordnance; the greateſt whereof they buried by the way, which was neuertheleſſe afterwards B found out by the Chriſtians. And although the Turks at their departure had ſet fire both vpon the towne and the caſtle, yet the Chriſtians left therein did what they might to quench the ſame: by whoſe diligence and the helpe of two thouſand footmen, and certaine troupes of horſemen ſent thither by SwartZenburg, a great part both of the towne and the caſtle was preſerued: the whole Armie of the Chriſtians following after, encamped in the open field, and with their horſemen braued the Turks euen to the gates of Peſth. This ſo ſudden a comming of the Chriſtians, brought a great feare both vpon them of Peſth & Buda, inſomuch, that they ſent their wiues and children, with the chiefeſt of their ſubſtance downe the riuer vnto places of more ſafetie, and farther off from danger: which was done ſo diſorderedly (as it happeneth in ſuch common feares) that many of them for haſt thruſt one another into the riuer, and ſo periſhed.

Vacia abandoned of the Turks, is taken by the Chriſtians.

C Hitherto in the former wars againſt the Turke, had Matthias been Generall of the Chriſtian armies: but now of late, Ferdinand the Emperors vncle Countie of Tirol being dead, Matthias was by the Emperor his brother preferred to the gouernment of that rich countrie and the prouinces thereabouts, not inferior to ſome kingdomes; and Maximilian his younger brother appointed General in his ſtead: who departing from Vienna in the latter end of Iuly, came into the camp the fourth of Auguſt, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palſi, honourably and with great triumph receiued.

Now were the Chriſtians threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, and hauing fortified Vacia, and therin placed a conuenient garriſon, reſolued by common conſent to beſiege Hatwan, a ſtrong D towne of the Turks in the vpper Hungarie. And thereupon riſing with their armie from Vachia the thirteenth of Auguſt, came the fifteenth of the ſame month about noone & ſat down before the towne; and that with ſuch ſpeed, that they were before ſeene of the Turks in the town, than that they heard any thing of their cōming: inſomuch, that at the firſt ſhew of them, they of the towne tooke them to haue been ſome come out to ſeeke after bootie; and therfore ſallying out vpon them, skirmiſhed with them a while, vntill they perceiued the whole battell comming. The Chriſtians approching the towne, encamped themſelues, as they thought moſt conuenient, and began in three places to batter the counterſcarfe. This frontier towne of the Turks, beſides that it was kept with a ſtrong garriſon, was alſo ſtrengthned with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad counterſcarfe and ſtrong paliſadoes. Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks ſallying out of the towne, brake into their trenches, and there did great harme; and like enough they were to haue done more, had not the horſemen in good time come in vpon them and enforced them to retire. In this ſally, amongſt others was one Greis a notable captaine ſlaine, being ſhamefully forſaken of his owne men; who for that their cowardiſe, were all in the ſight of the whole armie diſarmed, and ſo turned out of the camp as men vnworthie any longer to beare armes. One morning alſo as the Chriſtians were at their deuotions in their trenches, a Turkiſh prieſt from out of an high tower not far off, railed moſt bitterly vpon them, curſing and deriding them: wherewith one of the Chriſtian canoniers much moued, made a ſhot at the tower, which he ſo well beſtowed, that therewith he ſtruck downe the tower, together with the Idolatrous prieſt, as he was yet railing & blaſpheming. At length the Chriſtians had with exceeding labor & continual batterie made the town ſaultable: wherwith the Turks diſcouraged, offered (but al too late) to yeeld vp the towne vpon the ſame conditions that they of Strigonium had: whereunto they receiued no anſwer; yea commandement was giuen throughout the campe, That no man vpon paine of death, ſhould haue any parley with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readineſſe for the aſſault, the Chriſti-ans one day about fiue a clocke in the afternoone, aſſaulted the towne in foure places; and after three houres hard fight, by ſtrong hand tooke it, with the ſchriching and lamenting of the women and children, and other fearefull people, who now gaue themſelues all loſt and forlorne. Foure houres execution was done vpon all that came to hand, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: women were ſlain great with childe, and yong children hanging at their mothers breaſts; it booted not to crie for mercy, the bloudy ſword deuouring all. The fury of the Wallons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thongs and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had ſlain quicke. Which their cruelty they afterwards excuſed when they were therefore reproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turkes hereafter not ſo wickedly to blaſpheme againſt Chriſt, or with ſuch their wonted and barbarous cruelty to torment the Chriſtians that fell into their hands, for feare of like themſelues. In this aſſault and furie periſhed of the Turks about foure thouſand, & of the Chriſtians not paſt three hundred. In this towne beſide that which the fire deuoured, was found a very rich prey. The firſt that entred the towne was one Terſkie a notable captain, with his companie: after whom followed Ruſwurme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to haue ſlaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turks.

Mahomet the great Sultan commeth to Buda with an army of two hundred thouſand.

Now in the meane time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, remoued thence to come downe into the heart of Hungarie, ſending Cicala Baſſa before him: and at length after long looking for, the ſecond of September arriued at Buda, hauing in his armie about two hundred thouſand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he preſently ſent fortie thouſand to Temeſwar; but ſtaied there himſelfe with the reſt of his armie.

The Chriſtians yet lying at Hatwan, and doubting leſt the Sultan ſuddenly paſſing the riuer ſhould come vpon them not yet readie for battell, departing thence, and retiring backe againe, came and encamped not far from Vachia. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from Hatwan, had left a conuenient garriſon for the keping of the towne; yet ſuch was the terrour of the Turkes approch, that the next day after, they that were there left in garriſon forſooke the towne, and ſetting it on fire, followed themſelues after the campe. This comming of the Turkiſh Sultan to Buda, brought alſo a great feare vpon them at Vienna, as much doubting leſt he ſhould that way haue turned his forces, which cauſed them both day and night to labor for the better fortification of the citie, and for the prouiſion of all things, as if it had bin for a preſent ſiege.

But Mahomet not prouided for the vndertaking of ſo ſtrong a place, and not ignorant of the diſgrace his great grandfather the victorious Solyman had ſometime receiued vnder the wals thereof, had no purpoſe thereto, as hauing bent his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of Hungarie is an antient famous city, well fortified and honoured with a Biſhops See called Agria, not far from Hatwan: vpon this city, as the chiefe fortreſſe of the Chriſtians in thoſe quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into Hungarie caſt his eies, and began now that way to make head, with purpoſe by taking of that citie, and placing there of a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the vniting of the Emperors forces with the Tranſyluanians, for the mutuall ſtrengthning of the one the other by the way of the vpper Hungarie. Which the Archduke perceiuing, ſent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terſkie with a notable companie of Italians and Germanes, and a thouſand other harquebuſiers, who all arriued there in ſafetie. At which time alſo the lord Teuffenbach ſent into the citie three thouſand footmen, vnder the conduct of countie Turne, with good ſtore of warlike prouiſion needfull for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended vpon by the great Baſſaes, Ibrahim, Giaffer, Haſſan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand men, came and encamped betweene the two riuers of Danubius and Tibiſcus, couering a great part of the countrie with his tents. Approching the citie, he with wonderfull celeritie caſt vp fiue great mounts, and from them with ſuch furie battered the wals, that the Chriſtians were glad night and day to ſtand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals were ſo great, & in many places ſo weakly fortified as that they were not but by a greater garriſon to be defended againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie; and that therefore the defendants with their honou lawfully might euen the firſt day haue ſet the citie on fire, & retired themſelues into the caſtle, which was both faire and ſtrong, and the only place to be truſted vnto; yet for the ſpace of fi daies they worthily defended the whole citie againſt the fury of the enemies; and out of it di

A them great harme. But ſeeing the danger greatly encreaſing, and that the citie was not longer to be holden, they ſet it on fire; hauing before conueied all the beſt of their ſubſtance with themſelues into the caſtle: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, brake ſo ſuddenly into the city, as if they would together with the Chriſtians haue entred the caſtle alſo; but in the attempt therof they were notably repulſed & many of them ſlain. Adioyning to the caſtle was a great and ſtrong bulwarke, againſt which the Turks for certain daies furiouſly thundred with their great ordnance, & that without intermiſſion: and hauing in diuers places ſore ſhaken it, in the ſpace of two daies aſſaulted it 12 times, but not without the wonderfull loſſe of their men: & yet gaue it not ſo ouer; but as men with their loſſe more enraged, came on againe with greater fury than before, & ſo at laſt by plaine force tooke it: and there put to the ſword all them they B found therin, except ſuch as by good hap got betimes into the caſtle. This bulwarke thus loſt, the Chriſtians the next day ſallying out, again recouered; wherein they ſlew a great number of the Turks, with the loſſe of ſome thirtie men, and as many moe wounded. The beſieged now diuers times both by letters and meſſengers craued aid of Maximilian the General, giuing him to vnderſtand, that they could not long hold out for want of ſhot and pouder, if they were not betimes relieued (whereof the enemie alſo was not ignorant) yet were they reſolued to hold it out euen to the laſt man; although the great Sultan had oftentimes by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promiſe that they ſhould in ſafety with life & goods depart, otherwiſe threatning vnto them greater extremities than was of late ſhewed vnto the Turks at Hatwan, if they ſhould as obſtinat men hold it out vnto the laſt. Whereunto they neuer C anſwered him any thing: for Terskie had forbid them all parly with the enemie; and in the midſt of the market place had cauſed a paire of gallowes to be ſet vp, threatning to hang him thereon, whoſoeuer he were, that ſhould once make motion of yeelding vp the citie.

A bulwarke twelue times aſſaulted in two daies.

Whileſt the beſieged thus liue in hope of reliefe, the Archduke vpon the comming ouer of the Sultan towards Agria, hauing retired with his army to Strigonium, and there ſtaid ſomewhat too long expecting the comming of more aid, began now at length to ſet forward, and to make ſome ſhew as if he had indeed purpoſed to haue relieued his diſtreſſed friends ſo hardly beſet at Agria. But ſuch was the fouleneſſe of the weather, hindering the paſſage of his great ordnance (not to ſpeake of any thing elſe) that in fourteene daies he marched ſcarcely twelue miles forward. Whereby the enemie tooke occaſion to preuaile as he did in his ſiege: who D now hearing of the comming of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing to how little purpoſe he had ſo long battered the caſtle, conuerted all his indeauors to the filling vp of the ditch of the old caſtle, with fagots, earth, and ſuch like matter: for the haſtening of which worke, Mahomet himſelfe ſpared not to ride vp and downe in all places of his armie, with his preſence and cheerful ſpeech encouraging his men in that deſperat worke. But whileſt the Turkes are thus buſie in fulfilling his command, the Chriſtians ſallying out vpon them made great ſlaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Baſſa with ſuch as were about him: after whom they ſo eagerly followed, that he in the flight loſt his tulipant for haſt, & was there very like to haue bin taken. Neuertheleſſe the worke went ſtill forward, and was now at length with the reſtleſſe labour of ſo great a multitude brought to ſuch perfection, that the Turkes thought it now no E great matter by aſſault to enter the caſtle: and thereupon the tenth of October gaue vnto it foure deſperat aſſaults one vpon another, being ſtill with greater ſlaughter of his men repulſed.
But comming on again the fifth time with freſh ſupplies, and greater fury than at the firſt, they preuailed; and ſo entring, put to the ſword all they found in the caſtle, in number about eight hundred: foure hundred of whoſe heads, one of the Turks captains cauſed to be carried vnto Mahomet in the camp, in the beholding whereof, he is ſaid to haue taken great pleaſure, as in the vndoubted ſignes of his victorie.

The old caſtle taken.

The old caſtle thus taken, nothing remained but the new caſtle, againſt which the Turks conuerted their whole forces, wherein they repoſed not ſo much hope (although their batterie were verie terrible, & their power great) as in the ſecret mines wherewith they had in 14 places vndermined the caſtle, and were now almoſt readie to be blowne vp. Which the beſieged perceiuing, and withall conſidering the ſtate wherein they ſtood, and not hearing any thing of reliefe, reſolued amongſt themſelues (without the conſent of their chiefe commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yeeld. And thereupon altogether as if it had beene but one man, riſe vp in a mutinie againſt their two Gouernours, Paul Niari, and Terskie, who at the firſt by all the reaſons they could deuiſe, diſſuaded them from ſuch cowardiſe, putting them in mind of G the oath they had taken: which not preuailing, they afterwards vpon their knees requeſted them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of ſpeedie reliefe: yea Terskie with his hands caſt vp entreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yeeld, then they ſhould firſt kill him with their owne hands, that he might not liue to ſee ſo great a diſhonour.

But what auaileth perſuaſion with men poſſeſſed with ſo great feare? And in the meane time two hundred and fiftie of the common ſoldiers, among whom were many Italians, ſecretly eſcaping out of the caſtle fled into the camp, of whom diuers became renegats & turned Turk; which added to the former feare, ſo much diſcouraged the minds of the reſt, that they forthwith required to come to parly with the enemy, and ſo agreed, That they might with bag and baggage and their ſwords by their ſides in ſafetie depart: the great Sultan giuing his faith for H the performance thereof, with hoſtages deliuered on either ſide. So the 13 of October about noone, the garriſon ſouldiers came out of the caſtle in number about two thouſand: but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great plaine ſet vpon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces; ſome of them were ſlain quicke, and ſome other of them otherwiſe ſhamefully diſmembred; the Turks in the meane time vpbraiding them, and ſaying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had ſo cruelly before dealt with them of Hatwan. This perfidious dealing much offended diuers of the better ſort of the Turks, inſomuch, that ſome of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) cauſed ſome of the chiefe authors thereof to be put to death: and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them priſoners, they ſhould forthwith ſet them at liberetie.
Thus is the famous citie of Agria, of long time a Chriſtian Biſhops ſeat, now become a I ſure receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Agria yeelded vnto the Turks Petrinia beſieged by the Turkes.

Whileſt Mahomet thus lay at the ſiege of Agria, the Baſſa of Boſna with certain other of the Sanzackes thereabouts, hauing raiſed a great armie, came & beſieged Petrinia in the borders of Croatia: which he at his firſt comming ſo furiouſly battered by the ſpace of ſeuen daies, that it was of many thought not poſſible for it to hold out two daies longer. In the mean time the Lord Herbenſtein and Leukowitze, with all the power they could make out of Croatia and Windiſmarch, came towards Petrinia: but hauing no meanes in ſo great haſte to make a bridge ouer the riuer of Kulp, they retired towards Siſeg, there to paſſe ouer. The Turkes hearing of their retire, and ſuppoſing them to haue fled for feare, put ſixe thouſand horſemen ouer K the Riuer to purſue them: Vpon whome the Chriſtians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and hauing ſlaine many of them, draue the reſt headlong into the Riuer, where moſt of them periſhed. The Chriſtians neuertheleſſe keeping on their way to Siſeg, there the next day by a bridge paſſed ouer the Riuer, and ſo marching towards Petrinia, and beeing come neere vnto the towne, were encountered by eight thouſand Turkes, whom they alſo put to flight; and by certaine priſoners there taken, vnderſtood that the Baſſa the day before was riſen from before the towne and gone: which they at the firſt beleeued not, but comming thither found it ſo, to their owne good contentment, and the great ioy of the late beſieged.

Petrinia releeued.

Maximilian the Generall marching on faire and ſoftly from Strigonium, at length the ſeuenteenth L of October came to Caſſouia, foure daies after that Agria was loſt; and there met with the Tranſyluanian Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thouſand men, aud forty field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thouſand were mercinarie horſemen, fifteene hundred were of the nobilitie of his country, and the reſt footmen. The next day after, they ſetting forward from Caſſouia, ioyned themſelues with the reſt of the armie led by the Lord Teuffenbach and Palfi, and ſo of all their vnited forces made one armie, conſiſting now of two and thirtie thouſand horſemen and eight and twentie thouſand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twenty field pieces, and twenty thouſand wagons, wherewith they euery night encloſed their armie as with a moſt ſure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards Agria, with a full reſolution to giue the Turks battell, whereof the whole armie ſeemed to be very deſirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to paſſe ouer a certain riuer, the paſſage whereof Giaffer Baſſa had before taken with twentie thouſand Turks and Tartars, the reſt of the Turks armie lying ſtill not farre from Agria. Now the purpoſe of the Baſſa was, to haue enlarged the paſſage of the riuer, and

A ſo to haue made way for the whole armie, to haue afterwards paſſed to the other ſide, as moſt commodious for many purpoſes, eſpecially for water, whereof they ſo might themſelues haue had plentie, & yet kept the Chriſtians from it. But of this his purpoſe, by the comming of the Chriſtians he was quite diſappointed: for the next day being the 23 of October, they skirmiſhed with him in diuers places, eſpecially at the paſſage of the riuer; where at the firſt incounter he loſt 300 of his men, and in the end ſeeing himſelfe too weake to withſtand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, hauing loſt two of his enſignes & 20 field pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approch of the night hindered the purſuit of the Chriſtians, who were now become maſters both of the paſſage of the riuer, and of B the place where the Baſſa lay: which they finding not ſo commodious for them as they had at the firſt ſuppoſed (eſpecially for lacke of wood, the weather being then extreme cold, as alſo hearing of the approch of the Sultan with his whole army) they forthwith forſook the ſame, and retired again ouer the riuer to the place where they lay before, incloſing themſelues with their waggons, as if it had beene a city ſtrongly encloſed with woodden wals. The next day which was the 24 of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his armie ſhewed himſelfe vnto the view of the Chriſtians, and ſent 3000 Tartars to paſſe the riuer: of whom the Chriſtians ſlew a great number with their great ſhot, and put the reſt to flight. Both the armies were populous and ſtrong, and couered a great deale of ground, a moſt goodly ſight to behold: both drunke of the ſame riuer, as well the men as their horſes, and therefore kept continuall watch C all that night on both ſides of the riuer, eſpecially at the paſſage. In the morning betwixt ſix & ſeuen a clocke, Mahomet with his armie ranged in order of battell, came within ſight of the Chriſtians, his ſquadrons as it were couering all the country on that ſide of the riuer as far as the Chriſtians could well ſee; and now againe ſent part of his army ouer the riuer: with whom the Chriſtians skirmiſhed from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the riuer, all this while ſtanding faſt, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both ſides well wearied, and many ſlaine, the Turks retired again ouer the riuer to the camp: in the meane time (as if it had bin by conſent) they reſolued on both ſides the next day to trie the fortune of a battell; and ſo commandement was giuen through both the armies, for euery man againſt a certaine appointed time to make himſelfe ready. So the next day, being the 26 of D October, Mahomet brought forth his armie again out of his camp, which was not far from the Chriſtians; and began now to draw downe towards the riuer. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old Church, where Mahomet placed certain companies of Ianizaries, and 24 field pieces, and commanded ten thouſand of his ſelect ſouldiers to paſſe the riuer, which they readily did. The Chriſtians alſo ready for battell, and now thinking it time vpon the comming ouer of the enemie to begin; with part of their armie thereunto appointed, ſo fiercely charged the Turks that were already come ouer, that they quickly ouerthrew them, and not them only, but certaine companies of Tartars alſo that were in another place come ouer the riuer: and not ſo contented, but following them they had in chaſe, put to flight them alſo that ſtood on the farther ſide of the riuer, of whom they ſlew a great number, & by the comming on of the E reſt of the armie, tooke from them an 190 great pieces of artillerie: whereof ſo great a feare riſe in the enemies camp, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Baſſa ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the armie, fled in all haſte towards Agria, ſhedding ſome teares by the way as he went and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomets garment, which hee for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, and the Archduke was about to haue cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Tranſyluanian Prince, the Lord Palſi, and the reſt, perſuaded him in that ſo great feare of the enemie to proſecute the victorie; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their diſordered battels. Wherefore the Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, charged afreſh the front of their enemies reſtored battell, conſiſting of fortie thouſand men, and that with ſuch violence, as that they in ſhort time had ſlaine the moſt part of them, and put the reſt to flight: and with the like good fortune charging the bodie of the maine battell, forced the diſcouraged Turkes with great ſlaughter into their owne campe. Now commandement was before giuen throughout the Chriſtian army, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould in ſeeking after ſpoile breake his array, or forſake his place, before the victorie were aſſuredly gotten. But they in this hot purſute breaking together with the Turkes into their tents, and there killing a great number of them, and ſeeing in euery place great ſtore of rich ſpoile, contrarie to the aforeſaid commandement, left the purſuit of the enemy, & diſorderly fell to the ſpoile of the tents, vntil they came to the very tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the miſchiefe, with a moſt ſudden change of fortune. For here theſe greedie diſordred men, not now worthy the name of ſoldiers, light vpon a ſtrong ſquadron of reſolute men, with good ſtore of great ordnance ready charged, which they diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies, and rent in ſunder a number of them, and after that, came on reſolutely themſelues: when in the meane time Cicala Baſſa with his horſemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them alſo, and with the terror of his comming brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they began amaine to flie, eſpecially the Hungarians & Germans, moſt buſied in the ſpoile. Neither could they in that feare, by any threats or intreatie of their commanders be perſuaded to make a ſtand, or ſo much as once to looke backe, or to ſhew any token of true valour: which their haſty flight was the ouerthrow not of themſelues only, but of others alſo that would haue fought, for whilſt they fled headlong vpon the ſpur, and could not be ſtaid, they ouerran their owne footmen, & ſo furthered the enemies victorie. Thus for want of good order, through the greedy couetouſnes of a ſort of diſordered men the moſt notable victory that euer the Chriſtians were like to haue had ouer the Turks, was let ſlip out of their hands. Many noble gentlemen & commanders, in ſeeking to ſtay the flight of their own men, were here ſlain: & although the enemy followed the chaſe ſcarce halfe a mile, yet were the Chriſtians poſſeſſed with ſuch a feare, that they fled amaine all ouer the country with greater ſhame than loſſe, no man purſuing them. The Archduke himſelfe ſeeing all deſperat, fled to Caſſouia. The Tranſyluanian of all others moſt orderly retired himſelfe towards Tocaij, hauing not loſt in this battell aboue 200 men, and of them neuer a man of name. All this loſſe he imputed to the couetouſneſſe of the Hungarians, and cowardiſe of the German horſemen. The Lord Bernſtein hauing charge of the great artillerie, fled alſo, and made ſhift for himſelfe, as did Palfi, and in fine all the reſt. Neither was the feare leſſe amongſt the Turks (a wonderful thing to be ſpoken) than it was among the Chriſtians: for the night following they for feare of the return of the Chriſtians, truſſing vp the beſt of their things, fled alſo towards Agria. And it was afterwards known, that the Turks great ordnance, tents, & baggage ſtood three daies in their trenches, either altogether vngarded, or ſo ſlenderly guarded, as that they might haue bin eaſily taken by the Chriſtians, if they would but haue made head againe. Yea Mahomet himſelfe is reported oftentimes to haue confeſſed the danger and feare he was then in to haue been taken, & all his army deſtroied, if the Chriſtians had (as they ſhould) purſued the victory, and not ſo baſely run after the ſpoile: by which danger he then warned; afterwards euer ſhunned to aduenture his perſon to the like perill in the field. In this battel of Kareſta (for ſo it is of a place therby called) & at the ſiege of Agria, were loſt of the Chriſtians about 20000, and of the Turks 60000. Mahomet after this victory fortified Agria, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 ſouldiers, and ſo returned to Belgrade.

A great and long skirmiſh betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

Twentie thouſand Chriſtians ſlain, & threeſcore thouſand Turks.

Vacia beſieged by the Baſſa of Buda.

The Baſſa of Buda perſuading himſelfe that the Chriſtians after ſo great an ouerthrow could not this yeare to any purpoſe recouer their ſtrength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of Nouember beſieged Vacia, in hope to haue eaſily carried it: but finding there greater reſiſtance than hee had before imagined, and hearing that the diſperſed Chriſtians in the vpper part of Hungarie were making head for to come to the reliefe of the towne, he more afraid than hurt, brake vp his ſiege, and ſo returned to Buda: for indeed the diſperſed reliques of the late army of the Chriſtians were drawing together, but vnarmed & vnſeruiceable, as hauing in the late flight ſhamefully caſt away their armes, and therefore could haue done the Baſſa ſmall harme if he had continued the ſiege.

Mahomet thinking it honor enough for him to haue thus woon Agria, and driuen the Chriſtians out of the field, diuided his armie into two parts at Belgrade: whereof the one he billetted in the countrey thereabout, to be ready for all euents, and with the other hee returned to Conſtantinople: but by the way he was ſet vpon by Barbelius Ianuſchie the Tranſyluanian princes Lieutenant, and the Vayuod of Valachia, who with a great power both of horſe and foot being got ouer the riuer Danubius, and ſecretly fauored by the country people, lay in ambuſh for him in places of aduantage, and ſtill following in the taile of his army, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them: and ſo with much trouble arriued at length at Conſtantinople, where we will for this yeare leaue him, vntill we heare of him more.

Maximilian with a ſmall retinue arriued at Vienna in the latter end of Nouember, where he found the Viſcont of Burgaw, Swartzenburg, and ſome other of the commanders of his late armie; moſt of the reſt, eſpecially the Italians, being ſlaine. The ſmall remainder of this vnfortunate yere was ſpent with often skirmiſhes and inrodes one into anothers frontiers, as the manner of war is, without any other great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor, notwithſtanding the late diſcomfiture of his armie not farre from Agria, made choice againe of his brother Maximilian the Archduke for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars againſt the Turke. Whereunto the Pope by his legat Fran. Aldobrandino promiſed of his owne charge to ſend him 10000 Italians, vnder the conduct of the duke of Mantua; as did alſo the German Princes their woonted aid, with ſome others. All which ſlowly at length meeting together neere vnto Poſſonium and Altenburg, in the months of Iuly and Auguſt; departing thence, marched to Pappa, which after eight dayes hard ſiege they took, and ſo againe retired to Altenburg, where they tooke a general muſter of the army, and afterwards in the beginning of September ſhewed themſelues before the ſtrong towne of Rab: where the lord Bernſtein approching too neere the walls, was with a ſhot ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe the reſt there ſtayed, vntill that hearing of the comming of Mahomet Baſſa the Turkes General with a great armie, they left the ſiege, and the 24 day of September paſſing ouer the riuer Danubius, into the Iſland Schut towards Comara, there on the North ſide of the riuer encamped. Where they had not lien paſt eight dayes, but that the caſtle of Dotis ſtanding vpon the South ſide of Danubius, was by the Baſſa before their faces, and as it were euen vnder their noſes beſieged and taken; the whole armie of the Chriſtians in the meane time as idle beholders looking on, but not daring to relieue their diſtreſſed friends: but afterwards ariſing, marched to Vacia; where hearing of the Turks comming againſt them from Peſth, they ſet fire on the caſtle, and ſo retyred alongſt the North ſide of the riuer, vntil they came ouer againſt Vicegrade a caſtle of their owne on the farther ſide of Danubius; where by the good direction of the lord George Baſta a moſt expert captaine, and lieutenant General of the armie, they encamped ſo ſtrongly, as that the Turks after many braue attempts giuen to haue forced them in their trenches, were glad with ſome loſſe to depart.

Pappa taken by the Chriſtians.

Dotis taken by the Turks.

Neither went things this yere better forward with the Chriſtians in other places than in this ſide of Hungary: for Sigiſmund the Tranſiluanian prince by his Chancelor beſieging the ſtrong city of Temeſwar in October, was by the valour of the defendants, and the vnſeaſonablenes of the weather enforced to raiſe his ſiege, and with diſhonor to depart. Michael alſo the Vayuod of Valachia, who moued with the example and perſuaſions of the Tranſyluanian Prince, had reuolted from the Turks, and done them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often inuaſions and the ſpoile of his country, almoſt brought to vtter deſolation, many thouſands of his ſubjects being by the Turks and Tartars carried away captiues, and his townes and caſtles for moſt part raſed; to giue his people a time of breathing, ſubmitted himſelfe againe vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance, ſolemnely receiuing at the hands of one of the Turkes Chiaus (for that purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople) an enſigne in token of his ſubmiſſion vnto the Turkiſh Emperor, as alſo of his fauor towards him. Which the more to aſſure him of, he by another honorable meſſenger ſhortly after receiued from Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayuodſhip of Valachia by the grand Seignior his ſolemne oath, vnto Michael the Vayuod and his ſon Peter, then about thirteene yeares old, for the terme of both their liues, without diſturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turks before demanded. So glad they were vpon any condition to haue reduced that martial man with his country vnto their obeiſance: and in token of further grace, together with theſe letters he receiued alſo a goodly horſe, moſt richly furniſhed, with a faire ſcimiter and an horſemans mace, in ſigne of the martial power and gouernment committed vnto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honors the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to accept: neuertheleſſe not daring too far to truſt vnto the Turkiſh faith, of the ſmal aſſurance whereof he had before had ſufficient experience, he ſtil kept ſtrong garriſons vpon the frontiers of his countrey, with ſuch other forces alſo as he was woont, excuſing the ſame to be done for feare of the Tartars; by whom he alſo excuſed himſelfe, for not going with the Turkes Generall this yeare into Hungarie, as he was by ſpeciall meſſengers from the grand Seignior himſelfe requeſted; telling him that he might not in any caſe ſo do,for feare of the Tartars moſt horrible incurſions , and the ſpoiles of his countrey : yet knew he right well , how that they were by the great Sultan his expreſſe commandement charged not to do any harme either in Moldauia or Valachia, as they went into Hungarie. But this warie Vayuod not greatly truſting either the Sultan or them, as alſo loth himſelfe a Chriſtian,to go againſt the Chriſtians his friends and late confederats,excuſed himſelfe by the neceſſarie care he had of his ſubiects and country,and ſo requeſted that his reaſonable excuſe to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted : but of him more is to be ſaid hereafter. Thus paſſed this yeare without any great thing done more than is before declared; both theſe great Princes,the Emperor and the Turkiſh Sultan, being warned by the laſt yeres work what it was to put al to the fortune of a battel:& therfore now contenting themſelues to haue ſhewed their forces,as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this yeres wars more in ſhewes than deeds.

What great things might by the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues be done againſt the Turke,is by the conſiderat right eaſily to be gathered: but eſpecially by the notable victorie of the famous Tranſyluanian prince Sigiſmund, who confederated but with his poore oppreſſed neighbours the Valachians and Moldauians , and ſtrengthened with ſome ſmall aid from the Emperor and the Hungarians, not only deliuered thoſe three countries from the heauie burthen of the Turkiſh thraldom,but vanquiſhed alſo their moſt renowned captains, ouerthrew their mightie armies, burnt and ſpoiled their Countries, raſed their townes and cities ; which as it hath beene before in part declared, ſo if it ſhould be all particularly ſet downe, beſides that it would be tedious , ſo alſo might it haply ſeeme almoſt incredible. Beſide which calamities of war(commonly more felt of the ſubiects than of the prince)the great Sultan himſelfe found no ſmall wants,as well in his coffers,as other his neceſſarie ſupplies for the maintenance of his wars,eſpecially in Hungarie ; the onely countrey of Moldauia before theſe troubles yeelding vnto him yerely a tun of gold, 2000 horſes for ſeruice, 10000 great meaſures of wheat,with as much barly,and a wonderfull proportion of butter,hony,and other victuals; the other two prouinces paying the like or more,as a yerely tribute: whereof he had of late,to his great diſcontentment, by the general reuolt of theſe three countries been quite diſappointed. But this ſo wholeſome a confederation(to the great hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale, & benefit of the Turks) now broken,& Moldauia by the Polonians diſſeuered from the reſt,& again made tributary to the Turk,as is before declared,& now Valachia alſo in a ſort acknowledging the Turks obeiſance; the noble Tranſyluanian prince,who hitherto with great cheerfulneſſe and courage had fought the moſt Chriſtian battels againſt the Turk,now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his owne ſmall forces to be able long to defend his country againſt the Turke and the Polonian, whom he feared not much leſſe than him : leſt the ſame ſhould together with himſelfe, fall into the hands of the Turks or ſome other his enemies, by a wonderfull change voluntarily reſigned this his countrey of Tranſyluania vnto Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor and his heires for euer : and ſo leauing his wife in Tranſyluania,went himſelfe into Sileſia,there to take poſſeſſion of the dukedomes of Oppel and Ratibor,which together with the yerely penſion of 50000 Ioachims,or the reuenues of the Biſhoprick of Vratiſlauia,he had in lieu thereof receiued of the Emperor: whereupon the poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania,by the general conſent of all the States of that countrey, was in the beginning of this yeare 1598,deliuered vnto the Archbiſhop of Vacia,the County Nadaſti,and Doctor Petzi the emperors commiſſioners; and a ſolemne oath of obedience and loyaltie taken of them all in general : albeit the aforeſaid Commiſſioners,as alſo the Emperor himſelfe would haue perſuaded the Prince,either not at all, or at leſtwiſe not ſo ſuddenly to haue forſaken his country, but to haue ſtill kept the gouernment thereof himſelfe yet for a yeare or two ; well foreſeeing, that the ſame could not ſo conueniently be gouerned by any other,as by himſelfe,a natural Prince therein borne,and exceedingly beloued of his ſubiects. The ſame commiſſioners alſo in Iune following going into Valachia,there tooke the like oath of obedience of Michael the Vayuod and his people: who loathing the Turkiſh ſoueraigntie, all willingly yeelded themſelues vnto the Emperors protection. Theſe commiſſioners alſo at the ſame time came to agreement with the Tartars Embaſſadors,offering vnto the Emperour peace and aid for the yearely penſion of 40000 duckets,and as many ſheep-skin gownes their vſual manner of apparel.

A great tribute.

All this while continued the Diet of the empire, begun in December laſt paſt at Ratiſbon, Mathias the Emperors brother being there his deputie,and in his Majeſties name demanding a greater greater

A greater aid for the maintenance of his wars againſt the Turk the common enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered: where after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed vpon for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars & defence of the Chriſtian commonweale, to be paied in three yeares next, and ſo thereupon was the aſſemblie diſſolued. But as they were returning home, behold contrarie to all hope, Rab one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of Chriſtendome, three yeares before betrayed vnto the Turks by Countie Hardeck, was now by the wiſedome and valour of Adolphus Baron of Swartzenburg, the Emperors lieutenant in the lower Hungarie, againe recouered, to the great griefe of the Turks, and wonderfull rejoycing of the Chriſtians, in ſuch ſort as followeth:

Two Italian priſoners flying out of Rab, diſcouer the ſtate of the towne to the Lord Swartzenburg.

This noble gentleman the lord Swartzenburg, of no leſſe courage than experience, then lying B at Comara, and ſtill in doubt leſt the Turks ſo neere vnto him at Rab, ſhould attempt ſomthing againſt him and his charge, prouided for his owne defence all that Winter time with a ſtrong garriſon, keeping continuall watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemie with any armie to keepe the field. So Winter paſſing, and the Spring approching, it fortuned that the 22 day of March, about 7 a clocke in the night, the gates being ſhut, were heard neere vnder the walls of the towne, two men, who by their ſpeech ſeemed to be Italians: with great inſtance requeſting, for the ſafegard of their liues, to be let in, for feare of the enemies purſuit.
Which by one of the ſentinels was forthwith reported vnto the gouernor: who doubting it to be ſome ſubtill practiſe of the enemie, commanded them there to take their fortune vntill the morning: at which time they were receiued into the citie, and being brought before the Gouernor, C proſtrating themſelues forthwith at his feet, pittifully requeſted him to haue compaſſion of their miſerie, and to comfort them with his charitable relief, that ſo they might at length returne againe into their countrey. Who at the firſt asked them, what countrymen they were, and from whence they came at that time of the night? Whereunto they anſwered, That they were Italians, and that they had but euen then eſcaped out of the cruel hands of the Turkes at Rab. But deſiring to know of them ſome news, they after their manner humbled themſelues, ſhewing by their geſture not to know any. Yet would he needs vnderſtand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had vſed to eſcape out of that cruel ſeruitude, in all order as had befalne them. Where the yonger of them beginning, told him, that now almoſt two yeres ago, at ſuch time as the Chriſtians were ouerthrown D by the Turkes vnder Agria, and euery man in that confuſion then ſeeking the beſt and neereſt way to ſaue themſelues; they hauing by flight now eſcaped the greateſt danger of the enemy, and ſo trauelling ouer the country towards Vienna, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to ſcoure the country, and to ſeeke after prey) taken priſoners, and as ſlaues committed to the chaine, where they had almoſt two yeres, vntil now, with great patience ſerued. Theſe two fugitiues by their outward appearance ſeemed to be men of good ſpirit and valor, which cauſed the gouernor the more deſirous to know of them the meanes they had vſed for their eſcape. So the yonger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to vnderſtand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had bin three months before ſtill carefully deuiſing how to recouer their loſt libertie, which now ſeemed to make ſome offer of it ſelfe vnto them: for E that ſince the time that the Emperors army riſe the laſt yere from before the towne, they were not kept ſo ſtraight or looked vnto as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded: which cauſed them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to reſolue either the ſooner to dy, or to ſet themſelues at liberty. And that ſo one day as they were carrying certain munition from the palace of Giaffer Baſſa for the ſoldiers, they ſecretly conueyed three pieces of cord of ſome reaſonable bigneſſe, therewith by night to let themſelues down from the wal, and ſo as they might to eſcape: which ſtolne cord that it ſhould not be ſeene, and ſo their purpoſe ſuſpected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in what they had ſo long deſired, and they roming vp and downe in the darke, and ſtil finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to ſtay, and to defer it vntill the night following: which being come, and choice made of a moſt conuenient place, they made faſt the cord aboue, and ſo thereby ſlid downe, firſt the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to ſwimme, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow conducted ouer vnto the farther ſide of the broad and deepe ditch: and that ſo, in the night (ſo darke as that one of them could hardly ſee the other) they were come by chance to Comara, thinking to haue taken the way to Vienna. The gouernour thus fully inſtructed of their eſcape, demanded of them further, how the ſtrong town of Rab was by the Turks gouerned and garded: who told G him, very euill, and with ſmall care, eſpecially ſince the departure of the Emperors campe: and alſo that foure gates of the towne were filled vp with earth, which if they were broken open, would all fal into the town ditch, and ſo further them that would attempt to enter, with diuers other particularities. Wherof the Gouernor hauing well conſidered, thought with himſelfe, that if by ſome ingenious deuice he might by night with ſome good ſtrength vpon the ſudden enter the towne, it might happily be ſo againe recouered. Vpon which ſo great a deſignement he thought good to conſult further with the lord Palſi, whom he requeſted, in all haſt & with as much ſecrecie as was poſſible, with 1600 foot and as many horſe as he could make, to come vnto him to Comara. Who vpon this aduertiſement ſtaid not, but preſently giuing order vnto his men, ſet forward by night, and the 26 of March before day, with 1400 foot and 120 horſe H arriued at Comara; where they were all joyfully receiued, and the gates after they were entered, again faſt ſhut, and ſo kept for feare of the enemies ſecret ſpies, of whom no man can be too warie, be he neuer ſo wiſe. Now whilcſt theſe ſoldiers were refreſhing themſelues, in the mean time the gouernour with the Lord Palſi diſcourſed to the full concerning the intended enterpriſe: which reſolued vpon, they found themſelues vpon the view of their men to haue 2600 foot of the garriſon ſoldiers, and 300 horſe, all good and couragious men, and well appointed for the intended ſeruice: who there ſtaying two dayes after their comming, and many of them in the meane time (after the manner of their religion) confeſſing themſelues, and receiuing the Sacrament, were become ſo couragious, as that they doubted not in the quarrel of the Chriſtian religion to encounter a far greater number of the Turks than themſelues. And the more to I ſtir them vp, the Lord Palſi at the ſame time deliuered vnto them a notable ſpeech; not for all that telling them whither they were to go: but, That they were his Chriſtian ſoldiers & brethren, vnder his leading both of long and late time: who neuer by him deceiued of their wonted pay at ſuch time as it was due, would not now as he hoped forſake him. And albeit that he well knew them to haue deſerued at his hands a greater contentment; neuertheles being himſelfe depriued of his reuenue by theſe late warres, and his poſſeſſions ſubiect euery houre vnto the incurſions of the Turks, could not therefore according to his deſire, and their deſerts, ſhew vnto them the great good will he bare them: Yet now and euen preſently was come the time wherein they might not onely abundantly enrich themſelues, but alſo adorne their heads with K an immortal crowne of glorie, and make themſelues for euer famous, by performing the moſt happie and glorious exploit that euer was by valiant ſouldiers attempted or atchieued in that part of the world. And to the intent that they might know how dearely he accounted of the life and honor of euery one of them, he would therefore himſelfe with the lord Swartzenburg (of whom proceeded all that faire deuice and new ſtratagem) be preſent with them in the action: and that therefore they were not to thinke that they were led forth to any priuat danger, farther than their commanders themſelues; whoſe folly were to be accounted great, if raſhly and vpon no good ground they ſhould aduenture their liues and honours together: whereof they ought not now to doubt, hauing by a thouſand proofes known, how much they had been of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoued them ſo much the more to ſhew their valor in this piece of ſeruice vndertaken for the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and the honour of Chriſt Ieſu, vnto whom they were with one accord to make their prayers, with his mightie hand to ſtrengthen their hearts, and with glorious victorie to bring to happie end the intended exploit againſt his enemies, to the honour of his name, and the aduancement of the Chriſtian religion and faith. At the end of which ſpeech all the ſouldiers cried aloud, That they were moſt readie to do any their commands, and to follow them whitherſoeuer. So order was taken, that within three houres they ſhould euery man be preſt and readie with their armes according to their places: and ſo hauing wel refreſhed themſelues, about eleuen of clocke the ſeuen and twentieth day of March they in good order began to ſet forwards toward Rab. But for that the multitude of ſouldiers oftentimes giueth the enemie warning of that is intended againſt him; Palſi gaue order to one Iohn Stroine his Sergeant Major, to follow faire and ſoftly after him, with 1700 horſe and foot, which hee well performed. And ſo vpon the breake of the day they began to draw towards Rab, and there lay cloſe in ambuſh all that day vntill night, about ſeuen miles ſhort of the towne: refreſhing themſelues in the meane time

A time with plentie of victuals, which they had brought with them from Comara. Night (the fauorer of deceit) being come, in two houres march they began to draw neere to Rab, & there ſtaied about fiue houres: from whence they ſent before them a French engineer, a man of great judgement, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 duckets) hauing with them 4 petards, engines of force to blow vp into the aire any thing whereunto they be faſtened, be it neuer ſo great and weightie; where by good chance they found the draw-bridge downe, and the portculleis vp: for that the Turks then caſting no peril, expected euery houre for certain waggons with prouiſion from Alba-Regalis. By which good hap the Chriſtians vnperceiued comming to the gate, & thereunto faſtning their petards, in good order gaue fire to the ſame, which preſently tooke not hold: yet were they not far gon, but that they were by a ſentinel deſcried, B who demanding what they were, was preſently anſwered by the violent engines, which in a trice tore in ſunder the gate, with ſome part of the wall and of the fortifications neere vnto it. When now the watch (but all too late) began to giue the alarme, and the Chriſtians in the foreward thruſting preſently in, took the gate, none of the Turks yet cõming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entring. The firſt that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their woonted cry Alla, Alla, in ſuch hideous manner as if they would therewith haue rent the heauens, would haue ſtaied the Chriſtians from farther entring, but were themſelues ouercharged by 300 which were alreadie entred. At which time alſo the Baſſa came on with more than a thouſand following him, and that with ſuch courage and furie as was neuer greater to be ſeene in any Turke: where after a moſt terrible fight maintained by the ſpace of two houres, C the Baſſa himſelfe being ſlaine, the Turks began a little to retire, whereby a thouſand Chriſtians mo had leiſure to enter: when ſtraitway after came Giaffer the great Baſſa with aboue 1000 tall ſoldiers following him, all the inhabitants alſo of Rab running after him, & that with ſuch force, that they conſtrained the Chriſtians to retire vnto the gate whereby they entred. Who reſolued rather honorably to die within the towne, than with diſhonor to be forced out, there with incredible courage ſuſtained the greateſt impreſſion of the furious enemie: where was to be ſeene the true Chriſtian valour for the performance of ſo great an exploit well worthie of eternall memorie. But this Baſſa alſo (the other being dead of a wound in his necke) encountered by the lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that ſharpe conflict ſhewed great tokens of his D valour, was there at length ſlaine alſo: both whoſe heads ſtrucke off, were for a preſent afterwards ſent to the Emperor at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole action. But now the Turks perceiuing that all their chiefe commanders were ſlain, retired moſt part of them into the citie: ſome 300 of them crept vnderneath one of the bulwarks, where ſtood certain barrels of gunpouder, which they deſperatly ſet on fire, and ſo together with themſelues blew vp 300 Chriſtians that were aboue vpon the bulwarke; the greateſt loſſe the Chriſtians had in all that victorie, who were otherwiſe ſuppoſed not to loſe therein aboue 200 of their men. Thus the Turks diſcomfited, and altogether full of feare, loſing both their force and courage, fled in euery place before the Chriſtians, they in euery corner making of them a moſt horrible ſlaughter. The Turkiſh women all this while out of their windowes and other high places, ceaſed not to caſt downe ſtones, timber, and ſuch like things vpon the heads of the Chriſtians, whom they thought by all meanes to annoy, and to helpe the Turks. The bloudie execution continued E all that day vntill night, the Chriſtians ſtill finding one or other hidden in the moſt ſecret places of the city, vpon whom to exerciſe their wrath: who ranſacking alſo euery corner thereof, were by the wealth therein found greatly enriched. But comming to the palace of Giaffer the great Baſſa, they found ſuch great ſtore of rich furniture, as better beſeemed ſome great Prince than a Turkiſh ſlaue. There they found alſo letters written in characters of gold from the Baſſa of Buda to this Baſſa, greeting him, and promiſing him in his behalfe to deale with the Grand Seignior againſt the next Spring, with the firſt that his armie ſhould take the field, that he might therein haue ſome honorable place of command, to the end he might in the field ſhew his greater valour, and no longer lie idle in that ſtrong towne. So found they there alſo many things written from the Great Sultan himſelfe vnto this Baſſa, with great ſtore of coine, which all fell to the ſouldiers ſhare; inſomuch that by this ſo notable an exploit ſo well performed, the publique State, together with the ſouldiers priuat was not a little bettered. There amongſt other things were recouered threeſcore and ſix pieces of Artillerie, which were knowne to haue been ſometime the Emperors, and foure and twentie others, which the Baſſa had had cauſed to be brought from Buda, with great ſtore of ſhot and pouder and other ſmall pieces, and meale ſufficient to haue ſerued foure thouſand men for a yeare and a halfe, but of wine G (little vſed of the Turks) onely foure veſſels. In the Baſſa's palace was alſo found of armour and weapons of all ſorts great ſtore, with aboundance of cloath and apparell, which was all giuen in ſpoile to the ſouldiers. Thus Rab one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of Chriſtendome, not full foure yeares before beſieged by Sinan Baſſa with a hundred and fiftie thouſand men, by the ſpace almoſt of three moneths, and then at length by the treaſon of the gouernour to him betraied; was now in one night by the valour and policie of a few reſolute men, to their immortal glorie againe reſtored to the Chriſtian commonwealth the nineteenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which ſo notable a victorie the Chriſtians reioyced not a little both in Hungarie and elſewhere: the great Sultan with the Turkes no leſſe grieuing and ſtorming, as well for the loſſe of the towne, before got with no ſmall charge, as for the death of his people H there ſlaine, to the number of about ſix thouſand and moe, with the loſſe of ſcarce ſix hundred Chriſtians.

A great tumult betweene the Ianizaries and the Spahi.

Yet for all this, Mahomet the great Sultan ceaſed not to make great prouiſion for his wars in Hungary, and that greater than before; and ſo with greater furie alſo to proſecute his wrathfull indignation to be reuenged vpon the Chriſtians. Whereunto order was giuen vnto Ibraim Baſſa his brother in law, and General of his armie, with all conuenient ſpeed to take the field: which for all that fell out far otherwiſe; for that now thinking to haue had all things in good forwardneſſe, a great diſſention riſe betwixt the Ianizaries and the Spahi; the Ianizaries being the beſt footmen, and the Spahi the beſt horſemen of the Turkiſh Empire; both the faithfull keepers of the perſon of their Prince, and the greateſt ſtrength of his ſtate: whereby it commeth I to paſſe, that in ſetting forward towards the wars, theſe two ſorts of valiant ſoldiers, the one ſtanding vpon their ſtrength, and the other vpon their honor, and both jealous of their reputation and credit, haue no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and eſpecially of late in this corruption of their martial diſcipline vnder their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themſelues, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affairs, and trouble of their General. Inſomuch that to appeaſe this tumult he was glad to put to death certaine of the inſolent Ianizaries refuſing to ſet forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding further, and thinking to haue executed ſome others of them alſo, to the further terrour of the reſt, he was by them and their adherents put in ſuch feare of his life, that to auoid the preſent K danger, he was glad to excuſe himſelfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame vpon him as the cauſe thereof: who was therefore as a ſacrifice deliuered vnto the fury of the Ianizaries, by whom he was there preſently ſlain, with ſome others of the Baſſa's followers. So theſe broils with much ado ouerpaſt, Ibrahim hauing taken a general reuiew of his armie at Sophia, there ſtayed, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in Hungarie or in Tranſyluania, for as yet that was in queſtion: which could not wel be before the beginning of Iuly, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of victuals euen then ariſing in the campe; for the ſupplying whereof Mahomet himſelfe had no ſmall care. But this long delay was the cauſe that a great number of the Ianizaries comming from Hadrianople, and hearing by the way, that the General would not as yet ſet forward, not knowing the cauſe of his ſtay, and doubting to be deceiued of their L promiſed entertainment, were about to haue returned backe againe: which known at the court, commandment was preſently ſent thence vnto the General, without longer ſtay to ſet forward toward Hungarie, which the more haſtened his departure with his armie.

In this the Turks ſo long delay, the Chriſtians had good leiſure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Sommer: for well they might thinke that the enemie ſlept not, knowing what prouiſion he had made as well in Conſtantinople as in other places. Wherefore reaſonably doubting, that Sommer well ſpent, and Auguſt now at hand, he would not ſo late turne his forces into the lower Hungarie, they thought it beſt to prouide for the ſafetie of the vpper countrey: And to the end that the enemie approching thoſe frontiers, might there finde forces readie to encounter him, the lord George Baſta a man of great eperience and valor M was appointed Lieutenant Generall for that countrey; to the great contentment of the ſouldiers in generall, all ſhewing themſelues moſt readie at his command. The Lord Swartzenburg in the meane time remaining in the lower Hungarie at Rab, with eight thouſand good ſoldiers: and the Archduke Mathias at Vienna for the diſpatch of George Baſta, and the haſting of him forward: for that the vpper Hungarie to the great hurt thereof began now to feele the incurſions of the Turkes and Tartars: beſides that, hee was afterwards to returne himſelfe to ſpeake with the Emperour his brother, ſtill expecting a Chiaus of the Turks by the appointment of the grand Seignior, ſent by the way of Polonia for Prague, to intreat with the Emperour concerning a peace.

Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

They of Buda in the mean while ſeeing the delay of the Turks, of whom not one band yet appeared in thoſe quarters; and on the other ſide perceiuing the great preparation of the Imperials, and the great garriſon at Rab ſo neere at hand, began now to doubt ſome new reſolution of the Chriſtians: wherein they were no whit deceiued; for no armie of the Turks being then in field in the lower Hungarie, and the country plaine and open, the lord Palfi with a conuenient power, and certaine pieces of batterie, ſet forward to attempt the enterpriſe, and the 16 of October with 16 pieces of artillerie began to batter the citie of Buda, to the great feare and diſcomfiture of them within: hauing firſt taken the fort S. Gerarde, with hope to haue gained the reſt alſo. For which cauſe, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the citie, moſt inſtantly beſought the Baſſa, not to indure the deſtruction of the ſame, with the inhabitants & wealth thereof altogether; but being not able long to hold out againſt ſo furious a batterie, in time to hearken vnto ſome reaſonable compoſition, that ſo they might yet euery man at leaſt with life depart. Whereunto the Baſſa for all that would not hearken, but put them ſtill in hope that they ſhould be preſently relieued. Howbeit the batterie ſtil continuing, and they not able longer to indure the force of the Imperials, nor any reliefe yet comming, they were glad at length to abandon the citie with the loſſe of two thouſand of the Ianizaries, and but 300 of the Chriſtians ſlaine, and 800 hurt: the reſt of the Turks at the ſame time retiring themſelues into the caſtle, where they might for a ſpace deeme themſelues ſafe. So the Lord Palfi poſſeſſed of the citie, with all his forces laid ſiege vnto the caſtle, which although it were in ſome places ſhaken with the continual furie of the cannon, yet were the defendāts ſtil ready to make good the ſame: inſomuch that Palfi vpon good hope of ſucceſſe giuing thereunto a general aſſault, was by their valor enforced to retire; they within in the meane time with great labor & induſtry repairing the breaches and gaules made by the artillerie. So that Palfi conſidering the difficultie of the aſſault, thought it better by vndermining to ſhake the rocke whereon the caſtle ſtood, than by a new aſſault to expoſe ſo many worthie men vnto ſo manifeſt a danger: which his purpoſe by the enemie diſcouered, was by them alſo by countermining diſappointed: yet for all that were the Chriſtians ſtill in good hope by another mine not yet by the enemie perceiued, to ſort to the full of their deſire: and the more, for that they ſaw not ſo much brauerie or ſhew of courage in the defendants as before. Who now kept themſelues ſilent and quiet, as if they had bin conſulting about the yeelding vp of the caſtle, as men bereft of al hope of reliefe and ſuccor; the Chriſtians being now poſſeſſed of a ſtrong abby and fortreſſe faſt by, and hauing broken downe all the bridges ouer the riuer Danubius, in ſuch ſort, as that the beſieged could not receiue any reliefe either by land or water. But foraſmuch as the time of the yere began now to grow tedious, & the Winter weather ſharpe, the Chriſtians thought it not beſt there long to protract the time; and therefore reſolued to preſent vnto the caſtle another general aſſault, and at the ſame inſtant to blow vp the mine: but in giuing this aſſault, they were againe repulſed with the loſſe of 200 men. At which time alſo a number of the Turks ſallying out of the caſtle, couragiouſly encountered the Chriſtians, but not with ſucceſſe anſwerable to their valor, being there almoſt all cut in pieces: neither did the mine take the deſired effect, but being blowne vp did little or no harme at all. So that the Chriſtians wearie of their long ſuffering of the extremitie of the weather, and withal conſidering the great courage of the defendants, were euen vpon the point to haue riſen: yet willing to giue a freſh attempt by the mine, they began againe to worke in the ſame, and in hope to preuaile, began to parly with the defendants about the giuing vp of the caſtle: but all to little or no purpoſe; for that the mine hauing taken no effect, the ſouldiers could hardly be drawne on through the deep and muddie ditches to giue a new aſſault. In fine, ſeeing no hope to preuaile, and hearing alſo of the comming of a great armie of the Turks for the reliefe of the beſieged, they raiſed their ſiege, & at their departure burnt their ſuburbs, carrying away with them a great booty: and ſo retiring towards Strigonium, expected further direction where to Winter. Where ſhortly after order was taken, that the forces diſbanded ſhould be diſperſed, ſome into the garriſons, and ſome into the countrie thereabout;to the intent they might ſo be in the more readineſſe with the firſt of the next Spring to take the field,or as occaſion ſhould ſerue to be otherwiſe imploied.

But Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince in the meane time repenting himſelfe of the vnequal exchange he had made with the Emperor,in diſguiſed apparel haſting in poſt out of Sileſia came to Clauſenburg in Tranſyluania:and there was ioyfully receiued of his ſubiects,& taking of them a new oath of obedience,by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe certified Maximilian the Archduke(appointed by the Emperor for the gouernment of Tranſyluania,and now vpon his way as far as Caſſouia) of the cauſes of his returne, perſuading him rather to conuert his forces againſt the Turks for the recouerie of Agria,than to trouble himſelfe to come any farther for Tranſyluania, now againe by him to the great contentment of his ſubiects repoſſeſſed: as did alſo the Princeſſe his wife (Maximilian his Couſin German) wiſhing him to conſider what hurt and diſhonour he ſhould doe vnto the Emperour his Maieſtie, himſelfe, the Roman Empire, and the whole Chriſtian common-weale in generall, if in ſo dangerous a time he ſhould attempt any thing againſt the Prince her husband, and vnto him by her ſo neerely allied.

Veradinum beſieged by the Turkes.

Now the Turks great armie being come into the vpper Hungarie, lay encamped vnder the wals of the ſtrong citie of Veradinum,where that worthie captain George Baſta was Lieutenant Generall for the Emperor;but not hauing ſuch ſtrength,as without further helpe to go againſt ſo mightie an enemie, or to relieue the beſieged citie,not as then furniſhed with a ſufficient gariſon,he gaue knowledge thereof vnto Maximilian the Archduke,who(as is aforeſaid)with a conuenient power was but a little before come to Caſſouia; to haue gone into Tranſyluania, had he not there by the way been ſtayed by Embaſſadors from the Prince Sigiſmund,but lately before returned out of Sileſia;and hauing againe taken vpon him the gouernment,by theſe his Embaſſadours requeſted him no further to trouble himſelfe with that iourney,offering to giue him aid againſt the Turks whenſoeuer he ſhould require it. The beſieged neuertheleſſe in the meane time notably defended themſelues, and with certaine braue ſallies did the enemy great harme;ſtil expecting that Baſta the Lieutenant,or the Tranſyluanian Prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vnited forces ſhould ſend them reliefe: vnto whom they gaue knowledge the nineteenth of October,how that the Turks with all the force and furie they had vſed,had as yet little preuailed,being by their valor ſtil repulſed,and with many ſharp ſallies to their great loſſe encountered,and ſome of their great ordnance cloyed,in ſuch ſort,as that they were in good hope to protract the time vntil they might by them their friends be relieued : yet not doubting,but that the Turks according to their woonted manner,would doe what they might to ſubdue them. According to whoſe expectation, the Tranſyluanian Prince with a great power taking the field to haue relieued them, was letted ſo to do by the Tartars,to that purpoſe ſtirred vp by the Turks:ſo that he could by no means ioine his forces with Maximilian,for looking to the ſafetie of his owne people and countrey. Yet in token of forwardneſſe,he ſent certain companies of braue ſouldiers vnto the Lieutenant Baſta;who vnderſtanding that of 2000 good ſouldiers in garriſon in the citie at the beginning of the ſiege, there were ſcarce 700 left aliue, all the reſt beeing with continuall aſſaults ſlaine or mortally wounded, vſed a notable ſtratagem to delude the enemie withall : for hauing put his men in good order,and comming brauely on,as if he would euen preſently haue ioyned battel(a thing which the Turkes moſt deſired)whileſt they likewiſe with great ſtir were putting themſelues in order of battell,and wholly buſied therein,he by another way(of the Turks leaſt ſuſpected) cunningly thruſt into the citie eight hundred good ſoldiers, and that done, preſently retired againe into his trenches,wherein he ſtrongly encamped,feared not all the Turks forces: who thinking euen then to haue come to a day battel,and ſtill in vaine expecting the ſame,returned deceiued by this fineneſſe. And ſo ſhortly after (enforced by continuall foule weather) raiſed their ſiege,not without great difficulty & danger(reliefe lying ſo neere at hand,and the defendants ſtrengthened with new ſupplies)to haue been longer maintained. So paſſed the troubles of this yeare, with no gaine but great loſſe of the Turks : who at their departure enforced by the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather and feare together, left behind them in their trenches many tents with ſome great pieces of artillerie,being not able to conuey the ſame by water to Buda:and withall fearing greatly to be encountered by the forces of Baſta, ſtrengthened with new ſupplies euen then ſent vnto him from the Emperour.

A new ſupplie put into Veradinum by Baſta

A The Archduke Mathias, Swartzenburg, and the other commanders of the armie in the lower Hungarie, beeing twelue thouſand ſtrong, with the garriſon ſouldiers of Rab, Strigonium, and Komara, in the meane time becauſe they would not ſtand idle, together with the Hungarian horſemen, ouerran all the country thereabout euen vnto the gates of Buda: in good hope alſo to haue met with eight thouſand Turks (as they were by their eſpials aduertiſed) comming towards Peſth with victuals for the reliefe of the caſtle of Buda.

Whileſt things thus paſſed in Hungarie, Mahomet to ſhew his greatneſſe, as alſo the more to keepe the Chriſtian Princes in ſuſpence, ſent Cicala (or as the Turkes call him Cigala) Baſſa his Admirall with a great fleet to ſea: wherewith being come vpon the coaſt of Sicilia, he requeſted the Viceroy of that Kingdome, to ſend him aboord his fleet the Ladie Lucretia his mo-B ther, which dwelt in Meſſina, for that he greatly deſired to ſee her, and to do her honour; promiſing ſo quietly to depart without any harme doing. And the Viceroy againe conſidering how that the angry renegat for the like courteſie to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harme all alongſt the ſea coaſt; couenanting with him to ſend her in ſafetie backe againe, ſent her honorably accompanied aboord the Admirall gallie: whom Cicala her ſon receiued with great ioy and triumph, and hauing kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be, according to his promiſe ſent her backe againe to Meſſina; and ſo without any harme done for her ſake to any part of Chriſtendome, peaceably returned backe again with his fleet.

Now in the mean time Michael the Vayuod of Valachia with good forces of his own, be-C cauſe he would be doing ſomething alſo, reſolued to giue an attempt vpon Nicopolis, a city of the Turks in Bulgaria: and ſo giuing order to his people, cauſed a bridge to be made ouer Danubius to paſſe that great riuer by. Whereof the Baſſaes of Siliſtria and Badoua vnderſtanding, thought it good with all their power to diſturbe him in that worke: and ſo comming, as the ſaid bridge was by the Vayuod his ſouldiers laid ouer the riuer vpon boats, without farther ſtay attempted to haue broken the ſame, to the intent that the Vayuod ſhould not that way paſſe. Who haſting thither with his armie, reſcued his worke, and enforced his Baſſaes to forſake the exploit by them begun: where betwixt them for a ſpace was fought a moſt hard conflict, vntill at length the Turks were with a great ſlaughter ouerthrowne, and ſo glad ſome D here, ſome there, by flight as they might to ſaue their liues. After which victorie, he without let paſſing ouer the riuer with his whole forces, came and encamped vnder the wals of Nicopolis: where they of the citie vnderſtanding of the late ſlaughter of the Turkes, and finding themſelues not able to hold it out againſt the force and valor of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any help or reliefe in time to come from the Turks, without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues into the power of the Vayuod: who hauing ſacked the city and ſet it on fire, carried thence a great ſpoile and bootie, with a number of the Bulgarians: chuſing out the beſt and moſt able bodies amongſt them to ſerue him in his wars, and appointing the reſt to inhabit and manure the waſted places of Valachia. The report of this ouerthrow giuen vnto the Turks by the Valachian, with the ſacking of Nicopolis, running abroad, brought a general feare vpon the Turks euen in the imperial city of Conſtantinople. For the ſtaying wherof Mahomet commanded the chiefe of his Baſſaes, with a great power of tumultuarie ſoldiers taken vp in haſt to go E forthwith againſt the Vayuod to ſtay the courſe of his farther proceedings, to the diſmaying of his people; himſelfe thundring out moſt horrible threats againſt him: who encouraged with his late victory, and well acquainted with the Turks maners, little regarded the ſame, as knowing that he was not with words but with armes to be vanquiſhed.

Nicopolis ſacked and burnt by the Vayuod

Now Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour oppreſſed with melancholie to ſee himſelfe at once aſſailed with the Plague then raging in Conſtantinople, the bloudie wars in Hungarie, and the horrible mortalitie and loſſe of his people in both places; and withall not ignorant of the euil ſucceſſe of his armie at Veradinum, and of the great harme done at Nicopilis by the Valachian; yet for all that, ceaſed not in what he might to prouide for ſo many euils, but gaue order to Taut Baſſa with all ſpeed to ſet forward (as we haue ſaid) from Conſtantinople toward Valachia; as from whence hee feared the greateſt danger: who without delay to make the Vayuod to vnderſtand how highly the great Sultan was diſpleaſed with him, put himſelfe vpon the way with ſix hundred Ianizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe there to Winter vntill the Spring, and ſo to expect the comming of the reſt of the armie, that ſo with the ſame, vnited vnto the forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the laſt yeare beſieged Veradinum) hee might in the field appeare more terrible vnto his enemies. The Chriſtian Emperor alſo at the ſame time reſted much diſcontented, that his people in ſo faire a way for the winning of the caſtle of Buda, had yet failed thereof: the Wallons laying the fault vpon the Lords Swartzenburg, Palſi, and the reſt of the commanders, that it was not woon; for that when they as valiant men offered to haue done therin the vttermoſt of their deuoire, their leaders had made choiſe by the ſpade and mattocke rather than by the ſword to performe the ſame.

The Turks again ſpoiled by the Vayuod.

But Michael the Vayuod ſeeing the Turks not a little diſmayed with the ſacking of Nicopolis, began afreſh to their greater terrour and hurt to make new inrodes vpon them, in ſuch ſort, as that he was entred an hundred miles into their territorie: againſt whom Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks General in Hungarie) comming with his forces, he againe retired, carrying away with him the ſpoile of the countrie by him waſted.

Buda diſtreſſed

They of Buda in the meane time fearing ſome ſudden aſſault to be giuen vpon them, and ſuffering within great want of victuals, expected long to be relieued both with victuals and other neceſſaries: vnderſtanding yet withall, that the grand Seignior had cauſed it to bee giuen out in Conſtantinople, That he was raiſing a great power of his beſt and moſt expert ſouldiers, and had therefore ſent for vnto the court all his old men of war, ſuch as had ſerued in the wars of Perſia, to be now againe emploied in Hungarie. Where the Turks in the meane time prouiding to relieue the diſtreſſed citie of Buda both with men and many other neceſſaries; certain reſolute Hungarians vnderſtanding by their eſpials, that one of the Turks Baſſaes with 3000 ſoldiers was comming thither to encreaſe the garriſon, laid themſelues cloſe in ambuſh in a place whereby the Turks were to paſſe: where they had not long ſtaid, but that the Turks as men without feare diſorderedly paſſing by, were by them with ſuch force and fury aſſailed, that in a moment, when they leaſt thought, they were ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of many of their horſes, much money and iewels, and many captaines there taken priſoners, the Baſſa himſelfe with much adoe hardly eſcaping into the citie. But ſhortly after, 400 Chriſtians ſcouring the countrie about Buda, and hauing taken a good bootie of cattell and other pillage, returning loded with the prey, were by the way aſſaulted by the Turkes, and enforced to forſake the ſame, and to fight for their liues: whom for all that, they notably repulſed, with the ſlaughter of diuers of them, & ſo again recouering their bootie, returned with victorie. And about this time or not long after in the vpper Hungarie, a great power of the Turks and Tartars hauing forraged a great part of that country, and done the Chriſtians great harm, came before Coſſouia, making ſhew as if they would euen preſently haue beſieged that citie: which put the inhabitants in ſuch a feare, that many of them without further deliberation fled forthwith as faſt as they could into the mountains, thinking thēſelues more ſafe there than in the citie. Neuertheleſſe, by the perſuaſion of George Baſta, the Emperors Lieutenant in thoſe parts, 2000 valiant and expert ſouldiers ſtaid there with him, expecting what the Turks would do: who approching the wals, demanded of them in the citie a great ſum of mony by way of contribution; threatning otherwiſe the vtter ruin and deſtruction thereof. Which their proud demand was by Baſta ſtoutly reiected, and they with the loſſe of a great many of their liues inforced to get them farther off. Wherfore ſeeing themſelues not able to preuaile againſt a city ſo well prouided, they for feare by night riſe, and departed quite another way than that whereby they came, doing great harm ſtill as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachia alſo, a warlike kind of people, liuing for moſt part vpon prey, & willing to ſhew ſome token of their hatred toward the Turks, by certain bridges paſſing ouer the Danubius, encountered with the Baſſa of Natolia with a great power, whom they ouerthrew with much ſlaughter of his people, and the loſſe of his brother there ſlaine alſo: and ſo afterwards ouerrunning the country, did there exceeding harme, and tooke the ſame Baſſa his ſonne priſoner. Thus paſſed the Winter with many light skirmiſhes and incurſions in diuers parts of Hungarie and other the frontier countries; which had done great harme, had it not beene before hand well prouided for by the Imperials; who in moſt places ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, ſtayed the furie of their barbarous enemies. Maximilian the Archduke in the meane time comming from Prague to Vienna, found himſelfe there to haue in his camp but foure & twentie thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, readie againſt the next Spring (diuers of the Germane Princes this yeare not ſending thither any aid at all, by reaſon of their troubles neerer home, with the Spaniards

A the Spaniards in the lower ſide of Germanie) which made him the more to dread the enemies comming, who he knew after his accuſtomed manner would that Summer appeare in the field with a farre greater number. But to haue holpen this want, the great Duke of Muſcouie about this time, by his Embaſſadors amongſt other things requeſted leaue of the Polonian, for forty thouſand horſemen to paſſe through his country, which horſemen he had determined (as hee ſaid) to ſend in aid of the Emperor againſt the Turke. Which his requeſt the Polonian would by no meanes grant, as dangerous to his eſtate. Wherefore the Muſcouite offended with the Polonian, ſent other his Embaſſadors vnto the Emperor by ſea: who embarked in an Engliſh ſhip in the port of S. Nicolas, and ſayling about the kingdomes of Sweden, Norway and Denmarke, after long trouble at ſea, at length arriued at Stoad, and ſo from thence by land trauel-B ling to Hamborow, Lubecke, and Maidenborow, and in euery place honourably entertained, came at laſt vnto the Emperour into Bohemia, then lying at Pliſena, for that the plague was then hot at Prague: where they hauing with great ſtate deliuered their Preſents and Letters of credence vnto the Emperour; had audience, and were by him moſt honourably vſed. Yet the Polonian hauing thus denied the Muſcouite paſſage, ſuffered the Turks Embaſſadour, who called himſelfe Gabriel, a Iew, to paſſe through his Countrey vnto the Emperour, to entreat with him of a peace to bee made betwixt him and the Turke. Which Gabriel comming to Prague as Embaſſadour from the great Turke, and hauing no letters of credence to ſhew for his negotiation (for that they were, as he ſaid, vpon the way taken from him by the Polonian Coſſackes, and certaine of his retinue ſlaine) was there taken for a ſpie, and ſo ſent to Vienna: C where at his firſt arriuall hee was well vſed in a common Inne: but the night following being taken in his chamber by the Martiall, was ſo clapt faſt in priſon, with as many yrons vpon him as he could beare, and all his followers with gyues vpon their legs compelled as ſlaues daily to worke in the towne ditch.

The Turks embaſſador taken for a ſpie, and impriſoned at Vienna.

About this time alſo Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince (whom hitherto all men admired as a man euen ſent from heauen, for the benefit of his countrey and of the Chriſtian common-weale) by a wonderfull change gaue a moſt manifeſt token of a diuers and vnconſtant nature, to the great wonder of the world: for hauing broken the agreement made with the Emperor the laſt yeare, and being ſecretly in poſt returned out of Sileſia into Tranſyluania, and againe D taken vpon him the gouernment (as is before declared) and hauing withall requeſted himſelfe and the Tranſyluanians his countreymen to be diſcharged of the oath of obedience and loy-altie by them before giuen vnto the Emperour; and the citie of Veradinum, with the country thereabout, to be againe reſtored vnto him; and the Emperour pauſing thereupon; did now, (doubting of his owne abilitie for the keeping of that countrey) in the beginning of this yeare 1599, by his Embaſſadors the Biſhop of Alba-Iulia, and Stephen Paſchai his Chauncellor, ſent of purpoſe vnto the Emperour, requeſt him to haue the firſt agreements againe renewed, and the principalitie of Trebnits in Morauia, to be added vnto the two Dukedomes of Oppel and Ratibor in Sileſia, with fiftie thouſand duckats to be yearely paied vnto him out of the chamber of the Empire: and a generall pardon to be giuen vnto all the Tranſyluanians that following him had of late reuolted from the Emperour, and their antient liberties to be againe vnto euery one of them confirmed. With all which conditions obtained at the Emperours hands (as of him that ſaw how needfull it was for him by any meanes to keepe that ſtrong country in his power) the ſame Embaſſadours with their diſpatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of Aprill.

But Sigiſmund in the meane time at home, was entred into new conceits with certain of the Polonian nobilitie, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperour: and hauing ſent for one of the Turkes Chiaus from Conſtantinople; and for his Couſin Andrew Bathor the proud Cardinall out of Boruſia, and ſo meeting with them in an obſcure village in the confines of Tranſyluania, towards Polonia, accompanied with certaine of the chiefeſt of the States of his countrey: there in the preſence of the Polonians and of the Turkiſh Embaſſadour, reſigned all the right and title he had in the countrey of Tranſyluania, vnto the Cardinall his couſin; commanding all the States there preſent to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelitie who ſhortly after together with the Polonian Embaſſadour, ſent one of his eſpe-ciall fauourits to Conſtantinople, to deſire ſafe conduct for his Embaſſadours to be ſent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turke. Which meſſengers ſo ſent, together with the Sigiſmund yeeldeth his country of Tranſyluania vnto the Cardinal Bathor his couſin.

Polonian Embaſſador, were both courteouſly receiued in the Turks court, and as with an eſpecial fauor rewarded with right ſumptuous garments, and charge giuen them, That the Cardinall within three months next ſhould ſend thither a ſolemne Embaſſador, with the old accuſtomed tribute by the Turke demanded. Thus through the inconſtancie of the Prince, the ambition of the proud Cardinall, and the foule colluſion of the Polonian, the countrie of Tranſyluania (one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of that ſide of Chriſtendome) falling from the obedience of the Emperor, and ſo in ſort bereft from the Chriſtian common-weale, became againe tributarie vnto the Turke; moſt good men deteſting the lightnes of the one, the ambition of the other, and the ſlineſſe of the third.

The Baſſa of Buda taken priſoner.

The Turks ouerthrown, & the Baſſa of Boſna ſlaine.

Now the Turks of Buda not able longer to endure the great famine therein, had moſt earneſtly requeſted reliefe from the other Turks their friends in Hungarie; who on all hands ran to haue relieued them: but comming neere thereunto, could not put therin ſuch prouiſion as they had brought for the relief of the ſame, being letted ſo to do by the Imperials; who about a league off diligently attended euery motion of the enemy: from whence the Lord Swartzenburg in the night ſecretly approching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a Petard to haue broken it open, and ſo to haue entered. Which his deuiſe taking not effect, as did that at Rab, the gate being within ſtrongly fortified by the enemy, he was inforced to depart, being alſo diſcouered by the Turks from the wall. Now ſhortly after, the Baſſa of Buda with ſix hundred horſe iſſuing out of the city to haue met with victuals that were comming thither, fell into an ambuſh of the Haiduckes, who after their manner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, tooke him priſoner, his horſe in his chaſe falling vnder him: whom his ſouldiers ſeeking to reſcue, there began a new skirmiſh, encreaſing their former ouerthrow with the loſſe of the greateſt part of them that were left: amongſt whom the Baſſa his ſonne, with the Aga of the Ianizaries there, loſt their liues alſo. Which conflict thus ended, the Baſſa was with ſafe conduct brought to the camp, & there with great threats enforced to reueale the ſtate of his city, with other the ſecret deſignes of the Turks. Whereupon the Haiducks returned again towards Buda, ſeeking by all means to ſtop the comming of victuals thither, ſo in hope at length to haue gained the diſtreſſed city. But whileſt they thus lay vpon the paſſages, behold newes was brought vnto them, how that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Sanzacks of Sigeth, Quinque Eccleſiæ, & Coppan, with 10000 Turks were comming to oppreſſe them, and to open the paſſages by them holden. But they knowing their owne ſtrength, and nothing fearing ſo ſmall a force, ſtaid not for their comming, but went to meet them; & in a place of good aduantage waiting for them, vpon their firſt appearance, with great aſſurance & courage charged them, brake their array, and ſlew the greateſt part of them, together with the Baſſa himſelfe: yet with ſo much adoe, as that had not the Lord Palſi in good time ſent in vnto their aid certaine companies of freſh men, it was not without cauſe doubted but that the Haiducks had bin put to the worſe, about three hundred of them hauing there already loſt their liues. The Tartars yet neuertheleſſe in good number held on their way towards Buda, with purpoſe to haue ouerrun the country, and ſo haue withdrawne the Imperials from the city: but foraſmuch as that baſe nation was knowne to be good for nothing but to rob and ſpoile, the Lord Swartzenburg his regiment only going againſt them, & encountering them, ouerthrew them in ſuch ſort, that part of them beeing there ſlaine in fight, and part for feare driuen into Danubie, the greater number of them there moſt miſerably periſhed.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in the vpper Hungarie, at the ſame time lay at Caſſouia, with eighteene thouſand men, doubting leſt the enemies army, which he heard to be at hand, ſhould come to beſiege that city. In the meane time, Ibrahim Baſſa Generall of the Turks forces came to Solnoch with an armie of fiftie thouſand ſtrong, among whom were ten thouſand Ianizaries: but for all that, vnderſtanding that Baſta nothing diſmaied awaited his comming at Caſſouia, not thinking it good to goe any farther (his ſouldiers being alreadie wearie with long trauell) neither yet ſafe there to ſtay ſo neere vnto his ſtrong enemie, retired backe again vnto Belgrade, a place of more ſtrength and ſecuritie, expecting a great fleet of ſhips, which charged vpon the Danubius, were to bring victuals for the armie, as alſo for the reliefe of Buda, Alba Regalis, and other ſuch diſtreſſed places, with diuers great pieces for battery, & other leſſe artillerie vpon carriages, with a number of ladders and other inſtruments of warre, declaring their purpoſe for the performance of ſome notable exploit, all guarded with fiue thouſand ſand Turkes, which conducted it vp the riuer. Of all which the Imperials vnderſtanding, the Lord Palſi diſpatched his Lieutenant with a conuenient power, and the Captain of the Huſſars with his followers, all good and valiant ſouldiers, to cut off this conuoy: who to make the matter ſhort, ſuddenly aſſailing them, and ſo comming to handie blows, cut in pieces the conuoy, and rifled the ſhips, of whom the greater part were there ſunke in the deep riuer; and ſo tooke an exceeding great bootie, deemed to be worth a million of gold: where among other things of great value, there was found aboord 100000 Dollars, which were all diuided amongſt the ſouldiers as a reward of their trauell. This great ouerthrow once knowne at Buda, Alba-Regalis, and the cities thereabouts, brought vpon them a great feare: yea the armie of Ibrahim grew thereby much diſcontented, as being at once diſappointed both of their victuals and their pay. Beſides that, the Imperials ouerran all the countrie thereabout, ranſacking, ſacking, and deſtroying the country villages and caſtles without mercy, although the poore inhabitants offred them large contribution to haue ſtaid their fury, which would not be accepted. Vpon this notable ouerthrow alſo the Lord Swartzenburg was determined with al his forces to come again to the ſiege of Buda, in hope in ſo great a diſcōfiture & want of victuals to haue had it deliuered vnto him; and for that purpoſe ſent for certain great pieces of artillerie to Vienna. But whileſt things went thus well in the lower Hungarie, Colonell Rodoler of S. Andrews in the vpper country, tooke occaſion alſo vpon this ouerthrow of the Turks, with 500 horſe and 600 foot, to ſhew himſelfe with this ſmall companie before Agria, hauing yet left the greateſt part of his forces a little off in ſecret ambuſh: which ſmall companie the Baſſa of Agria beholding, preſently put himſelfe in armes, and ſo ſallying out, began an hot and braue skirmiſh: when ſuddenly the other ſouldiers left in ambuſh, ſtarting out, & couragiouſly aſſailing their enemies, brake their order, & put them to flight, purſuing them at the heeles euen to the gates of the city: and had there been a greater force of footmen, it was verily thought, that the Turks (diſmaid with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Chriſtians euen then become maſters of the city, which had bin the cauſe of their notable ouerthrow in the yere 1596. Neuertheleſſe they with great brauerie and ſmall loſſe retired, hauing ſlaine a great number of the Turks, and carrying away with them an hundred priſoners, with a bootie of fiue hundred horſe, and much other cattell.

The Turkes receiue a notable ouerthrow vpon the riuer of Danubius.

The free Haiducks alſo ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, had done great harm in the country about Buda, ſcouring freely all ouer it, finding none to oppoſe themſelues againſt them: for which cauſe the poore Chriſtians, which yet dwelt in that countrey, riſe vp againſt the Turks, promiſing their obedience vnto the Emperor: and moreouer, to the intent they might be no more moleſted by the Imperials, offered to take vp armes themſelues againſt the enemy, & to the vttermoſt of their power to hinder his paſſage both by land and water. Theſe ſame Haiducks alſo had broken down all the bridges which the Turks had made betwixt Buda & Alba Regalis, to the end they ſhould not that way commodiouſly bring either victuals or munition from the one place to the other: and the lord Palſi and Nadaſti vnderſtanding by their eſpials, That the Tartars diuided into three companies, had ouerrun a great part of the countrey, and with a great bootie were retiring towards Buda, preſently went out againſt them, and inforced them to fight: which barbarous people, better enured to filch than to fight, there loſt all their liues, together with that they had before ſtolne. After which victorie, theſe valiant men turning their forces againſt certain other places of the Turks there by, tooke two of their caſtles with much rich ſpoile: which caſtles they ſacked and burnt, together with the great towne of Zolna, breaking downe alſo the bridge vpon the riuer Traua.

Now at this time the Turks at Buda held themſelues malecontent within the citie, hauing no Gouernour, their Baſſa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themſelues pinched alſo with great want of victuals. Wherefore doubting ſome ſudden attempt of the Chriſtians as men diſmaied, they for their more ſafety retired themſelues into the caſtle, a place of great ſtrength, leauing the citie vnto the Imperials then ready to haue beſieged it: but doubting of the Turks great army, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the auantgard thereof being come to Moatcſh, where Sartes Baſſa was alſo looked for; the report being giuen out, that the Turkes hauing relieued Buda, would goe to beſiege Caniſia or elſe Strigonium, they ſtayed to goe any farther, as men in doubt what to reſolue vpon. So were ſent certaine Colonels and other Captaines with their ſouldiers, to fortifie certaine paſſages whereby the

The Chriſtians vpon the approch of the Turkes great armie retyre.

Turks armie was to paſſe. The reſt in the mean time retiring, for that the puiſſant enemy began now to approch; as alſo for that they knew the great deſire that Ibrahim Baſſa had to recouer againe Strigonium, and had therefore ſent a great number of Tartars to forrage and waſte the countrey, and ſo ſuddenly hauing relieued Buda and Agria, there to reſolue whither to turne his forces. The Imperials in the meane time incamping neere vnto Hatwan and Zolnoc, to hinder the Turks from victualling of Buda, as they deſired, cut off fiue hundred of them at their firſt arriual, who to that purpoſe were going towards Buda; and tooke alſo one of the Turkes Chiaus priſoner; who ſent from Ibrahim the General, was going to Agria to put them in hope of their ſpeedie reliefe. They alſo at the ſame time attempted to haue ſurpriſed Zolnoc: where a good number of them with certaine petards approching the gates, in hope ſo to haue broken them open, being diſcouered by the Watch, were enforced to retire, leauing fortie behinde them ſlaine, and carrying away with them many moe of their fellowes wounded: in reuenge whereof the reſt ſhewed their furie vpon the countrey thereabout, deſtroying the villages, and intercepting a great deale of munition, which together with other victuals they met by the way as it was going to Buda and Agria.

Sommer now almoſt ſpent, Ibrahim the great Baſſa in the beginning of September came to Buda with an armie of an hundred and thirtie thouſand ſtrong, and from thence in the name of his great lord and maſter gaue the Emperor to vnderſtand at Prague, That for the ſauing of further effuſion of innocent bloud, and not for any feare or diſtruſt of his owne ſtrength and power, he could be content to hearken vnto ſome reaſonable conditions or treaty of peace. Wherunto both theſe great Princes (hauing well wearied themſelues with theſe long wars, and exhauſted their treaſures) ſeemed not now vnwilling, expecting (as was thought) nothing more than for the honor to be the firſt entreated: and the rather, for that the old Sultaneſſe, Mahomet his mother (who by the weakeneſſe of her ſons gouernment, ſuch as neuer was in any the Othoman kings or emperors before, did beare the greateſt ſway in his affaires) did what ſhe might to further the ſame. Wherefore in the latter end of September a place was agreed vpon for a parley for peace, which was in an Iſland in the riuer of Danubie beneath Strigonium: whither the lord Swartzenburg, Nadaſti, Palfi, and the Biſhop of Vacia, being come for the Emperour: and Amurath the Baſſa of Buda, with the lieutenant General of the Tartars, and ſome others for the Grand Seignior: The Turks at the firſt, after their vnreaſonable manner, demanded to haue Rab, Strigonium, Filek, Setchin, and all the reſt of the townes and caſtles in fiue yeres before taken from them by the Chriſtians, to be now againe ſurrendred vnto them, with a certaine yerely tribute by the Emperor to be payed vnto the great Sultan at Conſtantinople; as alſo there to haue his Embaſſadour lieger continually attending vpon the Turkes Court: for which they offered to deliuer againe vnto the Emperour the citie of Agria onely. All which their proud and vnreaſonable demands being by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners on the Emperours behalfe rejected, they were contented to come to ſome more reaſonable talke, offering to leaue vnto the Emperour Rab and Agria (whereof Rab was his owne alreadie) onely for Strigonium, exchanging as it were Strigonium for Agria. Which when it could neither be obtained, the parley was ſo broken off, and nothing concluded, and ſo the warres againe continued, without any memorable thing more this yeare betwixt them done, either on the one ſide or on the other; the Chriſtians contenting themſelues to haue diſtreſſed the chiefe Cities the Turkes held in Hungarie; and the Turkes no leſſe apayed to haue relieued the ſame.

A parley for peace.

Michael the Vayuod with a great armie entreth into Tranſyluania.

But whileſt things thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in Hungarie, Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, yet the Emperours friend and confederat, and vnder his protection, certainly enformed his life to be ſought after in the Turkes Court by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor his enuious neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Tranſyluania (as is before declared:) by commandement from the Emperor, and to be reuenged of ſo great a wrong, as alſo betimes to prouide for his owne ſafetie, with an armie of threeſcore thouſand ſtrong ſuddenly entred into Tranſyluania, in moſt horrible manner burning the countrey, and killing the people before him as he went. Where whileſt the Cardinal (who was thought to haue purpoſed to haue ſerued him in like ſort, had hee not beene by him preuented) was making head againſt him, he in the meane time had the citie of Corona (commonly called Braſſo) with the ſtrong caſtle of Fogaras yeelded vnto him: from whence he marching toward Alba-Iulia, the 26 of October, with all his armie, before diuided into three parts, but now againe vnited, came into the plains neere Temiſon, about three leagues from Hermenſtat; where vnderſtanding that his lieutenant corrupted by Ibrahim Baſſa had promiſed to kill him; and now wel aſſured thereof, to rid himſelfe of that danger, with his owne hands preſently cut his throat, and ſo diſpatched him. When by and by after came vnto him the Popes Nuntio, ſent by a fineneſſe from the Cardinal, accompanied with another Embaſſadour, the better to countenance out the matter; telling him, That the ſame Embaſſador had commiſſion from the Emperour, to will him forthwith to deſiſt from armes, and without further delay to depart out of Tranſyluania. Which thing ſeeming vnto the Vayuod verie ſtrange, and almoſt impoſſible, he deſired to ſee the ſaid commiſſion. Whereunto the Nuncio before inſtructed, anſwered, That hee had left it with the Cardinal. But I (ſaid the Vayuod) haue one here preſent from the Emperor of another purport, which I purpoſe fully to put in execution: yet was he for that day entreated by the Nuncio to ſtay his army. And ſo in the mean time lying both ſtil and in great ſuſpence, the Vayuod deſired to know of the Nuncio, the cauſe why the Cardinal forgetting himſelfe, ſo troubled that country, by intruding himſelfe thereinto, to the great preiudice of them vnto whom it of better right belonged, not attending vnto the gouernment of the Church, better beſeeming his calling than the mannaging of armes, to the diſturbance of the Chriſtian peace. Whereunto he receiued no anſwer. So the 28 of October, a day dedicated to the commemoration of the Apoſtles Simon and Iude, theſe meſſengers were ſent backe againe vnto the Cardinal, who preſently returned them backe vnto the Vayuod with new inſtructions (being then buſie with his yong ſon, in ſetting his men in order of battell preſently to go againſt the Cardinal) of whom they could get no other anſwer, but that he was reſolued foorthwith to come vnto the trial of a battel with him. So the two armies lying incamped not paſt a quarter of a league the one from the other, and the ſame day meeting together, joined a moſt terrible & cruel battel, which for the ſpace of fiue houres was with ſuch deſperate obſtinacie fought, as if they had euery man vowed to haue carried away the victorie ouer his enemie, or there to haue left themſelues dead vpon the ground; vntill the Cardinals people at length ouercome in a long and bloudie fight, were there vtterly ouerthrowne: amongſt whom were 3000 Turkes and Tartars, ſent vnto him from Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks General. The Cardinal himſelfe ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his armie, was by ſome reported to haue ſaued himſelfe by flight; but by ſome others was ſaid to haue bin drowned in paſſing a riuer, as he fled from the Valachians that had him in chace. But the truth was, That the Vayuod now maſter of the field, ſent out certaine troups of horſemen diuers wayes ſtil to purſue him: and himſelfe with the reſt of his armie proſecuting the victorie, came to the Cardinals campe, now by the Tranſyluanians and Turks quite forſaken, wherein he found 45 pieces of artillerie, with great ſtore of coine and wealth, beſide a number of tents and horſes, all which became vnto him a prey. From thence he marched vnto Alba Iulia, where he was with great joy receiued of his friends and confederats there: for though the greater part of the Tranſyluanians, eſpecially the nobilitie, had together with the Cardinal ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turks protection, and followed his enſignes; yet were there diuers others alſo who ſtill fauoured the Emperor, and therefore rejoiced not a little of this victorie. The Vayuod after that, ſent his lieutenant to Claudiopolis, to ſee if they would yeeld alſo: which they willingly did, with many other cities and caſtles in diuers parts of that countrey, which hauing none to reſt vpon, now yeelded alſo: in ſuch ſort, that ſhortly after all Tranſyluania ſubmitted it ſelfe againe vnto the Emperors obeiſance, and ſwore vnto him obedience; moſt of the nobilitie of that country being either ſlain in the battel, or afterwards put to death by the Vayuod: amongſt whom were fiue, which corrupted by the Cardinal, had before vndertaken to kill him. Now the fourteenth of Nouember, after diuers reports of the Cardinals eſcape, his vngracious head was for all that preſented to the Vayuod: which to the terrour of others, being for a while ſet vp in Alba-Iulia (where hee but a little before had commanded as a Prince) was afterwards taken downe, and ſent for a Preſent from the Vayuod vnto the Emperour and the Archdukes his brethren; his headleſſe bodie being afterward by the commaundement of the Vayuod honourably buried in a Monaſterie at Alba-Iulia, in the ſame Tombe he had before made for his brother beheaded by his Couſine Sigiſmund Bathor. The Cardinals Treaſure alſo fell into his hands, which was ſaid to haue beene three millions of gold. Thus the Countrey of Tranſyluania lately before before by the Cardinal yeelded vnto the obeiſance of the Turke, was againe by this worthie G Vayuod recouered and reſtored vnto the Chriſtian empire; the proud Cardinal caſt out and brought to confuſion, hauing not yet poſſeſſed theſe his new honors full eight moneths. His couſin Sigiſmund the late Tranſyluanian Prince, who almoſt all this while had ſtayed at Boruſia, and in diſguiſed apparell ſeene Danske, and diuers other the free cities thereabouts, now hearing newes of the Cardinals ouerthrow, ſecretly got him away from thence into Polonia, to ſeeke againe his new fortunes. The lord Swartzenburg at the ſame time vniting his forces in the lower Hungarie with them of Stiria, and now twentie thouſand ſtrong, ſought by all means to reduce ſo many places vpon thoſe frontiers as he could, vnto the Emperours obeiſance, and ſo tooke in aboue 200 villages: but afterward thinking to haue ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of H Capiſuar, and by night ſecretly approching one of the gates with a petard, which took not the expected effect, he was diſcouered by the watch, and ſo by the garriſon ſoldiers (now raiſed with the alarum) repulſed, and enforced to retyre with the loſſe of about a hundred men, and diuers others wounded, all men of good account: in reuenge wherof Swartzenburg afterwards ſent out diuers troupes of horſemen, which ſcouring all ouer the country as far as Sigeth, burned it alſo, and ſo returning carried away with them a great bootie.

Ibrahim Baſſa hearing of this ouerthrow of the Cardinal, with al the forces he had ſent him, much troubled therewith, ſent newes thereof in poſt to Conſtantinople; the brute whereof brought a general feare vpon the whole citie alſo, inſomuch that Commiſſion was forthwith ſent vnto him from the great Sultan, giuing him power (if it might be) to come to ſome honorable peace with the Emperor, and to bring it with him to Conſtantinople: whither hee was I ſhortly to returne; being now no longer time to keep the field with his armie, which beſide the cold ſeaſon of the yeare, ſuffered great want of bread, the plague alſo then raging therein, with the death of many his beſt ſouldiers both horſe and foot, beſide the wonderfull mortalitie of their cattell alſo: in ſuch ſort that the ſouldiers not able longer to endure the famine and wants increaſing, fel to robbing of one another, and ſo at length into mutinie; wherein diuers of them being ſlain and cut in pieces by their fellows, the reſt for the moſt part brake in ſunder of themſelues, and ſo by diuers wayes returned home, not well truſting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turkes, their armie being diſcomfited with wants and the euill ſucceſſe of their affaires as well in Hungarie as in Tranſyluania. Neither did Ibrahim the great Baſſa for the reliefe of thoſe euils, at his returne bring any concluſion K of peace vnto his great lord and maſter, as was commonly expected.

The Turks great army of it ſelfe diſſolued.

Cuſahin Baſſa of Caramania riſeth vp in rebellion againſt the great Sultan.

Now beſide theſe troubles of Tranſyluania and the other reuolted countries, Cuſahin (or as ſome call him Caſſan) the ſon of one of the Sultaneſſes, brought vp in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and hauing long ſerued in the wars of Perſia & Hungary, and ſo at length made Baſſa of Caramania, a man of great ſpirit, and not able to indure the imperfections he daily ſaw in the Othoman Empire, and the cowardiſe of the grand Seignior; vpon the report of the euill ſucceſſe of the affaires of Hungary on the one ſide, and the deſire he ſaw in the Perſians to recouer their loſt fortreſſes, on the other, & grieued alſo with more particular wrongs concerning himſelfe; as a man altogether diſcontented, reſolued to take vp armes: and calling vnto him his ſoldiers, and (as he was a well ſpoken man) laying before them the deformities of the L preſent ſtate, gallantly perſuaded them, with the promiſe of honour, ſoueraigntie, and rich rewards, what an eaſie thing it were to chaſe the grand ſeignior out of Aſia, and to ſet themſelues with all that part of the Empire at libertie. And ſo euen at the firſt hauing woon vnto him 3000 harquebuſiers and 5000 horſemen, tooke the field, to the great hurt of the Turks, and trouble of the State. A ſtrange matter in that tyrannical Empire. The newes whereof comming in poſt to the Court, Commiſſion was forthwith directed vnto foure of the Sanzackes of Aſia neereſt vnto him, for the ſpeedie ſuppreſſing of that rebellion but euen then ariſing. Wherof Cuſahin vnderſtanding, and that they with ten thouſand horſe & foot were comming to oppreſſe him, without further ſtay, went couragiouſly to meet them, and ſo encountering of them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and tooke from them their baggage with ſix pieces of ordnance. And after with his people ſeiſed vpon all the caſtles thereabouts, giuing whatſoeuer he found therein for a prey vnto his Souldiours: who alſo much enriched themſelues with the ſpoile of the Iewes, as the people whome they moſt hated, and neuer reſted vntill hee had made almoſt all the Countrey of Caramania his owne. After that, hee

laied ſiege to Cogna a city in the confines of Natolia,which was forthwith yeelded vnto him. And yet not ſo contented,gaue it out by open proclamation, that for the reformation of the diſordered ſtate, he would ere long go to beſiege the Imperial citie of Conſtantinople: and that therefore all ſuch as would follow him ſhould of him be entreated as his friends and companions,threatening vnto the reſt moſt cruel death and deſtruction. Of which his proceedings Mahomet (as then diſporting himſelfe in his gardens of pleaſure in the countrey all alongſt the ſide of Propontis) vnderſtanding,and fearing to be there ſurpriſed, or that ſome ſudden innouation might be raiſed in the citie,haſted with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople,and from thence in all haſte diſpatched Mehemet one of the Viſier Baſſa's the ſonne of Sinan,with all the forces he could make to go againſt him. Who paſſing ouer into Aſia with a great power,and yet fearing to come to the trial of a battel with him, whom he knew to be a man of himſelfe deſperately ſet,and not a little fauored alſo euen of his owne ſouldiers; ſo ſecretly wrought by large promiſes, that Cuſahin his footmen were euen vpon the point to haue forſaken him. Which hee quickly perceiuing, fled forthwith through Siria into the countrey of Arabia with his horſemen and the horſemen of Simon the Georgian: purpoſing the next Spring by the helpe of the Arabians & Perſians,to appeare in the field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Baſſa following, came with his armie to Aleppo, there to Winter, and to expect the returne of the rebell together with the Spring, This ſo dangerous a rebellion,with the troubles of Tranſyluania and Valachia,were the cauſe that the grand Seignior,ſeeing himſelfe in ſo many places forſaken of his ſubiects,was the readier to incline vnto peace with the Emperor: whereunto for all that,the Emperor was not haſtie to hearken,but vpon honourable conditions; as knowing that the Turke required the ſame not for any deſire hee had to liue at quiet,but for that his troubled affaires both at home and elſewhere abroad ſo required,his Ianizaries and other men of war in this his ſo weak gouernment being grown ſo inſolent,as that they were hardly to be by him commanded,openly threatening in their diſcontented humors, not only the depoſing of the principal officers about him,but of himſelfe alſo, and of the baniſhment of the Sultaneſſe his mother; ſaying, That ſhee had bewitched him, to the end ſhee might her ſelfe rule, which ſhe indeed did in all his greateſt affaires. But the rebell Cuſahin the next yeare growne againe very ſtrong,was now come into the field,and euen ready to haue giuen the Baſſa battell: who as he was a man of great wiſedome and experience, well conſidering with what a deſperat enemie he had to do,thought it beſt againe to proue if his rebellious followers might by faire meanes be drawne from him: and ſo comming neere vnto him, by open proclamation promiſed a free and general pardon to all ſuch as had followed the Rebell in thoſe wars,if forſaking him, they ſhould forthwith returne home to their dwellings, and ſo to the obedience of their iuſt and lawfull prince and ſoueraigne. Which general pardon ſo proclaimed was the ruin of Cuſahin,for that the greateſt part of his followers now enriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now alſo hauing free pardon offered them, returned home into their owne countries, there at eaſe to liue of their euill gotten goods, leauing their captain with ſome few others which ſtayd with him,with little hope to be ſaued. So that within a few days after,Cuſahin thus forſaken of his followers was himſelfe taken and brought to Conſtantinople,where ſhortly after he was with moſt exquiſit torments tortured to death.

Mehemet one of the Viſier Baſſa's ſent againſt the Rebell.

Cuſahin the rebell taken and tortured to death at Conſtantinople.

The troubles of this yeare thus paſt, Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor with the beginning of the next (whilſt the ground yet couered with ſnow, and the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather would not ſuffer the ſoldiers to keepe the field) cauſed a Diet of the Princes of the Empire to be called,to conſider with him of ſuch helps as were by thē to be giuen againſt the next ſpring for the maintenance of the wars which yet he had againſt the Turk: who all promiſed to ſend their ſoldiers,with their pay and ſuch further contribution as might ſerue for the maintenance of that defenſiue war againſt the common enemy: wherunto alſo Clement now Biſhop of Rome (this yere of Iubilie)put to his helping hand,as he had diuers times before, by ſending thither ſuch aid both of men and mony as he had before promiſed: ſo that by this means great preparation was made by the Chriſtians for the taking of the field with the firſt of the Spring. At which time the Turks alſo began to ſtir: who although Ibrabim Baſſa their General,by the appointment of his great lord was then in ſome ſpeech with the Emperor about a peace, yet ceaſed not they in the mean time that this treaty was from day to day prolonged,with their companies ſcattering here and there to do what harme they could vpon the frontiers of the Emperors territories,the cauſe why he with more ſpeed called vpon his friends for their promiſed aid. And for the better managing of this yeres wars againſt the Turke,he appointed duke Mercurie (who had drawne a great number of Frenchmen both horſe and foot out of France) Generall of all his forces,ſending Ferant Gonzaga, ſyrnamed the Lame (whom for his approoued valour and experience in martial affaires,he had ſent for to Mantua) gouernour into the vpper Hungarie. So the ſoldiers now day by day by companies reſorting from diuers parts into Auſtria,were from thence ſent vnto ſuch places as were by the Turks moſt moleſted,ſo to repreſſe their often incurſions, as in many places they did. For eight thouſand of the Turks going out vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed Pappa, were by the garriſon ſoldiers of that place encountered and ouerthrowne. And on the other ſide,whilſt Ferdinand the Archduke was aſſembling his people in Croatia,for the defence of that country againſt the incurſions of the enemie,ſixe thouſand Turks without reſiſtance entring the ſame as far as Buccari, and burning the country villages as they went, had taken many priſoners with a great bootie of cattell; and ſo (merrie and out of feare)being about to haue returned,were ſuddenly ſet vpon by the Countie Serinus in certaine ſtrait and troubleſome paſſages where they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, and ouercharged alſo with their prey,were (I ſay) eaſily by him for the moſt part ouerthrowne,and the reſt put to flight,and ſo the priſoners with all the reſt of the bootie again recouered, At which time alſo one of the Imperial Colonels with fifteene hundred horſe making an inrode into the countrey about Alba-Regalis, and meeting with the Turkes and Tartars thereabouts, ſlew ſix hundred of them,and tooke diuers of their captaines priſoners. Six thouſand other Tartars alſo at this time returning out of Hungary home towards their owne country,were by the Coſſackes neere vnto the Blacke ſea ſet vpon with ſuch force, that many of them being ſlaine,the reſt for feare ran into the ſea, leauing all the prey they had got in Hungary,vnto their enemies. In the heat of theſe broiles,the noble lord Palſi gouernor of Strigonium, a man that all his life long had done great ſeruice for his prince and countrey,and whom we haue ſo often in this hiſtorie remembred, died the three and twentieth of March in his Caſtle at Biberſpurg, to the great griefe of many, eſpecially the Hungarians his countreymen. And for that Strigonium (ſo neere vnto the Enemie) required in his ſtead to haue a right valiant and couragious gouernor, the Emperor appointed the Lord Swartzenburg to that charge; the fame ſtill running, that Ibrahim Baſſa would come thither with the great armie he was in prouiding,if the peace went not forward; which was now ſtill leſſe and leſſe hoped for,by reaſon of his proud and inſolent demands.

The death of the lord Palſi.

The Frenchmen and Wallons mutinie in Pappa.

But whileſt theſe troubles with ſuch others too long to rehearſe,thus paſſed in diuers parts of this miſerable countrey of Hungary, 1200 Frenchmen and Wallons in garriſon at Pappa (a ſtrong frontier town of the Emperors in the lower Hungarie) for want of pay began to mutine. For which cauſe it was thought good to the chiefe commanders,to haue them thence remoued,and others placed in their room. Which they perceiuing,and withall knowing themſelues too ſtrong for the reſt of the garriſon,all Hungarians and Almaines,not partakers of their conſpiracie,they firſt reſolued to thruſt their owne captains out of the towne,as lets vnto their deſires: and then laying hands vpon Michael Marotti the pay-maſter,and other the Hungarian and Dutch commanders,with their ſoldiers,tooke from them their weapons,and caſt the ſaid Marotti, with the other captaines,and ſome of the better ſort of their ſoldiers into yrons, exacting of the reſt as well Hungarians as Dutch,in number about a thouſand perſons, 1000 duckets; threatening otherwiſe to deliuer them into the hands of the Turks: and albeit that Marotti offered for his libertie eighteene hundred duckets; yet would they not be ſo contented, but ſpoiling both him and the reſt of all they had,with their apparell and weapons furniſhed ſuch Turkes as were there priſoners, and ſo ſent them away to Alba-Regalis: and afterwards rifling euery mans houſe as if they had beene enemies, tooke from them whatſoeuer pleaſed themſelues: and that which worſe was,to encreaſe theſe outrages, compacted with the Turks of Alba-Regalis and Buda, for the pay which they ſaid the Emperor owght them, to deliuer them the towne: certifying them withall, how that the Lord Swartzenburg within two dayes was comming with money to giue them contentment; promiſing if he came into the towne, to deliuer him with the ſame into their hands: or to be the more ſure of him, they might if they ſo pleaſed intercept him at the paſſage Zeſnegkh, whereby he muſt needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpoſe, they ſent an enſigne of the Emperours, as a token

A token vnto the Turkes at Alba-Regalis; who for all that altogether beleeued them not, yet willing further to trie them, ſent them for hoſtages two Chiaus; from whom the rebels ſent alſo two others of the better ſort of them to Alba-Regalis, with concluſion, that the fiue and twentieth of Iune at the furtheſt the mony ſhould be paid, and the town deliuered. For the receiuing whereof, and for feare of ſome hidden treaſon, the Turks and Tartars began to make themſelues ſtrong: the Imperials alſo doing what they might for the appeaſing of ſo dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the Lord Swartzenburg with two thouſand horſe and foot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence ſent 24 horſemen to diſſuade the rebels from yeelding the town vnto the Turks, & to tell them that they ſhould ſhortly receiue their B pay: who ſhamefully deriding them, ſent them backe againe as wiſe as they came: ſo that Swartzenburg perceiuing himſelfe with ſo ſmall forces to be able to do nothing againſt them, neither yet by faire means to perſuade them, retired again to Rab, vntill ſome greater ſtrength were come vnto him. Immediatly after, doctor Petzen Counſellor for the wars, a man of great authoritie, grauitie, and wiſedome, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horſe conducted to Pappa, to ſee if he by his diſcretion could haue diſſuaded them from their ſo vngodly a purpoſe, for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemie: whom they not only refuſed to heare, although he ſpake vnto them moſt kindly, but alſo bent their muskets and harquebuſies vpon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When ſhortly after, twentie of the Hungarians impriſoned in a cellar in the town, brake out, and comming to Rab, C brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in Pappa were at variance amongſt themſelues about the yeelding vp of the towne vnto the Turks (ſome better minded than the reſt, not willing to conſent therunto) inſomuch, that they in the caſtle ſhot at them in the town, and they again at them in the caſtle: and that they had already receiued from the Turks twenty thouſand duckats, with ſome prouiſion of victuals, & were ſhortly after to receiue from them the reſt of the mony promiſed them, and ſo to deliuer the towne. For preuenting whereof, the Lord Swartzenburg the 22 of Iune ſent the Lord Sharpfenſtein with a French Colonell, 3000 ſouldiers, certaine Petards, and a number of ſcaling ladders towards Pappa: whom the falſe rebels ſuffered peaceably to enter the towne the foure and twentieth of Iune, ſtil encouraging them to come on, calling them their countriemen and brethren, and in token of friendſhip D ſhaking them by the hands, telling them, that hauing aſſurance of their pay, they deſired no more: But hauing now receiued in ſo many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deale with, ſhutting the reſt out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in deriſion called vpon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of theſe rebels at the ſame time had laied themſelues in ambuſh by a mill faſt without the towne, who by the Wallons & Haiducks without diſcouered, were alſo by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reaſon of the ſhot out of the towne, they could do no good; but hauing loſt three hundred men, and amongſt them Hanniball Kralzs the Lord Sharpfenſtein his Lieutenant Generall, and one Del la Margoſe the chiefe enginer, they retired: which loſſe the deſperat rebels (if it had been in their choice) had wiſhed rather to haue happened vnto the Dutches than to the E Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of theſe rebels being by chance taken priſoners by the Imperials, and brought to Rab, were not only apparelled but alſo trimmed after the Turkiſh faſhion, as men not deſiring longer to be accounted Chriſtians, the reſt of their fellows in the towne alſo imitating the Turks faſhions, as wel in their apparell as in their manner of ſeruice: yet for all that, would not theſe metamorphoſed monſters yeeld the towne vnto the Turkes, before they had the full ſum by them agreed vpon, the Baſſa of Boſna beeing commanded from the grand Seignior in all haſte to prouide it for them, and ſo to receiue of them the town. Neuertheleſſe, for their more ſtrength and their more credit with the Turks, they receiued into the town one enſigne of the Turks, with certain wagons of victuals, brought thither with ſo ſtrong a conuoy as that the Imperials durſt not meddle therwith: in which wagons (being diſcharged) they ſent in bonds 600 Hungarians and Dutch, men, women, and children, priſoners to Alba-Regalis; being all of them glad to be ſo ſent away, in hope to find more fauor & courteſie at the hands of their enemies, than they had found with theſe renegat Chriſtians. So ſhortly after, theſe rebels ſent out certaine meſſengers vnto the Gouernor of Alba-Regalis, to know his full reſolution: which meſſengers (conducted by certaine Turkes of great account) were vpon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the meſſengers taken,

A moſt wicked fact.

with 100 Turkes moe.In the mean while Michael Marotti,before impriſoned by the rebels in G Pappa, by letters ſecretly aduertiſed the Lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby hee might (as hee ſaid)eaſily enter the towne,and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance amongſt themſelues. Who thereupon the 12 of Iuly came to Pappa with nine thouſand horſe and foot;but diſappointed of his purpoſe for entering the towne,hardly neuertheleſſe belaied the ſame: vpon whom the mutiniers many times deſperatly ſallied out, & right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were ſtill, without any notable loſſe, by their enemies (too ſtrong for them)beaten backe again into the towne.In one of which ſallies it fortuned one of their captains to be taken,who to the terror of the reſt was preſently ſlaine quicke, & his head and skin vpon a pike ſet vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold.But the Lord Swartzenburg H ſtill more and more preuailing vpon them, they ſent ſecretly for aid to the Turkes: whereof he for all that getting intelligence,ſent alſo for three regiments of ſouldiers moe to come vnto him to the ſiege:by whoſe comming he wel ſtrengthened, and bringing his approches neerer the towne,tooke from the rebels the mill,a ſtrength which they very vnwillingly loſt,as in hope thereby to haue the more eaſily receiued aid from the Turks;who hauing made preparation to haue relieued them, were letted ſo to do by the riſing of the water,which had ſpoiled all the prouiſion for their reliefe at the bridge of Eſſeg,as alſo hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches euen to the town ditches, out of which they had let out all the water: where ſome of the townſmen eſcaping out of the towne,declared,how that the mutinous ſoldiers within labored both day and night to fortifie the towne,but to be in their worke much letted by the continuall aſſaults of the Imperials: I as alſo that they now had neither bread nor wine,nor other victuals left,more than a little ſalt,and threeſcore horſe,of which they had already begun to eat:and that although they were not altogether ſo valiant, yet that they had reſolued to die by the hands of the ſouldiers, as men expecting no other mercy. Yet ſhortly after,viz. the nine and twentieth of Iuly,they deſperatly fell out vpon the trenches of Marſpurgiſch, a Dutch captaine;of whoſe ſouldiers they ſlew many,being drunke,& driuing the reſt out of their trenches,raiſed a great alarme.Which the Lord Swartzenburg hearing, haſted thither to the reſcue; where with an vnluckie musket ſhot he was ſtruck in the head and ſlain. Whereof the rebels got knowledge the ſame euening, and Del la Mota their Generall in reward of that ſeruice gaue vnto them that had made that ſallie a thouſand dollars to be diuided among them. The dead body of that ſo worthy a man, K as had done great ſeruice for the Chriſtian common-weale,was afterwards with great ſolemnitie brought to Rab,and there honorably enterred. The like deſperat ſally they made againe the next day, and ſlew of the Imperials an hundred and thirtie, and tooke certaine priſoners: and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cryed aloud,That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towne, they would eate Chriſtians,whereof Marotti ſhould bee the firſt.

Pappa abandoned by the mutiniers.

The Lord Swartzenburg thus ſlain, the gouernment of the army was by Matthias the Archduke committed to the Lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned; who although he were very ſickly,came vnto the camp before Pappa the 8 of Auguſt; where vnderſtanding that that the rebels now brought vnto extremitie,had a purpoſe by night to flie away & ſo be gon, he cauſed a more vigilant & ſtrong watch to be kept;when lo according to his expectation the next night after,about two houres before day they began to iſſue out: whereof the watch giuing knowledge to the Generall,they were indeed ſuffered to go out as vnperceiued,but preſently after at their heels were ſent out the Lord Nadaſti & the Earle of Thurn,with 200 Huſſars, and after them the chiefe Colonel & Countie Solms,with part of their horſmen alſo,who in 3 diuers places ouertaking them neere vnto a great wood called Packem, ſlew moſt part of them: Del la Mota their chiefe captain or ringleader being ſlaine by the chiefe Colonell, becauſe he would not yeeld,& his head afterwards by him preſented vnto the Generall in the campe: 200 Wallons the Huſſars vnder the leading of the Lord Nadaſti, Countie Solmes, and County Thurn, found out in the wood;who albeit that they for a ſpace made great reſiſtance, yet in the end were inforced to yeeld, and ſo with their two enſignes were brought into the campe. The Huſſars alſo vpon another paſſage light vpon other 200 moe of theſe rebellious Wallons, who becauſe they ſtood ſtrongly vpon their guard,and were more deſperately ſet than the reſt, the Generall ſent out other 200 of the Colonels horſemen vpon them, by whom

A whom and the Huſſars they were almoſt all ſlaine: diuers others of them alſo were ſlaine in comming out of the towne, and in the mariſhes thereabouts. Their Generals Lieutenant with ſuch other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the Lord Rederns commandement deliuered vnto the Prouoſt Martiall; the reſt of the rebellious traitors he at the requeſt of the ſouldiers diuided into diuers parts of the armie, there to the terror of others to be executed, from whom the ſouldiers could hardly be perſuaded euen for the preſent to hold their hands. But afterwards hauing brought them to Rab, & leaue giuen them to do with them their pleaſure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as had they before in their outragious dealings, eſpecially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithſtanding moſt of B them were of the Wallon countries. Some of them they impailed, ſome they brake vpon the wheele; ſome of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and ſo poured into the wounds vinegar, ſalt and pepper; from ſome others they cut of their priuities, ſome they roſted, and ſome they put into the Tenalia; vpon ſome they dropped molten pitch, and then caſting gunpouder vpon them, ſo burnt them to death; otherſome they hanged vpon yron hookes; and ſome they put in the ground vp to the chin, and for their diſport with yron bullets bowled at their heads. In all which torments no ſigne of compaſſion was to be ſeene, the tormẽtors, to make their pain the greater doing nothing but deride them: the miſerable wretches in the meane time confeſſing the hainouſneſſe of their offence, and crauing for death as a fauor. A moſt horrible thing it was to ſee, how whileſt ſome were thus tortured, others were C brought to ſee the ſame miſerie they themſelues were by and by to endure. Amongſt the reſt of theſe exquiſite torments, one Peter Orſy cauſed one of the mutiners to be ſowed vp in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and ſo to be roſted, in which miſerable torment he liued three houres, and then died: after which, he cauſed the lothſome body ſo roſted, to be giuen to them that lay ſtaruing vpon the wheele to eat. Thus was the dangerous mutinie at Pappa with much adoe ended, and that ſtrong towne like to haue bin loſt, preſerued: the rebels themſelues being become a dreadfull example to all poſteritie, for all them to looke vpon that ſhall attempt the like villanie.

Now at this ſame time alſo, though neither the Chriſtians nor the Turks had as then any great army in the field, yet many an hot and bloudy skirmiſh paſſed daily betwixt them in one D place or other of Hungarie: all which to recount as it would be much tedious, ſo in ſilence to paſſe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong thoſe worthy perſonages by whom they were not without their great aduenture done. Among the reſt one Nicholas Horbath County Serinus his Lieutenant, with 150 ſouldiers, and Andrew Thuſſi another great Commander, going forth to ſeeke for bootie; Thuſſi hearing that the Turks were abroad for the ſurpriſing of certaine Haiducks then gone out, ſtaied faſt in a ſecret place vntill he might heare further newes, Horbath another way ſtill going on. Now it happened that the Baſſa of Sigeth hauing bin abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouerthrew him, and ſlew moſt of his men, Horbath himſelfe by flight hardly eſcaping. But Thuſſi hearing this skirmiſh, as lying cloſe not far off, and now haſting thither to haue bin partaker thereof, found the E Baſſa yet in the field on foot, viewing the bodies of the ſlaine: vpon whom he came ſo ſuddenly and with ſuch force, as that the Baſſa with his diſordered men had much adoe to take horſe, and ſo without any great reſiſtance to betake himſelfe to flight: after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, ſlew many of the Turks, & amongſt the reſt the Baſſa himſelfe, whoſe head preſently cut off, Horbath ſent to the Countie Serinus, who ſhortly after by Thuſſi himſelfe ſent it to Matthias the Archduke. This Baſſa was a man of great ſtrength and courage, a moſt expert and aduenturous captaine, about 36 yeares old, and for his valour of a common ſouldier created a Baſſa by the great Sultan. His head beeing brought to Vienna, and there ſhewed to the Baſſa of Buda then their priſoner, and he demanded, whether he knew it or not, ſighing anſwered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Baſſa of Sigeth, a brauer man than whom the Sultan had none in all his Empire; earneſtly withall deſiring to know how he was ſlaine. And not long after, the aduenturers out of Comara, Strigonium, and other places thereabout hauing made a great partie, and taken a great bootie from the Turkes at a faire at Gombar, and by Tra and Eſſeg, thinking to haue paſſed Danubius in hope of a greater bootie, ſeuen hundred of them being paſſed the riuer, were by the new Baſſa of Sigeth and others with fiue thouſand Turkes in an hot skirmiſh ouerthrowne; yet not without their great loſſe

Two Baſſaes of Sigeth ſlain one after another.

Iula ſurpriſed and burnt by the free Haiduckes.

alſo: the Baſſa himſelfe with two other Sanzackes and fiue hundred Turks being there ſlain, and but fiftie of the Chriſtian aduenturers left dead in the place, the reſt diſorderedly retiring to their boats, being for moſt part drowned in the Danubie. The free Haiduckes alſo ſurpriſed Iula and ſet it on fire, in which confuſion the Turks flying into the caſtle, for haſte thruſt one another from the bridge into the caſtle ditch; wherein ſo many of them were drowned, that a man might haue gone drie foot ouer vpon the bodies of the dead. They tooke there alſo ſix hundred priſoners with much other bootie, & deliuered two hundred Chriſtians which were there captiues. And albeit that theſe Haiducks after this exploit done were hardly purſued by the Turks from other places, yet they in ſafety retired with ſuch bootie as they had alreadie gotten.

The gouernement of Tranſyluania by the Emperour confirmed vnto Michael the Vayuod.

But now to leaue theſe the troubles of Hungarie for a while, as the forerunners of greater ere long to enſue; let vs againe looke backe into Tranſyluania and Valachia, to ſee how Michael the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himſelfe there. The Cardinall Bathor oueruerthrowne and ſlaine, and the countrey of Tranſyluania againe brought vnder the Emperors obedience; the Vayuod by his Embaſſadors gaue him forthwith to vnderſtand of all his proceedings, with the whole ſucceſſe thereof, as alſo of a purpoſe he had to inuade Moldauia: for that it was commonly reported, and alſo beleeued, That Sigiſmund the late Prince (not a little moued with the death of the Cardinall his couſin, and the reuolt of his countrie) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldauians, would now attempt ſome great matter for the recouerie of Tranſyluania: All which was ſhortly after the rather thought to be true, for that diuers of his ſpies beeing taken, ſome at Clauſenburg, ſome at Neſſen, beſide the Letters that were found about them from him vnto the Nobilitie and States of Tranſyluania (perſuaſuading them to reuolt from the Vayuod vnto him, and that his meaning was ſhortly to come with a great armie out of Polonia for the repulſing of him) they alſo of themſelues confeſſed, How that Sigiſmund in diſguiſed apparell had himſelfe been in Tranſyluania, to conferre with diuers his ſecret friends concerning that matter. Which his Embaſſadours the Emperour honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vayuod the gouernment of Tranſyluania, ſending alſo vnto him diuers honourable Preſents, forbidding him neuertheleſſe to inuade Moldauia, for feare of raiſing a new and dangerous war againſt the Polonians alſo, vnder whoſe protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then reſted. According vnto which command the Vayuod ſtayed his intended expedition; yet ſending ſome good part of his forces vnto the Frontiers of Moldauia, for feare of Sigiſmund whome hee heard to bee hatching ſome miſchiefe in Polonia, and euen then to lie vpon the frontiers of that country. Some few moneths thus paſſing, Huſraim Aga (a graue reuerend old man, and much employed by the Turkiſh Sultan) with fiue other Turks of good account, Embaſſadours from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following him, came to Cronſtat in Tranſyluania where the Vayuod then lay. Of whoſe comming the Vayuod hearing, with foure thouſand horſemen moſt brauely mounted, went halfe a mile out of the citie to meet them: the footmen in the meane time on both ſides of the ſtreet ſtanding in good order, from the gate of the citie whereby they were to enter, euen vnto the Vayuods lodging, where ſtood alſo his guard al in red and white ſilke. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horſes, with great reuerence ſaluting the one the other: when preſently the Embaſſador embracing the Vayuod, vngirt his ſcimitar, and in the name of the great Sultan put another about him, ſo richly garniſhed with gold and precious ſtones, as that no part of the ſcaberd was therefore to bee ſeene: beſides this, he preſented him with a faire plume of blacke Hearnes feathers mixed with ſome white (a right goodly ornament, in forme of a great buſh) which the Vayuod would not in the field put vpon his head, although he were thereunto by the Embaſſadour moſt earneſtly requeſted, but cauſed it to be carried before him: he alſo preſented him with two very faire red enſignes, in token of the Turkes fauour and protection; the one for himſelfe, and the other for his ſonne Petraſco: moreouer, he gaue vnto him two exceeding faire horſes richly furniſhed, with foure others, and a moſt faire Faulcon. The Vayuod himſelfe was moſt brauely mounted, and (after the manner of his countrie) had ten very faire ſpare horſes led before him. At whoſe enterance into the town, all the great ordnance was diſcharged, with great vollies of ſmall ſhot: and ſo the Embaſſador ſtil riding on the left hand of the Vayuod, being brought to his lodging, had ſix of his chiefe followers euery one of them preſented with a rich robe of cloth of gold: in requitall

A requitall whereof the Embaſſadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers euerie one of them with a good ſuit of apparell: with this Embaſſador of the Turks was alſo the Polonian Embaſſador, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. Theſe Embaſſadors (as was thought) did what they might to haue drawne this worthy and renowned man, together with the countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, from the Emperour vnto the Turks obeiſance: howbeit he ſeldome or neuer ſpake with them, but that either before or after hee had conference with the Lords Vngnad and Zeckel (the Emperors Commiſſioners) concerning their requeſts; alwaies proteſting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the Emperors conſent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aduertiſed, and that he was not by any thing yet ſaid or done, to be remoued from the Emperor, gaue him by the ſame Embaſſadors to vnder- B ſtand, How that he was in ſome ſpeech with the Emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by meſſengers from the Baſſaes at Presburg) which if it ſorted to effect, that then it ſhould be well; but if not, that then it ſhould be good for him whileſt yet he had time, wiſely to conſider of his owne eſtate, and to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praiſe of a certain fooliſh conſtancie, to aduenture himſelf with all that he had vnto moſt certaine danger and deſtruction: promiſing him in recompence of that his loyaltie, to giue vnto him for euer, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and at his need to furniſh him both with men and money; offering moreouer to make him a great Commander in his armie in Hungarie, and the Baſſa of Temeſwar as his friend to be at all times readie with fiftie thouſand horſe and foot (as need ſhould be) to aſſiſt him againſt the C Emperour, reſeruing vnto himſelfe whatſoeuer hee ſhould more win for him: for all which bountie and kindneſſe, requiring only to haue him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the ſame vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners: yet ſtill proteſting neuer to ſtart, but to ſtand faſt for the Chriſtian Emperour. Notwithſtanding as a man deſirous to better his eſtate, he tooke hereupon occaſion to requeſt of the Emperour the countrie of Tranſyluania, by him ſo lately taken in, vnto him and his ſonne in inheritiance for euer, with ſuch frontier townes as in former time belonged vnto Tranſyluania: and that whatſoeuer he ſhould win from the Turkes, might be his and his ſonnes: He alſo requeſted, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperiall Maieſty vnto Sigiſmund D the late Prince, might now be beſtowed vpon himſelfe; & for his ſeruice done, to be furniſhed with money for the payment of his ſouldiers: And that the Emperor with the other Princes of the Empire ſhould aſſure him, That if he were taken by the Turk, they ſhould ranſome him: but in caſe he were by the great power of the Turke driuen out of thoſe countries, then by the Emperours appointment to haue ſome conuenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper Hungarie to liue in, with the yerely penſion of an hundred thouſand dollars. All which his requeſts if it would pleaſe him to grant, he promiſed this yere to do ſo much againſt the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeres bin don before: with vant, that if he had had the imploiment of the money which was ſpent in the time of this war, he would not haue doubted but to haue brought all the countries from the Euxine (or Blacke ſea) to Buda, Alba Regalis, and Solnock, vnder the Emperors obeiſance. A large promiſe indeed, but hardly to haue bin performed by a far greater Prince than he.

Thus whileſt things ſtood in diſcourſe after the Cardinals death, Sigiſmund the late Prince in the meane time ſupported by the Polonians, with the aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was ready to haue inuaded Tranſyluania: yea the Tartars (as the forerunners of his greater power) were already entred the Countrie, and had out of the frontiers therof carried away ſome bootie. Wherefore the Vayuod vnderſtanding, in great haſt aſſembled his forces out of all places, which in ſhort time was growne to ſome good head, the countrie people together with the free Haiducks (an aduenturous and reſolute kind of ſouldiers) in great number daily reſorting vnto him. So being now eight thouſand ſtrong, & moſt of them braue and luſtie men, he with them and 20 pieces of artillerie remoued to Cronſtat the foure and twentieth day of Aprill, ſending part of his armie (which euery day more and more encreaſed) before him to Neſſen; where all his forces being aſſembled to the number of almoſt fifty thouſand horſe and foot, he with great celeritie paſſed the rough and high mountaines into Moldauia without reſiſtance, but yet not without ſome trouble, his ſouldiers by the way beeing glad ſometimes to eat the leaues of trees, the enemie hauing of purpoſe before carried away Sigiſmund and the Moldauian ouerthrown by Michael the Vayuod.

Moldauia ſubdued by Michael.

whatſoeuer hee could that might haue yeelded him reliefe. Of whoſe ſpeedie comming and G great ſtrength, Sigiſmund and Ieremias the Vayuod of Moldauia hearing, and vpon the reaſonable eſtimat of their own forces finding themſelues too weake to incounter him, retired themſelues out of Moldauia into the frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater ſtrength, & ſo to meet him: for as yet Ieremias the Vayuod had not receiued from the Turke ſuch forces as were vnto him promiſed, and as he ſtill expected. Michael the Vayuod in the meane time (his enemies thus fled) with fire and ſword entering into Moldauia, tooke in the greateſt part thereof, the feareful country people ſtill yeelding vnto him as he went: and the rather, for that Ieremias their Vayuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributarie vnto the Turke) had laid vpon them a moſt grieuous impoſition, as vpon euery man a duckat a month, for which they exceedingly H hated him. But here in Moldauia, Michael the Vayuod (hauing ſtill in his companie on of the Emperours commiſſioners in Tranſyluania, moſt rruſtie ſeruants, who might faithfully report vnto them the whole manner of his proceedings) after the departure of Sigiſmund and Ieremias his enemies, ſtaied not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the caſtle Othune neere vnto the riuer Neſter, being thirtie thouſand ſtrong; Polonians, Moldauians, Turks, and Tartars: with whom he ioyned a moſt fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage but greater obſtinacie on both ſides maintained vntill the euening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian preuailing, his enemies at laſt betooke themſelues to flight, of whom were there ſlaine eight thouſand, beſide many others of them drowned in the riuer Neſter: where of the Valachians were loſt two I thouſand onely. Concerning Sigiſmund and Ieremias, diuers reports were after this ouerthrow giuen out; ſome ſaying that they were ſlain, and ſome, that they were in flying, drowned: howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight eſcaped, to the greater trouble of themſelues, as of their afflicted countries alſo. Michael after this ſo notable a victorie, taking in the reſt of Moldauia, cauſed the people to ſweare their obedience vnto the Emperor, himſelfe, and his ſon, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they tooke it) wronged therein; but eſpecially of the great Chancellor, an old enemy vnto the houſe of Auſtria. Wherof enſued greater troubles in thoſe frontier countries than before, to the further effuſion of more Chriſtian bloud, much better to haue been imploied againſt the fatall enemy, in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale.
Yet thus the three warlike and frontier countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, & Moldauia, K the ſureſt bulwarkes of that ſide of Chriſtendome, and moſt expoſed vnto the furie of the common enemy, were now once again vnited vnder the obeiſance of the Emperor, to the great benefit (no doubr) of the Chriſtian common-weale, and hurt of the Turks, if they might haue ſo continued, as God wot they did not long.

Now the Vayuod notwithſtanding this ſo great a victory, well conſidering that he of himſelfe could hardly keep this new gained prouince of Moldauia againſt the power of the Turke, (pretending that to him it belonged as his own to giue to whom he pleaſed:) as alſo againſt the Polonians (not more deſirous to reſtore Ieremias againe into Moldauia, than the Prince Sigiſmund into Tranſyluania) without the helpe of ſome other more mightie Prince whome hee might reſt vpon; by his Embaſſadors (ſent for that purpoſe) offered the ſoueraigntie of al thoſe L three countries vnto the Emperor, with condition, that he ſhould appoint him perpetuall Gouernor of the ſame vnder him. The Emperour alſo vnderſtood, how that Mahomet the great Turke had not long before againe ſent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commanding him without delay to reſtore the countrie of Tranſyluania vnto the Prince Sigiſmund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of Polonia now before reconciled) threatning otherwiſe with fire and ſword to deſtroy Valachia, and by force of armes to depriue him both of Tranſyluania and his life together. Wherefore the Emperour doubting leſt the Vayuod either for feare, or for the better aſſuring of his owne eſtate, ſhould to his preiudice fall to ſome agreement with the Turke, yeelded to all that his Embaſſadors had of him requeſted, with condition, that he ſhould be bound as need ſhould require to ſerue with his people againſt the Turke; and that in Tranſyluania neere vnto his owne perſon ſhould be alwaies reſident one of the Emperors counſellors, as Superintendent ouer the whole countrey. Wherewith the Vayuod beeing contented, the Emperour ſent thither Doctor Petzen with ſix thouſand ſouldiers, and a great ſumme of money to pay the Vayuods ſouldiers, as he had before requeſted; and ſo to take of them an oath, That they ſhould from thenceforth become his Majeſties faithfull ſeruants. Which Superintendent ſo by the Emperor ſent, the Vayuod receiued with great honor, as vnto him of all others moſt welcome. Neuertheleſſe being againe returned into Tranſyluania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppreſſe the people of the country, and in ſome ſort to tyranniſe ouer them; vſing great ſeueritie againſt diuers of the nobility alſo, eſpecially ſuch as he knew to haue taken part before with the Cardinal, or now of late with Sigiſmund his couſin, or any way to haue fauored his quarel. All which he did without the conſent or good liking of Petzen, contrary to his promiſe made, No more to imbrue his hands in the bloud of the nobilitie of Tranſiluania, without the knowledge or conſent of his Imperial Majeſtie or the Superintendent by him appointed: which for all that, if he had not done, he could not poſſibly haue kept them (diſdaining to be gouerned by him) vnder his obeiſance. Neuertheles the Tranſyluanians taking it in euill part to be ſo oppreſſed, and the nobility almoſt extinguiſhed, yea and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by general conſent as if it had bin but one man, riſe all vp in armes againſt him: inſomuch that he finding himſelfe with his Valachians and other his fauourits too weake for them, retired with all ſuch as would follow him, into the mountains; and from thence ſent preſently for aid vnto the lord George Baſta (a worthy captaine, and then the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungary) for the ſubduing of theſe rebellious people, and the reducing of them to their former obedience. Who by letters from Matthias the Archduke, at the inſtance of the Vayuod commanded ſo to do, with about 6000 horſe and foot and 8 field pieces remoued from Caſſouia in the vpper Hungarie the 4 of September. Where by the way came vnto him Embaſſadors alſo from the people of Tranſyluania now vp in armes, and confederat alſo againſt the Vayuod: who in like manner alſo requeſted his aid, pretending themſelues to be the Emperors moſt loyal ſubjects, but not vnder the gouernment of ſuch a tyrant as was the Vayuod: alledging and exaggerating many his moſt cruel actions, and cleerely proteſting, That for the preſent want of a good gouernour, they were enforced for the ſafegard of their liues to band themſelues together: which if haply it might be in any thing preiudicial vnto the Emperours claime and intereſt, which he with ſo great toile and coſt had procured in that prouince, it was againſt their wills, as enforced by neceſſitie to do that they did in defence of themſelues. Which Embaſſadors ſo ſent from the people, Baſta with all ſpeed diſpatched away backe againe, comforting them without farther ſtir to expect his arriual in Tranſyluania; yet couenanting withall, That they ſhould before conceiue into writing the oath of their fidelity and allegeance vnto his Imperial Majeſtie. Now might many and important conſiderations trouble the mind of Baſta in ſo doubtfull a caſe. To giue aid vnto the Vayuod againſt the people, was the expreſſe order from Matthias the Archduke the Emperors lieutenant General: but to aid the people confederat againſt him, as they had requeſted, ſeemed now both more profitable and honeſt, eſpecially hauing moſt certaine tokens of the ſmall and doubtfull faith of the Vayuod; who only by diſputation intereſſed in that prouince, was not ſo carefull of another mans; neither ſeeming to haue regard of Petzen, or of his owne word giuen for not further imbruing his hands in the bloud of the Nobility of Tranſyluania, without the Emperours knowledge and leaue: vpon which promiſe was likewiſe grounded the Archdukes order for giuing of him aid: ſo that ſuch breach of his faith, & contempt of Petzen, had haſtned the conſpiracy of the people againſt him, deſpairing of all other health than that which by force of arms they could procure vnto themſelues. To ſtand doubtfull himſelfe, or to hold others in ſuſpence, vntil that by currors in this new caſe he might receiue new inſtructions from the Emperor or the Archduke, had in it too much danger, as giuing leiſure to each party to make ſides, & to increaſe the ſlander of the laſt yeare, That he might ſo eaſily (and eſpecially from the Valachian) haue aſſured that prouince to his Majeſtie, had he not bin an heartleſſe man of no reſolution, euen ſuch an one as durſt not looke vpon a cat (as ſome had ſaid) all which might not a little pricke an honorable mind. To take part with the people confederat againſt the Vayuod, if it ſhould not happily fall out at the firſt encounter, might betwixt the two contendants giue an entrance vnto the third, either the Turke or the Polonian in the fauour of Bathor: but if it ſhould ſort to the quite contrarie, and ſo himſelfe to loſe the day, then he ſaw himſelfe void of all defence againſt the malicious, eſpecially in that the world commonly meaſureth the wiſedome vſed in any action, according to the ſucceſſe thereof, than which nothing can be more vnreaſonable, but aboue all others, Michael tiranniſeth in Tranſyluania.

The Tranſyluanians rebell.

in matters of war. In this ſo troubled a tempeſt of contrarie winds, of power to haue driuen G a right good mariner out of his courſe, Baſta laid hand vpon the helme of good meaning, and ſpread the ſailes of ſuch diſcretion, as taught him in matters of war to be lawful for a General to depart euen from the inſtructions of his Prince, not concerning the end, but the meanes leading to that end; eſpecially when the preſent occaſion ſo requireth, which the Prince could not with reaſon before comprehend, as depending of the moſt mightie fortune of war, which ſuffereth not ſo much delay as to expect counſell from far. So in this ambiguitie Baſta reſolued to joyn himſelfe vnto the confederats, moſt in his judgment concerning his Imperial Majeſty, as being the vttermoſt ſcope of his ſo great coſt & charge, to keep the country of Traſyluania at his deuotion, which conſiſted in the people, and not in the woods or mountaines: the matter H being not great by what meanes ſoeuer it were done, ſo that it were honorable and honeſt.

Baſta taketh part with the Tranſyluanians againſt the Vayuod in whoſe aid he was ſent.

Vpon this deſire Baſta ſet forward, and the 14 day arriued at Torda, and there joined himſelfe vnto the confederats, to the great wonder of the Vayuod, in whoſe helpe he was ſent: where repoſing himſelfe one day, conſulting and conſidering of their forces, about 12000 ſtrong, with foure field pieces, beſides eight of his owne, with the ſix thouſand ſouldiers hee brought with him, in all about eighteene thouſand, he determined not to giue leiſure vnto the Vayuod to call vnto him farther helpe, hauing now with him about twentie thouſand foot and twelue thouſand horſe, with ſeuen and twenty field pieces: amongſt whom were diuers of the Siculi, in hope of their antient libertie, men of good account and ſort, with a mixture of the Coſſackes, Valachians, Raſcians, and Seruians, people of prey ſeruing only to ſpoile: whome Baſta knew to be far inferiour in courage to his twelue thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe; I not onely for the valour of his owne men accuſtomed vnto the frontier ſeruice, but alſo for the confederates, who engaged with their goods, liues, and honour, and deſirous to be reuenged of the Vayuod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore he ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two dayes march came within ſight of the Vayuod: who hauing ſent out certaine great troups of horſemen to take view of the enemie, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet fire on Miriſlo a village faſt by, out of which they had before drawne certaine ſmall field pieces into the campe.

Miriſlo is a village two leagues on this ſide of Alba-Iulia, directly vpon the high-way ſtretching from the ſide of Maracz a nauigable riuer, vnto the foot of an hil; alongſt which the riuer running, ſomtimes neerer, and ſomtimes farther off, together with the riſing of the hill, maketh K an vnequal liſt of ground, in ſome places half a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut vp as it were into a narrow throat, as in the ſelfe ſame place where the aforeſaid village ſtandeth, & where the Vayuod lay incamped in a place of great aduantage, behind a great trench drawn from the riuer, croſſe that little ſpace of ground betwixt the mountaine and the riuer. On this ſide, which from Miriſlo the farther a man goeth the farther the plaine enlargeth, Baſta encamping cloſe vnto the village, oppoſed againſt the comming of the enemy 3 great corps du gard, two of them Hungarians, towards the hill fauored with a Church, and the third toward the riuer, of the Almaine footmen, vnder the charge of Countie Tomaſo Caurioli of Breſcia, Sergeant Major of the field, with all the artillery: who as in a place neere and very open vnto the enemy, there intrenched himſelf, ſtil approching neerer and neerer both on the one ſide and the other. L Towards the euening of the ſelfeſame 17 day came to Baſta one Peter Armenio with Letters from the Vayuod, containing, That hauing vnderſtood of his arriual in the campe of the Conſpirators, he now further deſired to know whether it were by the conſent and commandment of the Emperor or not: and how it came to paſſe that he would ſo doe, conſidering the diuers chances of war, the ſword hanging as it were euen ouer his head if he ſhould chance to loſe the battell? Whereunto Baſta anſwered, That the morrow following he would ſhew him the authoritie he had from the Emperour (alluding to the Imperial Standard he carried with him:) and that as concerning the fortune and danger to enſue, he referred that wholly vnto the will and pleaſure of the Almightie, the juſt Iudge of all controuerſies. But in the meane time he exhorted him to leaue that Prouince he had ſo euill gouerned, vnto his Imperial Majeſtie, as he M was in duty bound; promiſing him free paſſage into Valachia, and giuing him time to conſider thereupon vntill 8 a clocke the next morning, after which time it ſhould be free for euery man to doe for himſelfe what he could. Which anſwer the Vayuod hauing read, inflamed with diſdaine, with many proud words full of threats and diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently cauſed by the ſound of the drum and trumpet the battell to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide, Baſta after he had aſſured his camp, hauing not onely ſent, but gone himſelfe to haue the counſel of his own eies, for his better vnderſtanding how the enemy lay; and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the trench before the front, & in part along the ſide of the enemies camp, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the plain betwixt the enemies camp and the village was ſubiect; thought it beſt to remoue, & to make a ſhort retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile, according to the commodiouſnes of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an enemy, and not altogether ſo well acquainted with martiall ſtratagems, to gain a notable victory. This his purpoſe propounded in counſel, was greatly diſliked of the captains of the confederates: vnto whome it ſeemed more ſafety to aſſault the Vayuod, yet lying in his ſtrength, than to retire before the face of an enemy ſo ſtrong & aduenturous: for that ſuch a retreat according to the manner of that country, would be deemed no other than a plain flight: and to breake his order & ariſe, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own people, and to encourage his enemies. But Baſta the better to perſuade them, promiſed therein to ſhew to them a more cunning kind of fight than was yet vnto them knowne; & declared the aſſurance that he in his owne perſon, with the Almains in the rereward would giue them in that retreat, in ſuch ſort, as that they ſhould not loſe ſo much as a man, much leſſe they needed to feare to fal into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a ſpace, his purpoſe being only to giue the plain vnto the enemy, wherinto ſhew himſelfe into the open field. So the retreat being agreed vpon, the morning following being the 28 of September, the three Corps du guard (before ſpoken of) were betimes called backe, and the baggage ſent away: after which followed the Tranſyluanians and Hungarians, the Almaines in the rereward encloſing the great ordnance.

The battell of Miriſlo betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta the emperors lieutenant.

The Vayuod aware of their departure, ſent forthwith a great troup of horſemen, eſpecially of the Coſſackes, to take view of them, and to skirmiſh with them; which were ſo far kept off by a company of musketiers in the rereward, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to do any harme, although that all the way they went they were by them ſtil charged, to the great contentment of Baſta, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his deſignes as might bring them all to their wiſhed effect. But when hee ſaw the great artillerie vpon the carriages to come out of the village, a certain ſigne that the enemy ſet forward with al his forces, he marched faire & ſoftly to giue him hope to ouertake him: and ſo retired as far as he thought good from the village, hauing before thought of a conuenient place wherin his people might with room enough vpon aduantage ſtay: when as about halfe a mile from him, and as far from the village, he might ſee the enemy march with his people in order of battell; then began he to march towards him alſo: & perceiuing the enemy to come on in one only thick front, by reaſon of the ſtraitnes of the place, hauing on the right hand towards the riuer placed as it were all his horſmen, & towards the mountaine his footmen alone, and 500 foot placed aloft without any artillerie, as it ſeemed he would haue done, hauing planted ſome below at the foot of the hill in the way, and in the midſt, euen before the front of the battell, where the horſemen came after the footmen; he alſo placed his ſquadron in one front onely, to the intent not to be incloſed by the enemie on the flanke of his army. The body of his main battell conſiſted of one great ſquadron of about 3000 Almaine footmen, flanked on each ſide with 150 Rutters of Sileſia: before the ſquadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe wing of three hundred musketiers: in the right wing towards the hill he placed a companie of launces, with two ſquadrons of the country footmen: and in the left wing toward the riuer one ſquadron of Tranſyluanian footmen, & two of launces, for that the enemie was at that time very ſtrong in horſemen: the Coſſacks, archers, and harquebuſiers he placed in the rereward: of his great artillerie he would make no vſe, for that hauing not much, he would not ſtand vpon the defence thereof, but deſired rather with all ſpeed to come to the ſword with the enemy, vnacquainted with ſuch cloſe fight, foot to foot; and well the leſſe fit, by reaſon of their light armor. And therfore he thought it beſt firſt to ſet forward his ſquadron of Almaines to giue the charge, bending towards the right hand, amongſt the thickeſt of the footmen towards the artillerie at the foot of the hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the enemies infanterie. And doubting in the performing hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great ſquadron of about 3000 launces, which ſeemed to ſtand vpon that wing to giue the firſt charge, he gaue order vnto Rodoniz his Lieutenant, and Colonell of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left wing, that he ſhould at a certaine G ſigne giuen, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great ſquadron. So his people beeing ſet in order, and the manner of proceeding ſet downe, he putting on his helmet, with cheerful countenance ſaid, That at that time he truſted he ſhould ſhew vnto the Vayuod, that his Trunchion could doe more than his ſcimitar: And himſelſe ſetting forward betwixt the ſquadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketiers, about two houres after noone, marched faire and ſoftly towards the enemy: who without moouing expected the diſcharging of their artillerie; whereunto the neerer that the enemie came vnto it, the leſſe harme it did him, by ſhooting either ouer or ſhort in the field, which eaſily aſcended. The wing of musketiers went directly to giue a charge vnto the artillerie; and the ſquadron toward H the foot of the hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be enforced to ſpend their firſt vollies, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, preſently came in, all afront, iuſt vpon the ſigne giuen; and ſo with his Almaine footmen and the Rutters on the right hand, encloſed and compaſſed in behinde the greateſt part of the enemies footmen. At which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo couragiouſly charged vpon the three thouſand launces, that better could not haue beene deſired of any band of moſt old and expert ſouldiers. The lances retiring without any hurt, and the firſt volley diſcharged, forced the infanterie, and ſo diſordered the reſt. Whereupon the wings charging, there enſued preſently a great ſlaughter and ouerthrow, onely fortie of Baſta his men being ſlaine, and as many hurt; where of the enemies were loſt in the battell ten thouſand: and greater had the I ſlaughter been, if the village and approch of the night had not couered many of them that fled, and ſtaied the purſuit of the victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great victorie that Scipio Aſiaticus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlaine of the Romans but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings ſtood for a time doubtfull) there being loſt of the enemies aboue fiftie thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peaſants of the countrey reported) twentie thouſand ſlaine in this battell. By this victorie Baſta recouered many enſignes and much armour, before ſent by the Emperour vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And preſently after the ouerthrow, there were many troupes of horſemen ſent out euerie way with proclamation, to ſpare the liues of ſuch of the Siculi as ſhould lay downe their armes: of whom K many were ſent priſoners vnto diuers places, eſpecially to Fogaras, a ſtrong Towne towards Valachia. As for the Vayuod himſelfe, hee with certaine Coſſackes eſcaped by flight.

Michael the Vayuod ouerthrowne.

The morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the Countie Caurioli, to enforme the emperour of all the particularities of the ſucceſſe of that expedition: who ſeemed to bee therewith pleaſed, yet neither gaue reward vnto the Countie, neither commended Baſta in that hee had done (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue therof) although he had in writing before approued his reſolution and motion made in fauour of the Confederats. Staying that day in that quarter, Baſta gaue order vnto the Chiaki, to ſend out a thouſand horſemen to purſue the flying Vayuod: who in ſtead of ſo doing, ioyning themſelues with other their conſorts, ſetled L themſelues to ranſacke Alba-Iulia, vnder the colour, that there was the Vayuods wealth and ſubſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither merchant nor citiſen: which worthily ſeemed vnto Baſta a great wrong, for to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guiltie to eſcape free. And albeit that he made what haſte he might thitherwards with all his camp, and ſo ſtayed one day not farre from thence, to haue giuen ſome redreſſe vnto the ſpoyle that had happened; yet was all that his labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater ſort and chiefeſt amongſt them had their handes therein, with whome hee thought it more wiſedome as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any tearmes of ſeueritie, without hope of doing any good. So he reſolued in all haſte to march towards Fogaras (whither he heard ſay the Vayuod was come with new forces out of Valachia and Moldauia) and in ſixe dayes march M came to Cibinium, where he receiued certaine newes, That the great Chancellour of Polonia, and Sigiſmund (ſometime the Tranſyluanian Prince) were with a ſtrong armie vpon the Frontiers of Moldauia; hauing ſent before them Moyſes the Siculian, with about eight thouſand of the Siculi (his ſouldiers) to what purpoſe was eaſie to bee ſeene. Which

This Chiaki was the chiefe man and as it were the ring-leader of the Tranſyluaniãs into rebellion.

aduertiſement interrupted the courſe of Baſta his victorie; for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the enemie, and to leaue behinde him a doubt of ſo great importance: and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelfe of the aid of the countrey people, in caſe that Sigiſmund their old Prince were once ſeene in Tranſyluania. Wherefore he thought good to ſtay where he was, to prouide for all euents as need ſhould be; and ſo reſolued to ſend the Chiaki, and one Ladiſlaus Pitbi, to parley with Moſes, who made a ſhew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats. In the meane time came two meſſengers from the Vayuod, offering in his name, that he ſhould do whatſoeuer were in the behalfe of the Emperor to be impoſed vpon him. Vnto whom theſe conditions were by Baſta and the reſt of the Councell propounded; Firſt, That he ſhould for euer reſigne all the claime he had or might haue into the country of Tranſyluania: then, That he altogether with his armie, ſhould giue his oath of fidelitie vnto his Imperial Majeſtie: alſo, That hee ſhould forthwith through Valachia go with his army vnto the frontiers of Moldauia, to ſtay the Polonians from farther entrance: and moreouer, to giue his wife and little ſon in hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Techelli, to receiue the oath and promiſed hoſtages: vnto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the Biſhops caſtle in Alba-Iulia, the Vayuod hauing before requeſted, That they might be ſo kept in Tranſyluania: although Baſta thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper Hungarie. This agreement being made, Baſta kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found alreadie poſſeſſed by the Chiaki, and ſo from thence to Corona. After which, the Vayuod diſtruſting of the articles agreed vpon, went directly into Valachia, but not at all into Moldauia; not ſo much diſcomfited with the forces of the Polonians whom he went againſt (not doubting to giue them a great ouerthrow) as for the diſtruſt he had of Moſes the Siculian, who in the battel might ſhew himſelfe his enemie behinde him. Now whether it were for the diſtruſt he had in his owne followers, or only for feare of treaſon by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with ſo ſmall forces were come to fight, without ſome greater ſecret deceit; he not knowing whom to truſt or to feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the ſtrength of the mountaines, without any great loſſe of his people, hauing left his baggage behinde him, which was aſſailed and taken by the Haiducks and ſuch other ſharkers enured to prey, and alwaies readie in like occaſion, helpe to ſpoile and chaſe them that are alreadie running: although that afterwards in diuers ſkirmiſhes with the Turks (who to cauſe him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polonians, had preſumptuouſly ſcoured vp and downe the country) he loſt many. In fine, giuing Moldauia loſt, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold only Valachia his old gouernment. Euen he which but a little before commanded aboue an hundred thouſand ſouldiers in field; he, which in deſpight of who ſaid nay, was able to command Valachia and Moldauia, and happily the other countries alſo neere vnto him, as hauing receiued the command of Tranſyluania as gouernor for the Emperour; he that made Conſtantinople to tremble, and found no Empire equall to his deſignes. But it fareth oftentimes with the Great, as with birds of prey, who greedily ſeeking to prey vpon others, become themſelues a prey vnto other greater than themſelues: for they neuer contented, and attributing onely vnto their owne valour and wiſedome, their owne proſperous proceedings, are the true ſhewers of the vnſtable wheele of fortune: or what ſay I of Fortune? being rather the verie children of Follie. So commonly falleth it out with Princes (eſpecially the new) which in the garboiles of war betwixt their mightie neighbours, not gouerned by their owne wiſedome, reſt themſelues onely vpon the aduice of their Counſellours, are by them led they wote not whither, for the greateſt intereſt they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the leaſt in-ſight into politicall gouernment, hee might well haue vnderſtood, that amongſt ſo many mightie Princes he could not much grow or yet well root himſelfe, without the aſſured ſtay of ſome one or other of them. He ſhould alſo haue knowne within what compaſſe a new prince ought to haue vſed ſeueritie and rigour; and that he ought to obſtaine from all offence in good or otherwiſe, which might any way procure vnto him the diſpleaſure or hatred of his ſubjects. Whereas his Counſellours not ſo much reſpecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to perſuade him ſo by good meanes to plant himſelfe ſure in Tranſyluania; but ſo both caſt him headlong from his high eſtate, and at the ſame time furthered the loſſe of Caniſia, a matter of important conſequence.

A reconciliation made betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta.

Michael for feare of being betrayed vnto the Polonians, takes his flight into the mountaines.

Now lay Baſſa encamped in the field in Tranſyluania, when a meſſenger came vnto him from the great Chancellour of Polonia, to declare vnto him, That it was not his purpoſe to G trouble Tranſyluania, hauing no ſuch order from the King: albeit that hee would aduiſe the Tranſyluanians, if they wiſhed to liue in quiet, to make choice of a Prince of their owne nation, and ſuch an one as the Turke ſhould well like of, whereas otherwiſe they ſhould but ſeeke their owne deſtruction, together with their neighbors. Which his counſell was well marked of them all, albeit it was thought by many of the wiſer ſort, not ſo much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Tranſyluanians, as of an old grudge and inueterate hatred he had alwayes borne againſt the houſe of Auſtria; as alſo, that he euen then countenanced the Prince Sigiſmund with his armie to no other end, but by him to raiſe vp new ſtirs in that Prouince, and ſo to draw it from the Emperors obeiſance, although thereby it became againe tributarie vnto the Turke, who in all theſe matters had a great hand. Yea ſome ſticked not to ſay, H That he couertly aimed at that Principalitie for his ſonne, howſoeuer he masked the ſame vnder the ſhew of Sigiſmund the late Prince. But vnto him anſwer was giuen by the Tranſyluanians, (with thanks for his good will) That in all their conſultations they would haue a principal regard of their owne welfare, together with the common. Which anſwer he hauing receiued, forthwith placed one Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldauian) Vayuod of Valachia in ſtead of Michael by him driuen out, and ſo leauing a conuenient number of ſouldiers with him, returned himſelfe towards Polonia. Vnto which election ſo made by the Polonians the Turks craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the lyons; wiſely for a time comporting the iniurie: and the old Chancellor as crafty as they, I hauing a ſecret purpoſe by occaſion of theſe preſent troubles, to prefer his ſonne at length vnto the principalitie of Tranſyluania, and thereunto alſo to ioine the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, had therein of purpoſe placed the aforeſaid Simon, a man of no valor, and of a ſmall apprehenſion, whom he might againe at his pleaſure diſplace, and ioine thoſe prouinces vnto his new purchaſe: which he could not ſo well do if he ſhould haue there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So worke the heads of the Great, and ſo trauell the braines of the ambitious aſpiring.

The Chancellor placeth a new Vayuod in Valachia in ſtead of Michael, by him driuen out Falſe rumours raiſed to haue terrified Baſta.

Baſta vnderſtanding of the retyring of the Polonians, entered into conſultation with the Chiaki and other the principal men of that Prouince (which lodged with the armie in the countrey villages thereabout) for calling together the States and people, to make choice of K ſome ſuch men as they thought meeteſt to be ſent vnto the Emperor, to know his pleaſure for the gouernment of that Prouince. But now in the meane time, whileſt there was no ſuſpition of the forreine enemie, began to worke certaine malecontents, which thinking with greater libertie to liue vnder a weake Prince, than vnder one of greater power; with one voice cryed out, That Sigiſmund with a great power was entred into the confines of Tranſyluania, one whiles towards Valachia, another while by the way of Moldauia; and that the ſtrength of the countrey and others there by ſtill reſorted vnto him: with other ſuch like inuentions, of purpoſe deuiſed to haue made Baſta ſuddenly departed, or at leaſtwiſe to haue troubled the Dyet or aſſemblie called, & the conſultation alſo. But he wel aduiſed of their purpoſe, moued not out of his quarter, but there lay verie priuatly, to declare thereby the great confidence he L had in the thankfulneſſe of the nobilitie of that country, as by him deliuered from the oppreſſion of the Vayuod: as alſo to make them to vnderſtand, That the gouernment to be appointed was not to be ſetled in the ſole power of a tyrant, but in the fidelitie of the ſubjects, protected vnder a moſt gentle, royal, and moſt fatherlike gouernment, not ambitiouſly ſought after, but voluntarily of themſelues offered, & for the common good, by the Emperor accepted. Beſide that, he knew right wel, how that Caſtaldo (in like caſe before in the yere 1551, ſent into Tranſyluania with 8000 Almaines) left behinde him his armie, and without any precedent courteſie went priuatly to Alba-Iulia, where Queene Iſabel had for her defence aſſembled a Dyet of all the States, and there by wel handling of the matter, got to Ferdinand the Emperor that kingdome, which he could not by the feare of his forces haue gained: for which doing, Writers M attribute vnto him the name of great wiſedome, notwithſtanding that the yeare following he was forced to abandon his conqueſt, but yet not through any default in himſelfe.

But it is truly ſaid, That men pleaſured, according to the occaſion change their manners, as doth the camelion his color according to the place: nothing being by nature ſo ſhort, nothing of

A of leſſe life than the remembrance of a benefit with the vnthankfull, which the greater it is, the more it is repaied with vngratitude; either by making it to haue been of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of courteſie, but from ſome other more priuat & proper conſiderations of the giuer. The diet aforeſaid being aſſembled, diuers broils were there raiſed by the malecontents, as vſually it commeth to paſſe where the people haue to do with the gouernment; apt to be moued with euery rumour, alwaies ready to change their opinion as ſtraight glutted therewith, headſtrong, faithleſſe, all in words to no end: ſome of them in that aſſemblie cryed out, that the Almains might be paid, diſcharged, and thanked for the pains they had taken for them as their neighbors, with offring to do them the like pleaſure as their occaſions ſhould require: B otherwiſe cried to haue them put all to the ſword, ſo much they were deuoid of reaſon: others cried out as faſt, that they were not by any means to endure the gouernment of Maximilian the Archduke, but by ſome nominated vnto them would needs haue a Prince of their own countrey, and ſuch an one as the great Turke ſhould well like of, as the Chancellour had perſuaded them. Baſta for all that not diſmaid with ſo vnexpected an encounter (albeit that he began to ſuſpect that he had loſt all his labor, if he were not in ſhort time with greater forces relieued) at ſuch time as the Chiaki with other the chiefe men amongſt the people, came as their maner was euery other day to viſit him: with couragious ſpeech and vnappalled countenance told them plainely, That he well perceiued their drift and purpoſe; and yet doubted not either of their oath of obedience giuen vnto his Imperiall Maieſtie, either of the freſh remembrance of C the great benefit they had from him ſo lately receiued; & in caſe it might happen them little to eſteeme of thoſe things (greater than which could not happen amongſt men) that yet they ſhould well know, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully reſolued not to ſtir one foot thence with his forces, but rather to loſe his life, which hee would for all that ſell as deare as he could. Whereunto anſwer was giuen with much courteous ſpeech, That he ſhould not giue eare vnto any the ſpeeches of the light vulgar people; but to content himſelfe that the nobility, in whoſe hands the chiefe power of that prouince was, had not don any thing not beſeeming themſelues. So after much diſpute, were appointed 3 perſons according to the three eſtates (the Nobility, the Commons, & the State in general) to go vnto the Emperor, to requeſt of him Maximilian the Archduke for their Gouernor: with ſpeciall requeſt alſo, that it would D pleaſe him not to ouercharge with forrein ſouldiers that Prouince already ſore impoueriſhed; eſpecially hauing in it ſelfe people ſufficient for the defence thereof, and more nimble to encounter with the Turks, than the heauy & ſlow Almains, and they alſo of double charge. Theſe difficulties with much ado thus appeaſed by ſuch as ſtood faſt for the Emperor, Baſta thought it not good again to cal any ſuch aſſembly, hoping that time and the Emperors great wiſdome, would for all theſe matters find conuenient remedy. Yet ſaw he plainly, the mind of the people was to reſolue to remaine for euer free, if they ſhould haue come to a ſecond conſultation; and in them a princely deſire to command rather than to be commanded: yea in that ſelfeſame Diet the Chiaki was declared Gouernour on the behalfe of the people, with authoritie in many things of himſelfe to determine without calling together of any aſſembly of the reſt of the E States: which they ſaid they did only vntill they were by his Imperiall Maieſty prouided of a Gouernour. Neuertheleſſe Baſta wel perceiued more than a Tribunitial power to be now ioyned by the people vnto the Emperours Commiſſioners, knowing that this Chiaki was in great hope to haue bin proclaimed Prince of the confederats, in caſe they had not bin preſently relieued againſt the Vayuod: & hauing in him yet noted ſtil his great ambitiō, for that marching from Torda toward the Vayuod, he cauſed to be carried before him a ſpeare with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers vpon a lance, in token of his chiefe command, albeit that afterwards at the complaint of Baſta, pretending therin a wrong to be done vnto his regiment marching vnder the Imperiall ſtandard, he tooke it down: neither was he then a little ſuſpected to haue ſuffered his ſouldiers to haue ſacked Alba-Iulia, as alſo to haue ſurpriſed Fogaras, and to haue vſed diuers other means all tending vnto popularitie and ambitious aſpiring: wherein he deemed it yet better to diſſemble than to proceed farther, and then to do it indeed when hee had power ſufficient.

The ſtout ſpeech of Baſta, vnto the Chiaki and the reſt of the nobilitie of Tranſyluania.

The next day following came all the Counſel of that prouince, with the Deputies (appointed to haue gone vnto the Emperor) & the people vnto the houſe of Baſta, requeſting him (although ſuch their manner of comming might ſeeme to exceed the bounds of requeſt) that he would ſend his Germanes out of the countrey, and ſo after ſo many troubles to giue it leaue a little to breath : as for himſelfe, that he might ſtay at Alba-Iulia, vntil the men deputed to that G purpoſe might go vnto his Maieſty with their requeſts. Baſta not a little troubled with ſuch an Imperious requeſt, and now (but not before) perceiuing the occaſion of this great diſcontentment, ſaw himſelfe much deceiued in a moſt materiall point, and the ground of all this action, by truſting too much vnto his owne too ſmall forces, too weake for the defence of his owne perſon, much leſſe to keepe vnder ſo populous a Prouince, ſuch as before in the yeare 1552 vnder the leading of Caſtaldo, had of it ſelfe ſent out 70000 fighting men for the beſieging of Lippa, and now vpon the ſudden 12000 with a few noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed enemy; where they now held an armed conſultation with him, the nobilitie meeting together with their great retinues; and ſo much the greater, by how much the ſuſpition was the H more by them feared, for them to be enforced to reſolue vpon any thing contrary to their good liking : whereas he contenting himſelfe only with their oath without any other hoſtages, and ſo giuing aid vnto the confederats, had put himſelfe vpon their faith, together with all his people, into the midſt of Tranſyluania; a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to haue giuen him. Beſides that, of the 6000 men which he had brought with him into that countrie, three thouſand fiue hundred of Sileſia now brought to 2000, could not be perſuaded longer to ſtay without their pay before hand, the pay of their countrie beeing alreadie ſpent; and the reſt drawne out of the garriſons of the vpper Hungarie, or els there preſſed, were at a certaine time to returne. Yet neuertheleſſe hee attempted in ſome ſort to ſatisfie their requeſt, for not grieuing of the country, by requeſting of them to deliuer vnto him I ſome ſtrong place, whereinto he putting his men into garriſon, they might ſo lie without any further charge or trouble to the country, liuing vpon their own wages. Which when he could not obtaine, and withall conſidering, that if thoſe few of his people which yet remained could be contented to ſtay with him, the retaining of them might giue occaſion vnto the deſirous of new ſtirs vpon euery the leaſt diſorder of the ſouldiers, to alter the matter at their pleaſure (as had hapned vnto the eight thouſand Almaines of Caſtaldo, driuen ſometimes out of that countrey vnder the colour of ſome inſolencie by them committed, although others had been the chiefe doers thereof, namely about ſome twentie Polonians) he reſolued of all theſe things to giue notice to the Court, and ſo faire and ſoftly to march with his ſouldiers vnto the confines of that countrie, & to ſaue his eight pieces of artillerie with his other munition in Samos Viuar K caſtle, a ſtrong fortreſſe a good way within the confines, which together with the ſtrong caſtle of Kuiuar, Aga Leche an Albanoiſe and Generall of the Vayuods horſemen deliuered to Zakel Captaine of Zaccomar, one of his Maieſties Commiſſioners; who there prouided for the Gouernor Baſta his familiar fauorit : although that the Tranſyluanians had with great promiſes ſought to haue croſſed ſuch deliuerie of the aforeſaid Caſtles, and to haue had them in their owne power.

The diſtretion of the doer is not alwaies to bee deemed by the euent of the thing done.

Wherfore Baſta not deceiued, but by neceſſitie enforced, yeelded that he could not hold, and gaue that he could not ſell, making a vertue of neceſſitie; deceiued in the euent of the matter which he had propounded vnto himſelfe from the beginning, for the aſſurance of that country L to the Emperor, by an excuſable error, if it be true that ſome wiſe men ſay, nothing to be more vnreaſonable than by the euent of matters to iudge of their wiſdome by whom they were managed; which conſiſteth not in diuining before of the certainty of the euent, but in the reaſonable coniecture thereof, by the means leading therunto, than which nothing is more deceitful, as not depending from our own actions only, but from other mens alſo more groſſe and vnreaſonable : none knowing better how much the wiſedome of man deceiueth it ſelfe, than thoſe which are vnto themſelues true witneſſes of the euent of their owne conſultations. Neuertheleſſe the matter was afterward ſo well handled by Baſta, Petzen, & others the Emperors great fauorites in Tranſyluania, that in a Diet holden by the Tranſyluanians, he was with a conuenient guard againe by them receiued as the Emperors Lieutenant, vntill further order were by M him taken for the gouernement and aſſurance of that countrey : the Chiaki and his complices faintly conſenting thereunto, as not greatly pleaſed therewith. Neither had Baſta much cauſe to be proud of ſuch his gouernment, hauing therof no longer aſſurance than pleaſed that fickle people to affoord him; yet ſith no better could be had, he muſt take it as he might, deeming it better in ſome ſort for the preſent to hold it for the Emperor, than not at all: with which his

But whileſt things thus paſſed (as we haue ſaid) in Tranſyluania and Hungarie (the treatie for peace betwixt the Emperor and the Turke being vaniſhed into ſmoke;) Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks Generall in Hungarie, hauing all the laſt Winter made great preparation for the inuaſion of the Emperors territories, and the doing of ſome notable enterpriſe for the recouerie of his reputation ſomewhat impaired by the euill ſucceſſe of the laſt yeres wars; & euen in theſe his greateſt preparations of this yere, not a little troubled by the mutinie of the Ianizaries and Spahi for want of their pay at Conſtantinople, as alſo with the rebellion in Caramania: now at length in the latter end of Auguſt (by order from the Grand Seignior his great Lord and maſter) began to ſet forward with his armie from Belgrade, ſuppoſed to be aboue two hundred B thouſand men ſtrong. And comming to Babotſca, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Chriſtians in the nether Hungarie, ſat downe before it, and hauing planted his artillerie, furiouſly battered it, with purpoſe to haue the next day aſſaulted it: but the captaine of the caſtle conſidering the weakneſſe of his garriſon to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie, and that the wals to be alreadie ſore ſhaken with the fury of the great ordnance, came to a reaſonable compoſition with the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered vnto him the place. Which exploit done, and the caſtle to him ſurrendred, he marched from thence to Caniſia, a ſtrong town in the frontiers of Stiria, of moſt men before ſuppoſed a place impregnable; for that it was ſcituat in a very deep mariſh, and furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſouldiers, part Hungarians and part Almaines: after this ſtrong towne Ibrahim the great Baſſa eſpecially longed, ſo to free thoſe frontiers of the Turks C from the often incurſions that the garriſon ſouldiers of that place made therein; as alſo by the taking of that ſo ſtrong a fortreſſe from the Chriſtians, to open a more free and ſafe paſſage for the Turks into Auſtria, to the indangering of other places of the empire alſo farther off. Wherfore encamping his great armie on the ſide of the mariſh which compaſſed the Iſle round whereon the towne ſtood, he began with fagots and earth to fill vp the mariſh, ſo to paſſe ouer his armie; they in the town in the mean time not ceaſing with their thundring ſhot to diſturbe them, and to do them what harme they might: who for all that, proceeding in their worke, had brought it now almoſt cloſe vnto the Iſland, where whileſt they were about to haue landed, they were by the ſouldiers of the garriſon ſo encountered, that hauing loſt a number of their D men as well Ianizaries as others, with two of their beſt captains alſo, they were by plain valor enforced to retire. But preparing themſelues againſt the next day with a greater force to haue again returned vnto the aſſault of the Iſle, they ſaw the Imperiall armie now at their backs, and come ſo neere them, that with their artillerie they did them great harm; which put them in no ſmall feare, ſeeing themſelues incloſed betwixt the towne and the camp, and both out of the one and the other to receiue no ſmall hurt, as well with the ſmall ſhot as the great: beſides that out of the camp diuers whole bands ſometimes ſallied, diſcharging great vollies of ſhot euen into their trenches. In the Imperiall army were about two and forty thouſand horſe and foot, men of diuers nations, vnder the leading of duke Mercurie, now Generall of the Emperors forces in Hungarie; with whom were alſo the Lords Nadaſti, Eſdrin, Bacchian, and the Gouernour of Croatia, with diuers other famous captaines, come thither for the reliefe of Caniſia, a place of ſo great importance for the defence of that ſide of the country, and to helpe that it fell not E into the power of the barbarous enemie. But Ibrahim Baſſa vnderſtanding by his eſpials the ſmall number of the Chriſtians; and well knowing how much he was too ſtrong for them by reaſon of his great multitude, went out againſt them, & finding them as ready as himſelfe, ioyned battell with them, with great ſlaughter of men both on the one ſide and the other: which bloudy fight (the victory yet ſtanding doubtfull, but in all mens iudgement more inclining vnto the Chriſtians than to the Turks) was at length by the comming on of the night broken off.
At which time the Chriſtians retiring themſelues into their trenches, the Turkes ſtood all the night in the field with their weapons in their hands, as fearing to haue been again in the night by their enemies aſſailed. Meane while the Chriſtian captaines in the camp at variance among themſelues, and ſo not now to be commanded by Duke Mercurie their Generall; at ſuch time as the Turkes preſuming on their multitude dared them to battell the next day, could by no means be perſuaded to go out againſt them, or once to ſtirre out of their trenches. Inſomuch that the Generall of the Tartars thereupon taking courage, made an inrode into the Countrie thereby, and meeting with two hundred wagons laded with victuals going vnto the Chri-ſtian campe, ſlew the conuoy that guarded them, and ſo carried them quite away. Whereby ſuch want aroſe in the Chriſtian camp,that hauing not what to eat,and out of hope of any new ſupplie of reliefe in time to come,they were glad by night to diſlodge & retire;which could not ſo ſecretly be done, but that it was by the Turks perceiued, who preſently following after them in the taile of the armie,cut off about three thouſand of them,with certaine pieces of great ordnance, and moſt part of the baggage; the reſt of the armie in the meane time retiring farther off into places of more ſafety. From this victory the Turks returned again to the ſiege of Caniſia,where after a few daies,the garriſon ſouldiers now out of hope to be in good time relieued,ſuddenly fel into mutiny,refuſing any longer to defend the town now hardly laid vnto by the Turks;and the rather, for that diuers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the towne vnto the Baſſa,hauing(as it was thought)reuealed vnto him the whole eſtate of the beſieged: ſo that now there was no remedy but that the town muſt be deliuered vnto the enemy, although Paradiſer with ſome other of the captaines did what they might (as they ſaid afterwards) to haue perſuaded the contrary. Whereupon they came to parley with the Baſſa,and couenanting with him,that they might with bag & baggage depart,and with a ſafe conuoy be brought ouer the riuer Mur,promiſed to yeeld vnto him the towne : all which the Baſſa granted,fearing how to haue been able to haue kept the field,if they ſhould for any long time haue holden out, Winter now ſo faſt approching. So the two and twentieth of October the towne was vnto the Baſſa right cowardly deliuered,and the garriſon ſouldiers with their baggage in 100 wagons lent them by the Turks,ſafely conducted ouer the Mur as was vnto them promiſed. After the agreement made for the yeelding vp of the towne,the Baſſa in courteſie ſent vnto Paradiſer the Gouernour,a very rich gowne of cloth of gold;which albeit that he refuſed, yet was it afterwards laid to his charge as a preſumption of ſome trecherous colluſion betwixt him and the Baſſa for the betraying of the town,which it was thought he might much longer haue kept. Ibrahim now thus poſſeſſed of the town he ſo much deſired,fortified it more ſtrongly than euer it was before; and for the more aſſurance thereof, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of foure thouſand foot & fiue hundred horſe,all old expert ſoldiers. And immediatly after,without reſiſtance forraged the country round about Caniſia, burning all before him as he went; the poore Chriſtian inhabitants ſtill flying as faſt as they could for ſafegard of their liues. But hauing thus with the ſpoile of the countrey well pleaſed his ſouldiers,he deſirous to haue the ſame againe in time repeopled,as thereby to yeeld vnto the Turks the more profit, ſtaid their farther outrage, vpon great paine forbidding the ſame; by open proclamations in euery place ſet vp,inuiting the Chriſtians without feare of farther harm to returne again into the country, where ſubmitting them vnto the great Sultans obeiſance, they ſhould vnder his protection ſafely dwell,without any tribute to be of them exacted for the ſpace of three yeares next following. Which proclamations were in his name thus publiſhed.

Caniſia yeelded vnto the Turks Stiria forraged by the Turkes.

Ibrahim Baſſa to the inhabitants of the countrey about Caniſia, greeting.

Ibrahim Baſſa his proclamation.

We Ibrahim Baſſa by the grace of God, Viſier, and Couſin vnto the moſt puiſſant and inuincible Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the Turkes, vnto all the inhabitants of the marches about Caniſia, and the reſt of the country of Steirmarck, from the greateſt vnto the leaſt, greeting. Whereas we haue willingly heard, that ſome of you willing to ſubmit your ſelues to the great Sultan, and to ſweare vnto him fealtie, are againe returned vnto your old dwellings: Wee promiſe and aſſure you vpon the faith of the ſaid Emperor, that whoſoeuer ſhall be found neere vnto the fortreſſe of Caniſia now belonging vnto the great Sultan, with al reuerence ſubbmitting himſelfe as his ſubiect vnder his gouernment, acknowledging him for his ſoueraigne, ſhall enioy moe priuiledges than euer he did before, and alſo be protected in the ſame. And for that we know that your houſes are for the moſt part deſtroied, as alſo your poſteritie, you ſhal therfore for theſe three yeres next following be exempted and free from all tributes and charges whatſoeuer, to the intent you may the better recouer your ſelues. Of which grace if you ſhall willingly accept, we promiſe you, that neither you, your wiues, or children, ſhall be in any thing wronged, or your goods in any part impaired, but ſo much as in vs poßibly is to be defended: ſo that ſo many of you as pleaſe, may in ſafetie returne into your owne old dwellings, giuing before knowledge thereof vnto the Gouernor of this our fortreſſe. Giuen in our campe after the conqueſt of Caniſia.

A Many of theſe poore countrey people before fled for feare of the Turks, and not knowing where to beſtow themſelues, now vpon this proclamation returned againe to their antient dwelling places, there to begin the world againe vnder the Turkiſh obeyſance. But for that Countie Serinus was the man whom of all others in that country the great Baſſa ſought after, as him whom he moſt feared after his departure to trouble this his new conqueſt, and to ſeeke to be reuenged; hauing in this ſo generall a calamitie of Stiria his countrie, loſt twentie villages of his owne, quite burnt by the Turks, and the people moſt ſlain or els taken priſoners: the Baſſa hauing many times before ſought to haue perſuaded him to haue yeelded his obedience vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, and now in hope after ſo great loſſe to bring him in, before he were B come into the vtter ruine of all his fortunes (now by the loſſe of Caniſia, and the entrance of the Turks into Stiria, not a little endangered) writ vnto him as followeth:

We Ibrahim Baſſa, chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes and couſin vnto the moſt puiſſant Sultan Mahomet, to the County Serinus ſendeth greeting. We haue oftentimes heretofore written vnto thee concerning the matter thou knoweſt of: but what the cauſe is that we receiued no anſwer, we cannot tell. Yet could I not but write to thee againe, That if yet thou canſt be content to begin the matter aright, and to ſubmit thy ſelfe vnto our protection, we will be readie to receiue thee. Thou ſeeſt, that what we foretold thee, is now more than fulfilled both vpon thee and thine, which thou wouldeſt neuer beleeue. Neuertheleſſe, for the ſtaying of the further effuſion of the bloud as well of thy ſubiects as ours, and to come to ſome good at- C tonement, it is high time for thee to lay thine hand vpon thine heart, and to conſider how much more it concerneth thee than vs, and that the benefit thereof redoundeth more vnto thine than ours: What our affection is towards thee, Hierome the Vayuod can tell thee. Fare thou wel, from our campe after the conqueſt of Caniſia, the ſeuenth of Nouember, 1600.

Ibrahim Baſſa his letters vnto the countie Serinus.

But theſe letters being alſo as the reſt anſwered with ſilence, the great Baſſa hauing diſpoſed of all as he thought beſt at Caniſia and in the countrie thereabout, returned with his armie to Belgrade, there to Winter: hauing before fully certified the great Sultan of all his proceedings, and the ſucceſſe of this war, vaunting after his vain manner, the next Spring to beſiege Vienna alſo, if it ſhould pleaſe him ſo to command. Of all which things Mahomet vnderſtan- D ding, and not a little therwith pleaſed, cauſed great triumphs to be made by the ſpace of foure dayes at Conſtantinople, and in token of his loue and fauour, ſent a rich robe of cloath of gold, with a leading ſtaffe, all ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, vnto the Baſſa, yet lying at Belgrade.

Ibrahim Baſſa returneth vnto his army to Belgrade.

This loſſe of Caniſia much troubled all that ſide of Chriſtendome, eſpecially them of the the territories belonging vnto the houſe of Auſtria, in a ſort diſmaid to ſee the Turks ſo eaſily poſſeſſed of a towne, before thought almoſt impregnable, and the ſtrongeſt defence of al that country againſt the furious impreſſions of the Turks, to whom it was now become a moſt ſafe and ſure receptacle, all men with one voice blaming the diſcord of the captains in the Imperiall army, for ſo retiring without any good doing: but aboue all deteſting the cowardiſe of Pa- E radiſer, who knowne to haue in the towne a ſtrong garriſon, with good ſtore of munition and victuals (as was ſuppoſed) had ſo baſely deliuered the ſame vnto the enemy, not doing the vttermoſt of his deuoir as had beſeemed him for the defence therof: whereas if he had ſo done, happily in the meane time the cold and vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather (though no other reliefe had been) Winter being now come, might haue inforced the Turkes to haue raiſed their ſiege. Whereupon he was for this ſo foule a fact, by the Emperors commandement apprehended and caſt in priſon at Vienna, where after he had long lien, and his cauſe oftentimes examined, he was the next yere following condemned of felony and cowardiſe, and ſo the 15 day of October executed, hauing firſt his hand at foure ſtrokes of the executioner ſtrucke off, and after that his head: with him was alſo in like maner executed his Enſigne-bearer: and after them his Lieutenant with the Maior of the towne, who both bound faſt to a ſtake, had firſt their F tongues cut out, and afterwards their heads chopt off.

Paradiser executed for the yeelding vp of Caniſia to the Turks.

Now the rebellion before raiſed in Caramania by Cuſſahin Baſſa (as is aforeſaid) was not with his death altogether appeaſed. Alſo Orfa, a great citie of that country (which hauing taſted the ſweetneſſe of liberty in the time of Cuſſahin) yet ſtill holding out againſt Mehemet the great Baſſa the Sultans lieutenant Generall there. At which time alſo a companion of Cuſſahin the late rebell, called the Scriuano, and one of his greateſt fauorits, ſeeing how hardly not onely Cuſſabin himſelfe, but the reſt of his followers had bin handled by the Turks, began to make head, and to call vnto him all ſuch as loued their liberty: vnto the ſweet name wherof, ſo many were in ſhort time come about him, as that out of them he formed ſuch an armie, as made him now dreadfull vnto the Turks his enemies. Againſt whom, Mehemet Baſſa going with all his power to haue oppreſſed him, found him with thoſe his rebellious followers ſo couragious (for the deſire they all had to breake out of the Othoman ſlauerie, and to liue in ſuch liberty as was promiſed them by their captaine and Generall) that ioyning battell with them, hee receiued of them a notable ouerthrow, inſomuch that fearing to haue loſt his whole army, he was glad to retire, and to ſend out commiſſions for the raiſing of greater forces. Sultan Mahomet in the mean time, whither it was for feare of this new rebellion, or for that he vnderſtood of the Embaſſadors ſent from the Perſian vnto the Chriſtian Princes, began to ſuſpect leſt that king ſhould breake the league he had with him, & ſo to his further trouble take vp arms alſo againſt him. Wherefore vpon a Turkiſh pride he ſent an Embaſſador into Perſia, to giue the King to vnderſtand, That for the more aſſurance of the league betwixt them, he demanded to haue one of his ſons ſent vnto him in hoſtage, as a pledge of his fathers faith. Which ſo proud a demand the Perſian king tooke in ſuch diſdaine, that he commanded in his rage the Embaſſador to be forthwith ſlain: but that his fury being by his graue counſellors ſomwhat appeaſed, he remitted the ſeuerity of that his rigorous command, and ſparing his life, was contented, that in deſpight and contempt of him that had ſent him, he ſhould be put to the Baſtonado only: and ſo grieuouſly threatned, ſent back again vnto his maſter. Who hauing receiued this ſhamefull anſwer, and in doubt of ſome further matter from that angry king, commanded new and ſtrong garriſons to be put in all his ſtrong holds confining vpon the Perſian kingdome.

The aid ſent out of Italy vnto the emperor.

This troubleſome yeare of Iubile thus paſt, the Emperor much troubled with the loſſe of Caniſia, and in doubt of worſe to come (albeit that Ibrahim Baſſa, whom for all that he truſted not, did afreſh intreat with him concerning peace) and ſeeing alſo the great need he had of greater aid to withſtand the mightie power of the Turke, with great inſtancie requeſted aid of the Pope and of the other Princes of Italie: who conſidering alſo how much it concerned the reſt of the Chriſtian commonweale, to haue the frontiers of Hungary defended, condiſcended vnto the Emperours requeſt: and ſo the Pope with the beginning of the Spring ſent him eight thouſand ſouldiers in pay, vnder the leading of Io. Franciſco Aldobrandino his nephew their Generall, who with the like charge had now ſerued euer ſince the yeare 1599: King Philip alſo at the inſtance of the Emperor gaue order vnto the Countie Fuentes to ſend into Croatia certaine bands of Dutches; who by direction from him, were forthwith conducted to Millaine: The great Duke of Florence, alſo ſent vnto him two thouſand ſouldiers, vnder the leading of Franciſco de Monte; with whom alſo by his appointment went the Lord Io. de Medices, whom Ferdinand the archduke forthwith requeſted for to be maſter of his camp: thither came alſo the Duke of Mantua with an honorable companie both of horſe & foot, being forthwith by the Archduke made his Lieutenant Generall. And ſo whileſt theſe people aſſembled together into Croatia, the Emperour ſent alſo another good armie into Hungarie, drawne for moſt part out of Germanie, which vnder the leading of the Archduke Matthias his brother, & the Duke Mercurie his Lieutenant General, went into thoſe parts to withſtand the Turke. A third armie hee alſo made of the Imperials: which ſtrengthened with the forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga, Gouernour of the vpper Hungarie, ioyned themſelues with Baſta, for the recouerie of Tranſyluania, out of which hee had beene of late driuen, as ſhall heereafter be declared.

And ſo whileſt theſe armies were in preparing, many hot skirmiſhes paſſed in Hungarie betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, the loſſe falling ſometime to the one ſide and ſometime to the other. But the time now come that ſouldiers might wel take the field, Ibrahim Baſſa being now before dead at Belgrade, whileſt he was yet entreating of a diſſembled peace, and Haſſan one of the Viſier Baſſies by Mahomet appointed Generall in Hungarie in his place: yet delaying his comming, the parley for peace laied aſide (as neuer indeed by the Turks intended, but only by them entertained to dallie off the time to their owne more aduantage) Duke Mercurie Generall of the Emperors forces taking the offer of ſo fit an opportunitie, came with his army from Comara (where he had lien expecting the euent of the parley) and layed ſiege to Alba Rega-

Alba Regalis beſieged by duke Mercurie.

A Regalis,one of the chiefeſt and ſtrongeſt cities of Hungarie: which ſeated in the midſt of a mariſh, was thought almoſt impregnable,being hardly to be approched but by the ſuburbs,which ſtrongly fortified and defended by the mariſh, ſerued the citie in ſtead of three moſt ſure bulwarks, within which ſtood alſo the citie it ſelfe, well defended with a good wall and a ditch: This city the Duke for certaine daies continually battered, as if he had purpoſed at length to haue taken it by aſſault: but in the mean time certainly informed by a fugitiue (but lately fled out of the city) that the broad lake on the other ſide of the city ouer againſt the place where he lay,was not ſo deep,but that it was to be paſſed(contrary to the opinion both of the Turks captiues,and of the naturall inhabitants,whom he had vpon that point examined) and that the B Turks preſuming vpon the ſtrength therof,& thinking themſelues on that ſide ſafe,had turned almoſt al their care & forces vnto that ſide of the city which was now by him battered,without regard of any great perill to be from the other ſide feared: he appointed the Lord Ruſſworm with his ſoldiers to make proofe if the Sigeth ſuburbs(for ſo they were called) on the aforeſaid ſide of the city ſo litle regarded by the Turks,were not to be ſurpriſed:for that theſe ſuburbs being taken,the city could not long hold out:for the vndertaking of which enterpriſe, Ruſſworm was both by the captiue Turks & country people therby dwelling,much diſcouraged, they al with one conſent affirming, That albeit he ſhould finde no other difficulties in the attempting therof,yet the lake it ſelfe was not poſſible to be paſſed: who neuertheles not altogether truſting them,ſent certain of his men ſecretly to trie the matter: who hauing ſo done, C brought him word,That the lake was vndoubtedly(though with much difficulty)to be paſſed.
Whereupon he with 1000 ſelect ſoldiers with euery one of them a good faggot on his backe beſide his armes,to fil vp the deepeſt of the mariſh, by night entred the ſame;wherein he had not gon far, but that he almoſt with the danger of his life found it much deeper & more troubleſome than the ſpies had vnto him before reported: but carried with an inuincible courage himſelfe,& his ſoldiers moued by his example,he ſtill went on,they alſo following of him. It is almoſt a thing incredible,to tell what theſe aduenturous men indured,plunged in the deepe mud among the flags and bulruſhes,going ſtill vp in water and mud vnto the waſt euen where the mariſh was the ſhalloweſt; where alſo if one miſſed but a ſtep, hee was by and by ouer head & ears,and in danger to be drowned,if he were not by his fellows preſently holden: yet D at length by Gods help hauing with the loſſe but of 6 or 7 men a little before day got ouer,the duke by an appointed ſigne aduertiſed therof,with greater ſtir and tumult than at any time before aſſailed that ſide of the city where he lay, as if euen then & there he had onely meant to haue ingaged his whole forces for the winning therof. When in the mean time the Lord Ruſſworm on the other ſide with his reſolute ſoldiers,with ladders prouided for the purpoſe ſcaled the wals of the ſuburbs, and almoſt vnperceiued,recouered the top therof(the Turks being at the ſame time wholly bent for the defence of the other ſide of the city,where moſt ſtir & apparent danger was)and ſo being got into the ſuburbs,with a great and terrible crie aſſailed the Turks,who ſurpriſed with an exceeding feare,and not wel knowing which way to turn themſelues, without any great reſiſtance fled into the city, the Chriſtians following them at the E heels,& making of them a great ſlaughter. In which ſo great a confuſion,euen where was leaſt feared,the Duke by other his ſoldiers tooke the reſt of the ſuburbs as he had before determined, the Turks there alſo for feare forſaking them,& retiring with all the haſt they could vnto their fellows in the citie,there to liue or die together. The Chriſtians in theſe ſuburbs,beſide much other rich prey,tooke alſo 14 great pieces of artillerie,with good ſtore of ſhot & pouder.
The ſuburbs (the greateſt ſtrength of the city) thus happily taken, the Duke againe ſummoned the citie,requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him: whereunto the Turks gaue no other anſwer but by their pieces,which they diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians ſo perſuading them to yeeld. Wherwith the Duke much diſpleaſed,ſent them word,That he would ſend them other manner of meſſengers to morrow,and by Gods help ſup with them in the citie, although hee were not vnto him welcome. Neither failed he of that his promiſe: for the next day hauing out of the ſuburbs by the fury of his artillerie made two faire breaches in the city, he by the ruines thereof with great ſlaughter of the enemie entred the citie, albeit that the Turkes did what they might to haue defended the ſame,by caſting down vpon the Chriſtians as they entered, darts,wild-fire,& ſuch like things,vſually prouided for ſuch purpoſe. But ſeeing now no remedy,but that they muſt needs giue place to the fortune of their enemies, they fled amaine into their houſes, there to defend themſelues, or els to die: many of which houſes they had before of purpoſe ſo vndermined, as that they could eaſily ouerthrow them, & ſo ouerwhelm G as many as ſhould come within the danger of them: which ſo ſtrange a reſolution was by many of them as deſperatly performed, inſomuch that the goodly church, the palace, with many other ſumpuous buildings, were left vnto the Chriſtians all rent & torn, not much better than rude heaps of rubbidge and ſtones. Howbeit the Baſſa vpon promiſe of life, yeelded himſelfe, and was by the Duke preſently ſent vnto the camp; the reſt of the ſoldiers being (as in ſuch caſe it commonly hapneth) all or moſt of them put to the ſword. The greateſt part of the prey fell vnto the Wallons, who by heaps breaking into the richeſt houſes, not only tooke what themſelues light vpon, but ſtript the Germans alſo of ſuch things as they had by chance gotten, to their great heart-burning & griefe: yea theſe rauenous and irreligious men not ſo contented, H opened the tombs of the Hungarian kings, there long before buried, to ſpoile euen the dead of ſuch things, as had for honors ſake bin long before interred with them (if haply any ſuch thing were there to be found) ſhewing themſelues therein more barbarous than the Turkes, who by the ſpace of 60 yeres hauing had the city in their poſſeſſion, had yet ſpared thoſe reuerent monuments, and ſuffered the reliques of thoſe worthy Princes to reſt in peace. Of this taking of Alba-Regalis, the Baſſa of Buda long before taken priſoner, and then lying at Vienna, hearing, abſtained from meat with his two ſeruants a whole day, proſtrate vpon his face, praying vnto his Prophet Mahomet, who had (as he ſaid) all this yere been angry with the Turks. Which had the ſiege of Caniſia taken the like effect, had then vndoubtedly been vnto them moſt vnfortunat: but God in his wiſedome ſtill tempereth the ſweet with the ſoure. I Aſſan Baſſa commeth out of ſeaſon to haue relieued Alba Regalis.

The victorie of the Chriſtians ouer the Turks.

The Baſſa of Buda ſlaine.

Now in the meane while was Aſſan the Viſier Baſſa and Generall of the Turks army, with ſuch ſouldiers as were already aſſembled at Belgrade, comming to haue relieued Alba-Regalis: and albeit that he vnderſtood by the way as hee marched, that the citie was by the Chriſtians won, yet held he on his intended iourny: and ſo taking with him the Baſſa of Buda with the other Sanzacks and Commanders of the townes and caſtles thereabout, had formed an army of about threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, but for moſt part raw and vnexpert ſouldiers: with which power hee ſtill held on his way towards Alba-Regalis, as well thereby to giue ſome contentment vnto the angry Sultan his Maſter, as in hope alſo to ouerthrow the Chriſtian army, or at leaſtwiſe to find the city as yet vnrepaired, and ſo to regain it. But vain was that his K deſignement, eſpecially for the recouerie of the city: for that the Duke had no ſooner taken it, but that he forthwith cauſed the breaches to be repaired, and for the more aſſurance of it, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of old expert ſouldiers: and being himſelfe about twentie thouſand ſtrong, and hearing of the Baſſaes comming, ſet forward to meet him, & being come neere vnto him, began an hot and bloudie skirmiſh with him. Yet the Baſſa to proſecute his intended purpoſe for the recouerie of Alba-Regalis, the next day ſent away part of his armie, to make proofe if happily the city might yet be againe recouered; and himſelfe in the mean time with the reſt of his army offered battell vnto the Chriſtians, ſo to buſie them, that they ſhould not be able to trouble them whom he had ſent to Alba-Regalis, or to relieue the city, if it ſhould chance to be by them diſtreſſed. Whenas the Duke, before enformed of the baſeneſſe of the L ſouldiers in the Baſſaes armie, and that although he were for number of men far aboue him, yet that for old, hardy, and expert ſouldiers he was ſtrong enough for him, valiantly went out and encountered him: and ſo euen at the firſt onſet by plaine valor diſordering the formoſt ſquadrons of the Turks battell, enforced them to retire with the loſſe of ſix thouſand men; among whom were the Baſſa of Buda, ſix Sanzacks, with diuers other Captains and Commanders of good place and marke. At which time he alſo tooke from them diuers pieces of great artillerie, and had vndoubtedly with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrowne all the reſt of the Baſſaes army had not a gret ſquadron of the Tartars euen at that inſtant ſhewed themſelues at the backs of the Chriſtians, and ſo ſtaying them, giuen leiſure vnto the Baſſa again to reſtore his diſordered battell. Whereupon the Duke contenting himſelfe with the victorie he had already gotten, in M good order retired again into his trenches, hauing in this conflict not loſt aboue three hundred of his people. But whileſt both armies thus lay, and new ſupplies ſtill repairing vnto them, expecting but when they ſhould come to a generall day of battell; the Ianizaries ſtill murmuring, that it was now no time of the yeare longer to keepe the field, by their importunitie enforced the Baſſa to retire to Buda, and there to diſband his armie. In which his

A retreat many were by the Chriſtians cut off in the taile of his armie, and a number of priſoners taken, and amongſt the reſt fiftie of the French mutiners of Pappa; whom the Archduke Matthias at the inſtance of duke Mercurie afterwards pardoned. Neither ſped they much better, that were ſent by the Baſſa to haue attempted the taking of Alba-Regalis; for being come neere thereunto, they were ſo welcommed with great ſhot out of the citie, and charged with often ſallies by the ſtrong garriſon, that ſeeing no hope to preuaile, they were glad to riſe and to returne againe vnto the Baſſa that ſent them.

About the ſame time that the duke began to beſiege Alba-Regalis, Ferdinand the Archduke hauing receiued great aid from the Pope with the other Princes of Italy and the King of Spain, and ſo now 30000 ſtrong, by the aduice of the duke of Mantua his lieutenant General, reſolued B to beſiege Caniſia; which to haue again recouered out of the hands of the Turks concerned much, not them of Stiria & Auſtria only, but the other prouinces ajoining, yea and Italie it ſelfe alſo: whereupon he with his armie in good order came the tenth of September and encamped before it; the Duke of Mantua and Don Iohn de Medices with 2000 harquebuſiers and two cornets of horſe being come the day before to take view of the town, at whom the Turks made diuers ſhot, but without any harme doing. And albeit that the Turks there in garriſon (in number not paſt a thouſand, accounting amongſt them 300 of the Wallons ſomtime of the garriſon of Pappa) with their often & gallant ſallies greatly troubled the Chriſtians, and that great bands of other Turkes came many times out of the ſtrong townes and fortreſſes thereby, to skirmiſh with them, and to ſee if they could put any moe ſoldiers into the towne for the more C aſſurance thereof; yet ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the Chriſtian Commanders, and valour of their ſoldiers, that the Turks both in the one place and in the other were ſtill repulſed and put to flight, with the loſſe alſo of ſome of their ſmall caſtles and forts thereabout. To approch this ſtrong towne, and to plant a batterie againſt it, ſeemed to be a matter of great difficultie, for that it was (as we haue elſwhere ſaid) enuironed round with a mariſh: yet means was found to drie it a little, and to fill it vp on the one ſide, and to come ſo neere the towne, that hauing planted three tyre of artillerie againſt it, the Chriſtians began furiouſly to batter it, beating downe both the walls, the houſes and other buildings therein. Yea at length they had brought their approches ſo neere, that they were come with their trenches euen cloſe vnto the towne D ditch, perſuading the Turkes, now whileſt they might vpon good conditions, to ſurrender the towne, and ſo to ſaue their liues. Whereunto their fierce and enraged mindes were ſo farre from hearkening, that brauing the Chriſtians, they ſaid, That they would in deſpight of all their forces keepe the place for their Sultan, do what they could. Whereupon the Archduke and the Duke of Mantua, by the aduice of Medices and the reſt of the principal captaines and commanders in the armie, reſolued to giue a general aſſault vnto the towne. In the mean time newes was brought into the campe of the winning of Alba-Regalis, which there made great reioycing; in ſigne whereof the Chriſtians (as their manner is) in triumph many times diſcharged their great ordnance; and by fit men perſuaded the garriſon ſouldiers in Caniſia to yeeld, and not to caſt themſelues into ſuch danger as had their fellowes at Alba-Regalis; for that in ſo doing they ſhould not onely ſaue their liues, but eaſily alſo obtaine ſuch other conditions as they could reaſonably deſire; whereas otherwiſe they ſhould to their coſt E finde the Chriſtians ſtrong enough to conſtraine them, which muſt needs bring with it their vtter ruine and deſtruction. Whereunto the Garriſon ſouldiours (amongſt whome the renegate Wallons were the chiefe) contemptuouſly anſwered, That they little feared ſuch weake aſſailants: and with great crie and ſcorne commaunding the meſſengers to depart, in token of their confidence, as alſo not to ſeeme inferiour vnto the Chriſtians, oftentimes to ſmall purpoſe diſcharged their great ordnance, as had the Chriſtians the day before. Now though the walls of the towne were with continual batterie ſore ſhaken, and the breaches almoſt laid open; yet was the intended aſſault for a while delaied, vntill the bridges might be made that were to be layd ouer the towne ditch for the Chriſtians to paſſe ouer vpon. But all things (as was thought) now in a readineſſe, and the Florentines with ſome other of the Italians (whoſe lot it was to giue the firſt aſſault) being come forward, the bridge whereby they were to paſſe the towne ditch, was found both too ſhort and too weake for them to get ouer vnto the other ſide by: ſo that ſinking vnder them, not the ſouldiers only, but euen the Commaunders themſelues (aad namely Herberſteine) were in great danger to haue been loſt. By which which means they hindered, & the enemies mnrthering pieces continually flanking them and their musketiers ſtil playing vpon thē afront, they were enforced to retire, leauing behind them G 300 of their men ſlaine. Yet were not the Chriſtian commanders any thing therewith diſcouraged, but being generally reſolued not to giue ouer that they had taken in hand, vntil they had brought it to effect, began to make ſuch prouiſion as they knew to be needfull to preſerue their army vnder, againſt the violence of the winter weather, as alſo to hinder that no victual might be brought vnto the towne, ſo by famin at length to enforce the Turks and Wallons to yeeld:

who although they were alreadie pinched with wants, inſomuch that horſe-fleſh was daintie cheere with them; yet for all that they nothing abated of their woonted fierceneſſe, but being againe required to yeeld, vouchſafed not to anſwer them one word, but in ſtead thereof ſhooke their naked ſwords a far off at them, in token of their vndanted courage. But yet for all this reſolution H of the commanders for the continuance of the ſiege, Aldobrandino General of the Italians being now a little before dead of an old infirmitie that he had, the Italians began at the firſt ſome few of them ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of their quarter: but afterward by greater numbers to depart, and ſo to returne againe into their country; alledging for their excuſe want both of pay and victuals. But the reſt better minded, vnderſtanding that the Turkes were riſen from before Alba-Regalis, and the reſt of their armie disbanded, began to enter into new hope by ſome deuice or other to paſſe the ditch, and ſo by force to take the towne: and the rather, for that they were by a French fugitiue enformed both of the weakeneſſe & wants of the beſieged. Whereupon they began afreſh to make new engines for the approching of the wals, without danger of the enemies ordnance any more to flanke them. At which time alſo, I viz. the fourth of Nouember the Lord Ruſſworm came vnto the campe, ſent thither from duke Mercury with 8000 ſoldiers, after that Haſſan Baſſa had broke vp his army: by whoſe comming they were alſo the more encouraged to proſecute that they had taken in hand. Neither failed the Turks in the meane time with often ſallies to trouble the Chriſtians; attempting aboue all things to haue fired their tents, for that ſo lying open in that ſo cold a ſeaſon of the yeare they muſt thereby of neceſſity be enforced to raiſe their ſiege and be gon. But the ſucceſſe of theſe their ſo great deſignes was not anſwerable to their hopes, being ſtill to their loſſe beaten backe into the towne by the Chriſtians: whom it behooued to looke well about them, for that the beſieged deſperatly ſet, and all reſolued rather to die than to yeeld, aduentured themſelues to all dangers, neuer ceaſing to do what they might to put the Chriſtians out of hope for winning K the towne. But whileſt the Turks with doubtfull and as it were deſperat hope ſo defend the place, and the Chriſtians growne ſtronger by the comming of their friends, lay in hope to win the ſame; lo, in the later end of Nouember, the North winde accompanied with a deep ſnow ſo furiouſly raged, that it ouerthrew the greateſt part of the tents and pauilions of the Chriſtians, and as it were buried their whole armie in the ſnow and yce, in ſuch wiſe, as that in Ferdinand the Archdukes campe (being reaſonably well prouided for) were 1500 men with 300 horſes ſtarued and frozen to death. At which time the ſtate of them that came with the Lord Ruſſworm was moſt miſerable; who wearied with the ſiege of Alba-Regalis, and as it were ſpent with the dirtie trauell of the deepe way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouiſion, and were therefore enforced to lie abroad in ſo cold and vnſeaſonable a time: with L whoſe miſeries although their good General was much grieued, yet to do the Chriſtian commonweale ſeruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which ſo great an extremitie, the Archduke with the reſt of the commanders vpon view taken, wel conſidering what ſmal hope there was in good time to take the towne, the vnreaſonableneſſe of the Winter weather ſtill more and more encreaſing; thought it better betime to riſe, than longer to expoſe their army vuto moſt certaine deſtruction, either of the enemie or the cold. Which was done with ſuch haſte and confuſed tumult, as that their riſing ſeemed rather an haſtie flight, than honourable departure; leauing behinde them for haſte their great ordnance, with their tents and baggage; a common voice ſtill running, That they were well if they might but ſaue themſelues: ſo that the ſoldiers euery man mindfull but of himſelfe, and in feare to be purſued by the enemie, no M man chaſing them, fled, but ſtil accompanied with ſuch furious winds, ſnow, and extreme cold, that with all the labor they could take they could get them no heat, but fell downe to the earth many of them frozen, and ſo once falling, neuer roſe more, being vnable for want of heate to helpe themſelues: in which caſe they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man ha-

uing

The Chriſtians by tempeſt and extreamitie of weather enforced to giue ouer the ſiege of Caniſa.

A uing enough to doe to looke vnto himſelfe : ſo that vpon the way whereby the armie went thus diſperſed with the weather, lay aboue fiue hundred dead of cold, beſide foure hundred others left ſicke in the forſaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the armie were thought to haue beene all put to the ſword by them of the garriſon of Caniſia.

But hauing thus paſſed through theſe troubles of Hungarie, it is time now alſo to looke backe againe into the frontier countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia; which to haue kept in the Emperors obeiſance, and ſo preſerued as a liuely member of the Chriſtian commonweale no leſſe concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many. Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, the laſt yeare for his crueltie firſt driuen out of Tranſyl-B uania by Baſta, and afterwards out of Valachia by the great Chancellor of Polonia (as is afore-ſaid) and another placed in his ſtead; as a man forſaken euen of his owne better fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turn himſelfe, thought it beſt now at laſt to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the Emperor, if ſo happily by his meanes he might in ſome ſort repaire his broken eſtate, and ſo at leaſtwiſe recouer his gouernment in Valachia. So reſolued, he ſet forward, and in the beginning of this yeare, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuarie, with fiue and thirtie of his followers and ſix coaches arriued at Prague, where he was by the Emperors appointment honourably receiued, and his coſt at the Emperors charge defraied. Vnto whom he excuſed him-ſelfe of the ſeueritie by him vſed in Tranſyluania (the cauſe of thoſe late troubles in that country) as enforced therunto by the ſtubbornneſſe of the Tranſyluanians themſelues, whom C he found ſtill enclined to rebellion, & vnwilling to be commanded by any but by themſelues.
Which his excuſe (as true) was wel admitted, and he with all kindneſſe vſed. Now at this ſame time Baſta lying alſo in Tranſyluania, as Gouernor for the Emperor, right ſlenderly accompanied (as is before alſo declared) the parliament at Clauſenburg beeing ended, and all contro-uerſies (as was thought) well compoſed, now without feare one night, the watch beeing ſet, went to bed to take his reſt, where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Tranſyluanian Lords, among whom the Chiaki was chiefe, came with their followers, and ſurpriſing the watch, and entering the Pallace, brake into the chamber where he lay, took him out of his bed, and ſo kept him priſoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelue miles off met with Sigiſmund Bathor their late Prince, before ſecretly by them called in, whom they D honourably conducted to Clauſenburg, and there deliuered vnto him Baſta, the late Gouernor for the Emperor, whom he commanded to be caſt into yrons : and ſo going to the palace, gaue like order for the apprehending and ſafe keeping of the reſt of the nobilitie alſo, ſuch as had taken part with Baſta in the behalfe of the Emperour. For now the Tranſyluanians were diuided into three parts : wherof the one ſtood for the Emperor; the ſecond for Istuan Bathor (pretending, that vnto him belonged the ſoueraigntie of that Prouince) but the third and farre the greateſt, for Sigiſmund their antient Lord and leader, who now by meanes of the King of Po-lonia reconciled vnto the great Turke, and in this troubleſome time by his fauourits called againe into his countrey, was by them ioyfully receiued at Alba-Iulia, Clauſenburg, and the reſt of the chiefe cities of Tranſyluania. Who now thereof againe poſſeſſed, for the better E aſſuring of his eſtate forthwith writ vnto the Emperor what had happened, requeſting him to content himſelfe, that hee was deſirous of his loue and fauour, promiſing to bee alwayes his good friend and neighbour, and for euer to keepe good amitie with him : giuing Baſta alſo (whom he had now at the interceſſion of certaine great friends againe enlarged) to vnderſtand, That he was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging vnto his principality, as alſo to ceaſe from further moleſting of his people that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience : which his requeſt was neither of the one, nor of the other much regarded or hearkened vnto : For the Emperour vpon the firſt aduertiſement of this ſo great an alteration in Tranſyluania, calling vnto him Michael the Vayuod (not ſo much troubled with the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, as for that his wife and ſonne, whome hee had left as hoſtages with Baſta, were now come into the hands of the Tranſyluanians his mortall enemies) and ſatisfy-ing him in many things that hee had before requeſted, tooke order with him, That with all conuenient ſpeed returning home againe into Valachia, where hee was now much longed for (the people generally diſliking of the ſimple Vayuod, by the great Chancellor ſet ouer them) and gathering together ſuch power as he could, he ſhould ioyne himſelfe with Baſta his Lieutenant Generall, vnto whom he had alreadie ſent great companies both of horſe and foot for the expulſing of Sigiſmund out of Tranſyluania, and the reducing againe of that Prouince G vnder his obeiſance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into Valachia, and aſſembling about ten thouſand of his friends, all good and expert ſouldiers, went to ſeeke for Baſta as he had with the Emperour agreed; whom he found ready in the field with about twentie thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe, but newly departed from Veradinum: where muſtering their army, they with their vnited forces entred into Tranſyluania, there to put in execution what the Emperor had commanded. Where the Vayuod in diſdaine of the people which loued him not, with fire and ſword waſted all the country before him as he went: not without the great diſcontentment of Baſta, to whom it ſeemed not good to make deſolat that country which he was in good hope ſhould in ſhort time be his Lord and Maſters the Emperours. But Sigiſmund vnderſtanding both of the comming of his enemies, and of the harme they did in his countrey, riſe from Solnock, where he lay encamped with his army, and ſo to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come ſo neere vnto them as that hee might well diſcouer them, he would not come to the triall of a battell with them, which was by them offered; but fortified himſelfe in his trenches, ſo ſeeking but to delay the time vntill the comming of the Tartars, which were to haue come vnto him from the Chancellor of Polonia, as alſo of ſix thouſand Turks to haue been ſent him from the Baſſa of Belgrade. Where hauing afterward vnderſtood that the paſſage of the Tartars to haue bin ſent him, was ſtayed by Don Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungarie; & that the Turkes ſtaying at Giula, would come no farther except they had their pay before hand: finding himſelfe too weake with his owne power to encounter with his enemies, he riſe with his armie, I with purpoſe to haue retired a little backe, and to haue taken certaine ſtrait paſſages whereby the enemy muſt needs paſſe, ſo by the aduantage of the place to haue holpen his owne weake ſtrength. But Baſta and the Vayuod perceiuing his riſing (whereunto they were ſtill attentiue) followed him with ſuch ſpeed, that they ouertooke him before hee could get thither, and ſo hardly preſſed him, that needs he muſt turn his face and ioyne battell, or els ſuffer his people altogether like beaſts to be ſlaine. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable victorie, yet ſuch was the valour of the ſoldiers of Baſta and the Vayuod, that in a great fight hauing diſordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and ſo cut them all in pieces. Which the Prince beholding, and not able to K remedy the matter, betime fled with his horſmen from the fury of his enemies, and ſo retired to the vttermoſt confines of Tranſyluania, hauing in this battell loſt ten thouſand of his faithful ſouldiers. Whereupon Claudiopolis with diuers other cities and townes of that countrey, returned againe vnto the Emperors obeiſance.

Sigiſmund ouerthrown by Baſta & the Vayuod, flieth out of Tranſyluania

In the proſecuting of this victory, the Vayuod to ſatisfie the hatred he had of long borne againſt the Tranſyluanians, did what ſpoile he could, vtterly waſting all the places whereby he paſſed: which Baſta not liking, requeſted him to vſe his victory with more modeſtie, and to haue more reſpect to what he did, eſpecially vnto ſuch places or perſons as of themſelues returned vnto the Emperours obeiſance. Whereunto he proudly anſwered, That he would doe what he thought good, without his appointment or the Emperours either, eſpecially in that L country which he had now with his own ſword twice conquered: & that therfore Baſta might command them that were by him to be commanded, as for himſelfe he acknowledged no ſoueraigntie that either Baſta or the Emperor had ouer him. Vnto which his ſo preſumptuous a ſpeech Baſta replied not, but yet much therewith diſcontented, began to enter into a great ſuſpition from what ground thoſe his hautie conceits (eaſily by his words to be gathered) might grow. And ſo from that time better obſeruing his proceedings, perceiued him to haue intelligence with the Turkes, with purpoſe to ioyne hands with them, that ſo by their help chaſing the Imperials out of Tranſyluania, he might hold it to himſelfe as tributarie to the Othoman Emperour, of all others beſt able to defend him. Which to bee true (beſide diuers other ſtrong preſumptions) he certainly vnderſtood by certain letters of his written to that purpoſe, M intercepted by his ſouldiers and brought vnto him: whereupon he became verie penſiue and heauy, for the great power the Vayuod was of in thoſe countries, as alſo for the great ſtrength he had euen then preſent about him, and wherewith he was as it were then guarded. So conſulting with certaine of his Colonels and chiefe Commanders of his armie, what were beſt to be done in that ſo dangerous a caſe, whereof ſo much depended: A Wallon captaine offered himſelfe to go into the Vayuod his campe, and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitour. Which his offer well liked off, and he as ready to performe as he was to promiſe, going into the Vayuods camp accompanied with ſome threeſcore men, and finding him in his tent, boldly ſtepping to him, willed him to yeeld himſelfe the Emperours priſoner: whereat he beeing about to lay his hand vpon his ſcimitar, the Wallon captaine with an halbard thruſt him into the breaſt, at which very inſtant another with a ſword at one blow claue his head down to the ſhoulders. An vnworthy death for ſo worthy a captain, had not ambition (the torment of great ſpirits) carried him too high with the wings of immoderat deſire, beyond the bounds of loyalty and reaſon. But there he lieth now dead among his friends, whom the great Turke ſomtime more feared euen in his palace at Conſtantinople, than he did al the reſt of the Emperors commanders. Preſently vpon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was raiſed by the ſouldiers in his camp: but Baſta forthwith ſhewing himſelfe with all his ſouldiers in armes, and withall producing the letters declaring the treaſon by the Vayuod contriued with the Baſſa of Temeſwar againſt the Emperor, all was againe appeaſed: but eſpecially for that his ſouldiers now ſaw themſelues without an head, and too weake alſo for the Imperials there preſent and already in armes. In the Vayuods tent were alſo other letters found, ſo plainly declaring his ſecret colluſion with the Turke, and treaſon againſt the Emperor, that the Valachians who at the firſt were wonderfully moued with his death, and hearing the ſame read, reſted not now only contented, but ſaid moreouer, that he was worthily ſlaine, and that if they had knowne him to haue had any ſuch traiterous purpoſe, they would themſelus long before haue taken of him deſerued puniſhment. Now vnto his ſouldiers Baſta offered, at their choice, either to depart whither they would without danger; or els taking the oath of obedience vnto the Emperour, to enter into his; pay which moſt part of them did. The tumult appeaſed, the dead body of the Vayuod was layed out a whole day for the ſouldiers to gaze vpon, and ſo afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of late, and many times before, had ſo fortunatly ouerthrown his enemies; vnhappie man himſelfe now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vnconſtancie.

Baſta now deliuered of the great feare he had before of the Vayuod, what by force, what by agreement, in ſhort time took in moſt part of the country: for that the Tranſyluanians ſeeing the ſmall power of Sigiſmund, & well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayuod ſo much of them hated; as alſo to auoid the dangers euen preſently hanging ouer their heads from the Imperials, if they ſhould in any thing ſhew themſelues obſtinate againſt them; ſubmitted themſelnes wholly to the courteſie of Baſta, ſo that the places were but few that yet held out for the Prince Sigiſmund: who in the meane time was doing what he might for the raiſing of a new army (hauing not altogether with this late ouerthrow forthwith alſo loſt his hope) by the help of the Turks, Tartars, and Polonians, to recouer again the poſſeſſion of his ſtate, and by force of armes to chaſe out the Imperials. But he being brought to ſo low an ebbe, and almoſt all the country of Tranſyluania poſſeſſed by Baſta; who would not haue thought but that now after ſo long trauels it would haue remained wholly at the Emperors deuotion: and ſo many, that thought themſelues to ſee much, ſaid aſſuredly it would. But ſee the change, and what ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue of the conſtancy of the vain multitude: neuer more like themſelues, than in diſliking to morrow what they beſt liked to day, fooliſh, ſenceleſſe, improuident, raſh, headſtrong, violent, and aboue all things mutable, and vnconſtant. So now for all that Baſta had done for the aſſurance of this countrie vnto the Emperor (being ſo much as moſt men thought to haue bin ſufficient, and indeed as much as was poſſible for him to do) euen in the winding vp of this yeare 1601, the Tranſyluanians vnderſtanding that Sigiſmund with a great army of Polonians, Turks, & Tartars, was now comming againſt the Imperials, moſt part of them preſently tooke vp armes in his fauour; ſaying, That their firſt oath voluntarily giuen vnto him as their naturall Prince & Gouernor, was more to be reſpected than any other afterwards by force extorted from them by a forrein Prince. Inſomuch that Baſta perceiuing with what a tempeſt he was like euen preſently to be ouerwhelmed, to ſaue himſelf and his people from the rage thereof, withdrew himſelfe with his followers vnto a ſtrong town in a corner of that country: from whence he with all ſpeed ſent vnto the Emperor for greater aid, as wel for the defence of the place he yet held, as for the ſubduing again of that rebellious people. whoſe departure Sigiſmund without reſiſtance entring the country, was of the people in generall ioyfully receiued as their moſt lawfull Prince and ſoueraigne, and all the honor done vnto him that was by them poſſible: in which his ſo princely, but dangerous eſtate, now twice in leſſe than the ſpace of one yeare by him regained, and yet thereof no whit aſſured, we will for a while leaue him to ioy therein with his ſubiects. The Baſſa of Agria ouerthrown by Ferrant Gonzaga

But whileſt the ſtate thus turneth vpſide downe in Tranſyluania, the Baſſa of Agria going out with ten thouſand Turkes in hope to haue ſurpriſed Toccaie (a ſtrong hold of the Chriſtians in the vpper Hungarie) was encountered by Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperours Lieutenant there, and by him ouerthrowne, and with great ſlaughter of his Turks chaſed to the gates of Agria.

Now was Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor this yeare alſo no leſſe troubled with the proceedings of the Scriuano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the euill ſucceſſe of his affaires in Tranſyluania and Hungarie. For the Scriuano by his laſt yeares victorie growne into great credit with the common people, and ſtill by them more and more followed, to maintain the reputation of his credit, came now again this yere with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Baſſa and Generall of the Turks armie, who with fiftie thouſand good ſoldiers (a power thought ſufficient to haue repreſſed him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scriuano ioyning battel, in a great fight cut in ſunder a great part of the Baſſa's army, and ſo became maſter of the field, forraged all the countries adioining almoſt as far as Aleppo, ſtill calling the people vnto libertie, and cauſing himſelſe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane Faith, and of the libertie of thoſe countries with him combined: in ſuch ſort, as that it now ſtood the great Turke vpon to ſend another great armie to the aid of Mahomet the diſcomfited Baſſa. With whom alſo the Scriuano (preſuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the firſt encounter with his people put to the worſe: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his diſordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting ſouldiers, he with a great ſlaughter diſordered alſo the Baſſaes armie. Yet hauing not any other firme ſtate or ſtay to reſt vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with theſe his rebellious followers, of whom he had now loſt a great many, he thought it not beſt to aduenture too farre (not knowing how preſently to repaire his loſſes) but contenting himſelſe with what he had already don, retired with his army into the ſtrength of the mountains, there that Winter to liue vpon the ſpoile of the countries adioyning, and the next yere to do more harm than euer he had done before. The Ianizaries in mutinie at Conſtantinople.

Beſide all which former troubles, the plague alſo this yeare ſore raged both in Conſtantinople and many other places of the Turkiſh empire. At which time alſo the Ianizaries at Conſtantinople hauing receiued ſome diſgrace by ſome of the great Sultans fauorits, & with great inſolencie requiring to haue their heads, cauſed their Aga well accompanied preſumptuouſly to enter into the Seraglio to preferre this their requeſt: whom Mahomet to the terror of the reſt, cauſed for his preſumption to be taken into the midſt of the Spahi, and ſo by them to be cut in pieces, which was not done without the great ſlaughter of the Spahi themſelues alſo, ſlaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries ariſing vp in arms alſo, and euen now ready to haue reuenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wiſedome of Cicala Baſſa, beſtowing amongſt them a great ſumme of money, againe appeaſed, without further harm doing. Which their ſo great inſolencie Mahomet imputing vnto their exceſſiue drinking of wine, contrary to their law of the great Prophet, by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, commanded all ſuch as had any Wine in their houſes in the citie of Conſtantinople and Pera, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to ſtaue it, except the Embaſſadours of the Queenes Maieſtie of England, the French king, and of the State of Venice: ſo that as ſome report, wine for a ſpace ran downe the channels of the ſtreets in Conſtantinople, as if it had beene water after a great ſhower of raine.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince now of late againe poſſeſſed of Tranſyluania (as is before declared) could not yet well aſſure himſelfe of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Tranſyluanians of his faction alone, was not able to withſtand the force of Baſta, who ſtill ſtrengthened with new ſupplies both of men and all things elſe neceſſarie for the wars from the

A the Emperor, was now with a great power alreadie entred into Tranſyluania: the Polonians buſied in the warres of Sueuia, and the Turks with their other greater affaires, neither of them ſending him their promiſed aid, the greateſt hope and ſtay of himſelfe in that newneſſe of his eſtate. Wherefore ſeeing himſelfe euery day to loſe one place or other, and fearing alſo leſt his ſouldiers for want of pay ſhould in ſhort time quite forſake him and goe ouer to Baſta; he thought it beſt betimes and whileſt he had yet ſomething left, and was not yet altogether become deſperat, otherwiſe to prouide for his eſtate, eſpecially hauing ſmall truſt in the Turks, to whom he had been before ſo great an enemie. Wherefore he dealt with Baſta for a truce or ceſſation from armes, vntill Embaſſadors might be ſent vnto the Emperor, to entreat with him B for ſome good attonement. Wherewith Baſta beeing content, and the Embaſſadors ſent, the matter was ſo handled with the Emperor, that Sigiſmund to make an end of all theſe troubles, was contented to the behoofe of his Imperiall Maieſtie, to reſigne vnto Baſta his Lieutenant all ſuch places as he yet held in Tranſyluania, vpon much like conditions he had about three yeares before made with him: and ſo in all, and for all, to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his Maieſtie. Which intended ſurrender of the Princes being bruted in Tranſyluania, Zachel Moiſes his Lieutenant (& now in field with the Princes forces) not able to endure or to heare that that noble Prouince ſhould again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his ſouldiers, went vpon the ſudden to aſſaile Baſta, in hope to haue found him vnprouided, & ſo diſcomfiting his armie, to haue driuen the Imperials quite out of Tranſyluania: but he an old and expert C Commander, perceiuing euen the firſt mouing of the Tranſyluanians, with great celeritie put his armie in good order, and ſo ioyned battell with them: wherein he with the loſſe of ſome fiue hundred men ouerthrew Moyſes, with his armie of Tranſyluanians, Turks, and Tartars hauing ſlaine aboue three thouſand of them, and put the reſt to flight: Moyſes himſelfe with ſome few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turks territories towards Temeſwar. But when Sigiſmund vnderſtood what his Lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocencie went himſelfe vnto the Imperial camp, accompanied only with certain of his gentlemen, and there vnto Baſta excuſed himſelfe of that which was by his Lieutenant againſt his will, and without his priuitie done; frankly offering to performe whatſoeuer was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and him. And ſo preſently calling his garriſons out of all ſuch ſtrong places as were yet for him holden, he ſurrendred them to Baſta; & ſo forthwith honorably accompanied, put himſelfe vpon his way towards the Emperor. After whoſe departure out of Tranſyluania, all that Prouince voluntarily and without more adoe yeelded to Baſta as to the Emperors Lieutenant: who preſently called an aſſemblie of all the Nobilitie of the countrie, taking of them an oath for their obedience and loyaltie vnto the Emperor. Thus by the wiſedome and proweſſe of this worthy commander, is the country of Tranſyluania once againe brought vnder the Emperors obeiſance; a matter of far greater importance, than to haue woon the ſtrongeſt citie the Turke holdeth in Hungarie.

Zachell Moiſes ouerthrown by Baſta.

Great troubles in Valachia.

But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed in Tranſyluania, great troubles ariſe in Valachia (the countrie next adioyning) for that the people of that Prouince not able longer to endure the great inſolencie of the Turks (who after the death of Michael had by their power made one Ieremias Vayuod there) by a generall conſent tooke vp armes, and proclaiming one Radoll (a fauorit of the Emperors) Vayuod, chaſed Ieremias (before placed by the Turks) quite out of the country: who flying vnto Simon Palatine of Moldauia, his friend, by his means and the helpe of the Turkes, returning vnto Valachia, draue out thence Radoll againe: who beeing now at this preſent with Baſta, with about ten thouſand Valachians his followers, earneſtly requeſted of him (now that hee was ſo quietly poſſeſſed of Tranſyluania) to helpe him with his forces for the recouerie of Valachia. And Baſta well conſidering how much it concerned the quiet and ſure keeping of the poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania for the Emperour, to haue that ſo neere a Prouince to friend, eaſily yeelded to his requeſt; and gaue him a great Regiment of his old approoued ſouldiers, and ſo ſent him away to recouer his eſtate: with whome (at his enterance into Valachia) the Moldauian meeting with a great power both of his owne, and of the Turks, come thither in the fauour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible and bloudie battell, the glorie whereof fell vnto Radoll, hee carrying away the victorie. In which battell two of the Turks Baſſaes were there ſlaine, with a great number of others both of the Moldauians and Turks. After which victorie Radoll recouered againe the ſoueraigntie of Valachia, for which he was beholding to Baſta: and ſhortly after with the ſame aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were comming to haue aided the Moldauian.

Troubles in Hungarie.

Now in the meane time in Hungarie alſo paſſed many an hot skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, whoſe garriſons at Buda and in other places in the lower Hungarie, attempting to haue ſurpriſed Alba-Regalis, & diſcouered by the Chriſtians, were with great ſlaughter enforced to retire. At which time alſo, Countie Serinus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Turks with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to Caniſia, vpon the ſudden ſet vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and put to flight the conuoy that guarded them, carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And ſhortly after, the free Haiducks of Comara in a great party going out towards Buda to ſeek after booty, & hauing taken threeſcore Turkes priſoners, and ſo with them about to haue returned home; vnderſtanding by the way, that Ali ſometime the Baſſa of Buda, and now Gouernour of Peſth, was with a ſmall retinue about to come downe the riuer Danubius from Buda towards Belgrade, there to meet the Viſier Baſſa, but then comming into Hungarie; they ſlew all the priſoners, and hauing got two ſmall boats, about fifteene miles beneath Buda lay in wait for the Baſſa: who according to their expectation comming downe the riuer, was by theſe aduenturers fiercely aſſailed, and of his thirty followers hauing fourteene ſlaine, being himſelfe alſo ſhot in two places of his bodie, was there with a great bootie taken, and ſo brought to Comara, and ſhortly after preſented vnto Matthias the Archduke at Vienna: who amongſt other things, certainly enformed, that Haſſan Baſſa was with a great armie by the commandement of the great Sultan Mahomet comming to beſiege Alba-Regalis, and that hee was now vpon his way as farre as Belgrade; preſently ſent thither the Countie Yſolan Gouernour thereof, who with much adoe got into the citie, the Turks hauing already taken all the paſſages, to haue hindered the Chriſtians from putting in either men or munition, more than was therein alreadie. Howbeit the Countie now got in there, and being no leſſe good enginer than a valiant Commander, cauſed all them in the citie to labor vpon the rampiers: ſo that beſide the naturall ſcituation thereof, which was very ſtrong, he had in ſhort time ſo fortified it, as that in moſt mens iudgement it ſeemed a place almoſt impregnable. This Ali Baſſa was ſometime the great Turks butler, but after the taking of Agria, made Baſſa of Buda; which great place hee held but three moneths, being by the enuie and ambition of ſome, but eſpecially of Amurath Baſſa, remooued thence, and made Gouernour of Peſth: from whence now going downe the Riuer to Belgrade, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiducks, vnto whom he offered for his ranſome three hundred thouſand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken ſeuentie thouſand Duckats.

Ali Baſſa taken priſoner.

A great ranſome offered by Ali Baſſa.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the loſſe of Alba-Regalis (taken from him by the Chriſtians the laſt yeare) and now reſolued for the recouerie of the ſame, to ingage if need ſhould be a great part of his forces, had cauſed an armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand ſtrong, to meet at Hadrianople for that purpoſe, vnder the leading of Haſſan Baſſa one of the chiefe Viſiers, to be ſent into Hungarie. Who by the way of Belgrade comming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twelfth of Auguſt incamped (as he had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his tents couering all the countrie round about, as if it had bin a white ſnow: where hauing well entrenched himſelfe, & planted his artillerie, hee began a moſt terrible & furious battery, in ſuch ſort as if he had not meant to haue made a breach only, but to haue beaten the citie euen from the face of the earth, which ſeemed now to tremble vnder his feet, and the clouds to rend with the thundring of his great ordnance: & for that the mariſh and deep ditches were a great let vnto his men for to come vnto the aſſault, he cauſed them with the number of his pioners to be filled vp (a worke thought almoſt impoſſible) & ſo brought on his men to aſſault the counterſcarf, which the gouernor had cauſed to be made before the city for better defence therof: which aſſault coſt him much bloud, by reaſon of the wonderful valor of the defendāts: yet in the end the great number of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were inforced to forſake it & retire into the city: but ſhortly after ſallying out again, they Alba-Regalis beſieged by the Turkes.

they with ſuch force aſſailed the Turkes now got within the counterſcarſe, that hauing ſlaine moſt part of them that were entred, they forced the other out againe: at the brute wherof, an alarm being raiſed throughout the camp, infinit numbers of the barbarous enemies came running thither with ſuch ſauage fury, that without regard of their liues they as deſperate men preſſing ſtill on, fell twice as many as before: inſomuch that the Chriſtians weary of that long and bloudy fight, & on euery ſide charged or rather ouerwhelmed with the enemies ſhot, were glad againe, but not without great loſſe to abandon the place. With which skirmiſhes and diuers others that they had, the number of the defendants was greatly diminiſhed, to keepe a weake citie, ſhewing as yet the ruins of the late ſiege, when it was by the Chriſtians woon; the breaches therof being but euil repaired, & the mines yet gaping, requiring great & ſtrong fortifications to hold out and endure any long ſiege againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie. Yet was not the courage of the valiant County Yſolan the Italian Gouernor, any whit therwith abated, but by his letters gaue the Archduke Matthias to vnderſtand in what caſe things ſtood with them in the city; requeſting him with al ſpeed to ſend him reliefe, for that otherwiſe the city, ſo weakly both manned & fortified, would be in danger to be loſt; many of the garriſon ſoldiers being already ſlain in the defence thereof, and diuers of the Hungarians forſaking the wals, daily flying vnto the Turks campe; promiſing yet neuertheleſſe himſelſe to do the vttermoſt of his deuoir. Vpon the receit of which letters, the Archduke gaue order vnto the lord Ruſſworm (maſter of the campe) to go forthwith to Comara, & there with ſuch forces as were from diuers places come thither, to goe forth and to prooue if by any meanes the weake garriſon of Alba-Regalis might ſo be relieued, by putting in ſome good ſupply of freſh ſoldiers. According to which command, Ruſſworm comming thither, without delay tooke the field with 12000 men which he found there, to ſee if he might with them, put into the city the deſired reliefe. But whileſt the matter was in the performance therof too long delaid, by diſcord ariſing betwixt him and the other colonels, about the maner of relieuing the town, the Baſſa had time to effect his purpoſe; who the 28 of the ſame moneth of Auguſt, after a long and terrible batterie, cauſed a generall aſſault to be giuen vnto the citie: which the Turkes from time to time renuing, continued all that day and the next night, with ſome part of the day following alſo, without ceaſing: ſo that the defendants now much weakned, and they alſo that were left, ſo wearied or wounded, as that they were not well able to make any longer reſiſtance (and the countie himſelfe, who gaue as it were life vnto them all, being now alſo carried away dangerouſly hurt in the thigh with a musket ſhot) there was a ſigne of parly giuen vnto the enemy: which the Baſſa granting, and the fury of the aſſault ſtaid, certaine of the chiefe captains and commanders in the citie, going vnto the Gouernor, put him in mind of the weakneſſe of the place, of the force of the enemie, of the number of his moſt valiant men ſlain, of the want of the defendants. They had (as they ſaid) done enough for their honor, hauing endured ſo many and ſo great aſſaults, in a place not defencible: & enough to diſcharge their fidelitie, hauing holden it out to the vttermoſt of their power. That they could do no more than they had done, being not relieued; and that the ſame bond which bound them to defend the place, bound the Emperor alſo to relieue them, ſeeing that otherwiſe it was not in their power to maintain it. That they had, with the loſſe of their liues and bloud, ſhewed their fidelitie vnto the Emperor, no ſufficient armie appearing from him (according to his promiſe) for their ſuccor. That to fight any longer was but to encreaſe the glory of their enemies, and their owne loſſes: ſeeing that after they had don what they poſſibly could, expoſed to a thouſand dangers, they ſhould neuertheles be vanquiſhed, and the citie taken. That the ſame conſideration which carried valiant minds vnto the effects of honour when they are relieued with hope, diſſuaded them being out of all hope of any happy end of their troubles: & to loſe themſelus to no purpoſe, was as great a ſigne of folly, as to let ſlip a faire opportunity, was a ſigne of cowardiſe. That they were to expect nothing but extreame miſerie, if the enemy ſhould againe force them; the breaches being ſo broad, as wherby they might eaſily enter: and their own beſt men ſlain, that ſhould keep them out. And that therefore he ſhould do well, to come to ſome good compoſition with the enemy, whileſt they had yet ſomething to yeeld vp vnto him, and that he ſtood in ſome feare of them; & not to expect, whilſt they were ſpoiled of al means, either to reſiſt him by force, or to bind him by courteſie: nothing remaining for them in the place, but death, if they ſhould obſtinatly ſtand

Great diſorder and confuſion among the beſieged.

Alba Regalis taken by the Turkes.

The Chriſtians cruelly murdered in Alba Regalis.

With theſe perſuaſions the Gouernour moued, came to a parley with the Baſſa being right glad thereof; as well knowing that a towne beſieged comming to a parley, is commonly more than halfe woon: and glad by any means to gain it, for that thereof depended the aſſurance both of his head and honour: where after ſome ſhort talke it was agreed, That the County ſhould yeeld the town into the hands of the Baſſa, with all the great ordnance, and other warlike munition therein: and that the countie with his garriſon, ſhould with bag & baggage in ſafety depart with their armes, by the ſuburbs leading toward Rab; and with a good conuoy in ſafety to be brought halfe way thither: This capitulation agreed vpon, and by the Baſſa and the county ſigned, euery man aſſured himſelfe of the Baſſaes faith, and thereon reſted. But what faith is to be expected from a faithleſſe man? Vpon the firſt brute of this compoſition, yea and before it was altogether well concluded; whileſt the merchants in the towne were ſeeking for waggons to carry their merchandiſe, and the ſouldiers for horſes to carrie their baggage, the ſcarceneſſe thereof bred a great confuſion and ſtir among the people; as commonly it falleth out in things done in haſte, but eſpecially where men for ſafegard of their liues, in their flight for haſte fall into a thouſand errors: ſo whileſt ſome in this hurly burly were quarrelling about their horſes and carriages, and otherſome were opening the gates to be gone; others were as buſie in robbing and pilfering the baggages of their captaines and companions; miſerable men, who all appointed for a prey vnto the greedy and merciles Turks, yet fel to preying one vpon another. Which diſorders encouraged the reſt of the ſouldiers to fall to pillage all alſo, ſome loading themſelues with ſuch goods as the merchants had for lacke of carriages left behind them; and otherſome euen with the goods of their owne captaines; which the ſouldiers appointed for defence of the breaches ſeeing, left their charge, and came thronging into the towne, & thruſt themſelues in amongſt the pilferers, as if the pillage of the towne had bin vnto them by triumphant victory aſſured, and that they themſelues had bin victors, and not men vanquiſhed. The Tartars lodged at the foot of the breach, ſeeing it forſaken, and without any great ſtrength to defend it, let not this opportunitie ſlip, but preſſing on without any great reſiſtance, entred the ſame; and ſo in a trice full thirtie thouſand of them thruſt into the towne, and there ſurpriſed the vanquiſhed Chriſtians, at once loaded with prey, feare, and deſpaire. After whome, euen by the ſame breach, the Turks entered alſo, to be partakers of the ſpoile: ſo that in a moment the town was full of enemies both Turks and Tartars. The Turks beſide the bootie they took themſelues, fell to quarrelling with the Tartars, for ſome part of theirs; and ſo long as there was any thing that might pleaſe their eies, or fill their hands, they abſtained from ſlaughter & bloudſhed, buſying themſelues with that which for the preſent was more for their profit: but the pillaging ceaſing, by reaſon there was no more to be had, then the perfidious wretches fell to maſſacring of the miſerable Chriſtians, the ſword deuouring al that they could light vpon, ſo that all the citie flowed with bloud. Neither was there any end thereof, vntill that by the comming in of the Baſſa the ſlaughter was ſtayed; by which meanes Countie Yſolan the late Gouernour with ſome other captaines and ſouldiers were ſaued, hauing eſcaped the enemies fury.

County Yſolan carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople.

In this maſſacre were ſlaine 3000 Chriſtian ſouldiers, beſide others of the citiſens, in number not few. The captaines that were ſpared, were led priſoners to Conſtantinople, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation: and with them the Countie Yſolan, for his valor and noble courage vnworthy of ſo hard a fortune. Howbeit, that he by liuely and pregnant reaſons ſhewed, both himſelfe & the reſt to be vniuſtly detained, as taken priſoners contrary to the publicke faith vnto them before giuen, within the aſſurance of the capitulation agreed vpon with the Baſſa, and out of the actions of war. Whereunto it was againe anſwered him, That the towne when it was taken, was yet ſtill in his power, and he at choice whether he would deliuer it or no. That if he would by the yeelding vp of the town challenge his liberty, according to the articles of the capitulation, he ought then to haue deliuered it as was agreed, & not to haue ſuffred it to haue bin taken by force, according to the ordinary proceeding of war: the laws whereof do iuſtly condemne to death, or to captiuity, ſuch as are by force of arms vanquiſhed. That euery town which during the treaty of capitulation, is by force taken, followeth the courſe of the latter condition and ſtate, & not of the former, ſeeing that it is conquered and not deliue-

A red. That this is the reaſon that they are puniſhed by the rigor of armes, which haue not bin carefull to preſerue themſelues by the ſweetneſſe of peace: for that a man is not to expect of his mortall enemie any other curteſie, than that which neceſſity cauſed him to promiſe, which he may for his owne good againe violate, as he for the good of his enemie againſt his wil hath granted. With which quirkes and quillets the Countie deluded, ſay what he could, was carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople, where wee muſt for a while leaue him. Aud ſo the Baſſa hauing in eighteene dayes taken Alba-Regalis, (now being eleuen moneths poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians) cauſed the breaches he had made, to be againe repaired, and the citie well prouided for both of victuals and munition, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon of 6000 ſoldiers; and with his people hauing ouerrun all the countrey as far as Strigonium, roſe with his armie and B retyred againe to Buda: where as he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwixt Buda and Peſth, for the more eaſie tranſporting of victual, and better relieuing of the one the other as need ſhould require; and hauing brought that worke to paſſe, and about to haue gone to the ſiege of Strigonium; commaundement came from the Great Sultan, That hee ſhould with all ſpeed returne to Conſtantinople, for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a moſt valiant man, was now minded to employ him in his wars againſt his Rebels in Natolia, where things now went not well, as ſhall be hereafter declared. Vpon which commaundement, the Baſſa gaue leaue to all ſuch in his armie as had charge of any place, forthwith to returne to their ſeuerall places of gouernment: appointing ſome others with thirtie thouſand ſouldiors, in the companie of Zachel Moyſes (but of late Prince Sigiſmund his Lieutenant) to go with him into C Tranſyluania: who after the ouerthrow he had there receiued by Baſta, was come vnto this great Baſſa, offering vnto him, with ſuch an aid as was now appointed for him, and the helpe of ſuch other his friends as he had in Tranſyluania, to chaſe Baſta with his Germanes from out thence, and to reduce that Prouince againe vnto the deuotion of the Othoman Emperours, as it had in former time beene. And ſo by the way of Belgrade Haſſan Baſſa himſelfe with the reſt of his Armie haſted towards Conſtantinople. Which hee was thought the more willingly to do, for that the Great Sultan before his ſetting forth had put him in good hope to marrie one of his Aunts (a woman of great wealth and honour) if by the winning againe of Alba-Regalis he ſhould make himſelfe worthie ſo honourable a match; after which he now D longed.

But long it was not after his departure, but that the Imperials now at laſt aſſembled together at Comara, to the number of about 30000 men, with twelue * Naſſadies and two gallies, ſome by water, ſome by land, marched downe alongſt the riuer to Strigonium; where were alſo 20 other ſhips readie to receiue them, and ſo all embarked, were by the Lord Ruſſworm and other the Imperial Captaines conducted to Buda, there with ſome notable enterpriſe to redeeme the diſgrace by them before receiued in not relieuing of Alba-Regalis. Whoſe comming was ſo ſudden and ſo vnlooked for of the Turks there, as that they had not any time to take in any greater helpe or prouiſion than was alreadie in the citie. And for as much as the Chriſtians knew the good ſucceſſe of this their enterpriſe taken in hand, not ſo much to depend of their ſtrength, as of their politique proceeding and ſpeedie diſpatch of the matter begun, they thought it not good to vſe any long delay, or to ſpare for any labor, but ſo ſoon as they might, by taking of the Water-city (or as ſome call it, the Iewes ſuburbes) ſo to cut off the paſſage of them of Buda to Peſth, as alſo from thence to trouble them in the caſtle and the vpper city of Buda. Which their intended exploit they happily attempted and brought to paſſe in this ſort: The citie of Peſth ſtanding right ouer againſt Buda, is (as we haue oftentimes before ſaid) diuided from the ſame with the great and ſwift riuer of Danubius; ouer which the Turkes vpon boats had with great labor and coſt of late built a moſt eaſie and commodious bridge for paſſage or carriage of things from the one citie to the other. This bridge the Imperials thought neceſſarie firſt to breake, the more eaſie to beſiege either the one or other city; and for that purpoſe had by a ſtrange deuice built a ſhip, which by the force of the ſtreame carried downe the riuer, and reſting vpon the bridge, ſhould by a wonderfull power breake the ſame. Which ſhip the Turkes ſeeing comming downe the riuer with the reſt of the Fleet after her, they ran by heapes, eſpecially out of the Water-Citie, to the bridge for the defence thereof: where whilſt they were thus buſied, Countie Sultze on the other ſide by land with a petard blew vp one of the gates of the city, and ſo entering and killing all ſuch as he light vpon, came vnloo-ked for vpon the backs of the Turks at the bridge, of whom ſome he ſlew, ſome he draue into G the riuer, who there periſhed; the reſt, in number not many, by ſpeedie flight retiring themſelues into the citie: whereupon he had now brought ſuch a general feare, that they all as well the ſouldiers as the citiſens, with the Chriſtians at their heeles, with as much haſte as they could tooke their refuge into the vpper citie of Buda, much ſtronger and better fortified than was the lower citie. At which time the bridge was by them vpon the riuer broken alſo, ſo that now the one citie could no more thereby relieue the other as before.

The Water-citie thus woon, and the bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to beſiege either the one or the other city. But for that they of Peſth might with their great Ordnance much anoy them in the beſieging of the caſtle and the vpper city of Buda, they thought H beſt to begin with it firſt: which they did in much like ſort as they had before done at the lower citie of Buda, the ſame deuice againe wel proſpering in their hand. For the Lord Ruſſworm with the fleet vpon the riuer making a great ſhew as if he would euen preſently on that ſide haue entered, had with the ſtirre by him raiſed, drawne downe moſt part of the garriſon ſoul-diors vnto that ſide of the towne, where moſt ſhew of danger was: whileſt in the meane time Countie Sultze with the gouernor of Althem (before vndiſcouered) vpon the ſudden by land ſcaled the other ſide of the citie, and gained the walls, the Turks yet dreaming of no ſuch matter. But hereupon began a terrible outcry, the Turkes ſtanding as men aſtonied, eſpecially now feeling the Chriſtians weapons in their bodies, before they knew they were got into the I citie. In this ſo great an amazement ſuch of them as could fled into the ſtrongeſt towers, the reſt hid themſelues in cellars and other the moſt ſecret corners they could finde, out of which they were afterwards by the Chriſtians drawne and ſlaine. They which were retired alſo into the towers and other ſtronger places of the city, ſeeing the great ordnance bent vpon them, and now out of all hope of reliefe, offered to yeeld; requeſting only, that they might with their wiues and children with life depart; promiſing for that fauour ſo ſhewed them, to perſuade them of Buda alſo in like manner to yeeld. Vpon which promiſe, that their poore requeſt was granted, and the Lord Nadaſti with certaine other Captaines ſent with ſome of theſe citiſens of Peſth, with their wiues and children to Buda: who comming thither, according to their promiſe moſt earneſtly requeſted them of Buda to yeeld, for that they were not now to K expect any further helpe, and that by their fooliſh obſtinacie they ſhould be the cauſe of the death of them, their friends, their wiues, and children. Vnto whom alſo, to mooue them the more, the Lord Nadaſti promiſed in the name of General, That they ſhould all excepting ſome of their chiefe Commanders in ſafetie depart. Howbeit they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but ſtood ſtill vpon their gard. In this city of Peſth, well inhabited with Turkiſh Merchants, the Chriſtians found great ſtore of wealth, which all became a prey vnto the ſouldiers, with a thouſand horſes for ſeruice, many great pieces of artillerie and much other warlike prouiſion.

The citie of Peſth taken by the Chriſtians.

Peſth thus woon, and a ſtrong garriſon left therein, they returned againe ouer the riuer to beſiege the caſtle and vpper citie of Buda, which they attempted by vndermining the ſame, as L alſo by batterie, hauing placed ſome of their great ordnance ſo high, that they could at their pleaſure ſhoote into the middeſt of the ſtreets of the Citie; wherewith they much troubled the Turks, not a little before diſcouraged with the loſſe of Peſth; thundering alſo at the ſame time with their other batteries in diuers places of the walls both of the caſtle and of the citie: Where vnderſtanding that the Turkes garriſons of the frontier Townes and Caſtles thereabouts (hearing of the ſiege) were comming to the reliefe of their diſtreſſed friends, they ſent out their horſemen with ſome part of their footmen againſt them: who meeting with them, gaue them a great ouerthrow, and ſo with victorie returned againe vnto the reſt of the Armie lying at the ſiege, being ſtill in hope either by force or compoſition to become Maſters of M the citie.

The vpper citie and caſtle of Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

But whileſt they lay in this hope, and hauing the twelfth of October brought their approches neerer vnto the wall,s had there planted certaine notable pieces of batterie, with purpoſe the next day with all their power to haue aſſaulted the Citie; behold, the Viſier Baſſa hearing (by the way as he was going to Belgrad, & ſo to Conſtantinople) that the city of Peſth was

A was woon, and Buda beſieged; changing his mind, returned in haſte with ſuch forces as he had yet left; and ſo vnlooked for, came and ſat downe before Peſth, being not then aboue fiue and twentie thouſand ſtrong, but thoſe all for the moſt part old and expert ſouldiers. But whileſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of Peſth on the one ſide of the riuer, and the Imperials at the ſiege of Buda on the other, diuers braue attempts were in both places giuen both on the one ſide and the other. The Chriſtians in Peſth beſieged by the Turks, hauing amongſt them di-uers braue captains, and deſirous of honor, one day vnder their conduct ſallied out of the citie to skirmiſh with the Turks; and comming with them to the ſword, by plaine valor diſordered them, and enforced them to flie, & ſo allured with the ſweetneſſe of the victory, purſued them B euen to the trenches: from whence a great ſquadron of the Turks horſemen and harquebuſi-ers at the ſame inſtant iſſuing out, and with their multitude ouercharging the Imperials, conſtrained them of force to retire: in which retreat, Countie Maximilian Martinengo (one of theſe aduenturers) doing what hee might both with his valour and direction to haue ſtayed the diſordered retreat of the Chriſtians, was with many others ſlaine: wherewith the reſt diſcouraged, tooke their refuge towards the citie. Which they of the garriſon beholding, ſent out certaine companies to relieue them; by whoſe comming out, the furie of the Turkes was not onely repreſſed, but they alſo euen vnto their trenches again repulſed. Shortly after which hot skirmiſhes, the Lord Ruſſworm with the other Chriſtian Captains on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing with continuall batterie made ſuch a breach into the caſtle, as that the ſame ſee-C med to be now ſaultable, in good order came on with certaine companies of their footmen appointed for that ſeruice (and ſo couragiouſly aſſailed the breach: where the Turks, who before had expected this aſſault, hauing in beſt ſort they could repaired the breach, and on both ſides thereof placed diuers murthering pieces, with great ſtore of dangerous fire-workes, at ſuch time as the firſt companies of the Chriſtians ſought couragiouſly to haue entred the breach, ouerwhelmed them with that deadly fire, and ſo rent them with their murthering ſhot, that they no faſter entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and ſlaine; with the ſight whereof, they which were appointed to ſecond them, nothing diſcouraged, but ſeeking deſperately to haue entered, and with the taking of the caſtle, and ſlaughter of the Turks, to haue requited the death of their fellowes, were themſelues in like ſort welcommed. So that now a thouſand D of them being loſt, the captaines conſidering how much the loſſe of ſo many braue ſouldiers concerned the whole enterpriſe taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the loſſe of the greateſt part of them, they cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo the aſſault for that time to be giuen ouer.

A notable skir miſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

But long it was not that the Viſier Baſſa (thus retired as aforeſaid) had lien before Peſth, but that by reaſon of his ſudden returne, great wants began to ariſe in his camp; his ſouldiers for want of food beeing glad to eat their dead horſes, a pound of bread being ſold for two Hungarian Duckats, and a buſhell of oates for fiue, and yet hardly ſo to be gotten: which wants in that ſo waſted a country ſtil more and more encreaſing, & many of his ſouldiers ſecretly ſtealing away from him, he had much adoe by al the means he could vſe, to perſuade them there E to ſtay eight daies longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done, than ſome few weake attempts giuen, and ſome light skirmiſhes made, rather for faſhions ſake than for any hope of preuailing, and the want of all things ſtill encreaſing; hee with the reſt of the Commanders fearing ſome ſudden miſchiefe to bee done them by the hungrie and diſcontented ſouldiers, the ſecond of Nouember, cauſing his baggage to bee truſſed vp in the dead time of the darke and ſilent night, riſe with his armie, and ſo in haſte retired directly to Belgrade, leauing behind him in his campe three hundred dead horſes, not yet eaten by his hunger-ſtarued ſol-diers. Immediatly after whoſe departure, the Lord Nadaſti and ſome other of the commanders in the armie, with fiue thouſand ſouldiers and certaine great pieces of artillerie, ſome by land, ſome by water, went downe alongſt the riuer to Adom, a faire well built towne vpon the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from Buda, and ſeruing as it were for a ſtorehouſe for the garriſon there: Which towne Nadaſti ſummoned by his Huſſars ſent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Which they of the towne at the firſt refuſed to doe: but afterwards ſeeing a far greater power come, prouided of great ordnance and all things elſe requiſit for a ſiege, they with the ſight thereof diſcouraged, without more ado offered to yeeld the towne, ſo that they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart; which they did, the Chriſtians conducting them as far as Feldwar, which caſtle was alſo at the firſt ſummons, G by the perſuaſion of them of Adom deliuered vnto them: for they of the caſtle, by them enformed of the great ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and of the ſtore of great ordnance they had brought with them, and that they ſtaid there with but faſt by, were eaſily perſuaded to hearken to their friends, and ſo yeelded. Which done, the free Haiducks the ſame night ſurpriſed alſo the caſtle of Pax: from whence the Chriſtians ſtill marching on alongſt the riuer, tooke in alſo the citie of Tolna.

But whileſt Nadaſti with the reſt were thus buſied in taking theſe caſtles and towns alongſt the South ſide of Danubius, they in the camp at Buda were aduertiſed of the new deſignes of the Turkes Lieutenants and Captaines thereabout, for the reliefe of the beſieged: as that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Gouernors of Caniſia, Sigeth, and others, had aſſembled an army of H thirtie thouſand for the raiſing of the ſiege. Wherefore the Chriſtians doubting as they lay at the ſiege diſperſed, to be by them oppreſſed, leauing their tents in their trenches, gathered themſelues together into the Water-city: which the Turks out of the vpper city quickly perceiuing, as feeling themſelues now at ſome more libertie, preſently ſallying out, took both the trenches and the tents ſo left, with no ſmall ſlaughter of ſuch as were left for the keeping of them: and ſo poſſeſſed of the trenches and the tents, held them by the ſpace of two houres, vntill they were by ſtrong hand by the Chriſtians beaten out, and ſo with ſome loſſe inforced againe to retire into the citie. The Lord Nadaſti alſo, with the reſt that had taken the aforeſaid caſtles and towns vpon the ſide of Danubius, making a rode towards Alba Regalis, in their returne I within a mile of Buda light vpon a thouſand Turks there gathered together, moſt part of whom they ſlew, and hauing put the reſt to flight, took ſome fifty of them priſoners. At which time alſo another of the Imperiall Colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turks comming to the reliefe of the beſieged, not far from Buda, ſlew moſt part of them, took an hundred and threeſcore of them priſoners, with a number of horſes and much other rich bootie, all which he brought into the campe. Neither were they at the ſiege in the mean time idle, their great artillerie ſtill thundering againſt the wals both of the caſtle and the citie: ſo that by the fury of the cannon hauing beaten downe a ſtrong tower next vnto the Danubius, not far from the kings ſtable, they were a little before night about to haue there entered, when ſuddenly ſuch a tempeſt of winde and raine ariſe, as that they could not poſſibly vſe their pieces, K or well any other weapon: ſo that the heauens as it were then fighting for the enemy, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the aſſault begun. Which ſtorme was no ſooner ended, but that two thouſand of the Turkes both horſe and foot, to keepe the Chriſtians otherwiſe buſied, ſuddenly iſſuing out of the citie, charged vpon the Stirian horſemen; who preſently relieued by the men at armes, ſo welcommed them, that hauing loſt an hundred and threeſcore of their men, they were glad with more ſpeed to retire, than they came out. But ſeeing ſome of the Chriſtians that ſo hardly purſued them, ſome ſlaine, and ſome hurt from the wals; taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleuenth of Nouember) they ſallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were ſlaine, yet fell they out againe the third day alſo, L and were againe by the Countie Thurne with great loſſe of their men beaten backe into the citie: wherein purſuing of them, the Chriſtians were by certaine Ianizaries (laid cloſe for that purpoſe) ſuddenly aſſailed and dangerouſly gauled, the Countie himſelfe beeing hurt in his left arme, and ſome other captaines ſlaine. In all which ſallies, although the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, yet thereby they gained time in ſome good ſort to repaire againe their breaches.

The ſiege of Buda for feare of the Tartars giuen ouer by the Chriſtians.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the ſiege, certainely enformed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (hauing made themſelues way through Valachia) where comming as farre as Temeſwar to relieue Buda; thought it not beſt (eſpecially now that Winter was come) to abide the comming of that ſo great a Northern tempeſt, M but betimes whileſt they had yet ſpace, to raiſe their ſiege and be gone: Which they did the ſixteenth of Nouember, leauing the Water-citie, with all that they had got about Buda, againe vnto the enemie: onely Peſth they furniſhed with victuals and all things elſe neceſſarie, leauing therein almoſt ten thouſand ſoldiers in garriſon, for the defence therof againſt the barbarous rous enemy. As for Adom it was ſtrengthened with a garriſon of Hungarians only, with their wages offred to be paid before hand; which for all that, they refuſed to accept; alledging that for the great danger this place was expoſed to aboue others, they could not ſafely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to do what beſeemed valiant ſoldiers, in ſuch ſort as that all men ſhould well vnderſtand, that nothing euill ſhould happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

The ſiege of Buda for feare of the Tartars thus giuen ouer, and the Imperials departed and gon, the Turks forthwith came downe out of the higher citie into the lower, declaring their ioy for the recouerie thereof, by the often thundring of their great ordnance, with diuers other ſignes of triumph. But whileſt in their iolitie they ſpared not by the mouth of the cannon to ſend commendation to them of Peſth, they from them againe receiued the like; but in ſuch rude manner, that the Turks wearied with ſuch greetings, requeſted them to ſpare their ſhot and pouder, and quietly to liue by them as became neighbours for that Winter vntill the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this ſtrife ſhould be ended by their Emperors, the weaker yeelding vnto the ſtronger either the one or the other citie. Yet for all this their great ioy, their cheere in Buda was not great, victuals by this ſiege being become ſo ſcarce, that it was by the Turks feared, That if the Chriſtians had there longer lien, they ſhould for verie want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the city. Of which their need their friends not ignorant, and hauing made what prouiſion they were able for their reliefe, were with a great conuoy bringing the ſame towards Buda: whereof the garriſons of Comara and Strigonium hauing intelligence, went preſently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, ouerthrew the conuoy, and carried away all that prouiſion of victuals; like vnbidden gueſts making themſelues merrie with that which was neuer prouided for them.

Theſe doubtfull wars of Hungarie, with the general reuolt of Tranſyluania much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like vnto the warres he had in Aſia againſt the Scriuano and the rebels his followers; the euill ſucceſſe whereof (as moſt dangerous to his State) ſo much tormented his haughtie minde, as that it would ſcarce ſuffer him to thinke of any thing els. For the Rebel encouraged with the ſucceſſe of the laſt yeares wars, and ſtil growing ſtronger and ſtronger, (by reaſon of the great number which, allured with the ſweet name of libertie, hope of prey, or the good entertainment by him giuen, dayly more and more reſorted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turks dominions in Aſia, putting all to fire and ſword that ſtood in his way, ranſacking alſo diuers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more eaſily do, for that the Ianizaries of Aleppo and Damaſco, with many other their partakers and fauourits, which might greatly haue hindered his proceedings, were at the ſame time alſo vp in arms, and together by the eares amongſt themſelues, to the great benefit of the Scriuano: who in the midſt of the courſe of theſe his deſired fortunes, fell ſicke of a natural diſeaſe, and ſo died. By whoſe death the rebellion was no whit appeaſed, (as commonly in like caſe it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in ſhort time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scriuano was no ſooner dead, but that a yonger brother of his no leſſe warlike & couragious than himſelfe (to the great contentment of the rebellious) ſtept vp in his place, fiercely proſecuting the wars his brother had before him taken in hand. Againſt whom Haſſan Baſſa by commandement from the grand Seignior with a great armie ſetting forward, with hope in that newneſſe of his command to haue oppreſſed him, and ſo to haue quenched that ſo ſpreading a fire; at length met with him, that was eaſie enough to be found, and ioyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloudie fight ouerthrowne and ſlaine together with his whole army, except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight ſaued themſelues from the furie of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his beſt commanders and ſoldiers into thoſe parts for the ſubduing of him, for that cauſe called Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungarie to ſerue againſt this new Rebel: who in the meane time following the courſe of his victorie, made hauock of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vſe all ſuch tribute as was in thoſe Countries and others alſo farther off, due vnto the great Sultan; hauing of late exacted onely of the citie of Ancyra and and the countrey thereabout, three hundred thouſand duckets: ſo by exacting of great ſummes of mony from the countrey people (ſuch as be his enemies) heaping vp great treaſures for the maintenance of his wars.

Diuers incurſions of the Tartars into the frontiers of the Emperours territories, and much harme by them there done.

Now though Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor had called home Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungarie, to go againſt the rebels in Aſia, (as is aforeſaid) yet had he before prouided, that for the better aſſurance of his townes and territories in Hungarie, the Tartar Han with a great power of his Crim Tartars ſhould euen againſt that time come downe into that countrey. Which rough and needie people dwelling neere vnto the fennes of Meotis, for pay or prey always readie to do the Othoman Emperors ſeruice, ſetting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himſelfe, and of his two ſonnes, and by plaine force breaking through Valachia, though not without great loſſe of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free Haiducks a whole day) were now in the later end of December with their huge companies come into Hungarie, the Han himſelfe with fortie thouſand to Quinque Eccleſiæ, and his ſons with twentie thouſand moe into Poſſega (a fertile countrey lying betweene the great riuers Sauus and Drauus) where they ſpoiled all as well the Turks as the other poore Chriſtians, pretending all that frontier countrey with the whole command thereof to be giuen vnto them by Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor in reward of their good ſeruice. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to ſhew for what they came, they enforced the Chriſtians thereabout to victual Caniſia for the Turks: and ſo breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the neereſt Fortreſſe of the Chriſtians towards Caniſia) carried away aboue two thouſand Chriſtians captiues: and ſhortly after ſurpriſing Keſchemet a great and populous towne, ſlew moſt part of the inhabitants, and carried away the reſt priſoners. Other ſome of them alſo at the ſame time making an inrode to Sharuar, and hauing burnt twentie villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thouſand ſoules into moſt miſerable captiuitie and thraldome. They alſo at their firſt comming relieued them of Buda, the Lord Nadaſti with his Huſſars, who before kept them from victuals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer ſo to do. By them alſo the Turks encouraged, tooke and burnt certaine places poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians neere vnto Buda, putting them all to the ſword that they found therin. So that the poore countrey of Hungarie (neuer to be ſufficiently pittied) with the reſt of the countries and prouinces belonging vnto the houſe of Auſtria, and confining vpon the Turke, were not ſo much eaſed by the calling home of the Viſier Baſſa with his army, as they were now annoyed by the comming of theſe roguiſh Tartars, a people wholly euen from their infancie giuen to the ſpoyle. Againſt whom for all that, the Chriſtians beſide their ordinarie garriſons, began now euen in the depth of Winter to oppoſe ſome other of their forces alſo: the Palatine of Rhine ſending ten companies of horſemen to Poſſonium, from thence to be ſent to Sharuar for the defence of Stiria: and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the Emperour) for his part raiſing foure hundred horſe, a thouſand Huſſars, and three thouſand of the free Haiducks for the repreſſing of thoſe Tartars: the Duke of Brunſwick alſo at that time for the ſame ſeruice ſending thither a thouſand horſe with two thouſand foot, againſt thoſe ſworne Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion.

THe troubles of this yere thus ouerpaſt, Alba-Regalis being by the Chriſtians loſt, Peſth with ſome other places woon, Tranſyluania recouered, Buda beſieged, the Viſier Baſſa returned, and the Tartars come into Hungarie, Ianuarie with a ſharpe froſt began to open the next yere; by force whereof the riuers in many places, but eſpecially in thoſe more Eaſterly countries, were not onely frozen ouer, but ſeemed rather euen wholly turned into yce: Danubius that great riuer (for all his ſwift courſe) beeing then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard froſen, that men and carts might ſafely paſſe too and fro thereupon. Which ſo hard a ſeaſon for all that did no whit freeſe but rather encreaſe the hot deſires of the greedie Turks, ſtill breathing after the vtter ſpoile and ruine of the Chriſtians dwelling neere vnto them. For which purpoſe, they euen in this dead time of the yeare, and extremitie of nature (which commonly affoordeth vnto moſt mortall enemies a ceſſation from armes) out of their garriſons of Sigeth, Buda, Caniſia, Alba-Regalis, Babotz, and ſuch other places, raiſed an armie of eighteene thouſand ſtrong, to haue forraged and ouerrunne the Chriſtians, with their territories confining vpon them; Quermanie with the countrey thereabout beeing the places by them aſſigned to haue felt the firſt force of their ſudden rage and furie. Of which their deſignes Collonitz, Gouernour for the Emperour in thoſe parts, vnderſtanding, to preuent the ſame, and to meet with their forces, with all ſpeed put into the ſuburbes of Quermanie a thouſand Reiſters, and two thouſand Lanſquenets; and in the Burroughes thereabouts laded the regiment of the Countie Reingraue, with ſix companies of the Coſſackes, foure thouſand Haiducks, foure hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred horſe of the Regiment of Collonitz; with whome was Collonitz himſelfe, commanding ouer all theſe troupes: a man for his worth euery way anſwerable vnto his charge. Who for the more aſſurance of this Countrey, ouer which the enemie now houered, commaunded all the inhabitants thereabout to take vp armes; and withall, with good and ſtrong barricadoes to ſtrengthen the wayes, and ſtop vp the paſſages into their countrey: which they right cheerefully performed, with their weapons in the one hand, and their ſpades and ſhouels in the other. Of which their ſo great reſolution the Turkes vnderſtanding, changed their purpoſe. For they conſidering the aſſured danger they were to vndergoe, in forcing of theſe troupes, ſtanding vpon the wals of their defence, & ſtrong in their reſolution, changed their former deſigne, for the inuading of Quermanie (where they for the ſpace of fiue weekes together had by the Chriſtians been expected) and vpon a new reſolution marched along by Roquesbourg, with purpoſe to haue loaded themſelues with the ſpoyle of the countrey thereabout. Which their new deſigne cauſed Collonitz to gather together his forces to croſſe and fruſtrate them therein: which hee did by fauour of the riuer, which both ſtrengthened him againſt their incurſions, and was well to be defended. But the Turkes, whoſe purpoſe was not to fight, but to haue robbed and ſpoiled the countrey at their pleaſure, finding now contrarie to their expectation, ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, and their deſignes diſturbed, in fine, gaue ouer their enterpriſe, and ſo againe retired; contenting themſelues to gather a conuoy of victuals to put into Caniſia, which then lay in great extremitie for want thereof. Which victuals they drew out of the villages thereabout, and ſo came to Babotz, to march to Caniſia, a towne moſt commodious for ſuch an aſſemblie, and for the relieuing of Caniſia. Of this their purpoſe Collonitz (who ſpared for no coſt) by his eſpials aduertiſed, euen hee which before was appointed as a prey vnto his enemies, began now to plot with himſelfe, that they ſhould become a prey vnto him: their cowardiſe, by ſo many precedent effects declared, had giuen him the meanto aduenture vpon them, and the hope to ouerthrow them. A neceſſarie conſideration in martiall affaires, for Commanders to put in execution their deſignes, at what price ſoeuer: for that it is better to loſe in the performance of them, with the preſeruation of their reputation, than otherwiſe to gaine with the loſſe thereof: for that it preſerued, ſtill ſtriketh a feare of their valor into the mindes of their enemies, oftentimes ouercome euen with this their apprehenſion thereof: Whereas otherwiſe they might happily ouercome, in the aſſurance by them conceiued of their enemies cowardiſe.

A great froſt.

An army of the Turkes raiſed out of their garriſons.

Collonitz in armes againſt the Turkes.

The Turkes for feare of the Chriſtians cowardly retire.

Vpon which reſolution this braue Colonell the foure and twentieth of March with his troupes marched towards little Comara, about two leagues from Caniſia, and lay with them cloſe in ambuſh in the woods neere vnto two mariſhes, ouer which the Turks had made two bridges to paſſe the great artillerie and wagons vpon: the Turks being well neere 20000 ſtrong, and our men but 8200, whereof there were 2200 horſemen, and 6000 foot, a ſmall number in compariſon of their enemies. But whileſt that thoſe men lie thus cloſe in ambuſh, with a purpoſe to doe ſome notable exploit, let vs in the meane time run to Peſth, to ſee what there in the meane time paſſed.

The Turkes after the loſſe of Peſth much grieued to haue this impoſtume ſo neere their hearts, ſought to breake it to our hurt, employing all their treacherie to gaine our garriſon ſouldiers, and with their forces to diſtreſſe them of victuals. And the Chriſtian armie was no ſooner riſen from before Buda, but that the Turks came downe againe into their baſe towne; which they found much ruinated and in euill eſtate. But the ioy of their conqueſt buried in it all the obiect of their ſorrow, and the feeling of their griefe; the leſſer paſſions alwaies giuing place vnto the greater, and ſorrow finding no place at all in the middeſt of their immoderate ioy. Whereof they gaue a number of teſtimonies, by the thundring of their great ordnance, by fires of ioy, and vollies of ſmal ſhot; all which their fury they diſcharged vpon them of Peſth; who with the like courteſie requited them, ſending them backe againe bullets for bullets. Which now became a common exerciſe among the canoniers, paſſing the time in theſe actions, more vpon a brauerie than to any purpoſe, ſmall harme being done thereby either on the one ſide or on the other: in ſuch ſort, that in the end the Turks better aduiſed, requeſted our men to ceaſe from ſuch ſhooting, as they on their part would doe likewiſe, and to expect the end of the negotiation of peace, of a certaine begun (as they ſaid) betwixt their Princes; but meaning indeed by this meanes to ſpare their pouder, ſhot, and paines, and to reſerue them to their better vſes.

Buda diſtreſſed for want of victuals.

And yet for all this triumphant ioy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of victuals, the late ſiege hauing deuoured all their prouiſions, and no new ſupplie thereof as yet come vnto them: inſomuch, that their greateſt care was now how to come by victuals, without which they muſt needs forſake their city. Of which their ſo great neceſſity the other garriſons in the places thereabout aduertiſed, aſſembled themſelues to take order therefore; and hauing prouided 200 wagons, loded with all manner of neceſſary prouiſions at Alba-Regalis, with a conuoy of 6000 ſouldiers put themſelues vpon the way toward Buda. Of all which their proceedings the garriſon of Strigonium hauing got vnderſtanding, and ioyning vnto them the garriſon of Comara, met with them vpon the way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, and charged them; and ſo with great confidence on both ſides came to handie blowes, the Turks being in number ſtronger, and our men in valour and reſolution; the waggons in the meane time ſtanding ſtill, as the motiue of the charge, and appointed for a prey vnto the victors. But our horſmen beeing for the moſt part Huſſars, well acquainted with ſuch charge, with their diuers courſes greatly troubled the enemies, our footmen in the meane time charging them alſo with a number of harquebuſiers: againſt whom the Turkes with the ſame armes and like courage defending themſelues, and many of them being ſlaine, and the waggons gained from them, gaue place vnto their valour, and ſo were almoſt all cut in pieces. The waggons thus ſurpriſed, were diuided as a rich bootie among the victors: fortie whereof were ſent vnto the garriſon at Peſth; who were well content that the enemies trauell and wealth had been gathered for their good, and without their owne paines to ſolace themſelues with the fruit of their enemies labours.

The Turkes in carrying a conuoy of victuals to Buda ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians.

But what ſhould we ſay? The moſt ſure reſolutions are ſometimes by chances croſſed, and tempeſts otherwhiles ouertake vs, euen in the enterance of the deſired port. The Turkes of Buda vnderſtanding of the bruit of this medley, and that it was for their bread, poſted in haſt to haue ſuccoured their troupes, and arriued at the ſame time that our men victoriouſly led alongſt by the Riuer of Danubius the waggons they had before gained. At the ſight of which obiect, they animated with hunger after the victuals, and with deſire to bee reuenged vpon the men, charged them. But our men, who thought of nothing more, but that they were victorious, and poſſeſſors of their enemies bootie, ſeeing theſe new come enemies ſo furiouſly to charge them, daunted with the preſent perill, and with the conſideration thereof onely poſſeſſed, bethought themſelues of nothing elſe, but how to ſaue themſelues, and to leaue their honour, bootie, and the field, all as ſpoiles vnto their enemies. The furious countenance of the Turkes, and their number ſurmounting ours by 1500, ſo bereft them of their reſolution for to fight for their liues and waggons, as that they without more adoe quite forſooke them, accounting themſelues happie enough if they might but ſaue themſelues. And the Turkes without farther purſuing of them, contented to haue recouered their victuals, left them, and ſo returned homeward, driuing their waggons along the banke of Danubius. But ſee the wind which by and by changed, and hauing as it were with a ſudden tempeſt vndertaken euen at the enterance of the port to ſwallow vp both the one and the other, ſent the garriſon of Peſth vpon them of Buda to ſtay them. Great changes of fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh men with ſhewes, bringing forth effects quite contrarie to their expectation. Theſe Turkes ſtayed vpon their retreat by the comming of theſe new come aduerſaries, did euen as ours had done before. For not willing to prefer their good before their life, and more greedie of victuall than of battell, they quitted their prize, and retired. For our men in number two thouſand, were ſeized of a forreſt about the middeſt of the way whereby the Turks were to paſſe, & which they could by no means ſhun; and diuided into two companies, kept themſelues cloſe there in ambuſh, reſolutely attending for the comming of their enemies. Of which their purpoſe the Turks not aware, and ſtill preſſing on forward, found themſelues hardly charged, before they could ſee them by whom they were ſo charged; one of our companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks incloſed betwixt them, and in ſo great and ſudden a feare not knowing againſt whom to defend themſelues, without any great reſiſtance betooke themſelues to flight, leauing their waggons, and caſting away their armes: yet ſo, that a number of them were left dead vpon the place, ſome others of them taken priſoners, and the reſt chaſed euen vnto the gates of their citie. But our men beeing victors, with the waggons, and a number of priſoners returned home, and by the mouth of their great artillerie gaue a thouſand teſtimonies of their victory vnto the ſorrowfull cowards, who themſelues alſo carried the heauie newes thereof vnto the reſt of their fellowes ſhut vp within the citie of Buda.

The conuoy of victuals again recouered from the Chriſtians by the garriſon of Buda.

The ſame conuoy of victuals recouered from the Turkes by the garriſon of Peſth.

But ſee againe the change of Fortune, conſtant only in vnconſtancie, as the ſequell ſhortly after ſhewed. Danubius that great riuer was then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard frozen, that men and catts might now ſafely paſſe too and fro thereupon. In which ſo hard ſeaſon, the Turkes in garriſon at Buda hauing once vpon the frozen Riuer braued the Chriſtians in Peſth, and the two and twentieth of Ianuarie in like brauerie comming out the ſecond time, were by the garriſon ſouldiers of Peſth put to flight, and by two hundred of the moſt forward and valiant ſouldiers hardly purſued; vpon whome, not onely they which fled, but other of the Turkes alſo out of Buda in greater number returning, chaſed them likewiſe backe againe euen to the bridge, whereby they were to haue paſſed into the Citie: which now drawne vp for feare of greater harme from ſuch a number of Turkes as were now come out, and were readie to haue entered at the heeles of the flying ſouldiers; the poore ſoules ſo ſhut out, and too weake for ſuch a multitude as then had them in chaſe, were there euen in their friends ſight euerie man ſlaine, the Turkes themſelues with little harme returning to Buda.

The garriſon ſouldiers of Peſth ouerthrowne by the Turks of Buda.

Neither long laſted the ioy of this victorie: for within a few dayes after, one Letbner a Captaine of the Chriſtian garriſon in Peſth, more grieued than the reſt with the loſſe of ſo many valiant men, and ſome of them his frends and companions alſo; certainely vnderſtanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda, with two of their greateſt Commanders, and a great traine of gallant Gentlewomen, were for their pleaſure the next day about to goe vnto the hoat Bathes neere vnto Buda, and taking with him threeſcore musketiers, the night before ſecretly vpon the yce paſſed ouer the Riuer, and ſo not farre from the Bathes lay cloſe in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their deſired prey. In which expectance they lay not long, but that theſe Turkes caſting no perill, came accordingly as they could haue wiſhed, and in thoſe pleaſant Bathes merrily bathed and ſolaced themſelues: fooles to ſeeke after the pleaſures of peace amidſt the gulfe of the miſeries of warres, and ill aduiſed to aſſure themſelues of faire weather in a ſtorme ſo neere at hand. For in the middeſt of all their delights theſe reſolute men came ſuddenly vpon them, not fearing any ſuch danger, and ſlew all the men, ſparing none but one boy and the Gentlewomen: who in the time of the conflict, naked as they were, ran as faſt as they could into the Citie, feare hauing in them ouercome the modeſtie of their ſexe. Which exploit done, the Captaine leauing the Turkes ſlaine in the Bath (now become red with their bloud) returned with his ſouldiers, laded with the rich bootie, and merrily ſporting at the naked gentlewomen: with whoſe fearefull crie they of Buda ſtirred vp, ſent out certaine of their garriſon after them, but to no purpoſe; for why, they were in ſafety before got home. By continuance of this froſt, by reaſon whereof victuals could not be ſent down the riuer, the ſouldiers in garriſon at Peſth were driuen to ſuch wants, as that dogs and cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turkes their enemies ſtill roaming about in the fields, to keepe them from victuals, and to encreaſe their neceſſitie.

The Turkes in bathing themſelues at Buda, by them of Peſth ſurpriſed and ſlaine.

Great want of victuals in Peſth.

Of theſe neceſſities the Turkes of Buda were partakers alſo, hunger-ſtarued as were the other, but yet euerie day in the field to ſeeke reliefe. They knew right well, that hunger was hard to bee deceiued, beeing ſtill in action and vigilant: and therefore they ſought ſome meanes how to deceiue our men, ſtill attending vpon them, and ſo to aſſure themſelues of victuals. To which end they gaue it out, and made ſhew as if they would haue beſieged the fort of Adom, diſtant about two leagues from Buda: Vnder the colour whereof, they receiued into their citie a conuoy of fiftie waggons laded with victuals and munition: which our men hindered not, for that they had no ſuſpition of any ſuch purpoſe of theirs. With which reliefe the Turkes encouraged, gaue knowledge thereof vnto their ouerthwart neighbours in Peſth by a thouſand great ſhot, which they in thundering manner ſent ouer the Riuer vnto them, as from men of courage, and deuoid of feare. Howbeit, that this action was more vaine than profitable vnto the Turkes, who for the diſpence of their ſhot and powder gained not ſo much as the life of one ſouldier, nor one ſtone out of the walls of Peſth. Vpon this jolitie theſe ſame garriſon ſouldiers of Buda ſhortly after thought to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Palotta, a ſmall Caſtle of the Chriſtians, by night: but beeing in good time diſcouered, were deceiued of their hope, and with the loſſe of an hundred and twentie of their men enforced to retire: vnto whome Gaſpar Horwad Captaine of the Caſtle, by a countrey peaſant before ſworne to doe the errand, ſent a little pot full of ſalt, and a bottle of wine, willing them (in deriſion) with that ſalt to ſeaſon the Veniſon they had taken in their late hunting, and to emptie that bottle to quench their thirſt, and to cheere them vp after their late conqueſt.

Buda victualled.

The Turks ſeeking to ſurpriſe Palotta, themſelues ouerthrowne.

This jeaſt more prouoked theſe enemies, galled ſo to heare of their ſhame and loſſe; in ſuch ſort, that in reuenge thereof they diſcharged a ſhower of thundering great ſhot and ſmall bullets vpon the garriſon of Peſth, which in great abundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to ſmall purpoſe: for that their cannons beeing euill leuelled, ouerſhot the towne, carrying with their thundering bullets more feare than they did hurt: yea that worſe was, the ruine made by their great batterie fell vpon their owne citie. For while they were thus thundering, fire by negligence of the cannóniers fell into one of their barrels of powder, which taking hold of another, and ſo running along, as if it had been by a traine of purpoſe layed, burſt out with ſuch force, that it ouerthrew a long peece of the wall of Buda, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the ſouldiers neere vnto it. The noiſe of this thunderclap was great, and the force thereof terrible, ſo that it reuiued them of Peſth with ſome good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes beeing from thence retired. Vpon which occaſion the Gouernour of Peſth reſolued to giue an aſſault vnto the place, and to make vſe of the meane that Fortune, without his paine or trauell, had put into his hand. Whereupon taking with him a thouſand Almaines, and three hundred Hungarians, he foorthwith (in hope of good ſucceſſe) marched toward the breach; and happily had preuailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a companie of Turkes, who gaue an alarme vnto them of the vpper towne, who vpon that brute of their approch manned their wals, and with great ſpeed repaired the breach. Now all that they of Peſth could doe, was to reuenge themſelues vpon theſe Turks whom they had met withall, who were there all ſlaine, except ſome few, whom they ſaued, and carried priſoners vnto Peſth, to be by them inſtructed of the enemies affaires.

A breach made in the walls of Buda by the negligence of a cannonier.

Siliſtria ſpoiled by the Vayuod of Valachia.

A About this time Radul Vayuod of Valachia aduertiſed, that the Turkes in garriſon at Siliſtria were gone abroad into the countrey to ſeeke after bootie and victuals, with his ſouldiers paſſed forthwith ouer the Riuer Danubius vpon the yce, to ſurpriſe the towne, now bared of the garriſon: whoſe men for the deſire of the riches of the place, and for feare leſt the garriſon ſouldiers ſhould returne before they had gained the place, with redoubled force and courage ſo aſſailed the towne, that the Turkes diſmayed, and deeming the number of the Chriſtians that ſo furiouſly aſſayled them to bee greater than indeed it was, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe by them taken in hand; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, left the way open for them to enter: who forthwith ouer the dead bodies of their B enemies thruſt into the town, took the whole ſpoyle thereof (which was both great and rich, as being a towne well peopled) & ſo ſet fire vpon it, to the intent that it ſhould no more ſerue for a place for the enemie to retire vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich, returned with his ſouldiers laded with ſpoyles of their enemies, before that the Turkes could gather themſelues together to hinder their retreat. And vnto George Baſta, who was then in Tranſyluania in armes againſt the Turks, for his part of the bootie he ſent him thirteene of the enemies Enſignes.

But our troups are now too long in their ambuſh, where the valiant Collonitz holdeth them cloſe, attending the comming of the Turkes, and of their conuoy to Caniſia; now wee muſt draw them out of their Sentinels and ſee what effects their deſignes ſhall bring forth. Theſe C braue ſouldiers had now lyen three dayes in their ambuſhes without diſcouering of any enemie, vntill that the ſixth of March three eſpies fell into their hands, whome the Turkes had ſent forth before, to diſcouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But theſe faithfull Infidels ſo taken, would not by any meanes diſcouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours: So that in fine the Generall mooued with their obſtinacie, commanded one of their heads to be ſtrucke off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them that which faire entreatie and perſuaſion could not. The other two that were yet aliue diſmayed with this ſpectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at laſt conſtrained to confeſſe, That they were the enemies ſpies, ſent forth to view the country, to ſee if the Chriſtians had any forces there, able to let their cannons and waggons to enter into Caniſia; which not D appearing, and they reporting vnto their companies, that the countrey was cleare, that then within two dayes after the conuoy was to paſſe euen by the ſame place where they then lay, to be put into Caniſia, ſetting forth from Babotz two houres before day. Our men thus enformed of the enemies deſignes, forced their hope to defeat them, and againe retired themſelues into their ambuſcado's, attending for their hoped prey, in ſuch ſort, that our men in their conceits held the victorie now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two houres after the taking of theſe ſpies, the Haiduckes, layed without the principall ambuſcado, and hidden in the *thi*ckets and buſhes, diſcouered a cornet of horſemen, with fiue enſignes of the Turks, come out of Caniſia, marching to meet with the conuoy, in ſafetie to conduct the ſame in- E to the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto the Generall of the arriuall of the enemie, to the end he might reſolue what was beſt in that caſe to be done. Which opportunitie Collonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his horſemen in good order, to encloſe the Turkes betwixt the mariſh and the wood, and to cut them ſo encloſed in pieces. The Turks hauing diſcouered nothing but the mariſhes and the woods, held on their way, and ſo as men hauing their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For beeing come into the danger, the Chriſtian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, and diſordered them; The Hungarians fell vpon their flankes, which they opened; and the horſemen preſſed them at their backes. Theſe poore miſerable men ſo encloſed, not knowing againſt whome firſt to defend themſelues, and ſeeing death vpon euerie ſide of them, became as beaſts to bee ſacrificed vnto the furie of the Chriſtians. The ſmall reſiſtance that they made deſerued not the name of a fight, beeing all ſlaine, and hauing themſelues not ſlaine one man; layed by heapes one vpon another, not hauing ouerthrowne ſo much as one of their enemies: In ſuch ſort, that of ſix hundred men that were there together, there were not foure of them ſaued. Their horſemen which followeth them, ſeeing them ſurpriſed, in ſtead of relieuing them, ſhamefully fled, and thinking by flight to ſaue themſelues, whileſt that their companions were in maſſacring, preferred G their liues before their honour: For if it bee a ſhame for ſouldiers in fight to flie with the ſafetie of their friends, it muſt needs be an irreparable diſhonour to flie and leaue them to the ſlaughter. But our Carabins taking the occaſion for their aduantage, no more ſpared their horſes in the purſuit of theſe Infidels, than they had done their hands in the defeating of their fellowes: but purſuing amaine after theſe fugitiues, ſlew a number of ſuch of them as were worſt mounted, and purſued the reſt euen to the gates of Caniſia. Thoſe of the towne at this tumult raiſed an alarme, ſhot off their great artillerie, and diſcharged many vollies of ſmal ſhot againſt our men, as well to ſtay the purſuit of our men, and to ſaue their owne, as to giue warning vnto them that were to bring the conuoy, that our men were in the field, ready to ſurpriſe them. But during this fight, three of the Turks horſemen paſſing well mounted, and exceeding H hardie, aduentured to paſſe by our troups, and vpon the ſpurre to meet with them which were bringing of the conuoy, and to giue them warning of the ouerthrow, and that they ſhould again returne to Babotz. Which their ſo braue an attempt Fortune fauoured, as not willing to fruſtrat the deſert of ſo well deſeruing valour. And the Turks vpon the way with the conuoy, now vpon this aduertiſement returned, and retired themſelues againe into the Caſtle from whence they came.

Babotz in vain beſieged by Colloniz.

But our men aduertiſed of this their retreat, & as it were deceiued of the hope by them conceiued for the intercepting of the conuoy, vndertooke an exploit much more hautie, braue, & dangerous: for forthwith they made head toward Babotz, with a reſolution to carry the place; I and though they were almoſt ſixteene miles from it, yet they reſolued to goe thither, and to make themſelues maſters therof. And ſo marching cheerfully on, therein vſed ſuch diligence, that about nine of the clocke at night they arriued at the place: whither they were no ſooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their enemies, to make their conqueſt the more eaſie. The greatneſſe of the attempt it ſelfe ſerued well to that purpoſe, but yet the beleefe more, if they could driue into their enemies minds the ſufficiencie of their forces, for the performance of ſo great an exploit. Which cauſed them to ſound their trumpets, to ſtrike vp their drums, to remooue their artillerie, to ruſſle with their armes, to keepe a ſtirre with their ſouldiers, and to make the noiſe not of a ſmall, but of a puiſſant and great armie. But the Turks in number twice ſo many as were our men, and within a good and ſtrong place, were not with K ſuch a bruit to be carried away, but ſtanding faſt vpon their guard and reſolution, prepared themſelues for fight, and how to receiue our men, if they ſhould attempt to aſſaile them. Now whileſt the alarme thus ſounded, our companies aduanced themſelues, repeating oftentimes the name of Ieſus, and making themſelues readie for to fight. This skirmiſh began with a thouſand cannon ſhot which the Turks out of their Caſtle deliuered vpon the troups of the Chriſtians, and their muskets ſtill playing from the curtaine of their wals, ſo that the caſtle ſeemed as if it had been a mountaine of fire. All which terrors no whit ſtaied the hope of our reſolute footmen, who paſſing thwart theſe flaming ſhowers, marched along the counterſcarp of the ditch toward the gate of the towne, to haue broken open and forced the ſame. The Turkes at L the ſame time were come forth out of the towne, making ſhew as if they would haue ſallied forth vpon our men, and haue fought with them. But at the ſame inſtant that they charged the front of our footmen, they were by them ſo encountered and beaten backe, that hauing loſt ſome of their men, they were glad againe to retire into the towne: where they did there endeuor to defend themſelues, not daring afterward to fight without the fauor of their wals: within which it ſtood them vpon to haue both courage and power, being ſtill furiouſly aſſailed by our men, who planted vpon the towne ditch, with their muskets and harquebuſes ſo plied the Turks vpon their wals and in their holds, as that they durſt not ſhew themſelues or looke out for the ſhowers of lead which they thundered vpon them. And aſſuredly, if our men had then had inſtruments wherwith to haue opned the gates or the wals, as wel as their muskets & harquebuſes M had made a breach into the reſolution of the Turks, the town had vndoubtedly bin ours: but this deſigne being not before foreſeene, neither intended, wanted the meanes to put it in execution; ſo that, for want of Petards and of ſcaling ladders, the place remained ſtill the Turkes, and ſaued it ſelfe out of our hands. In fine, our men hauing beene foure houres in fight before

A before it, both doing and receiuing harme, and finding no mean to enter the place, were enforced to ſound a retreat, and to leaue it.

In which retreat the Chriſtians burnt certaine villages of the enemies, rather to ſhew that they had beene there, than for any their valour therein: ſeeing that things inſenſible, which follow the order of their nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them without reaſon. This done, they of purpoſe retired to little Comara: for the long time that they had kept the field, the diuers exploits by them done againſt the enemies, and the common report of the vanquiſhed, had ſtirred vp the enemies, ſo that they began now on euery ſide by heapes to flocke together, to ſwallow them vp, and euen now preſſed vpon their retreat. So Collonitz in B deſpight of the enemie, in ſafetie brought backe his ſouldiers: and being entered into Comara, cauſed the heads of the principall of the ſlain enemies to be ſet vpon the pikes of the paliſadoes, & vpon a great pine tree ſtanding before the gate, which for this purpoſe had almoſt all the branches lopped off. An action learned from the cruelty of the Turks, and now done by the Chriſtians, more to aſtoniſh and deterre them from this their cruell cuſtome, than for any glorie or profit enſuing thereby: ſeeing that to tyrannize vpon a dead body, is but a ſigne of cowardiſe, and an action altogether vnprofitable.

Collonitz retireth to Comara

This done, our men departed from this caſtle, as men worne, and almoſt ſpent with trauell and wearineſſe, but yet more with famine. For why, they thinking to haue executed but that deſigne which had put them in armes, and that in ſo ſhort a time alſo, had taken no prouiſion of C victuals with them: ſo that they were all pined with hunger, ouercome with watching, and halfe dead with labour. Their horſes alſo in like ſort languiſhed, the countrey being alike cruell both to the one and to the other. For beſide that it was vnfruitfull for ſuch as held the field (all the fruits thereof beeing gathered together and carried into the towns by the men of warre) it was not poſſible for our men to forrage, or to ſeeke for victuall there, and to come to an happie end of their deſigne, for that they had raiſed an alarme abroad in the countrey, and ſo perhaps might themſelues haue become a prey vnto them, whome they ought to prey vpon. Which was the cauſe that our ſouldiers had for the ſpace of three daies eaten nothing but crabbes and acorns which they found in the woods which couered their ambuſhes: ſo that beeing now come vnto this Caſtle, they deuoured a world of victuals, and requeſted D euerie one of them to returne againe vnto their garriſons; their bodies weakened with hunger, beeing ſcarce able to beare their armes. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were aduertiſed, that the Turkes ſhut vp the wayes whereby they were to make their retreat home; in hope eaſily to ouercome men alreadie with hunger brought low, and to kill the bodies which trauell alreadie had ſpent. Howbeit, the great courage of our men fruſtrated this the enemies deſigne, and ſaued themſelues. But ſo farre off was it that this aduertiſement diſmaid Collonitz, that euen to the contrarie it the more encreaſed his courage, as appointed for his glory: being glad to haue ſuch an occaſion offered him for the ſhewing of his valor, although it were through the middeſt of danger, death, and ſlaughter. So that in ſtead of ſhunning the combat, whereas it was reported, that the Turks with great aſſurance E marched neere vnto a Caſtle of the Chriſtians, to make head vpon a paſſage whereby our men were to retire; hee turned head toward the ſame place, with a firme reſolution, with true valour vpon the ſudden to encounter the enemie, which had thought to haue ſurpriſed him by cowardiſe. And the ſouldiers, weakened with hunger, although they well apprehended the danger of this deſigne; yet reſting vpon the great reſolution of their Generall, and conſidering the neceſſitie they had to goe farther for their ſafetie, vpon a good courage were content to follow whither ſoeuer their Generall would: who led them directly vnto the aforeſaid Caſtle, where it was expected that the Turkes ſhould haue charged them. But being come thither, there was no bodie to be ſeene: and yet our men, as hungrie as they were, ſtayed there one day in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their enemies; who for all that, hauing no minde to meet them, appeared not, but gaue them time and libertie in ſafetie to F retire themſelues euery man vnto his own garriſon, to refreſh themſelues, and to recouer their ſtrength.

The notable reſolution of Collonitz.

But now whileſt our men of Warre, after theſe troubles in Tranſyluania and Hungarie, repoſe themſelues; let vs in the meane time take our journey to Conſtantinople, and goe vnto the marriage of Haſſan Baſſa one of the Viſiers of the Graund Seignior, and laſt yeare Generall of the Turks armie in Hungarie.

At ſuch time as he departed from this great Citie, to goe vnto the conqueſt of Alba-Regalis, [G] Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, reſolued to ſet all vpon the regaining of this citie, cauſed to be preſented vnto him a Crowne and a Sword, the one in reward of his valour, if hee returned with victorie from this exploit; and the other in reuenge of his cowardiſe, if he failed in the performance thereof: promiſing him indeed his ſiſter in marriage, amongſt other the glorious rewards and trophies of his victorie: and threatning him with death, as a puniſhment amongſt the griefes of his diſhonour. But it came to paſſe, that by the cowardiſe of our men, he came vnto the effect of his deſire (as is aforeſaid) and tooke the citie, which promiſed vnto him the glorious triumph in Conſtantinople.

Haſſan Baſſa after the winning of Alba Regalis honorably receiued at Conſtantinople

And vnder the ſweet influence of this Planet he returned to Conſtantinople, where he found all things in readineſſe for the ſatisfying of [H] his expectation, and the aduancement of his glory. He is magnificently receiued of his Prince, courteouſly ſaluted by all the nobilitie, and with greateſt reuerence poſſible honoured of the people. And as he had happily diſcharged his charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in readineſſe for the performance of the promiſe of the grand Seignior his Lord and Maſter: who had cauſed them to be in moſt ſumptuous manner prouided for the ſolemnizing of the marriage, and the contentment of the Baſſa.

The Spahi and Ianizaries in mutiny, demãd audience of the great Baſſaes.

But nothing now wanting that hee could haue deſired or wiſhed, more than the very ſolemnizing of the marriage it ſelfe, and that alſo euerie day of all men expected; the Ianizaries and Spahi, with the other ſouldiers of the Court, to the number of fiue and twentie thouſand, euen vpon the ſudden, when as no ſuch thing was feared, came and in armes preſented themſelues before the Diuano, or Tribunall, [I] holden for the chiefe adminiſtration of Iuſtice in the Turkes Palace, the firſt foure dayes in euerie weeke: and hauing ſet guards at the Court gates, the more ſafely to execute what they were before reſolued vpon, proudly demanded to haue audience for certaine of the Spahi and Ianizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all to deliuer vnto the great Baſſaes their grieuances, and the cauſes of that their aſſemblie Who as ſoone as they were entered into the Diuano before the Baſſaes (of whom the moſt couragious of them was not without feare, as looking for nothing but for preſent death) they at the firſt demanded to haue Haſſan Baſſa deliuered vnto them: Who thinking that his head ſhould haue ſerued for a ſacrifice to pacifie this their furie; as a man altogether diſmayed, wan and pale, paſſed through this mutinous multitude, to haue gone vnto the great Sultan, proteſting of his owne [K] innocencie, and calling vpon his Prophet Mahomet, to diſcouer vnto them the truth of all things.

Haſſan Baſſa in great feare of his life.

But they, after a thouſand iniuries and reproaches by them heaped vpon him, rudely demanded of him, whence it proceeded, that whileſt hee with a great part of the forces of the Empire was buſied in Hungarie, for the recouering of Alba-Regalis, there was in the meane time no good order taken for the repreſſing of the Rebell in Aſia; who by ſufferance was (as they ſaid) now growne ſo proud, as with Enſignes diſplayed to come within three or foure dayes iourney of Conſtantinople, the Imperiall ſeat of the Othoman Emperors. Whereunto hee in no ſmall feare anſwered, That he for his part had done his duetie, as well while hee had the charge of the armie in Aſia, as now of late whileſt hee had the like charge a- [L] gainſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie, as euen the enemies themſelues could witneſſe. But ſeeing himſelfe euen readie to die, hee yet requeſted them, That his guiltleſſe death might bee vnto the State in general profitable: and in diſcharging of his conſcience, to declare vnto them the cauſes of this contempt and neglect, for the ſuppreſſing of the Aſian Rebell, which they were ſo deſirous to know. It proceedeth (ſaid hee) onely from the euill gouernement of the Grand Sultans mother (who then all commanded) and from the negligent careleſneſſe of the Capi-Aga. Which his ſpeech although they with much impatience and ſtorming gaue eare vnto, yet hearing him ſo well to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the blame there where they were well content it ſhould reſt; they gaue him leaue to goe to the great Sultan, to requeſt him that they might ſpeake with him; and further to deale with him, that they might haue [M] the head of them who had beene the cauſe of this diſhonorable ſeruice, or otherwiſe cowardly behaued themſelues in the managing of the warres againſt the rebels in Aſia: Threatning him withall, That if hee failed to performe this his charge, hee ſhould not faile to feele the heauie effects of their iuſt furie. An heauie charge, yet glad was the Baſſa to vndergoe the ſame, to rid himſelfe out of their hands, where hee ſaw himſelfe in greater danger, amongſt them, A them, moſt of whom had ſometimes ſerued vnder him, than amongſt ſo many his moſt mortal enemies: but what remedie? he muſt now ſo do or die therefore; for which he was the more to be excuſed. So in great feare comming vnto the great Sultan, almoſt as fearefull as himſelfe, he ſhewed vnto him the great danger like euen preſently to enſue, by the mutinie of his beſt ſouldiours, and guarders of his perſon: perſuading him, betime to appeaſe their fury, before they had embrued themſelues with bloud; for feare of further danger like enough to enſue, as well vnto his owne perſon, as vnto the reſt of his moſt faithfull and truſtie Counſellors, from ſuch furious headſtrong men, vp in tumult with their armes in their hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the greatneſſe of his Eſtate to do any thing as thereunto forced by his ſubiects, leſt in ſo doing he might breed in them a contempt of himſelfe, and B increaſe their inſolencie; that yet neuertheleſſe in this action, being altogether extraordinarie, he was not to reſt vpon that point: for that theſe mutinous ſouldiers turned not their weapons (as they pretended) againſt his Imperial power and ſoueraigntie, but rather to the contrarie, againſt the contemners thereof, ſeeking to be reuenged vpon them that had done him ſuch euill ſeruice for the maintenance of his Honour and Majeſtie, and for the puniſhment of the inſolent and diſloyall. And that therefore the juſtice of the cauſe requiring and couering the malice of the fact, he was of opinion, That it were beſt for him to yeeld a little vnto the zeale of theſe his beſt ſouldiers, and to ſatisfie their juſt deſire, although they had by verie euill and vnlawfull meanes ſought for the ſame. And therefore aduiſed his Majeſtie, in ſome ſort to ſatisfie the juſt complaints of theſe men, armed for the reuenge of his honour: and to chaſtiſe C the chiefe Commanders of his Aſian Forces, ſuch as by whoſe treacherie or cowardiſe his ſeruice being neglected, had armed theſe men againſt them: with the ſame hand puniſhing ſuch as had wronged his Majeſtie in honour, and appeaſing the diſcontented for the good of his ſeruice. Mahomet thus by the Baſſa perſuaded, as alſo to ſhew himſelfe in his Majeſtie vnto theſe his diſcontented Subiects, one part of their deſire; the neceſſitie of the cauſe ſo requiring, in his Imperial ſeat preſented himſelfe vnto them, accompanied with the Mufti (the great Mahometan Prieſt) and ſome few others of the reuerend Doctors of their Law: who by the Sultan commanded to ſit downe, and the Baſſa's ſtanding vp (ſo great the reſpect is to men of that ſort, euen in a barbarous Nation of ſo ſmall reſpect) the chiefe of the ſeditious ſtepping forth, demanded leaue to ſpeake both for himſelfe and the reſt. Which being granted, he boldly D thus began;

Haſſan Baſſa perſuadeth the Great Sultan to giue way vnto the Ianizaries, and to grant thē their requeſt.

Mahomet by the perſuaſion of Haſſan Baſſa ſheweth himſelfe to the mutinous ſouldiours of the Court.

Moſt happie and mightie Emperour, we the Spahies and Ianizaries thy obedient Slaues, full of griefe and diſcontentment to ſee a great part of thine Empire in danger to be loſt; deſire to know of thee the cauſe why thy Greatneſſe doth not remedie it, and employ the meanes which God hath giuen thee. They ſuppoſe that the Rebels courſes in Aſia are vnto thee vnknowne, ſeeing they haue beene ſo hardie as to come in Armes ſo neere vnto thy Imperial Citie, the place of thine abode, and that without any let or reſiſtance. They deſire to know if all this haue beene made knowne vnto thee, and whether thou wilt take vpon thy ſelfe the care of the gouernment of thy great Monarchie, or no; which through the negligent careleſneſſe and euill gouernment of ſome by thee put in truſt, is like vnto a bodie with great and well proportioned members, but of little or no ſtrength or power. Or elſe, that thou void of care, canſt be content that all ſhould be diſmembred, and ſo euery man to take vnto himſelfe what he can lay hand of, as the rebels do in Aſia.

The proud and rude ſpeech of one of the Mutiniers vnto Mahomet the Great Sultan.

Now let no man maruell at this preſumptuous rude ſpeech of a proud Ianizarie vnto his ſoueraigne: for why, they are the men which may moſt boldly ſpeake in Turky, they are the ſtay of the Turks Empire, the great Sultans children acknowledging no other father but them: nay rather the Great Turke himſelfe is their creature, for they raiſe him vp and confirme him in the Empire: they are his greateſt ſtrength, and vnto them he is moſt beholden. If Mahomet were with ſo inſolent a ſpeech much moued, he was not iuſtly to be therefore blamed: howbeit being beſet with ſuch a furious multitude with weapons in their hands, and hauing no meanes to withſtand their fury, he wiſely diſſembled his inward choler, and with a faire countenance and a majeſtie full of mildeneſſe, with the beſt and calmeſt words he could deuiſe, ſought to appeaſe them: imputing the diſorder and euill ſucceſſe of his affaires vnto the vnfaithfulneſſe of his miniſters, and the concealing of the truth thereof from him. Saying more-

Sultan Mahomet with milde words ſeeketh to appeaſe the mutinous ſouldiers of the Court.

ouer, That before this their complaint he had reſolued to reforme theſe matters, and to take C from them all occaſions of diſcontentment, or for them to vſe any ſuch ſpeech as was not beſeeming them; whoſe obedience and reſpect of loyal dutie vnto him their Soueraigne, ſhould haue beene an example vnto the reſt of his ſubiects. Vpon which ſpeech, they fiercely demanded of Haſſan Baſſa, Why he had not giuen an account vnto his Maieſtie, of the Rebels proceeding in Aſia. Who anſwered, That he had neuer failed of his dutie therein, but that he had beene alwayes hindered ſo to do by the Capi-Aga; ſaying, That it was not needfull to trouble him their Soueraigne therewith, (hauing committed theſe matters to others) but to reforme and amend them as well as they might otherwiſe, without giuing of him any ſuch diſtaſte concerning theſe matters. And further, That the cauſe of all theſe diſorders proceeded from the Empreſſe his mother, the Capi-Aga, and ſome few others, vnto whom he had commended H the mannaging of thoſe his affaires. With which his anſwer the Mutiners more mooued, furiouſly ſaid, That they were thither aſſembled to demand the heads of ſuch offendors; being reſolued to take another courſe, if he ſhould refuſe to grant it them: [meaning thereby to make a new Emperour.] Whereunto for all that, the great Sultan anſwered, That it was no reaſon, neither that hee would for their humours put ſuch as they demaunded innocently to death; but willed them to reſt themſelues contented, vntill it might by order of iuſtice be tried whether they had deſerued death or no, and that then he would giue them euen his owne ſonne, if he were found culpable. But the mutiners conſtant in their reſolution, againe replied, That he had not by juſtice put his brethren to death, but for the preſeruation of the State; and that thoſe whom they ſo demanded were ſo guilty of that wherewith they were charged, I as that they deſerued not to haue an orderly trial: That the lawes, how juſt ſoeuer, ſhould be vnprofitable, and juſtice iniurie, if they were not by them to be puniſhed; and that therefore it muſt needs be ſo, or els that they would take therein a courſe themſelues. As for the Empreſſe his mother, they were contented that ſhe ſhould be confined vnto ſome place farther off, and no more to meddle in matters of State. A ſtrange thing it was, to ſee ſo great a Prince ſo to be forced by the ſedition and mutinie of his ſubiects, to deliuer ſo great an officer of his Court as was the Capi-Aga, with ſuch others as they required, to be vſed at their diſcretion.
But the violent reſolution of theſe moſt inſolent men ſo vp in mutinie, made the Sultan Mahomet wiſely to yeeld to what they demanded, cauſing the Capi-Aga and the others to be brought forth; who preſented themſelues vnto their furie as men alreadie halfe dead. Mahomet K did what he might to haue ſaued them, but the mutiners with a great and dreadfull clamour ſtill cried out to haue them diſpatched, neither could they be appeaſed vntil they ſaw their heads ſtrucke from their bodies. For the loſſe of whom ſo deere vnto him, Mahomet inwardly grieued, to be in ſome part reuenged commanded the executioner to proceed, and to do vnto ſome other of the chiefe Baſſa's (whom he knew to be much beloued and reſpected of the Ianizaries, and whom he could haue been content to haue been rid of) as hee had done vnto the Capi-Aga and the reſt: but then the murmuring and mutinie of the Ianizaries was in ſuch ſort increaſed, and as it were redoubled, as that Mahomet was for feare forced with patience to temper his choler, and by giuing way ſo to appeaſe them. The Empreſſe the Sultans mother for all that was not then confined, but reſerued to the further troubling of the L State.

Haſſan Baſſa excuſeth himſelfe, and layeth the fault vpon the Empreſſe Mahomet his mother and the Capi-Aga.

The Capi-Aga with ſome others executed.

Mahomet glad to giue way vnto his mutinous ſouldiors.

Other cruelties of Sultan Mahomet.

With like tyrannie, and no leſſe injuſtice, Mahomet but a few dayes before had cauſed Capin one of his great Baſſa's to be beheaded; but whether it were for the deſire he had of his wealth and riches, or for the enuy of his honor and valor, was vncertaine: howbeit the former cauſe ſeemed vnto many to be the more probable, for that Mahomet immediatly after his death tooke the whole ſpoile of his wealth, and ſeiſed vpon all his goods except 400000. duckets, which Caly Baſſa father of the dead Baſſa had detained for himſelfe. Which his purloyning Mahomet hauing diſcouered (as the eye of the couetous man is alwayes fixed vpon his prey) demanded one day of the Baſſa, If it were true that he had retained vnto himſelfe thoſe 400000 M duckets. Which fact the Baſſa, partly for feare, and partly for couetouſneſſe conſtantly denied, and ſwore himſelfe to be guiltleſſe from any ſuch crime. Whereupon he was forthwith taken, and thinking by lying to haue ſaued his life, was for the truth put to death, without any further examination of the matter, hauing his head ſtruck off. Such is the ſmall aſſurance euen of the greateſt that liue in tyrants courts. Neither reſted his greedie minde ſo contented with the Baſſaes bloud; for why, that ſerued but for a ſhew; it was his wealth muſt worke that cure, which was all forthwith ſeiſed vpon, rifled, and carried away to ſatisfie in effect the greedy appetite of the hungrie tyrant, who changed the dowrie and ſucceſſion of the wife and children of the dead Baſſa, into bonds, chaines, priſons, and ſlaueries.

Mahomet Baſſa by the Ianizaries ſlaine.

Mahomet another Baſſa with theſe cruelties diſmaied, and perceiuing the like euill hap and danger to hang ouer his owne head, that had ouerwhelmed Calil and his ſonne; reſolued to haue prouided for himſelfe againſt this miſchiefe, by flying vnto the rebels in Aſia. But this his purpoſe diſcouered by certaine ſpies (which ſerue as means to open a way vnto the Turks crueltie) and he with one of the chiefe followers of Capin Baſſa taken by the Ianizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

The ſucceſſe of the rebels in Aſia.

But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, the rebels with all diligence proſecuted their rebellion in Aſia, and bent their forces againſt the great townes there. Their army was exceeding great, euery man ioyning himſelfe vnto the firſt forces which were in good eſtate, being not as yet by any greater power repreſſed, and rich with the ſpoiles that they had taken. Theſe men had beſieged Angore a great and ſtrong towne in Aſia, and ſeemed reſolutely ſet downe for the carrying thereof. Whereof the citiſens being afraid, and out of hope of reliefe, came to parly, offering vnto them a ſum of money to redeeme themſelues and their citie: and ſo in fine agreed to giue them 200000 Duckats; vpon the readie payment whereof, the rebels without more adoe preſently departed.

Shortly after, the new Captaines of Sultan Mahomet arriued there alſo, whom he had placed in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeaſing of the ſouldiers of the court, who would needs make it treaſon, and put to death the citiſens, for hauing giuen ſuch money as is aforeſaid, vnto the rebels, though it were done for the preſeruation of their liues: as if the lawes were to be reſpected in the horrours of neceſſitie, or that life were to become a ſlaue vnto riches, and riches not made for the vſe of mans life. Well, needs they would for this ſuppoſed treaſon (as they pretended) haue put them to death, and ſacked their citie; but indeed all was in their greedie furie to haue carried away that which the rebels had in their mercie left them. Theſe poore citiſens with this ſo cruell a reſolution diſmayed, and out of all hope of finding fauour at ſuch mercileſſe mens hands, reſolued now to hazard all, and ſo vpon the ſudden taking vp armes, ſtood vpon their owne defence. Hereupon aroſe a great and cruell fight betwixt theſe ſouldiers and the citiſens, both the ſubiects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the ſelfeſame ſuperſtition: but the one ſide armed with pride and couetouſneſſe, and the other with neceſſitie and deſpaire: howbeit at laſt the iuſter cauſe preuailing, the citiſens ouercame theſe new come ſouldiers, and hauing ſlaine a great number of them, chaſed the reſt out of the citie. This euill encounter of theſe new Captaines euen at the firſt enterance into their charges, giuen them by the ſubiects themſelues, encreaſed the rebels courage, ſo that they being in number fortie thouſand, vnder the leading of one of the Tartar Han his brethren, beſieged Burze a great and rich Citie, being the ſtore-houſe for the warlike prouiſions of Aſia, and the place whereunto the Turkes cuſtomes, taxes, and ſubſidies of Aſia were brought, and there kept. Theſe men after certaine dayes beſtowed in the ſiege, and great reſiſtance made by the beſieged, at length by force carried the place, ſlew the inhabitants, and ſacked the citie. Which exploit gracing their fortune with honour and bootie, increaſed alſo their power and reputation, ſo that redoubled on all ſides, and increaſed with courage and ſpoyles, Mahomet diſmaied, reſolued by faire meanes to appeaſe them, and to entreat with them of peace. This good fortune had drawne vnto their part the Gouernor of Babylon, either wearie of the ſeruice of the Turke, or deſirous by the ruine of the State in generall, to increaſe his owne power: whoſe reuolt greatly increaſed the rebels power, and diminiſhed the grand Seigniors. Beſide theſe miſhaps alſo, the great Shaugh of Perſia (commonly called the Sophi) thruſting himſelfe into theſe diſorders, to make his gaine, and to fiſh (as they ſay) in a troubled water, had now taken Corbery, a ſtrong town vpon the borders of the Turks empire, and was making himſelfe ready for new conqueſts. All which tempeſts ariſing as it were in one together, cauſed Mahomet to ſtrike ſaile, and maugre his Imperiall dignity and honor, to ſeek for peace; which indeed could not be great in ſuch weakneſſe of his nature, neither braue in ſuch his great want of courage. For great dignities and honors without valor to maintaine them, are but like rich garments which couer bodies almoſt rotten, but heale them not.

The Turkes together by the eares among themſelues.

Mahomet deſirous to come to ſome good agreement with his rebellious ſubiects,at length(but not without his great diſhonour)obtained the ſame;granting to them all their demands,diſarming them by yeelding vnto them, and not by valour: and giuing vnto Zellalie one of their chiefetaines, the honourable place of the Baſſa of Boſna,to content his ambition,and to binde him therewith to doe his ſeruice. The readie way by ſufferance to encreaſe the diſloyall ſubiects courage, in ſtead of ſtopping their furie by the ſeueritie of Iuſtice: for to grace a rebell with offices of authoritie,is but to arme him with lawfull power,for him the better to vndertake whatſoeuer ſhall beſt fit his appetite and deſire,vpon the hope of his owne priuat and certaine profit or aduancement.

The captaines and ſouldiers murmure againſt their Sultan Mahomet.

Mahomet his other captains and men of war,ſeeing this diſhonorable peace of their Prince, and preferment of the rebels,honored with honors and dignities,in ſtead of paines and puniſhments which they ſhould of right haue for their rebellion indured; began to enter into great murmuring and diſcontentment againſt their great Sultan. They conſidered his vniuſt dealing and baſe feare,in aduancing the rebels vnto ſuch honors and dignities,as of right belonged vnto his moſt faithful and loyall officers and ſeruants, by ſuch their vnworthie preferments making them ſlaues vnto his enemies, and vaſſals vnto the rebels: they, to their diſhonour and loſſe,by their inſolencie and treacherie,inioying the honours and preferments of right due vnto their faithfull and loyall ſeruices. Which dangerous perſuaſions tranſported them ſo far from their allegeance and dutie, as to vndertake a greater and more perillous matter againſt his crowne and dignitie, than had the rebels before by taking vp of armes in the field againſt him, whereunto the aſſured knowledge they had of his cowardiſe encouraged them alſo: ſo that their reſolution was to thruſt him out of his Imperiall State,and to ſet vp his eldeſt ſon called alſo Mahomet in his place. Theſe are the ordinarie effects of iniuſtice and cowardiſe, the ouerthrow of Princes; their iniuſtice through crueltie arming all creatures againſt them; and their cowardiſe through contempt diſpenſing with euery man for his dutie: ſo that hee muſt bee iuſt, that will keepe his ſubiects in order; and valiant, that muſt hold them in awe.

Mahomet in danger to haue beene depoſed from his empire and his eldeſt ſon ſet vp in his place.

Vnto theſe diſcontentments theſe mutiners ioyned alſo (as I ſaid) the ſlothfulneſſe, effeminatneſſe,and inſufficiency of Mahomet,vnfit to deale in matters of eſtate,and altogether vnable to manage armes. He was too cowardly,as they thought,to repreſſe their valor by force, and too weake to croſſe their deſignes by wiſedome: which not a little encouraged them in that their ſo deſperat and dangerous a reſolution. They drew alſo into this their plot the Sultaneſſe Mahomet his chiefe wife, and mother to the yong Prince: who blinded with ambition (the bane of great ſpirits) had not the hap to reiect their perſuaſions,as dangerous vnto her and her ſon,but ſhutting her eies againſt the due conſideration of loyaltie and duty, caſt both herſelſe and her ſonne headlong into the midſt of moſt deſperat dangers.

This proiect (of no leſſe importance, than of the depoſing of one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World) reſolued vpon, ſome of theſe men,according to the manner of the Turkes,ioyning ſuperſtition vnto their deſignes,conſulted with an Aſtrologer,concerning the ſucceſſe of the actions of the young Prince, whome they were about to enſtall in his fathers Imperiall throne. This man to be excuſed in his trumperies, ſeeing that to deceiue is the chiefe point of his art, erected the figure of the Princes natiuitie,conſulted with his ſpirits,conſidered the cœleſtial bodies,and in fine arriued at the point of his iudgement,for the good and welfare of the Prince: and thereupon diſpatched an Eunuch towards the Sultaneſſe, with theſe pleaſing ſpeeches, That ſhe ſhould be of good courage,and in aſſured hope that the young Prince her ſonne within a few daies ſhould haue the Imperiall crowne ſet vpon his head, and the royall ſcepter put into his hand: his art (as he ſaid) promiſing vnto him theſe honours, by the fauor of the cœleſtiall bodies, of whome he had learned theſe newes; and by the conference with ſpirits, from whom hee had this aſſurance. But ô the vaine and fooliſh knowledge of man againſt God! attributing vnto the ſecond cauſes, that which altogether belongeth vnto his owne power; robbing him of his owne prouidence,which extendeth ouer all,to giue the ſame vnto creatures, which neither haue their owne beeing,neither are able of themſelues to bring forth,or to worke any effects at all without it! and that more is, to giue certaine credit vnto the enemie of all faith and beliefe,euen to the Father of leaſing,who taketh as much glorie in falſhood,as God himſelfe doth in truth; as being the proper marke of his power. For it chan-

A ced that theſe letters ſent by the Eunuch to the Sultaneſſe, were intercepted & brought vnto Mahomet the great Sultan, whom they moſt concerned: whereupon it ſo fel out, that he which tooke vpon him to foretell the long life and empire to befall to another man, could not foreſee the end of his own life, which followed him faſt, euen at the heeles, being himſelfe by the commaundement of the great Sultan, with the young prince, the Eunuch, and fiftie others of the conſpirators, & ſuch as were conſenting vnto the conſpiracie, moſt cruelly ſtrangled, and the Sultaneſſe her ſelfe drowned. Howbeit ſome report this yong Prince to haue bin ſtrangled vpon ſuſpicion of conſpiring againſt his father, with the rebels of ASIA: which after his death being found not to be ſo, the Baſſa which put that ſuſpicion into Mahomets head, to haue bin therefore worthily hanged. But with theſe contentments taken from the croſſes B of our enemies, let vs againe returne vnto HVNGARIE.

Mahomet cauſeth his eldeſt ſonne, with diuers others to be ſtrangled.

The laſt yeare ended with the great bruit of the comming of the Tartar Han, with a great army into HVNGARIE, and now he had diſpatched his Embaſſadors towards the king of POLONIA, to demand of him tribute, and paſſage through his countrie. Great and proud demands to be both at once required. But the King of POLONIA requited him againe with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly anſwering of his threats. Which ſo reſolute and blunt a refuſall, cauſed the proud tyrant to change his intended courſe, & for feare of being defeated by the Polonians in paſſing through their countrie, (as the Tartars had often beene) before he could come into HVNGARIE, tooke another way, and turned with his Armie toward VALACHIA. Of whoſe comming Radul the Vayuod vnderſtanding, and C that beſide the forraging of his countrie, they had a purpoſe to diſplace him, & to ſet vp another Vayuod in his ſtead; with great diligence gathered together the greateſt power that he could, and ſo marched vnto the borders of his country, there to attend the comming of theſe Tartars, and to ſtay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his deſire, for the barbarous people beeing arriued, and attempting with all their force to haue entred, were by this little armie encountred; which commanding the countrey, tooke all the aduantages of the ſtrait paſſages, and there notably repulſed the fierce enemie. Two of the firſt encounters fel out fortunately vnto the Valachians, who therein ſlew about 3000 of the Tartars; whoſe auantgard for all that ſtill came on, and at the third encounter ſo long maintained the fight, that their whole Armie was now come in; and hardly charged the Valachians; whoſe fortune ſurcharged, began then to change, the hardie beeing conſtrained to bow vnder the multitude, & valor forced to yeeld vnto number. Which was not done without a long and cruel fight, both armies encountring with great courage and furie, the one for the defence of their countrie, and the other for an entrance vnto their conqueſts. Howbeit the ſtrong enemie at length preuailed, and entring into VALACHIA, brought in with it ruine, death, and deſtruction.

The Polonian denieth the Tartars paſſage through his countrie, into Hungarie.

Diuers hard cōflicts betwixt the Tartars & the Valachies in their paſſage through Valachia.

The Tartars hauing by force thus opened themſelues a way through VALACHIA, and grieuouſly ſpoyled the countrie, were come with their armie to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, a town in HVNGARIE, to ioyne their forces with Haſſan Baſſa, now after his marriage returned into this countrey with a great armie to continue his charge: who cauſed the Tartars to bee muſtred in his preſence, and found them to be fortie thouſand ſtrong. Men of great courage againſt the weake, but meere cowards before the couragious: who in ſtead of aſſaulting the walls of any ſtrong towne, fell vpon the cottages of poore countrey villages, ranſacking and pilling the poore inhabitants, as well in the villages of the territories ſubiect vnto the Turks, as in the territories of the Chriſtians; conſtraining the poore people, contrarie to their conſcience, and to the preiudice of their faith, to ſweare to ſerue the Turke: Beſides that, they enforced them to furniſh them with all warlike prouiſion and munition, which they put into CANISA, but a while after that our men had defeated the Garriſon there. Neither were they ſo contented, all the neighbours beeing thereabouts ſubiect to this tempeſt: for they paſſed into STIRIA with their families, and ouerran a part of that Prouince, ſpoyling it of men, cattell, & goods; leauing in ſtead of them, deſtruction, miſerie, and death; and carried away with them two thouſand poore Chriſtians for ſlaues, whom they ſold vnto the Turks, and made great profit of them. From thence they went into the Countrey of SHAVARIE, embruing themſelues with the bloud of the Chriſtians, rifling their Villages, and after that burning them; carrying away with them a thouſand Chriſtian captiues into moſt miſerable bondage and ſlauerie. Which cruell outrages afterward thruſt the valiant Colonell Collonitz G into the field, againſt theſe barbarous people, to ſtay their incurſions, and to defeat them if he could.

This worthie Commander had but a few dayes before been much troubled in appeaſing the French light horſemen in garriſon in the villages about ROQVESBVRG, riſen vp in mutinie for their pay: whoſe hot and moued ſpirits he by his wiſedome ſo calmed, as that they were content againe to be ſworne to the Emperor, and ſo ioyned themſelues vnto the armie of Collonitz, which was then 10000 good men ſtrong.

In the meane time, the Tartars greedie of prey, and ſtill ſeeking after bootie, ranſackt and ſpoyled fiue and twentie countrey villages about VERADIN; all which they afterward burned alſo, carrying away with them a great bootie both of men and cattell, no man reſiſting H them. At which time other companies of them alſo inuading the Countie Serin his Iſland as farre as RACKENSPVRGE, made in it great ſpoyle, as had their fellowes elſewhere, and beſide other bootie, carried away with them two thouſand Chriſtian Captiues. Theſe outrages of the Tartars armed the Countie on the one ſide, and Collonitz on the other; who couragiouſly oppoſing themſelues againſt theſe Barbarians, for a time ſtayed their incurſions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Armie, ſufficient enough for the valour thereof, to haue ouerthrowne that of their enemies, for number dreadfull. This made them to turne their courſe another way into SCLAVONIA, beeing in number fiue and thirtie thouſand men, leauing nothing behind them there but death and deſolation, for the number of priſoners and great booties which they carried from thence. Amongſt other their ſpoyles, it was I their fortune by the way to meet with ſixe hundred of the Chriſtian ſouldiers, of whome not one eſcaped their hands, but were ſlaine euery mothers ſonne. At length it ſo fortuned, that certaine of their Troupes in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the Countie Serin, who with his Followers ſtill houered aloofe off, for feare to bee of their great multitude ouerwhelmed: a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his ſoldiers ouerthrowne and all cut in pieces, and a number of Chriſtian Captiues by them taken, deliuered out of chaines, and ſet at libertie. Which exployt was greater for the feare it brought vpon the Enemie, than for the ſlaughter there made. For the Tartars, ſtill in doubt to meet againe with the Chriſtian Troupes (who left not one of them aliue that they could light on) were glad now to keepe themſelues cloſer together, and ſo did a great deale the leſſe harme K than when they without feare roamed vp and downe at their pleaſure: ſo that euen by this little victorie the Countrey receiued ſome comfort, and the Earle greater honour; Small helpes beeing infinite Treaſures in time of neceſſitie, which out of it would not bee to bee reckoned of.

The Tartars repreſſed by countie Serin.

The Garriſon Souldiers of CANISIA, of late defeated by Collonitz in going to meet the Conuoy comming towards them with victuals (as is before declared) the reſt of the Garriſon deſirous to be reuenged, were conſulting of the meanes how to bring the ſame to paſſe. It fortuned that at the ſame time there was a fugitiue Chriſtian Soldier in the towne, who made ſhew of a man male-content, deſirous to turne Turke: of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he ſeemed to know much of the deſignes of the Chriſtians, and the meanes how to croſſe them: Whereof hee ſo aſſured them, as if the matter had been now alreadie done; promiſing to bring them euen into the middeſt of the Chriſtian Campe, and to deliuer it into their hands and power. Howbeit his meaning was nothing leſſe; for ſeeing the Turkes much buſied with carrying in of victualls into the Caſtle, brought into the Towne after the ouerthrow of their Fellowes before ſent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentiue to that buſineſſe; knowing the place in the Caſtle where the powder and munition lay, hee at the ſame time by a traine layd fire thereunto, and afterward, amiddeſt the tumult and the ſturre, by a loope hole in the wall, got himſelfe out of the Towne, and came to Collonitz, who with his Troupes lay neere there by in ambuſh, expecting the opportunitie to performe ſome notable exployt vpon the ſucceſſe of ſo dangerous an aduenture, whereunto hee had before beene made priuie. Neither fayled the fire any thing of the accuſtomed violence thereof, but ſeemed rather to redouble the ſame, it had ſo ſuddenly conſumed the Buildings, Munitions, and perſons. All the place felt the furie thereof; the Cannons, Cannoniers, Souldiers, and whatſoeuer elſe, was ſubiect vnto

A notable exployt done by a fugitiue Chriſtian.

A vnto this dreadfull blaſt: all was ſhaken and turned vpſide downe, yea the fire burſt out of the caſtle, and burnt the greateſt part of the towne alſo. There was a confuſion of feare, miſhap, and miſerie together, the terror whereof cauſed many of the Turkes to caſt themſelues ouer the walls, in hope ſo to haue ſaued their liues: but whileſt they thought ſo to haue eſcaped the danger of the fire, they preſently fell vpon the edge of the ſword: for meeting with the ſouldiers of Collonitz (who lying in ambuſh neere thereby, awaited the opportunitie in that ſo confuſed a tumult, to haue ſeiſed vpon the place) they were all either taken priſoners, or ſlaine. But ſee the hap, how one croſſe chance of fortune ouerthrew this ſo notable a deſigne, as had it beene well followed, might in one moment haue recouered that ſtrong place, which had before for the ſpace of many dayes endured the greateſt forces of the Otho- B man Emperour; neither yet was then ſo loſt, but through the infamous treacherie of our owne men.

A faire opportunitie for the recouerie of Canſia, ouerſlipped through the diſloyalty of the French & Wallons.

You haue heard before, how that Collonitz had by faire perſuaſions, rather than by true effects, appeaſed the French men and Wallons, vp in mutinie for their pay; ſo that by him perſuaded, they had againe giuen their oath of fidelitie vnto the Emperour, and to follow his Armie. But now when Occaſion ſerued, and held out as it were both her armes vnto the Chriſtians, for the regaining and conqueſt of Canisia, theſe French men and Wallons, the greateſt part of Collonitz his ſtrength, iniuriouſly refuſed her ſo faire an offer; and at ſuch time as they ſhould rather haue fought naked, than haue failed in their dutie, (it beeing to haue gained a moſt great and rich conqueſt) for want of pay (as they pretended) turned their C backes, and being by no intreatie or perſuaſions to bee mooued, to the diſcouragement of the reſt, who were better minded, and their owne eternall infamie, withdrew themſelues from the Armie. So that Collonitz rather by the wicked vnfaithfulneſſe of his owne diſloyall ſouldiers, than by the valour of his enemies, diſappoynted of his purpoſe, was to his great diſcontentment, contrarie to that he hoped, enforceed to retyre without any thing more doing.

The Tartars defeated by the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti.

While this exployt, ſo well begun, but euill performed, was in hand, the Turkes and Tartars aſſembled together, made a cruell ſpoyle in the country about Rab, euen almoſt vnto the Gates of the Towne, carrying away with them a great number both of men and beaſts. In fine, it chanced that the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti came that way, who vnderſtanding D what had happened, with all ſpeed made after theſe Robbers, ouertooke them in their retreat neere vnto Alba Regalis, ſlew a great number of them, and inforced the reſt to leaue a great part of their prey behind them. With which bootie recouered euen out of the Lyons mouth, they returned to Rab; of whom the poore inhabitants and country people, with teares ſtanding in their eyes, requeſted to haue againe their own goods. But War, the enemie of Charitie, and nurſe of barbarous Crueltie, had ſo hardned the hearts of theſe men of Warre, as that they were not to bee mooued to reſtore them their Cattell againe, but that they muſt redeeme them for preſent money, which they did, and ſo receiued them.

Now the noble Collonitz ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſhamefully forſaken of his owne Souldiers, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, and the Turkes and Tartars in great numbers comming to the reliefe and repairing of this ſo ſore ſhaken towne; and out of hope to do any good thereon, full of griefe and indignation returned towards Comora. And howbeit that euill happe had cruelly fruſtrated the glorie of his enterpriſe, yet the Heauens, in deſpight of Fortunes frowne, left not this noble and valiant Captaine altogether without honour, but as amorous of his vertues and valour, preſented vnto him in this Winter of Fortunes diſpleaſure, ſome trophies of glorie. For vpon the way as he was returning home he met with 2000 Turkes, whom after ſome ſmall reſiſtance he cut all in pieces; miſerable ſacrifices, appointed vnto the furie of his wrath. In this fight their enſignes were all taken, and a number of priſoners, the chief of whom, together with the Enſignes, he ſent to Pragve, as a Preſent for the Emperour, and a token of his good ſeruice.

2000 Turks defeated by Collonitz.

The report then was, That the Turkes and Tartars with their vnited forces had forraged Sclavonia, taken diuers ſtrong holds, burnt a number of villages, and carried away eight thouſand Chriſtians priſoners, beſide a great number moe ſlaine with the ſword, or conſumed with fire, and all the Cattell of the Country driuen away; and that being with this bootie come to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, they had there receiued command with Mahomet Baſſa, G to beſiege COMORA, and that all the Commanders of the Turkes Armie were thereupon reſolued. All which reports no whit diſmayed the valiant Collonitz, or any thing altred his deſignes; but hauing fortified COMORA againſt the intended ſiege of the Turkes, and taken from thence foure culuerins, according to a former purpoſe by himſelfe intended, reſolued now to take from the Turkes the caſtles of LOQVA and BOVLONNEVAR, the garriſons whereof greatly annoyed the territories of the Chriſtians, and hindred the deſignes of this great Captaine. Theſe two Caſtles are ſcituate vpon a great mariſh which ſeperateth HVNGARIE from RASCIA, and are therefore as bounders of Hungarie, and ſtrong enough to be defended againſt a ſmall armie.

The caſtle of Loqua beſieged by Collonitz.

Vpon which reſolution he ſet forward with his ſmall and valiant power, and the fourth H day arriued within the ſight of LOQVA, a Caſtle well manned, and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the defence thereof. The army lodged, Collonitz with a drum ſummoned the beſieged to yeeld vp the place, with promiſes of curteſie if they ſhould now accept of the ſame whileſt it was offred them: Which they ſtoutly refuſed to doe, ſwearing to the contrary, That they would die and liue within thoſe their walls. Collonitz ſeeing them ſo reſolued, firſt cauſed a Mill to be aſſaulted, which placed ouer againſt the caſtle, and well fortified, ſerued it in ſtead of a bulwarke, and ſeemed hard to be taken: howbeit his men, loath to haue their good fortune euen in the beginning checked, gaue thereunto ſo braue an aſſault, that after the enemie had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became maſters of the I place, carried it, and therein lodged: but finding it dangerous to bee kept, and to ſtand them in ſmall ſtead, they ſet it on fire, and afterward planted foure Culuerins in batterie before the Caſtle. But as they were thus buſied, the Turkes couragiouſly ſallied out vpon them, not doubting to aduenture themſelues, for the hope they had to bee in ſhort time by their great Armie relieued. In this ſallie they met afront with the Haiduckes, whom they fiercely charged, and ſo gauled them, that hauing ſlaine thirtie of them, they retyred without any loſſe, forthwith diſcharging ſo many thundring ſhot and arrowes vpon our men, as that they well knew not how to ſaue themſelues from the danger of them, in ſuch ſort, that all the ways to approch the place being ſtopped, they began to deuiſe how to ſet the caſtle on fire: Which they by certaine fire-works attempted, but to ſmal purpoſe, the fire being no ſooner kindled, K but that it was forthwith by the Turkes quenched. This done, and our men diſappointed of their hope, they deuiſed to ſet fire vpon the timber which ioyned the paliſado to the Caſtle ſtretching toward the port. Which their attempt ſorted but to ſmall effect alſo, the fire burning but ſlowly to do the enemies any great harme. All which deuices failing, they reſolued by plaine force to aſſault the Caſtle, and to ſcale the ſame: which enterpriſe reſolued vpon, the Haiduckes carrying before them certaine ſtrong and thicke plankes of wood, in ſtead of targuets, to defend them from the ſmall ſhot and arrowes of their enemies; by this deuice gained the paliſado placed vpon the ditch: and being there in ſome ſafetie, with their muſkets and harquebuſies ſo applied the beſieged, that they draue them from their curtaines, and made that they durſt no more ſhew themſelues vpon the walls. And immediately after, two companies of the Haiduckes placed ten ladders againſt one of the towers of the Caſtle, and ſo with their Enſignes in their hands couragiouſly mounted the ladders, in hope to haue gained the place: but the Turkes as men reſolued to liue and die in their caſtle, valiantly repulſed thoſe Haiduckes, and by force drew in vnto them from off the ladders, the two Enſigne-bearers of the Haiduckes, whoſe heads they cut off, and caſt them downe vnto their fellows, which were yet comming vp the ladders; and the two Enſignes ſo gained vpon the wals, they placed in the middeſt of their owne, as the trophies of the ſpoyles of them who would haue ſpoyled them. With which ſo great courage of the enemies, and death of their fellowes, our men not a little diſmayed, kept themſelues cloſe at the foot of the wall, as afraid any further to force the place, which to their loſſe they ſaw ſtored with ſuch valiant men to defend it.

Notable reſiſtance made by the beſieged Turkes.

Collonitz perceiuing this diſcomfiture of theſe men, and wel aſſured that the caſtle was not but by valor to be woon, immediatly drew out of euerie companie of the County Ringraue, cer-

A certaine of the beſt and moſt reſolute Souldiours to renew the aſſault: Which ſo honourable a charge they cheerefully vndertooke, and as men of courage, began forthwith to mount the ladders. Which the Haiduckes beholding, againe tooke courage, and partly aſhamed of themſelues, and partly to be partakers of the ſpoyle and prey, if they ſhould preuaile, did what they might for the winning of the place, ſtriuing now who ſhould doe beſt. Which aſſault was with ſuch furie and preaſe of men maintained, that the Turkes not able longer to withſtand ſo great forces, were conſtrained to yeeld both themſelues and their Caſtle vnto the furie of their angrie enemies. Which caſtle indeed coſt much Chriſtian bloud, but yet more of the Turks: for the Haiduckes armed with rage and reuenge, ſlew almoſt all in the caſtle, as well Raſcians as Turks, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Among others there was an Hun-B garian renegate there taken, whom for haſt they beheaded, beeing not at leiſure to empaile him, the ordinarie puniſhment for ſuch faithleſſe miſcreants. But during this ſpoyle made by men chafed with furie, the wind and fire were on their part exerciſing of their rage alſo. For the fire which they had caſt vpon the paliſado, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now increaſed with the wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, hauing burnt the paliſado, got hold of the caſtle alſo; whereunto the Souldiours (loaded with prey and bootie, the things they moſt deſired) had no regard at all: ſo that the fire vtterly conſumed the Caſtle, with whatſoeuer elſe had eſcaped their greedie hands.

The Caſtle of Loqua by the Chriſtians take and ſacked.

The Turkes in garriſon at Bovlovvenar (a fortreſſe but a league diſtant from this burnt C Caſtle) ſeeing theſe flames of fire, and doubting what might beſide themſelues, began to conſult what courſe were beſt for them to take, as either to attend the comming of the enemie, and ſo to abide the chance of warre, or elſe betimes to prouide for themſelues by flight: the conſideration of their honour and dutie perſuaded them to ſtay, but the ruine of their neighbours, as ſtrong and valiant as themſelues, perſuaded them otherwiſe. In fine, the care of the preſeruation of their liues preuailed, and the reſolution was, That they ſhould flie. And ſo putting all their houſhold-ſtuffe and goods into certaine boats there readie vpon the Lake, they by the middeſt thereof fled: fooliſhly perſuading themſelues, that our men comming thither, and finding nothing there, would not long there ſtay, but bee gone; after whoſe departure they might as they thought returne againe vnto their old dwellings, and in the meane time hid themſelues in the mariſh, vntill that the enemie were paſt. But our men comming thither, and finding no man in the Caſtle, neither yet any thing elſe that could wel be carried away, wondered to ſee that there were any men ſo cowardly, as for feare to abandon ſuch a place, as for the ſtrength thereof might haue beene an example to others to ſtand vpon their guard and defence, they ſought out euery corner thereabout, to find out whither the Turkes were fled. At laſt after much diligent ſearch, they found certaine boats which the Turkes had ſunke in the channell neere vnto the caſtle gate, which cauſed them to thinke that they were fled by water, and happely were in ſome place not far off. Theſe boats were forthwith drawne vp out of the water, and found furniſhed with oares and ſuch other things as belonged vnto them. Which done, Collonitz choſe out certaine of the moſt valiant and reſolute of the Haiducks, whom he commanded in thoſe boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who accuſtomed to ſuch exployts, and not ignorant of the places and ſecrets of their Countrie, went aboord, and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone paſt two leagues vpon the lake, but that they diſcouered a party of theſe fugitiues hid in a little iſland, awaiting the end of this tempeſt, to recouer againe that which they had forſaken. The Turks diſmayed with the ſight of theſe men, and forced by neceſſitie ſtand vpon their guard, welcommed them with certaine little faulcon ſhot which they brought with them in their boats, thinking to haue hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with ſuch muſick, to be moued therewith: beſides that, the deſire of the booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the caſtle into the iſle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining thereof, ſo that al fear of danger ſet apart, they landed in the Iſle. Whom ſo landing, the Turks with great courage receiued; ſo that betwixt them was fought a greater fight than is for ſo ſmal a number on both ſides to be beleeued, only valor and not number holding the ballance of the victorie. But in the end, the chiefe of the Turkes, and he which was their gouernour in Bovlovvenar, ſlaine, the reſt diſcouraged came to parley, yeelding themſelues with their wiues and children, and all that they had, as a prey vnto the victors. The priſoners were G brought backe againe vnto the Caſtle, vntill the next day, that our men hauing put a good and ſtrong garriſon of foure hundred Haiduckes, and two hundred Huſſars into BOYLOWINAR, with their priſoners, and their bootie returned toward COMORA: where they, notwithſtanding diuers reports of the aſſembly of the Turks garriſons for the ſurpriſing of them vpon the way, in ſafetie arriued, with a rich bootie, and a number of wagons loaded with the ſpoiles of their enemies. The emperour had for his part thirteene enſignes, beſide the places woon; which being nigh vnto CANISIA, much bridled the ſpoylings and incuſions of that garriſon.

Moyſes by Baſta ouerthrown flyeth vnto his ſtrong caſtle of Solomoſe.

He with his wife and familie flieth vnto the Turkes.

But leauing theſe endleſſe troubles of HVNGARIE for a while, let vs now again looke into TRANSILVANIA, to ſee what they there do. Moyſes the rebel by Baſta the Emperors lieutenant (as we haue before ſaid) ouerthrowne, and diſappointed of his hope, betooke himſelfe H vnto a ſtrong caſtle of his owne, called SOLOMOSE, there in feare attending the final ſucceſſe of his affaires. Baſta in the meane time being as wiſe to make vſe of his victorie, as he was valiant to obtaine the ſame, ſubdued the reſt of the countrie, repreſſed the rebels, ſtopped the way of ſedition, and put Moyſes in diſpaire of all ſafetie. Who ſeeing himſelfe brought vnto ſuch extremitie, offered to yeeld his caſtle vnto the Turkes, and ſo without farther acquainting of any man with his purpoſe, thruſt himſelfe with his wife and family, and all the reſt of his ſubſtance into TEMESVVAR, a ſtrong citie of the Turkes not far off: whom the Baſſa in ſhew moſt courteouſly receiued, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a prey of the great wealth of this new-come fugitiue: who had not there long ſtaied, but that he had I perſuaded the captain of GIVASGAR, a ſtrong frontier caſtle there by, to deliuer the ſame to the Turks, and that without the priuity of the gariſon ſoldiers, for that he doubted that they would hardly be therunto drawn: who yet getting knowledge therof, put their captain in remembrance of his duty, beſeeching him not to draw ſuch an infamy both vpon himſelfe and them, by committing ſo foule a fact. But afterward finding him reſolutely ſet downe for the betraying of the Caſtle, they ſuddenly layd hands vpon him, and ſtruck of his head; and ſo with the bloud of their traiterous captain, hauing auerted the eminent danger, with great honour held the place.

Baſta beſiegeth the Turkes in the caſtle Solomoſe.

Moyſes now as he thought in ſafetie at TEMESVVAR, was yet ſtill plotting how to trouble the ſtate of TRANSYLVANIA, and raiſe new ſturs therein; and to that end ſent a number of K ſpies with letters of credence vnto the principall men of that countrie, aſſuring them of great and ſufficient aid from the great Turke, if they would but take vp armes for their libertie (as he termed it) and ſhew themſelues in field againſt the Imperialls. Neither was Baſta in the meane time careleſſe of him, or negligent in his ſo weightie affaires; but knowing that he as a notorious rebel had yeelded his Caſtle vnto the Turkes, and was himſelfe retyred vnto TEMESVVAR, forthwith made choice of ſix thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers in his whole Armie, and ſo ſet forward to beſiege it: whom at his arriuall the Turkes there in garriſon derided, in hope to fruſtrate his deſignes. For why, they thought that their Caſtle ſeated vpon a ſteepe high hill, fortified with good and ſtrong walls, enuironed with a broad and deepe ditch, and not ſubiect vnto batterie, could not but with much labour, great danger, and long time, bee L gained out of their hands, it being impoſſible (as they ſuppoſed) for their enemies to make a breach, or find an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men ſeeing the ſtrength of the place, and the difficultie to force it, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmayed at the foot of the hill where the Caſtle ſtood; yet more diſcouraged with the impregnableneſſe of the place, than with the valour of the defendants. But what cannot induſtrie and valour do? in ſeeking about to find ſome means to make ſhew of their courage & valor, they diſcouered a little ſharpe ſteepe hill ouer againſt the caſtle, from the top whereof the caſtle was to be battered, and the beſieged diſtreſſed: but to bring the cannon thither, and eſpecially with horſes, was impoſſible, by reaſon of the ſteep roughneſſe of the aſcent thereunto, with broken and hanging rocks, ouergrowne with trees and buſhes, as if it had bin another Alps, not but with fire and vinegre to be opened: yet in fine, our men reſoluing to gaine the place, did themſelues that which their horſes ſhould haue done but could not, & by force of hand drew their cannon vp to the top of the hill, & hauing planted it ouer againſt the midſt of their enemies great ordnance, began to batter the caſtle: which done, they day & night made their approches, fortified their forts & trenches, brought on their warlike munitions, and put all things in ſuch order, as if they would euen by plaine force haue carried the place. But the Turkes more admiring the valorous reſolution of our men, then reſoluing themſelues vpon their reſiſtance, being not many in number within the place, and ſeeing themſelues to haue to do with men of inuincible courage, laying aſide both their hope and weapons, craued to come to a parley. Which granted, it was at length agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the Caſtle, leauing behind them, their great ordnance, their munition and enſignes, and ſo with their armes, and liues onely ſaued, to depart. A great and glorious conqueſt got with ſmall charge; onely by reſolution gained by our men without perill: thoſe being indeed the true victories, which neither draw bloud out of the veines, nor teares out of the eyes.

The caſtle of Solomoſe by the Turks yeelded vp to Baſta.

This ſtrong place ſo gained, contrary to the common opinion conceiued thereof, led the whole prouince as it were by the hand vnto the obeiſance of the emperour: in ſuch ſort, that Baſta hauing called together all the principall men of TRANSYLVANIA, declared vnto them the iuſtice of his cauſe, the right of the Emperour, with the malice and trechery of the Turks and rebels: how they might liue in aſſurance with the one, and become miſerable with the others: That the Emperour was alwaies armed for their defence and health, deſiring nothing but their welfare and preſeruation; wheras their enemies to the contrary ſought altogether their ruine and decay: That as they were not to expect light flames of fire out of the ſea, no more they were to looke for aid from thoſe their mortall enemies, whom they knew to haue before decreed to haue put them all to death, and to haue giuen their countrey vnto the Tartars their enemies: That this diſaſter had not now beene to fall vpon them, either euer haue been by them perceiued, without the aid of the Emperour; who oppoſing himſelfe againſt this fire, had quenched it and put it out; preſeruing them with his great charge, and ſauing them euen in the middeſt of their greateſt perils and dangers. That they ſhould therefore remember theſe his ſo great benefites, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publique faith, which bindeth vs to the reward of good deſerts: and that all the recompence that the Emperour deſired, was the welfare of the eſtate, as concerning their owne good; inſomuch, that hee deſired nothing of them but their obeyſance, for being bound to defend them and preſerue them to his power; whereby it ſhould come to paſſe, that he ſhould be ſatisfied for his trauels, and they preſerued from their enemies; the prince and the ſubiects together iointly working their mutuall health and welfare, each of them according vnto their proportion, for that this mutuall performance of dutie preſerued the ſcepter for the good gouernment of their eſtate. Whereunto their anſwer was, That they beſought him that their countrey might be relieued from the croud and crueltie of the men of war, and deliuered from the intollerable burthens of tributes, which ſo heauily oppreſſed it: that theſe obiects and inconueniences could not keepe them conſtant in their obedience, ſeeing that they both felt them, and receiued them from the hand of them, to whom they had yeelded their obedience, in hope to haue beene by them relieued: That the new feeling of the wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the obiect of their harms ſtill kept both their eies and their minds occupied vpon them who were the cauſes thereof; ſo that they could not well either looke vpon them or make reckoning of them: That therfore it would pleaſe him to eaſe them of their grieuances, in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian duckats yerely for to pay his men of war, and would farther furniſh them with al proviſions neceſſarie; it being a thing more honorable and profitable alſo vnto a prince, moderately to vſe his ſubiects means to keep his ſtate in perpetuitie, than through couetouſnes to deuoure them in one day, in their loſſe to vndoe himſelfe for euer. This their offer was by Baſta accepted, and the minds of theſe people by this contentment giuen them, kept in their dutifull allegeance and loyaltie vnto the Emperour.

Baſta his admonitions to them of Tranſyluania.

The anſwere of the Tranſyluanians vnto the admonitions of Baſta,

But whilſt Baſta thus trauelled for the quieting of TRANSILVANIA, Moyſes the rebell in the meane time was for his part no leſſe buſied for the diſturbing thereof againe, inſomuch, that hauing by the appointment of the Viſier Baſſa receiued tenne thouſand Tartars in his aid, and aſſiſted with a great number of Turks, he with enſignes diſplaied, entred into TRANSILVANIA, proteſting there to dye, or to be reuenged of Baſta, who had before chaſed him out thence. And the better to effect this troubleſome deſigne, hee now had made choice of a moſt fit time for the performance thereof. Baſta vpon the truſt he had of the publique faith which he came to take of the Tranſyluanians, for their allegeance vnto the Emperor, which aſſured him from all ſtirs and tumults in that prouince, being with a ſmall power come from CLAVDIOPOLIS in HVNGARIE, and then lying at WISCEBOVRG, vpon the confines of HVNGARIE. Which his journy, and the neceſſity of his preſence in HVNGARIE for the defence thereof, had cauſed the Tranſyluanians to beleeue, that he ſhould for that yeare ſtay in HVNGARIE as Generall of the Emperours armie there. Vpon which perſuaſion of his abſence many of them began againe to hold vp their heads, and to entertaine high conceits of new ſtirrs, whereunto Moyſes by his eſpials had prepared them, and now by his preſence not a little incouraged: inſomuch that many as wel of the nobilitie as others, ioyned themſelues vnto him, and his increaſed armie againſt the Imperials.

Wiſcebourg beſieged by Moyſes.

Wiſcebourg yeelded to Moyſes.

Moyſes with his power beeing come into the prouince, firſt forced a caſtle, about three leagues diſtant from WISCEBOVRG, and ſlew all the garriſon therein. Which exploit incouraged him farther, ful of hope in the abſence of Baſta; and ſeeing himſelfe now the abſolute maſter of the field, which he at his pleaſure without reſiſtance forraged, robbed, and ſpoiled, with his men loaded with bootie, beſieged WISCEBORVG, a little towne vpon the confines of HVNGARIE and TRANSILVANIA, neither by art nor by nature ſtrong, but expoſed as a prey vnto him that is in the field ſtrongeſt, if ſuccours be not at hand to relieue it. Howbeit weak as it was, it held out three weeks ſiege, and hauing a breach made in the wals endured two aſſaults againſt all the forces of the rebell. After which the beſieged thinking themſelues to haue ſufficiently diſcharged their dutie, in holding out ſo long, and induring of ſo much, and out of hope to be relieued by the weake forces of Baſta, came to parley with the enemie, and their liues and goods ſaued, yeelded vnto him the towne, and ſo departed themſelues to VARADIN.

Moyſes in great fauour with Mahomet.

Now albeit that there were no great forces of the Emperours on foot in TRANSILVANIA, yet the hungrie Haiduckes for all that fayled not to follow theſe warres, euen amidſt the great clouds of their enemies, and were euer taking of ſome prey or bootie from the enemie, the chiefeſt and almoſt the onely meanes whereby they liue. In which doing, as they benefited themſelues (the chiefe Motiues of their aduentures) ſo they not a little eaſed the countrey, by repreſſing the excurſions and pillages of the Turkes, whereof the countrey had indured the furie. Where, amongſt other priſoners by them taken, it was their fortune to light vpon a Chiaus of the Turkes come from CONSTANTINOPLE, going toward the rebell Moyſes from the great Sultan Mahomet. Who by them examined, confeſſed, That Moyſes was a man in great grace and reputation with his Lord and Maſter the Graund Seignior: And that hee was ſent to aſſure him thereof, as alſo of all the needfull aſſiſtance of his Prince, if hee ſhould faithfully and effectually ſerue him in TRANSILVANIA, and bring it vnder his ſubiection and power, as hee had promiſed and ſworne. In which doing, he ſhould not onely gaine the credit of a noble and faithfull ſeruant towards him, but ſhould farther obtaine thereby the honour to bee the Lieutenant Generall of his armie in this Prouince; the great Sultan (as hee ſaid) hauing meanes as eaſie as wordes to aduaunce his faithfull ſeruitours; who might draw more good fortunes in one houre out of this infinite ſource of felicitie and greatneſſe, than they could in a thouſand yeares out of the pouertie of the Princes of EVROPE. Hee ſayd alſo, That the Great Sultan had on foot an armie of a hundred and fiftie thouſand men ſtrong, for the conqueſt of PESTH and STRIGONIVM, furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, which had now alreadie turned head toward HVNGARIE, had it not been for the rebellion of ſome of his diſloyall ſubiects, whom for all that hee would in ſhort time chaſtiſe, and ſo turne his whole forces vpon the Emperour.

A Generall beſieged, looſeth his reputation.

Moyſes proud of his late conqueſt, and hauing found a great deale of great Ordnance in WISCEBOVRG, reſolued to proſecute his victorie, and to beſiege Baſta in SOMOSINNAR, whereinto he had thruſt himſelfe, with the reſt of his ſmall forces. But Baſta better acquainted with martiall affaires than hee, and knowing that a generall departed from his charge, and brought to the mercie of a wall for his chiefe defence, hath loſt his credit and reputation with his friends, and they alſo in hope of ſafetie from him thought it beſt firſt to take order for the ſtrengthening of the place, ſo to put Moyſes out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterwards as he might to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his

The Baſſa of Temeſwar calleth home his Turkes out of Tranſyluania, for the repreſſing of the Haiduckes.

A Wherefore he in good time aduertiſed the Gouernour of CASSOVA (who was neereſt vnto him) of Moyſes his deſignes, and of the neceſſitie wherewith he was himſelfe encloſed. Who forthwith conceiuing the conſequence of ſo great an exploit, as concerned both the loſſe of the place, and of ſo great a commander as was Baſta, a loſſe irreparable, preſently commanded ſix companies of horſemen to thruſt themſelues into the place, for the better defence thereof. Theſe horſemen either afraid of the rebels armie, or elſe fauouring his proceedings, without reſpect of that they had in charge, or of their honour (things deerer vnto men of worth than their liues) without any attempt at all giuen returned again to CASSOVA; hauing with their pilfering and outrages by the way much offended and prouoked the minds of the countrey people by him ſpoiled. But being now better aduiſed, and repenting themſelues B of their faults, and crauing pardon of their Gouernour, who was about with the reſt of his power to haue cut them in pieces, they offered him for ſatisfaction, ſix of the principall authors of their diſloyaltie; who were all forthwith executed, and their quarters (to the terrour of others) hanged vp vpon Gibbets by the high waies ſide. But Baſta by their trechery lay in the meane time without ſuccour, forſaken by his friends, and the place wherin he lay, in danger to be taken: when the Tranſyluanians dwelling neere thereby reſolued to relieue him as well for feare of the Turks bondage, as for the tyrannie of Moyſes; one of whoſe Secretaries with letters of credence then threatened all the countrey with fire and ſword, and al kind of miſeries, if the inhabitants helped not with all their power to force the place and to win it. Which threats by Moiſes publiſhed before he had any abſolute power, diſmaied euery man: C for why, they could not hope for any moderation or kindnes in the proſperitie of him, who in the time of his aduerſitie gaue ſuch apparent teſtimonies of his crueltie. So that the people, doubting this angrie man, reſolued to preuent his ſo grieuous threats by relieuing of Baſta, who onely was able to ſtop him. Amongſt others, Radul Vayuod of VALACHIA mindful of the aid that Baſta had giuen him againſt the Tartars, and willing now as a friend to reach his hand in time of his ſo hard diſtreſſe, immediatly rayſed a power of eight thouſand Valachians, which he preſently ſent to the reliefe of Baſta. Moyſes aduertiſed of their comming, and farther vnderſtanding that Baſta hauing well fortified the place, was departed thence, hauing before his departure aſſuredly promiſed his men there left to relieue them, and that hee was now in the midſt of the field gathering together his armie, changed both his reſolution D and purpoſe, of himſelfe raiſed his ſiege, and ſo departed. After which, miſhaps began to fall vpon him by heaps. The Turks forthwith forſooke him, taking their way to TEMESVVAR, whither they were by the Baſſa called backe, to repreſſe the Haiducks, who were now euery day euen at the gates of the citie. Theſe actiue and couragious men for their profit attending vpon al occaſions, knowing that the better part of the garriſon of TEMESVVAR, was gone to aid Moyſes, vpon the ſudden had deſperatly aſſailed the ſuburbs of that ſtrong citie ſlain, all that they found there, rifled them & burnt them: & ſo loaded with a great & rich prey both of cattel and other things, returned to VERADIN, no man purſuing of them: And not ſo contented were euery day abroad ſeeking after new bootie; which was the cauſe that the Baſſa now called backe the Turks from Moyſes home againe into their garriſons.
